TO THE HIGH AND MIGHTIE
PRINCE JAMES, BY THE GRACE OF GOD KING OF ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, FRANCE, AND IRELAND,
defendor of the faith, &c.

I may of some, and not without iust cause (most gracious and dread Soueraigne) be imputed vnto me for no small presumption, to present vnto your royall Maiestie (a prince of so great learning and iudgement) these homely fruits of mine endeouours and paines taken in the Generall Historie of the Turks, and strange successe of their great and mightie Othoman Empire. Whereunto for all that I was the rather induced, not only by the rare and wonderfull clemencie ioyned vnto many other the great and most resplendent vertues of your heroicall mind; the least whereof, is sufficient to haue cheared vp my weake and feeble spirits; but also by the encouragement of the right Worshipfull my most especiall friend Sir Peter Manwood knight, the first mouer of me to take this great Worke in hand, and my continuall and onely comfort and helper therein. Which to doe, I was also the more desirous, seeing diuers little volumes and small parts of the Historie presented vnto the greatest Princes: as the little Treatise of Pan. Iouius, de Rebus Turcicis, dedicated vnto the great and mightie Emperour Charles the first: and the small Historie of Caelius Secundus, de Bello Melitensi, vnto her late sacred Maiestie, of most happie and blessed memorie, the rare Phoenix of her sex, who now resteth in glorie: with diuers others of like sort, by the learned authors thereof still commended some to one great prince of their times, some to others: all filling me vvith good hope, that this whole and continuat Historie of that Northerne and warlike Nation (vvhich in short time by God his appointment hath brought such fatall mutations vpon a great part of the world as former times haue sildome or neuer seene) drawne euen from the first beginning thereof, and continued vnto this present yeare (not together to my knowledge by any one before written) should vvith your most noble Maiestie find no lesse grace and fauour, than hath almost euery part thereof vvith other the foresaid and suchlike most mightie and famous Princes: and the rather, for that your Maiestie hath not disdained in your Lepanto, or Heroicall Song, vvith your learned Muse to adorne and set forth the greatest and most glorious victorie that euer was by any the Christian confederat princes obtained against these the Othoman Kings or Emperors. Besides that, the matter and argument of this Historie and such like (so much concerning cerning the state and good of the Christian commonweale in generall, neuer by any so much impugned or endangered, as by these the naturall & capitall enemies therot) of right vnto none so properly belongerth, as vnto your most excellent Maiestie, with the rest of the Christian princes, sitting at the helme of your Estates; who onely by your vnited forces (the barbarous enemies greatest terror) are able to giue remedie thereunto: in the chiefeſt ranke of whom, your sacred Maiestie for glorie, honour, strength and power (God long preferue the same) is now second vnto none. Thus perswaded and encouraged, I in all humble and dutifull manner doe present vnto your Maiestie these my weake endeouours: which how vnworthie soeuer they be of so great and princely a fauour, as well for the meanenesse of me the Author, as for the plainenesse of the style; yet if for the worthinesse of the matter, or of your owne great and infinit clemencie you vouchsafe them your Maiesties fauourable regard, they shall no doubt liue no lesse fortunat than if they had beene more happily borne and brought to light: seruing (if to no other vse) yet as faire warnings vnto such great ones as God hath here vpon earth exalted aboue the rest vnto the highest degrees of power and of state, for the good gouernment and defence of his church and people. Accept them I beseech you most mightie Monarch into your gracious protection, so shall I (if God spare life) be comforted & encouraged vnder so mightie a fauor to proceed to amend what shall be found amisse, and adde what future times and better helpe shall deserue and minister vnto me for the perfection of this Historie: and according to my bounden dutie incessantly in all humilitie pray vnto the great God of all might and power (by whom all kings and princes raigne) to his glory long to preferue your most royall Maiestie in blessed health and peace to rule and raigne ouer vs and these your great kingdomes, so happily by you vnited: and so likewise (his will so being) your most noble posteritie after you euen to the worlds end.

Your Maiesties most

THE AVTHORS INVICTIon to the Christian Reader vnto the Historie of the Turkes following.

THE long and still declining state of the Christian commonweale, with the utter ruine and subuersion of the Empire of the East, and many other most glorious kingdomes and prouinces of the Christians; neuer to be sufficiently lamented, might with the due consideration thereof worthily moue euen a right stonie heart to ruth: but therewith also to call to remembrance the dishonour done vnto the blessed name of our Saviour Christ Iesus, the desolation of his Church here militant vpon earth, the dreadfull danger daily threatned vnto the poore remainer thereof, the millions of soules cast headlong into eternall destruction, the infinit numbers of wofull Christians (whose grievous groanings vnder the heauie yoke of infidelitie, no tongue is able to expresse) with the carelesnesse of the great for the redresse thereof, might giue iust cause vnto any good Christian to sit downe, and with the heauie Prophet to say as he did of Hierusalem: O how hath the Lord darkened the daughter of Sion in his wrath? and cast downe from heauen vnto the earth the beautie of Israell, and remembered not his footstoolle in the day of his wrath? All which miseries (with many others so great, as greater there can none be) the prince of darkenesse and author of all mischief hath by the persecuting princes of all ages, and auncient heretickes, his ministers, laboured from time to time to bring vpon the Church of God, to the obscuring of his blessed name, and utter subuersion of his most sacred word; but yet by none, no not by them all together so much preuailed, as by the false Prophet Mahomet, borne in an unhappie houre, to the great destruction of mankind: whose most grosse and blasphemous doctrine first phantasied by himselfe in Arabia, and so by him obruded vnto the world; and afterwards by the Sarasin Caliphes (his seduced successours) with greater forces maintained, was by them together with their Empire dispersed ouer a great part of the face of the earth, to the unspeakeable ruine and destruction of the Christian Religion and State: especially in Asia and Affricke, with some good part of Europe also. But the vnitie of this great Mahometane Monarchie being once dissolved, and it diuided into many kingdomes, and so after the manner of worldly things drawing vnto the fatall period of it selfe, in proceſse of time became of farre lesse force than before, and so lesse dreadfull vnto the Christian princes of the West, by whom these Sarasins were againe expelled out of all the parts of Europe, excepting one corner of Spaine, which they yet held within the remembrance of our fathers, untill that by their victorious forces they were thence at length happily remooued also, after that they had possessed the same about the space of seuen hundred yeares. In this declination of the Sarasins (the first champions of the Mahometane superstition, who though they had lost much, yet held many great kingdomes both in Asia and Affricke, taken for the most part from the Christians) arise the Turkes, an obscure and base people, before scarce knowne vnto the world, yet fierce and courageous, who by their valour first assired vnto the kingdome of Persia, with diuers other large prouinces: from whence they were about an hundred threescore and ten yeares after againe expelled by the Tartars, and enforced to retire themselves into the lesser Asia: where taking the benefit of the discord of the Christian princes of the East, and the carelesnesse of the Christians in generall, they in some good measure repaired their former losses againe, and maintained the state of a kingdome at Iconium in Cilicia

To the Reader.

(now of them called Caramania) holding in their subiection the greater part of that fruitfull countrey, still seeking to gaine from the Christians what they had before lost unto the Tartars. But this kingdome of the Turkes declining also, by the dismemb'ring of the same, there slept up among the Turkes in Bythinia one Osman or Othoman, of the Oguzian tribe or familie, a man of great spirit and valour, who by little and little growing up amongst the rest of his countrey-men, and other the effeminate Christians on that side of Asia, at last like another Romulus tooke upon him the name of a Sultan or King, and is right worthly accounted the first founder of the mightie Empire of the Turks: which continued by many descents directly in the line of himselfe, euen unto Mahomet the third of that name, who now reigneth, is from a small beginning become the greatest terror of the world, and holding in subiection many great and mightie kingdomes in Asia, Europe, and Affricke, is growne to that height of pride, as that it threatneth destruction vnto the rest of the kingdomes of the earth: labouring with nothing more than with the weight of it selfe. In the greatnesse whereof is swallowed up both the name and Empire of the Saracens, the glorious Empire of the Greekes, the renowned kingdomes of Macedonia, Peloponessus, Epirus, Bulgaria, Serbia, Bosnia, Armenia, Cyprus, Syria, Egypt, Indea, Tunes, Argiers, Media, Mesopotamia, with a great part of Hungarie, as also of the Persian kingdome, and all those churches and places so much spoken of in holy Scripture (the Romanes only excepted;) and in briefe, so much of Christendome as farre exceedeth that which is thereof at this day left. So that at this present if you consider the beginning, progresse, and perpetuall felicitie of this the Othoman Empire, there is in this world nothing more admirable or strange: if the greatnesse and lustre thereof, nothing more magnificent or glorious; if the power and strength thereof, nothing more dreadful or dangerous: which wondering at nothing but at the beautie of it selfe, and drunke with the pleasant wine of perpetuall felicitie, holdeth all the rest of the world in scorn, thundering out nothing but still bloud and warre, with a full persuasion in time to rule ouer all, presing vnto it selfe no other limits than the uttermost bounds of the earth, from the rising of the Sunne vnto the going downe of the same. The causes whereof are many and right lamentable, but for the most part so shut up in the counsils of the Great, as that for me to seeke after them, were great follie: yet amongst the rest, some others there be, so pregnant and manifest, as that the blind world taketh thereof as it were a generall knowledge, and may therefore without offence of the wiser sort (as I hope) euen in these our nice dayes be lightly touched. Whereof the first and greatest, is the iust and secret iudgement of the Almighty, who in iustice deliuereth into the hands of these mercilesse miscreants, nation after nation, and kingdome vpon kingdome, as vnto the most terrible executioners of his dreadful wrath, to be punished for their sinnes: others in the meane while, no lesse sinfull than they, in his mercie enjoying the benefit of a longer time, calling them vnto repentance. Then, the vncertainetie of worldly things, which subiect to perpetuall change cannot long stay in one state, but as the sea is with the wind, so are they in like sort tossed up and downe with the continuall surges and waues of alteration and change: so that being once growne to their height, they there stay not long, but fall againe as fast as euer they rise, and so in time come to nothing: As we see the greatest Monarchies that euer yet were vpon earth haue done, their course being run; ouer whom, Time now triumpheth, as no doubt at length it shall ouer this so great a Monarchie also, when it shall but then line by fame, as the others now doe. Next to these causes from aboue (without offence be it said) is the small care the Christian princes, especially those that dwelt further off, haue had of the common state of the Christian Commonweales: whereof euen the verie greatest are to account themselves but as the principall members of one and the same bodie, and haue or ought to haue as sharpe a feeling of anothers harmes, as hath the head of the wrongs done vnto the feet, or rather as if it were done vnto themselves: in stead of which Christian compassion and unitie, they haue euer and euen yet at this time are so decided among themselves with endlesse quarrels, partly for questions of religion (neuer by the sword to bee determined,) partly for matters touching their owne proper state and souerainetie, and that with such distrust and implacable hatred, that they neuer could as yet (although it haue beene long wished) ioyne their common forces against the common enemy: but turning their weapons one vpon another (the more to bee lamented) haue from time to time weakened themselves, and opened a way for him to deuour them one after another: where as with their combined forces (the greedie enemies greatest terror) they might long since not onely haue repressed his furie, and abated his pride, but with small danger and much glorie (God fauouring their so honourable attempts) haue againe recovered from him most of those famous Christian kingdomes, which he by force against all right holdeth at this day in most miserable subiection and thralldome; many millions of the poore oppressed Christians in the meane time out of the furnace of tribulation in the anguish of their soules crying in vaine vnto their Christian brethren for reliefe. By ciuite discord the noble countrey of Gracia perished, when as the father rising against the sonne, and the sonne against the father, and brother against brother, they to the mutuall destruction of themselves called in the Turke, who like a greedie hyon lurking in his den, lay in wait for them all. So perished the kingdomes of Bulgaria, Serbia, Bosnia, and Epirus, with the famous islands of the Rhodes and Cyprus, betrayed as it were by the Christian princes their neighbours, by whom they might haue easily beene relieved. So the most flourishing and strong kingdome of Hungarie (in the reliques whereof, the fortune of the Turkish Empire hath longer stucke than in the conquest of any other kingdome, by it attempted, whatsoeuer) diuided in it selfe by the ambition of princes and ciuile discord, the weaker still calling vnto his aid the mightie power of the Turke, is long since for the most part become vnto him a prey, the poore remainders thereof being at this day hardly defended by the forces of the Christian Emperour and of the princes his confederats, sildome times meeting together with such cheerefulnesse or expedition, as the necessitie of so great a matter requirereth. Vnto which so great a cause of the common decay, may be added the euill choice of our souldiours employed in those warres, who taken up hand ouer head out of the promiscuous vulgar people, are for most part vntained men, serving rather for shew and the filling up of number, than for use, and in no respect to be compared with the Turks Janizaries and other his most expert souldiours, continually euen from their youth exercised in feats of armes. Not to speake in the meane time of the want of the auient martiall discipline, the wholesome preseruation of most puissant armies, which breedeth in the proud enemy a contempt of the Christian forces, with a full persuasion of himselfe, that he is not by such disordered and weakne means to be withstood. But to come neuer vnto the causes of the Turks greatnesse, and more proper vnto themselves, as not depending of the improuident carelesnesse, weaknesse, discord, or imperfections of others: first in them is to be noted an ardent and infinit desire of souerainetie, wherewith they haue long since promised vnto themselves the monarchie of the whole world, a quickie motiue vnto their so haughtie designs: Then, such a rare unitie and agreement amongst them, as well in the manner of their religion (if it be so to be called) as in matters concerning their state (especially in all their enterprises to be taken in hand for the augmenting of their Empire) as that thereof they call themselves Islami, that is to say, men of one mind, or at peace among themselves: so as it is not to be marvelled, if thereby they grow strong themselves, and dreadfull to others: ioyne vnto this their courage, conceiued by the wonderfull successe of their perpetuall fortune, their notable vigilancie in taking the aduantage of euery occasion for the enlarging of their Monarchie, their frugalitie and temperatnesse in their diet and other manner of liuing, their straight obseruing of their auient militarie discipline, their cheerefull and almost incredible obedience vnto their princes and Sultans: such, as in that point no nation in the world was to be worthily compared vnto them: all great causes why their Empire hath so mightily encreased and so long continued. Whereunto may be added the two strongest sinewes of euery well governed commonweale, Reward propounded to the good, and Punishment threatened vnto the offender; where the prize is for vertue and valour set up, and the way laied open for euery common person, be he neuer so meanelly borne, to aspire vnto the greatest honours and preferments both of the Court and of the field, yea euen vnto the neere affinitie of the great Sultan himselfe, if his valour or other worth shall so deserue: when as on the contrarie part the disloyall or cowardly is to expect from the same soueraine power nothing but disgrace, death, and torture. And yet these great ones not contented by such commendable and lawfull means still to extend or establish their farre spreading Empire, if that point once come in question, they stick not in their diuellsish policie to breake and infringe the lawes both of Nations and Nature. Their leagues grounded vpon the law of Nations, be they with neuer so strong capitulations concluded, or solemnitie of oath confirmed, haue with them no longer force than standeth with their owne profit, serving indeed but as snares to entangle other princes in, vntill they haue singled out him whom they purpose to deuour; the rest fast bound still looking on as if their owne turne should neuer come, yet with no more assurance of their safetie by their leagues than had the other whom they see perishe before their faces. As for the kind law of nature, what can be thereunto more contrarie, than for the father most vnaturally to embrace his hands in the bloud of his owne children? and the brother to become the bloudie executioner of his owne brethren? a common matter among the Othoman Emperours. All which most execrable and inhumane murders they couer with the pretended (safetie of their state, as thereby freed from the feare of all aspiring competitors (the greatest torments of the mightie) and by the preservation of the integritie of their Empire, which they thereby keepe whole and entire vnto themselves, and so deliuer it as it were by hand from one to another, in no part dismembred or impaired. By these and such like meanes is this barbarous Empire (of almost nothing) growne to that height of maiestie and power, as that it hath in contempt all the rest, being it selfe not inferiour in greatnesse and strength vnto the greatest monarchies that euer yet were vpon the face of the earth, the Roman Empire only excepted. Which how farre it shall yet farther spread, none knoweth, but he that holdeth in his hand all the kingdomes of the earth, and with his word boundeth in the raging of the sea, so that it cannot further passe. Mowed with the greatnesse vesse and glorie of this so mightie and dreadfull an Empire, growne for the most part out of the ruine of the Christian commonweale, with the utter subuersion of many great and flourishing kingdomes, and wofull fall of many moe right puissant and mightie princes, not without grieffe to be remembered: I long since (as many others haue) entered into the heauie consideration thereof, purposing so to haue contented my selfe with a light view of that which might well be for euer of all good Christians lamented, but hardly or neuer remedied; untill that afterwards led with a more earnest desire to know the strange and fatall mutations, by this barbarous nation in former time brought vpon a great part of the world, as also so much as I might see so great a terror of the present time, and in what termes it standeth with the rest, I had with long search and much labour, mixt with some pleasure and mine owne reasonable contentment, passed through the whole melancholie course of their tragicall Historie: yet without purpose euer to haue commended the same or any part thereof vnto the remembrance of posteritie, as deeming it an argument of too high a reach, and fitter for some more happie wit, better furnished with such helps both of nature and art, as are of necessitie requisite for the vndertaking of so great a charge, than was my selfe, of many thousands the meanest. Not vnmindfull also of that which the Poet (keeping decorum) saith in like case, though farre lesse matter, of himselfe:

Virg. Ecl. 3.

Cum canerem reges & praelia, Cynthus aurem
Vellit, & admonuit: Pastorem Tittere pingues Pascere oportet oues, deductum ducere carmen.

When I did sing of mightie kings, or els of bloudie warre, Apollo pluckt me by the eare, and said I went too farre:
Besemes a shepheard Titterus his fatlings for to feed,
And for to fit his rurall song vnto his slender reed.

Resides that, so many difficulties euen at the first presented themselves vnto my view, as that to overcome the same, if I should take the labour in hand, seemed to me almost impossible: for beside the sea and world of matter I was to passe through (requiring both great labour and time) full of the most rare example both of the better and worse fortune in men of all sort and condition, yielding more pleasure vnto the reader than facilitie to the writer, I saw not any (among so many as had taken this argument in hand) whom I might as a sure guide or loadstarre long follow in the course of this so great an Historie: many right worthy and learned men (whose memorie my soule honoureth) contenting themselves to haue with their learned penne enrolled in the records of neuer-dying fame, some, one great expedition or action, some another, as in their times they fell out; yea the Turkish Histories and Chronicles themselves (from whom the greatest light for the continuation of the Historie was in reason to haue bene expected) being in the declaration of their owne affaires (according to their barbarous manner) so sparing and short, as that they may of right be accounted rather short rude notes than iust Histories, rather pointing things out, than declaring the same; and that with such obscuritie, by changing the auncient and vsuall names as well of whole kingdomes, countries, and provinces, as of cities, townes, riuers, mountaines, and other places, yea, and oftentimes of men themselves, into other strange and barbarous names of their owne deuising, in such sort, as might well stay an intenteue reader, and deprive him of the pleasure together with the profit he might otherwise expect by the reading thereof; whereunto to giue order, perspicuitie, and light, would require no small trauell and paine. Not to speake in the meane time of the diuersitie of the reports in the course of the whole Historie, such as is oftentimes most hard, if not altogether impossible to reconcile. Notwithstanding all which difficulties, with many others more proper vnto my selfe, hauing with long labour and diligent search passed through the course of the whole Historie, and so in some reasonable sort satisfied my selfe therein, I thought it not vnjust, as well for the worthinesse of the matter, as for the zeale I beare vnto the Christian commonweale, and for the satisfying also of some others my good friends, much desirous of the same, to make prooffe out of the dispersed workes of many right worthy men, I could set downe one orderly and continuat Historie of this so mightie an Empire, with the great and fatall mutation or rather subuersion of many right strong and flourishing kingdomes and states (the proper worke of all mightie rising Empires, still encreasing by the fall of others) wherewith this proud monarchie hath alreadye daunted a great part of the world, being so many and so strange, as that moe or more wonderfull were not cuer to be scene in any of the greatest monarchies of auncient time or memorie, and so together, and as it were vnder one view and at one shew, to lay open vnto the Christian Reader, what I was glad to seeke for out of the desufled labours of many: a worke so long and laborious as might well haue deterred a right resolute and constant mind from the vndertaking thereof, being as yet to my knowledge not vndergone or performed by any: wherein among such varietie,

To the Reader.

varietie, or more truly to say, contrarietie of writers, I contented not my selfe, as a blind man led by his guide happily of no better sight than himselfe, to tread the steps of this or that one man, going for a while before me, and by and by leauing me againe stumbling in the darke: but out of the learned and faithfull workes of many, according to my simple iudgement to make choice of that was most probable, still supplying with the perfections of the better, what I found wanting or defectiue in the weaker, propounding vnto my selfe no other marke to aime at than the very truth of the Historie; as that which is it selfe of power to giue life vnto the dead letter, and to couer the faults escaped in the homely penning or compiling thereof. Which the better to performe, I collected so much of the Historie as possibly I could, out of the writings of such as were themselves present and as it were eye-witnesses of the greatest part of that they write, and so as of all others best able, most like also to haue left vnto vs the very truth. Such is the greatest part of so much of the Historie set downe, gathered out of the doings of Nicetas Choniates, Nicephorus Gregoras, and Laonicus Chalcocondiles, all writing such things as they themselves saw, or were for most part in their time, and were vnto them done. Such are the wonderfull and almost incredible warres betwixt old Amurath the second, and his foster child, the fortunat prince of Epirus, of the Turks commonly called Scanderbeg, and by that wayward tyrant at his death together with his kingdom deliuered as it were by inheritance vnto his sonne, the great and cruell Sultan Mahomet; all written by Marinus Barletius, himselfe an Epirot, and in all those troublesome times then lining in Scodra a citie of the Venetians ioyning vpon Epirus. Such is the wofull captiuitie of the imperiall citie of Constantinople, with the miserable death of the Greeke Emperour Constantinus Palæologus, and the fatall ruine of the Greeke Empire, written by Leonardus Chienfis, Archbishop of Mitylene, being himselfe then present, and there taken prisoner. Such is the lamentable Historie of the Rhodes, taken for most part out of Ia. Fontanus his three bookes de Bello Rhodio, a learned man, then present and in great credit with Villerius the Great Master, at such time as that famous island, after it had by him and the other worthie knights of the Order bene most wonderfully of long defended, was to the great ruth of Christendome taken by the great Sultan Solymán. Such is the most tragicall Historie of Baiazet, Solymán his youngest sonne, collected out of the notable Epistles of Augerius Busbequius Legationis Turcicæ, he himselfe then lying embassador for the Emperour Ferdinand at Constantinople, and present in Solymán's campe at such time as he himselfe in person went ouer with his armie into Asia, to countenance his eldest sonne Solyman, who succeeded him in his Empire against his valiant younger brother Baiazet: and beside, well acquainted with the great Basses Achmet, Ruitan, Haly, and others, oftentimes mentioned in the Historie following. Such is also the Historie of the taking of the auncient citie of Tripolis in Barbarie from the knights of Malta by Sinan the proud Bassa, written by Nicholas Nicholay lord of Arfeuile, present at the same time with the lord of Aramont, then embassador for the French king vnto Solymán. So might I say also of the miserable spoile of the fruitfull and pleasant islands of the Mediterranean, made by Lutzis Bassa, Solymán his brother in law and great Admirall, with the submitting of the island of Naxos to the Turkes obedience, written by Iohn Critice, at that time duke of the same island. And so likewise of diuers other parts of the Historie, too long to rehearse. But for as much as euery great and famous action had not the fortune to haue in it a Caesar, such as both could and would commend vnto posteritie by writing that whereof they might truly say, They were themselves a great part: many right excellent Generals contenting themselves with the honour of the field, and their glorie there woon, leauing the honourable fame thereof to be by others reported. For lacke of such most certaine authors, or rather (as I before said) eye-witnesses, I gathered so much as I could of that remained, out of the workes of such, as being themselves men of great place, and well acquainted with the great and worthie personages of their time, might from their mouths as from certain Oracles report the vndoubted truth of many most famous exploits done both by themselves and others: as might Paul Iouinius from the mouth of Muleaffes king of Tunes, from Vastius the great Generall, from Auria the prince of Melphis, Charles the Emperour his Admirall, and such others: or els out of the writings of such as were themselves great traueilers into the Turkes dominions, and withall diligent obseruers of their affaires and state, as were the phisitions Pantaleon, Minadoic, and Leunclanius (of all others a most curious searcher of their antiquities and Histories) vnto which great Clarke and some others of that learned profession, we may worthily attribute the greatest light and certaintie of that is reported of a great part of the Turkish affairs. But these in the course of so long an Historie failing also (as by conferring that which is hereafter written, together with their Histories, is easily to be perceived) to perfect that I had taken in hand, I tooke my refuge vnto the writings of such other learned and credible authours, as of whose integritie and faithfulness the world hath not to my knowledge at any time yet doubted: yea for these few late yeares I was glad out of the Germane and Italian writers in their owne language to borrow the knowledge of these late affaires as not yet written in Latin, wherein if the reader find not himselfe so fully satisfied as he could desire, I would be glad by him to be better informed, as being no lesse desirous of others to learn the truth of that I know not, than willing to impart vnto others that litle which I know. Thus much I thought good to set downe, to perswade a Christian Reader of the truth of the Historie following, wherein he shall find matter enough to wonder at, and no lesse strange than that whatsoever it is that is written of the greatest monarchies of auntient time, vnto whom for power and maiestie it yeeldeth litle: But so much the more worthy our consideration than they, for that their periods alreadie run, and so their furie ouerpast, this in our time so flourisheth, and as this present so mightily swelleth, as if it would ouerflow all, were it not by the mercie of God first, and then by the iudges of some few of the Christian princes nearest vnto so great a danger with their great charge to their immortal glorie and benefit of the Christian commonweale mightily checked and kept within some bounds and compasse. This Historie for the most part thus as is afore said passed through, and brought to some good perfection, was yet by me againe laid aside; and like ynoung euen as an abortiue fruit to haue perished in the birth before it was growne to perfection, had I not many times fainting in the long and painefull trauell therewith, by my speciall good friend Sir Peter Manwood of S. Stephens in the countie of Kent knight of the honourable order of the Bath; a loue and great fauourer of learning (in whose keeping it so for the most part many yeares in safetie rested) bene still comforted and as it were againe reuiued, and now finally encouraged to take it in hand, and so at length as I might to perfect it: vnto whom (being the onely furtherer, stay, and helpe of these my labours) thou art for such pleasure as thou findest therein (if it be any) in courtiesie beholden. Now what I for my part haue in this my long trauell performed, I leaue it to thy good discretiō to consider, contenting my selfe in so great a matter to haue bin willing to haue done some thing; wishing no longer to liue, than in some measure to be profitable to the Christian commonweale, which long since in my nursing mother house Lincolne Colledge in Oxford, where I was sometime Fellow, I did purpose to performe, as it should please God in time to giue me meanes and occasion: in which mind I hope by the goodnesse & mercie of Christ so long as I liue to continue. Only this fauor (to conclude with) I request of thee That if in this so long and perplexed an Historie by peeces made of so many dierly handled & written by me in a world of troubles and cares, in a place that afforded no meanes or comfort to proceed in so great a worke, thou chance to light vpon some things otherwise reported than thou hast elsewhere read them (as I doubt not but thou maiest) not therefore forthwith to condemne what thou here findest, being happily taken from a more certaine reporter than was that wherunto thou guesst more credit or at leastwise not written by me, as measuring in any thing to preiudice thy better iudgement, but to leaue it to thy good choice in such diuersitie of reports to follow that which may seeme vnto thee most true. B THE GENERAL HISTORIE

OF THE TURKES, BEFORE THE RI-SING OF THE OTHOMAN FAMILIE, WITH ALL THE NOTABLE EXPEDITIONS OF THE CHRISTIAN PRINCES AGAINST THEM.

H E glorious Empire of the Turkes, the present terrour of the world, hath amongst other things nothing in it more wonderfull or strange, than the poore beginning of it selfe; so small and obscure, as that it is not well knowne vnto themselves, or agreed vpon euē among the best writers of their histories, from whence this barbarous nation that now so triumpheth ouer the best part of the world, first crept out or tooke their beginning. Some (after the manner of most nations) deriue them from the Trojans, led thereunto by the affinity of the words Turci & Teucri; supposing (but with what probability I know not) the word Turci or Turks, to haue bene made of the corruption of the word Teu-

cri, the common name of the Trojans: as also for that the Turks haue of long time inhabited the lesser ASIA, wherein the ancient and most famous citie of TROY sometime stood. No great reason in my deeming: yet giue the authors thereof leaue therewith to please themselves, as well as some others, which dwelling much farther off, borrow, or rather force their beginning from thence, without any probability at al; and that with such earnestnesse, as if they could not elswhere haue found, any so honourable ancestors. Other some report them to haue first come out of PERSIA, and of I wor not what, citie there, to haue taken their name: neither want there some which assume them to haue taken their beginning out of ARABIA, yea and some out of SYRIA, with many other far fet deuises concerning the beginning and name of this people: all seruing to no better purpose, than to shew the vncertainie thereof. Amongst others, Philip of MORNAY, the noble and learned Frenchman in his woorthy worke concerning the trueesse of the Christian religion, seemeth (and that not without good reason) to deriue the Turks together with the Tartars, from the Iewes, namely, from the ten Tribes, which were by Salmanaazar king of ASIRIA, in the time of Oseas king of ISRAEL, caried away into captiuitie, and by him consued into MEDIA, and the other vnpeopled countries of the North, whose going thither is not vnaptly described by Esdra, where among the great Herds of shee Tatars in the farthest part of the world Northward, euen at this day, are found some, that still retain the names of Dan, Zabulon, and Nephthali, a certaine argument of their descent: whereunto also the word Tartar or Tatar, signifying in the Syrian tongue remnants or leauings; and the word Turke, a word of disgrace, signifying in Hebrew, banished men; seemeth right well to agree. Besides that, in the Northern countries of RYSSIA, SARMATIA, and LITHVANIA, are found greater store of the Iewish nation than elswhere, and so neerer vnto the Tartarians, still the more; whereunto Io. Leunclauius the most curious searcher out of the Turks antiquities and monuments, addeeth as a farther conjecture of the descent of those barbarous northerne people from the Iewes, That in his trauell through LYONIA and LITHVANIA, in the coun-trie neere vnto the metropolitall citie of RICA, he found there the barbarous people of the Lettoes, quite differing in language from the other country people of the Curoes and Eftoris, no lesse barbarous than themselves; who had alwaies in their mouths as a perpetuall lamentation, which they with doleful moanes daily repeated abroad in the fields, Ieru, Ieru, Malco, Lon: whereby they were thought to lament ouer IERUSALEM and DAMASCO, as forgetfull of all other things in their ancient country, after so many wordes of yceres, and in a desolat place so far distant thence. And Munster in his description of LIVONIA repeating the like words, reporteth, That this rude people being demanded what they meant by these words so often and so lamentably by them without cause uttered: answered, That they knew no more than that they had beene so of long taught by their ancestors. But to leaue these opinions concerning their beginning, so diuers and vncertaine, and to follow greater probabilities as concerning the place from whence they came: it is vpon better ground thought by diuers others, and those of the best historiographers, That this barbarous nation which hath of late brought such fatall mutations vpon so great a part, not of Christendom onely, but euen of the whole world, tooke their first beginning out of the cold and bare country of SCYTHIA: induced thereunto, both by the authoritie of the greatest Cosmographers, as by most apparant reasons. Pomponius Mela, the describer of the world, reckning vp the people neere vnto the great riuer TANAI (the bounder of EUROPE from ASIA Eastward) amongst others maketh expresse mention of the Turks, in these words: Geloni urbem ligneam habitant. Iuxta Thyrsagete Turceque vastas sylvas occupant alunturque venando. Tum continuis rupibus late aspera & deserta regio ad Arympeos usque permittitur. The Geloni inhabit a citie of wood. And fast by, the Thyrsagets and Turks possesse the vast Forrests, and liue by hunting. Then, a rough and desart country with continuall rocks, is spaciouly extended euen as far as vnto the Arympeians. Plinie also in like manner reckning vp the nations about the fennes of MAOTIS, agreeing with that Mela reporteth, saith: Deinde Euaze, Cottæ, Cicimeni, Messeniani, Costobocci, Choatre, Zige, Dandari, Thyrsagete, Turce, usque ad solitudines altius, conuallibus asperas ultra quos Arympeus qui ad Ripheos pertinet montes. Next vnto them, are the Euaze, Cottæ, Cicimeni, Messeniani, Costobocci, Choatre, Zige, Dandari, the Thyrsagets and Turks vnto the desarts rough with wooddie vallies: beyond whom are the Arympeians, which border vnto the Riphean mountaines. And Ptolome in the description of SARMATIA ASIATICA maketh mention of the Tursi, whom many learned men suppose to haue been the same nation with the Turks. Vnto which ancient testimonies of reuerend antiquitie, adde the manners and conditions of the Turks, their ancient attire, their gesture, their gate, their weapons, and manner of riding, and fight, their language and dialect, so well agreeing with the Scythians: and a man shall find matter enough sufficient to perswade him in reason, that the Turks haue vndoubtedly taken their beginning from the Scythes; whom they in so many things resemble, and with whom of all other nations they best agree.

Now it hath beene no lesse doubted also among the writers of the Turks histories; at what time, and for what causes the Turks (to the trouble of the world) left their naturall seats in the cold country of SCYTHIA, to seek themselves others in more pleasant and temperat countries more Southerly, than it hath beene of their originall beginning. Blondus and Platina, report them, enforced with a generall want, to haue forsaken their native country and followed their better fortune, in the yeere of our Lord 755: with whom also Segonius agreeth in the cause of their departure, but not in the time or place when or whereby they departed. For they (as he saith) issued out of their dwelling places in the yeere of grace 844, by the straits of the mountaine CAVCASVS: whereas the other with greater probability suppose them to haue come forth by the Caspian straits: which the Turks also (as saith Sabellicus) affirme of themselves, their ancestors (as they say) being by their neighbours driuen out of the Caspian mountaines. Some others there be that report them to haue forsaken their native country, neither enforced thereunto by necessitie, or the power of others; but for their valour: sent for by the Sultan of PERSIA to aide him in his wars: vnadvisedly supposing that to haue beene the cause of their first coming out, which in deed hapned long time after, as in the proesse of this historie shall appeare. But whatsoeuer the aforesaid causes of want, or of the enemies power, might enforce them vnto, a greater power no doubt it was that stirred them vp, euen the hand of the Almighty, who being the author of all kingdomes vpon earth, as well those which he hath appointed as scourges wherewith to punish the world, as others more blessed; will haue his worke and purpose

A purpose full of diuine maiestie, to appeare in the stirring of them vp from right small beginnings, in the increasing & establishing of their greatnesse and power, to the astonishment of the world; and in the ruine and destruction of them againe, the course of their appointed time once runne. As for the difference of the time of their coming forth, before remembered, it may reasonably be referred vnto the diuers emotions of that people, who being not vnder the command of any one, but of their diuers gouernours, as the manner of that people was, are not to be thought to haue come forth all at once, either for one cause; but at diuers times, some sooner, some later, and that for diuers causes. This people thus stirred vp, and by the Caspian ports passing thence row the Georgian country, then called IBERIA, neere vnto the Caspian sea: first ceased vpon a part of the greater ARMENIA, and that with so strong hand, that it is by their posteritie yet holden at this day, and of them called TVRCOMANIA; of all other, the most true progenie of the ancient Turks. In which great country, they of long, vnder their diuers leaders, in the manner of their liuing most resembling their ancestors, roamed vp and downe with their families and herds of cattell, after the manner of the Scythian Nomades, their country men, without any certaine places of aboad; yet at great vnitic among themselves, as not hauing much to looke for wherfore to striue.

Armenia (now called Turcomania) the first seat of the Turks after their first coming out of Scythia.

The first kingdome of the Turks erected in Persia by Tangrolipix, Chiefeaine of the Selzuccian family: with the successe thereof.

His wandering and vnregarded people, but now the terror of the world, thus first seated in ARMENIA; long time there liued in that wide country, after their rude and woonted manner (from which the Turcoman nation their posteritie in that place, euen at this day: as we said much differeth not) and not onely notably defended the country thus by them at the first possessed, but still inroching farther and farther; and gaining by other mens harmes, became at length dreadfull vnto their neighbours, and of some fame also farther off: wherunto the effeminate cowardise of those delicate people of ASIA, with whom they had to do gaue no lesse furtherance, than their owne valour; being neuerthelesse an hardie rough people, though not much skilfull or trained vp in the feats of war. The fame of these Turks together with their fortune, thus daily encreasing, and the mightie Empire of the Sarafins as fast declining: which vnder their Chaliphes the successors of the false prophet Mahomet, hauing in lesse than the space of two hundred yceres, ouerspread not onely the greatest part of ASIA and AFRICA, euen vnto GADRES and the pillars of Hercules; but also passing ouer that strait, had ouerwhelmed almost all SPAIN, and not there staying, but passing the Pyrenei had pearced euen into the heart of FRANCE, and diuers other parts of Christendom; as namely, ITALY, SICILY, the famous Iland of the RHODES, with many others of the MEDITERRANEAN: now diuided in it selfe, and rent into many kingdomes, turned their victorious armes from the Christians vpon one another, to the mutuall destruction of themselves, & their empire. Amongst other the Sarafin Sultans which forgetting their obedience vnto their great Chaliph, tooke vpon them the soueraignie of gouernment (which admitteth no partner) was one Mahomet, Sultan of PERSIA, a right great prince, who hardly beset on the one side with the Indians, and on the other with the Chaliph of BABYLON his mortall enemie, praised aid of the Turks his neighbours, who were now come euen to the side of ARAXIS, the bound of his empire: Vnto which his request the Turks easily granted, in hope thereby to find a way for them afterwards to enter into PERSIA, and so sent him three thousand hardie men, vnder the leading of one Togra Mucaler, the sonne of Atikeil, a valiant captaine and cheefe of the Selzuccian tribe or family; whom the Greeks commonly call Tangrolipix, and some others Selduck or Sadock, names (as I suppose) corrupted of the great family whereof he was descended: By the aide of this Tangrolipix (for now we will so call him, as by the name most used) Mahomet the Persian Sultan, overcame Pisafirin the Chaliph of BABYLON, his Arabians being not able to endure the force of the Turkish archers. This war thus happily ended; the Turks desiring to returne home, requested of the Sultan leave to depart, and with a safe convoy to be conducted vnto the riuer ARAXIS; and there to haue the passage of that swift riuer opened vnto them; which was by the Persians strongly kept by two castles built vpon each end of the bridge whereby the riuer was to be passed: But Mahomet loth to forgoe such necessarie men, by whom he had obtained so great a victorie, and purposing to employ them further in his seruice against the Indians, would by no means hearken vnto their request; but seeming therewith to be discontented, commanded them to speake no more thereof, threatening them violence, if they should more presume to talke of their departure. The Turks therefore doubtfull of their estate, and fearing further danger, secretly withdrew themselves into the desert of CARAVONITIS; and for that they were in number but few, and not able to come into the open field against so many millions of the Sarafins, liued as they might by continuall excursions and roads which they made out of the desert Forrest into the countries adjoyning: wherewith Mahomet greatly incensed, sent out an armie of twentie thousand men, vnder the conduct of ten of his best captaines against them: who for want of water and other necessaries, doubting to enter the desert, encamped themselves in the side of the Forrest, there to consult what course to take. But Tangrolipix who with his Turks lay a great way off in the couert of the woods and mountaines, vnderstanding of the coming of his enemies, and of the manner of their lying; thought it best vpon the sudden by night to set vpon the Sarafins and Persians, if so happily he might overthrow them by policie, whom he was not able to encounter in plaine battell. Vpon which resolution, hauing trauelled two daies long, march in the desert, the third day at night he suddenly set vpon his enemies, lying negligently in their trenches, and by his vnexpected coming, brought such a feare vpon them, that they without longer stay betooke themselves to flight, euerie man shifing for himselfe without regard of others. This victorie so happily gained, and Tangrolipix now (beyond his hope) thoroughly furnished, with armour, horses, and abundance of all things needfull for the wars, kept the woods and Forrests no longer as a theefe or out-law, but shewed himselfe in the open field, where daily repaired vnto him numbers of roagues and vagabonds, seeking after spoile; with many other desperat villaines, who for feare of punishment were glad of such a refuge: So that in a short space his armie was growne to be fiftie thousand strong, and so much the stronger, for that they had nothing to trust vnto, more than the valour of themselves. Whilest Tangrolipix thus encreaseth, Mahomet enraged with the ouerthrow of his armie, in his furie caused all those ten captaines that had the leading thereof, to haue their eies pluckt out, threatening also to attire all the souldiers that fled out of the battell in womens apparell, and so disgraced, to carrie them about as cowards: and withall raised a great armie for the suppressing of the Turks. All things being now in readines, he set forward: when by the way the souldiers whom he had before so threatened to disgrace, suddenly fled to the enemy: with whose coming, Tangrolipix greatly encouraged and strengthened, resolved to giue the Sultan battell. And so boldly comming on, met with him at ISPAHAN, a citie of PERSIA, where was fought betwixt them a most terrible battell, with woonderfull slaughter on both sides. In the heat of which battell, Mahomet vnadvisedly riding too and fro to encourage his souldiers, falling with his horse, brake his necke: vpon which mischance both the armies comming to agreement, by common consent proclaimed Tangrolipix Sultan in his stead, and so made him king of PERSIA and of all the other large dominions vnto that kingdome belonging.

This was the first kingdome of the Turks, begun by the good fortune of Tangrolipix, about 214 yeeres after their coming out of SCYTHIA, in the yeere also of our Lord 1030; Constantinus Monomachus then reigning, or a little before (according to the Turks account) in the reign of Romanus Argirus, Constantine his predecessour. Tangrolipix by rare fortune, thus of a meane captain became king of PERSIA, forthwith commanded the garison that kept the bridge ouer the riuer ARAXIS, to be remooued, and so free passage to be giuen vnto the Turks his countrey men, at their pleasure to come over: who in great multitudes repaired into PERSIA, where they were by the new Sultan well provided for, and by little and little promoted vnto the greatest

- A greatest dignities of that kingdome; the Persians and Sarafins the ancient inhabitants thereof, being by these new come guests now kept vnder, and as it were troden vnder foot. Together with this kingdome, the Turks received the Mahometane superstition, from which they before not much abhorred, as men vsing circumcision: So that hard it is to say, whether the nation doth more; the Persians and Sarafins, by the losse of so great a kingdome, or the Turks, by embracing so great a vanitie.
- Tangrolipix* with his Turks thus possessed of the kingdome of PERSIA, held her him selfe therewith long content, but made war vpon his neighbour princes, especially against Pisafirin the Chaliph of BABYLON, whom hee in diuers battels ouerthrew; and hauing at length slaine him, joynd his kingdome vnto his owne. After that he sent Cutlu-Muses his cousin, with an armie against the Arabians, by whom he was ouerthrowne and put to flight. But returning by MEDIA he requested of Stephan the Greeke emperours lieutenant, leave to passe with his armie by the confines of his country: which his request, Stephan not only rejected, but also by strong hand sought to stop his passage; but joyning battell with him, was by the Turks easily ouerthrowne and himselfe taken. So Cutlu-Muses returning to Tangrolipix, and recounting vnto him the successe of his wars, perswaded him to turne his forces into MEDIA, as a most fruitfull countrey, and easie to be subdued. But he highly offended with the ouerthrow giuen by the Arabians, would not hearken vnto him, but raising a new armie in hope of better fortune, went against the Arabians in person himselfe. Cutlu-Muses in the meane time fearing the Sultans displeasure, fled with his followers and fauorits: and taking for his refuge PASAR a strong citie of the Chorasmians, reuolted from him; which the Sultan seeming not to regard, held on his intended journey against the Arabians, by whom he was also put to the worst; and enforced with dishonour to returne. After that, he with part of his armie besieged Cutlu-Muses, who by the strength of the place and valour of his people, for a great while notably defended himselfe. In the meane time Tangrolipix not vnmindfull what Cutlu-Muses had before said vnto him, concerning the easinesse of the conquest of MEDIA (a countrey (as hee said) defended but by women) sent Asan his brothers sonne, furnished the Deafe, with a conuenient armie to invade the same: who entering into the frontiers of that prouince, was there by the emperours lieutenant ouerthrowne, and himselfe with the greatest part of his armie slaine: with which losse the Sultan rather enraged than discouraged, sent Habramie Alim his brother, againe with an armie of an hundred thousand fighting men; with which so great a power the emperours lieutenant thought it not good to encounter, vntill he had procured farther aid from the emperour, especially out of BERIA, and therefore kept himselfe with such power as he had within his strong and fenced places: which Alim perceiuing, and out of hope to draw him vnto battell, coming vp and downe the countrey, at last besieged ARZEN an open towne, but full of rich merchants, by whom it was contrarie to his expectation, notably defended for the space of six daies; vntill that at length the Turks seeing no other way to win it, set fire vpon it in diuers places: by force whereof the inhabitants were enforced for safegard of their liues to flie, and to leaue the towne with an infinite wealth to the spoile of the enemy. By this time was Liparites gouernour of BERIA come with a great power to the aide of the emperours lieutenant in MEDIA: whereof Alim hauing intelligence, without delay hastened with his armie towards his enemies: and meeting with them a little before night, had with them a cruell fight, wherein the victorie fell vnto the Christians, who had the Turks in chase a great part of the night. Neuerthelesse Liparites valiantly fighting in another wing of the battell, was there taken and so carried away prisoner: For whose ransom the emperour sent a great summe of money, with certaine presents to the Sultan; all which he sent backe againe, and frankly set Liparites at libertie, wishing him neuer to beate armes more against the Turks. And with him sent the Seriph, a man of great place among the Mahometans, his embassadour vnto the emperour: who comming to CONSTANTINOPLE, amongst other things proudly demanded of the emperour to become tributarie vnto the Sultan, and so to be at peace with him for euer. Which his vnreasonable demand, was by the emperour with no lesse disdain scornfully rejected, and the Seriph so dismissed: which contempt of his embassadour the Sultan taking in euill part, as also not a little moued with the death of his nephew and losse of his armie, with all his power invaded the Roman prouinces. But being come as far as CORINTH without any notable harme doing, for that the countrey people hearing before of his coming, had in time conueighed themselves with their substance into their strong holds, whereof there was great store in those countries; and hearing also that the Greeke emperour was raising a great power to come against him at CESAREA; not daring to proceed any further, leaving so many enemies behind him, he fleeing in himselfe returned into MEDIA, where finding the people all fled into their strong townes, he laid siege vnto MANTZICHERT, a citie standing in a plaine champion countrey, but strongly fortified with a triple wall and deepe ditches: This citie he furiously assaulted by the space of thirte daies without intermission, but all in vaine, the same being still notably defended by Basilus gouernour thereof, and the other Christians therein. The Sultan wearie of this siege, and about to haue risen, was by Alan one of his great captaines, perswaded yet to stay one day, for him to make prooffe in, what he were able to do for the gaining thereof: whereunto the Sultan yeelding, committed the whole charge of the assault vnto him. Alan the next day diuiding the armie into two parts, and placing the one part vpon the higher ground, of purpose, with the multitude of their shot to haue ouerwhelmed the defendants; with the other part of the armie, furnished with all things needful for the assault, approached the wals: the Sultan in the meane time with certaine of the chiefe Turks, from an high place beholding all that was done: But this so forward a captaine in the midst of his endeavour lost himselfe, being slaine with a great number of his followers in approaching the wall. His dead bodie knowne by the beautie of his armour, was by two valiant yong men that salied out of the gate, drawne by the haire of his head into the citie; and his head being forthwith cut off, was cast ouer the wall among the Turks: wherewith the Sultan discouraged, and out of hope of gaining the citie, rose with his armie, pretending himselfe with other his vrgent affaires to be called home, and threatening withall, the next spring to returne with greater power, and to do great matters. But not long after, great discord arose betwixt the Sultan and his brother Habramie Alim, in so much that the Sultan sought by diuers meanes to haue taken him out of the way: which Habramie perceiuing, fled to his nephew Cutlu Musus, and ioyning his forces with his, denounced war vnto the Sultan his brother; who meeting with them not far from PASAR, ouercame them in plaine battell, wherein Habramie was taken, and presently by the commandement of his brother put to death. But Cutlu Musus with his cousin Melech, & six thousand Turks fled into ARMENIA; and by messengers sent of purpose, requested of the emperour Constantinus Monomachus to be receiued into his protection. But the Sultan with his armie following them at the heeles, they for their more safetie were glad to flie into ARABIA. The Sultan afterwards turning into IBERIA did there great harme, spoiling the countrey before him: against whom the emperour sent Michael Acoluthus, a valiant captaine; of whose approach the Sultan hearing, and that he would vndoubtedly ere long give him battell (deeming it no great honour vnto him to ouercome the emperours seruant, but an eternall dishonour to bee of him ouerthrown) retired with his armie backe againe to TAVRIS, leaving behind him one Samuch with three thousand Turks to infect the frontiers of the emperours territories; which both he and other the Turks captaines afterward more easily did, for that Monomachus the emperour hauing prodigally spent the treasures of the empire, to encrease his reuenue, had imposed a tribute vpon the frontier countries of his empire, woont before to befree from all exactions: in lieu whereof, they were bound to defend the passages from all incursions of the enemies; but now pressed with new impositions, had dissolved their woonted garrisons, and left an easie entrance for the barbarous enemies into the prouinces confining vpon them: Besides that the emperours immediatly following, and especially Constantinus Ducas, abhorring from wars, and giuen altogether to the hoording vp of treasure, gaue little countenance and lesse maintenance vnto men of seruice, which in short time turned vnto the great weakening, and in fine to the vtter ruine of the Constantinopolitane empire. At the same time also the gouernment of the Constantinopolitane empire by the death of Constantinus Ducas the late emperour, came to his wife Eudocia with her three sonnes, Michael, Andronicus, and Constantinus, all verie yong; whose sex and tender yeeres the barbarous nations hauing in contempt, at their pleasure grievously spoiled the prouinces of the empire, namely, MESOPOTAMIA, CILICIA, CAPADOCIA, yea and sometime as far as CÆLESIRIA. The report wherof much troubled the emperesse, & gaue occasion for many that loued her not, to say, That so troubled an estate required the gouernment of some worthie man. Wherefore shee fearing lest that the Senat, making choise of some other, she and her children should be remooued from the gouernment, thought it best for the preservation of her state and her childrens, to make choise of some notable & valiant man for her husband, that

But to check this her purpose (the onely remedie of her troubled thoughts) shee had at the death of the late emperour Constantine her husband, at such time as the soueraignie was by the Senat confirmed vnto her and her sonnes, solemnly sworn neuer more to marrie; which her oath was for the more assurance conceiued into writing, and so deliuered vnto the Patriarch to keepe. This troubled her more than to find out the man whom she could thinke worthe of her selfe, with so great honour. Shee held then in prison one Diogenes Romanus, a man of great renown & honorably descended; whose father hauing married the neece of the emperour Romanus Argirus, and aspiring to the empire, being conuicted thereof, slew himselfe for feare to be enforced by torments to bewray his confederats. This Diogenes was by the late emperour Constantine, for his good seruice against the Scythes (who then much troubled the empire) highly promoted, with most honourable testimonie in the charters of his promotions, That such honours were bestowed vpon him, not of the emperours meere bountie, but as the due rewards of his woorthie deserts. Norwithstanding after the death of the emperour, he sicke of his fathers discafe, and swelling with the pride of ambition, sought by secret meanes to haue aspired vnto the empire: Whereof the emperesse hauing intelligence, caused him to be apprehended and brought in bonds to CONSTANTINOPLE, where being found guiltie of the foule treason, and so committed to safe keeping, was shortly after brought forth to the iudgement seat againe, to receiue the heauie sentence of death. In which wofull plight, standing as a man out of hope and now vnterly forlorne, he mooued all the beholders with a sorrowfull compulsion: For beside that he was a man of exceeding strength, so was he of incomparable feature and beautie, adorned with many other rare qualities and vertues answerable thereunto: wherewith the emperesse mooued with the rest, or pearced with a secret good liking, is hard to say, reuoked the sentence of condemnation readie to haue beene pronounced vpon him, and gaue him pardon. And shortly after hauing set him at libertie, sent for him as he was going into CAPADOCIA his natie countrey, and made him generall of all her forces, with a full resolution in her selfe to marrie him, and to make him emperour, if shee might by any meanes get the writing out of the Patriarches hand, wherein her oath for neuer marrying againe, was comprised. For the compassing whereof, she entred into a deepe deuice full of feminine policie with one of her Eunuches, whom she purposed to vse as her pander for the circumuenting of the Patriarch. This craftie Eunuche instructed by his mistresse, comming to the Patriarch Ioannes Xiphilinus, a man both for his place and integritie of life much honoured, told him in great secret, That the emperesse had so far set her good liking vpon a yong gentleman, a nephew of his called Barda (then a gallant of the court) as that she could be content to take him to her husband and to make him emperour, if shee might by his holinesse be perswaded, that she might with safe conscience do it, and by him be discharged of the rash oath she had vnadvisedly taken, neuer to marrie againe, whereof hee had the keeping. The Patriarch, otherwise a contemner of worldly honours, yet mooued with so great a preierment of his nephew, promised the Eunuch to do therein whatsoeuer the emperesse had desired, which he accordingly performed. And so sending for the Senators one by one, in whose good liking the matter chiefly rested: he with much grauitie propounded vnto them the dangerous estate of the common weale, with the troubles dayly encreasing, and the continual feare of forreine enemies, not to be repressed by the weake hand of a woman, or the authoritie of yong children, but requiring (as he said) the valiant courage of some woorthie man. After that, hee began to find great fault with the rash oath which the emperesse had taken a little before the death of her husband, neuer to marrie; and vnterly condemning the same, as contrarie to the word of God, and vnjustly exacted of her, rather to satisfie the jealous humour of the emperour her late husband, than for any good of the common-weale: he in fine perswaded them, that the vnlawfull oath might be reuoked, and the emperesse set at libertie at her pleasure, by their good liking to make choise of such a man for her husband, as might better vndertake so weightie affaires of the empire, more fit for a man, than for so tender a lady and three yong children. The greater part of the Senat thus perswaded by the Patriarch, and the rest with gifts and promises ouercome by the emperesse; the Patriarch deliuered vnto her the writing she so much desired, & discharged her of her oath: wherupon shee forthwith calling vnto her certaine of her secret friends, married Diogenes, whom she caused to be proclaimed emperour. Now thought Eudocia, after the manner of women, to haue had her husband (whom she euen from the bottom of dispaire had exalted ted vnto the highest tpe of honour) in all things loyall and pliant: whereunto he for a while at the first forced himselfe, but afterwards (being a man of a proud nature, and haughtie spirit) became wearie of such obseruance, and began by little and little to take euery day more and more vpon him. And for that the imperiall prouinces in the East, were in some part lost, and the rest in no small danger, he aswell for the redresse thereof, as for his owne honour, and to shew himselfe an emperor indeed, and not the seruant of the emperesse, left the court and passed ouer into ASIA, although it were with a small armie and euill appointed: for why, it was no easie matter for him to furnish out the armie with all things necessarie, which by the sloth and sparing of the late emperours, had to the great danger and dishonour of the empire, bene vtterly neglected. Neuerthelesse the Turkish Sultan, who at the same time with a great power invaded the prouinces of the empire, hearing of his coming, and that he was a man of great valour, and doubting what power he might bring with him, retired himselfe; and diuiding his armie, sent the one part thereof into the South part of ASIA, and the other into the North, which spoiled all the countrey before them as they went, and suddenly surprising the cite of NEO-CESARIA, sacked it, and so laded with the spoile thereof departed. But the emperor vnderstanding thereof, and not a little greened therewith, drawing out certaine bands and companies of the best and most readiest souldiers in his armie, and with them coasting the countrey to get betwixt the Turks and home, yed therein such expedition, that he was vpon them before they were aware, and so suddenly charging them, brought such a feare vpon them, that they tooke themselves to their heeles, leauing behind them for haist, their baggage and cariages, with all the prisoners and bootie they had before taken at NEO-CESARIA, and in their late expedition: yet was there no great number of them slaine, for that the Christians forewaried with long trauell, were not able far to follow the chace. From thence taking his way into SYRIA, he sent part of his armie to MELITENA, and carried himselfe from ALEPPO, a great bootie both of men and cattell. At which time also the cite of HIERAPOLIS was yeilded vnto him, where he shortly after built a strong castell. But whilst he there staid, newes was brought vnto him that the other part of his armie which he had sent away, was ouerthrowne by the Turks, for the releefe of whom, he rose with all haist and matched towards them: but being in number faire inferior vnto his enemies, hee was by them as hee lay encamped, enclosed round in such sort, as that it was thought almost impossible for him to haue escaped. At which time also the gouernour of ALEPPO, traiterously revolted from him, and joynd his forces with the enemy, making now no other reckoning, but assuredly to haue taken him. But whilst the Turks thus dreame of nothing but of a most glorious victorie, and were in mind diuiding the spoile; the emperor without so much as the sounding of a trumpet, suddenly issuing out of his trenches, when they least thought he durst so haue done, and resolutely charging them home, put them to flight, & had of them had a notable victorie, had he thoroughly prosecuted the same. After that, hauing taken diuers townes he came to ALEXANDRIA in CILICIA, and there all about in the countrey billeted his armie, because of the approach of winter, and so returned himselfe to CONSTANTINOPLE. The next spring the Turks, according to their vsuall manner invading the frontiers of the empire, did much harme about NEO-CESARIA: whereof the emperor aduertised, went thither with his armie, and quickly repressing their furie, tooke his journey to the riuer EUPHRATES, where leauing part of his armie with Philaretus for the keeping of those frontiers, he himselfe retired Northward into CAPADOCIA. But after his departure, the Turks setting vpon Philaretus, put him to flight with his garrisons: and taking the spoile of the frontiers entred into CAPADOCIA, wasting all as they went: and afterwards turning into CILICIA, sacked ICONIUM a rich and populous cite. Whereof the emperor vnderstanding, at SEBASTIA, made towards them: but hearing by the way that they had ransacked the cite, and were for feare of his coming already retired, he sent Chatagurio gouernour of ANTIOCH, with part of his armie to MOPSIPHESTIA to stop the Turks of their passage. But they in the plaines of THARSVS were before distressed by the Armenians, and stript of all their rich prey: and hearing farther of the approach of the emperours power, fled by night, and so escaped: which the emperor vnderstanding, and hauing now well quieted those prouinces, and the yere far spent, returned againe to CONSTANTINOPLE. But after his departure, the Turks againe invading the frontier prouinces, he sent Manuel Comnenus, a valiant yoong man, generall against them; who so preuailed, that the emperor enuying at his honour, tooke from him a great part of his armie, and sent him with

- A with a small power into into SYRIA. But as he was vpon his way, he was by the Turks entrapped neere vnto SEBASTIA, and there taken, most part of his armie being at the same time ouerthrowne and slaine; with which losse, the emperor troubled, made great preparation to go himselfe in person against his enemies; who encouraged with the former victorie, ceased not to infect his territories. In the meane time, by great fortune came Manuel Comnenus home, together with the Turke that tooke him, who being fallen into the displeasure of the Sultan, fled vnto the emperor with his prisoner, of whom he was honorably entertained. All things now in a readinesse for so great an expedition as the emperor had in person purposed; he set forward and after long trauell hauing passed CESAREA, he encamped at a place called CRYAPEA; where for seuer execution done vpon certaine mutinous souldiers, one of the legions of his armie rose in mutinie against him: whom for all that he quickly pacified with the terror of the rest of his armie, which he threatened to turne vpon them if they proceeded to forget their dutie.
After that, remoouing to THEODOSOPOLIS, he diuided his armie, and sent Rufinus one of his best captaines, with one part thereof against Ghiat, and another part hee sent to besiege MANTZICERTS, retaining with himselfe the rest; being of no great strength. The Turks in MANTZICERTS finding themselves not able long to hold out, fell to composition, and yeilded the city. But shortly after, the souldiers left there in garrison for the keeping thereof, going out to seeke for forage, were by the Turks suddenly oppressed: which the emperor vnderstand-ing, sent thither one Nicophorus Bryennius, with certaine companies to relieue the cite; who en-counting with the Turks, and finding himselfe too weake, sent vnto the emperor for aid; who not knowing the strength of the enemies, blamed him of cowardise, yet sent vnto him Nicophorus Basilius with part of his armie; who joyning his forces with Bryennius, and giuing the Turks battell, put them to flight. But following too fast vpon them vnto their trenches, and Bryennius making no great haist after, he had his horse slaine vnder him, and so on foot heauily laded with armour, and not able to shift for himselfe, was there taken and brought to the Sultan: who honourably entreated him, and oftentimes questioning with him concerning the emperor; and shewing him his owne power, examined him also of the emperours.
- Tangrolipix was now dead, and the Sultan now in field against the emperor, was Acan his son, a man of great wisdom and discretion: who considering the doubtfull euent of battell, sent embassadours vnto the emperor to entreat with him of peace. But he (persuaded by some of his captaines, that this motion made by the Sultan for peace, proceeded but of a meere feare and distrust he had in his owne power, or else to gaine time vntill some greater strength came) had small regard of the embassadours or their message, but proudly willed them to tell their masters.
That if he were desirous of peace, he should get him farther off; and leaue the place wherein hee lay encamped, for him to lodge in. And so without other answer commanded them away.
Now had the emperor (as is before said) sent away part of his armie by Rufinus against Chliat, whom he now sent for in haist againe: but he hearing of the approach of the Sultan, by the persuasion of Tarchomates, one of his captaines, was retired for his more safetie backe into the Romain frontiers, leauing the emperor destitute of his helpe. At which time also, a companie of the Scythians which serued in the emperours campe, revolted vnto the Turks; not without some suspition, that the rest of their fellowes which remained, would ere long do the like. Ne-uerthelesse the emperor presuming of such strength as he had, or carried headlong with his owne fortune, resolved to giue the Turks battell, and therefore putting his men in order, set vp-on them. Who somewhat troubled with the emperours so sudden a resolution, as being yet in some hope of peace: yet hauing put themselves in order of battell, receiued the enemies charge still giuing a little ground, as men not greatly desirous either to fight or to flie. This fight continuing long, and the day now declining, the emperor doubting lest the Sultan should send part of his armie to assault his campe (from which he was now drawne somewhat far, and had left the same but weakly manned) caused a retreat to be sounded, and so began orderly to retire himselfe with them that were about him: which others a far off in the battell beholding, and supposing him to haue fled, began themselves to flie a maine. Of which so shamefull flight and sudden feare Andronicus (the sonne of John Duas, the late emperor Constantine his brother, and by him created Cesar, who with his sonnes secretly enuied at the honour of Diogenes) was the cause. For he commanding a great part of the armie, gaue it first out vnto such as were about him, that the emperor fled: and to encrease the feare, turning his horse about, fled towards the

campe as fast as he could: after whom all the rest most disorderly followed: which the emperor beholding, and therewith not a little troubled, made a stand, labouring in vaine to haue staid the rest. For now the Turks encouraged with the sudden flight of the Christians, began hardly to pursue them, as men already ouerthrown by the hand of God: whom for all that, the emperor with such as yet stood with him, for a space notably resisted. But being forsaken by the greater part of his armie, and oppressed with the multitude of his enemies, being wounded himselfe, and his horse slaine vnder him, he was there taken all embriued with his owne blood, and the blood of his enemies, of whom he had wounded and slaine many. The Sultan advertised of his taking, at the first beleeued it not, supposing it rather to haue beene some other great man: vntill that he was both by them whom he had but a little before sent embassadour vnto him, and by Basilacius one of his captaines then prisoner with him, assured that it was vndoubtedly he, which Basilacius brought before him to see if he knew him, fell downe prostrat at his feet, as before his dread lord and soueraigne. The emperor brought before the Sultan, and humbling himselfe in such sort as best befecmed his heauie fortune, the Sultan presently tooke him vp and thus cheerfully spake vnto him: Greene not noble emperor (said he) at thy misbap, for such is the chance of war, ouerwhelming sometimes one, and sometimes another: neither feare thou any harme, for I will use thee not as my prisoner, but as an emperor. Which he accordingly did, presently appointing him a princely pavilion, with all things answerable to his estate, setting him oftentimes at his owne boord, and for his sake enlarging such prisoners as he required. And after he had thus for certaine daies honourably vsed him, and discoursed with him of many things, he concluded a perpetuall peace with him, vpon promise of a marriage to be made betwixt their children, and so with a safe conuoy sent him away with greater honour than was at an enemies hand to haue beene expected. The emperor in Turkish attire, which the Sultan had bestowed vpon him, comming to THEODOSOPOLIS, there staid for the curing of his wounds, & afterwards accompanied with the Sultans embassadours, set forward toward CONSTANTINOPLE. But all was now there changed: for vpon the report of his captiuitie, John the Cesar, with Pselus one of the cheefe Senators, and others of the same faction, which alwaies enuied at the honour of Diogenes, presently tooke the imperiall government from Endocia the emperesse, and thrusting her into a monasterie which there had built neere vnto PROPONTIS, set vp Michael Ducas her eldest sonne, emperor, in steed of Diogenes: whose simplicitie, Cesar his vnkle, abusing with the rest, did now what they list. And hearing that Diogenes was now contrarie to their expectation, set at libertie by the Sultan, and comming towards the imperiall citie, sent out letters euerie way in the new emperours name, vnto all the gouernours of the prouinces whereby hee was to passe, not to receiue him as emperor, or to doe him any honour: which Diogenes vnderstanding, staid at the castle of DOCLIA, whether some of his friends with such power as they were able to make, reformed vnto him. Against whom, Cesar with the contrarie faction first sent his sonne Constantine, and after that Andronicus his eldest sonne, both Diogenes his mortall enemies, with a great armie: by whom Diogenes with his friends and followers, were ouerthrown and discomfited. Diogenes himselfe flying to the citie of ADANA, was there hardly besieged by Andronicus, and in the end glad to yeeld himselfe, vpon condition, that he should resigne the empire, and so for euier after to lead a priuat life. For whose safetie, certaine of the cheefe of the clergie sent of purpose from Michael the emperor, gaue their faith. So Diogenes all attired in blacke, yeelded himselfe to Andronicus: by whom hee was brought to COTAI, then the metropolitall citie of PHRIGIA, there to expect what further order should be taken for him from the court: during which time, he fell sicke, being as many supposed secretly poysoned. But whilst he there lay languishing, an heauier doom came from the yoong emperor, That he should haue his eies put out: which was forthwith in most cruell manner done; the clergie men that had before for his safetie gaged their faith, crying out in vaine against so horrible a crueltie. Thus deprived of his sight, he was conueighed into the island of PEROTA, where his eies for lacke of looking to, putrifying, and wormes breeding in them, with such an odious smell as that no man could abide to come nigh him, he in short time after died, when he had reigned three yeeres, eight months. All which miserie was thought to haue hapned vnto him through the malice of Cesar, without the knowledge of the yoong emperor his nephew.

The miserable death of Diogenes the emperor.

Axan the Sultan seeking revenge the death of Diogenes.

Axan hearing of the miserable end of the late emperor Diogenes, was therewith much grieved, and the more, for that the league which he had to his good content so lately made with him, was

A was thereby come to naught: wherefore in reuenge thereof, he with great power invaded the imperiall prouinces; not for spoile and bootie onely, as in former time, but now to conquer and to hold the same. Against whom Michael the emperor sent Isaack Comnenus his lieutenant, with a great armie: who meeting with the Turks, and joyning battell, was by them ouerthown with all his army, and taken prisoner: and glad afterwards for a great summe of money to redeeme himselfe. After which ouerthrow, the emperor sent his vnkle Cesar with an other armie against them, who was by Rufelius, that had before reuolted from the emperor, ouerthrown at the riuer SANGARIVS, and taken prisoner: whom he for all that, shortly after set at libertie againe, and joyning with him against the Turks, were both together by them discomfited and taken prisoners, but afterwards redeemed; Cesar by the emperor, and Rufelius by his wife. This Rufelius was a notable traitour, who joyning with the Turks did what he list in the prouinces of the empire in the lesser ASIA: for the repelling of whom, the emperor sent Alexius Comnenus, a yoong man, but verie politike and couragious; who secretly practising with the Turks that were great with Rufelius, had him at last by them for a summe of money betraied into his power: who forthwith sent him to CONSTANTINOPLE to the emperor, by whom he was imprisoned, but afterward set at libertie and employed against Bryennius and his brother, then vp in rebellion against the emperor.

But to come neerer vnto the Turkish affaires. Cutlu-Muses who with his cousin Melech and others were for feare of Tangrolpis their cousin fled into ARABIA, as is before declared, now in the beginning of the raigne of Axan, returned: and as the enuious competitor of his kingdom, hauing raised a great power of their friends and partakers, were now ready to haue tried the matter with him by plaine battell. Against whom also the Sultan on the other side had brought into the field his whole forces, and was now readie likewise to haue encountered them neere vnto the citie of ERBS. But whilst the Turks thus diuided, stood ready to destroy themselves, the Caliph of BABYLON (from whom though the Turks had taken all temporall soueraignie, yet in matters of religion still held him in great reuerence and esteeme, as their cheefe bishop, and the successeur of their great prophet) considering that nothing could be more dangerous vnto his sect and religion than that ciuile dissention, the late confusion and vtter ruine of the Sarafin empire, and authoritie of the Caliphs; and fearing the like effect in these new Sarafines, now the cheefe stay of the Mahometane superstition: setting aside all his pontifical formallitie, whereby he was bound not to go out of his owne house, came with all speed, euen as the armies were now ready to joyne battell, and thrusting himselfe into the middest betwixt them; what with the reuerence of his person, what with his effectual persuasion, wrought so much and preuailed so far with both parties, that they were content to lay downe their weapons, and to stand to his order and judgement: which was, That Axan the Sultan should still enjoy his kingdom and territories, whole and entire vnto himselfe as he did: and that Cutlu-Muses and his sonnes, aided by him, and so inuading the prouinces of the Constantinopolitane empire, should thereof subdue so much as they could vnto themselves, and to be thereof accounted the onely lords and gouernours. Which order as it was vnto the Turks, and for the maintenance of the Mahometane superstition, verie wholesome & commodious; so was it vnto the Christian common weale and religion most dangerous and hurtfull, as in proceesse of time by prooffe it appeared. For by this meane, in short time after, Cutlu-Muses with his cousin and sonnes subdued all MEDIA with a great part of ARMENIA, CAPADOCIA, PONTVS, and BYTHINIA, and so a great part of the lesser ASIA. By the aid of this Cutlu-Muses & the fauour of the souldiers, Nicephorus Botomates aspiring vnto the empire of CONSTANTINOPLE, displaced his master the emperor, Michael Ducas, after he had reigned six yeeres and six months; and in the habit of a munke thrust him into an abbey: which vsurper by the iust judgement of God, was at length required euen with the same measure, and in like manner serued by Alexius Comnenus; who thrusting him out, succeeded himselfe in the empire. Much it was that this Cutlu-Muses with his sonnes and kinsmen did for the enlarging of the Turkish empire, by the helpe of the great Persian Sultan: whose forces, together with their owne, in diuers countries conducted by these worthy leaders his nigh kinsmen, and doing great matters, gaue occasion for themselves to be accounted Sultans, though in deed they were none, neither their names such as are by some ancient writers and some others of later time also reported; but vnto the Turks themselves, by those names, either for Sultans, vnknewen. Out of these great commanders, all borne of the Selzuccian family, family bath Aithonus, and others following his report, deriued their Dogrissa, Alpasalemus, Melecl, and Belchiaroc, whom they suppose to haue orderly succeeded Zadot, otherwise called Tangrolpix, in the Turkish empire, and to haue done great matters: whereas both by the report of the Turks themselves, and the relation the Greeks, it appeareth plainly, Axan (more truly called Ax-Han, that is to say, the White king) to haue beene the sonne of Tangrolpix, and to haue succeeded him in the empire: and that by him the emperor Diogenes was taken, and not by Alpasalemus as they vainely imagine. As for Alpasalemus, whom the Turks by that name know not either any thing of his doings, it seemeth to haue beene a name corrupted of Alpam Sallarius, the brother of Tangrolpix and Habrami, and not his sonnes sonne as they would haue it. In like manner Melecl also seemeth to haue beene forged of Melech the sonne of Habrami, Tangrolpix his brother, and not of Alpasalemus, as some without any good ground report. Whom they finding to haue beene all great men in the Selzuccian family, with some others also, haue both corrupted their names, and giuen vnto them an imaginarie soueraintie and succession in the Turks first empire, such as becase that the Turks themselves acknowledge not, is easily to be refelled out of the histories of the Greeks, who had with them still much to doe. Wherefore leauing these supposed princes of the Turks, with their imaginatie succession, and doings, vnto the authors thereof, following more certainties, to returne againe vnto the course of our historie. Axan the Sultan at the same time that he had by the mediation of the Chaliph (or not long after) fallen to agreement with his cousin Cutlu-Muses: to encrease the honour of his nation and the bounds of his empire, gaue vnto Ducat and Melech, two of his high kinsmen, the government of DAMASCO and ALEPPO, with that part of SIRIA which joyneth vnto them, of purpose that way to entrench vpon the Aegyptian Chaliph, who then had vnder his iurisdiction all as far as LAODICEA in SIRIA; yet not with so large priuiledges as had Cutlu-Muses, vnto whom and his posteritie he had yeilded the absolute honour of a Sultan or king, ouer such countreys and prouinces as they should winne from the Christians: but vnto these others his kinsmen, he gaue the government of the aforesaid cities of DAMASCO and ALEPPO in the frontiers of his dominion in SIRIA, conditionally that they should still remaine his vassals, and hold of him as of their foueraigne, whatsoever they had: who neuertheless in short time mightily preuailed vpon the Aegyptian, still increasing the Turkish territorie with the losse of the Saracens, whose name together with their empire, was now by the Turks almost quite driuen out of ASIA.

But these proud branches of the Turkish empire, thus ouerspreading the lesser ASIA, with the greatest part of SIRIA, were in short time after by the mercie of God, and the valour of the most Christian and religious princes of the West, cut shorter, and brought againe into some better order. The full discourse whereof, worthie eternall memorie, by others inrolled in the ancient records of fame, I purpose not at large to follow, but in brieue to touch, for the orderly continuation of the present historie, hastning to the doings of this victorious nation of later times, wherein we are to make a longer stay, as more pertinent vnto the dangerous estate of the present time.

It fortuned that whilest Cutlu-Muses and his sonnes, supported by the Sultan Axan their kinsman, thus mightily preuailed against the Christians in the lesser ASIA on the one side, and Melech with his cousin against the Aegyptian Caliph in SIRIA on the other: that one Peter a French Heremite mooued with a deuout zeale, according to the manner of that time, went to visit the sepulcher of our Sauour, with the other holy places at IERUSALEM: who comming into SIRIA, then for the most part possessed by the Turks and Saracens, diligently noted by the way as he travelled, the manners and fashions of these barbarous nations, their government, their cities, their power and strength; but aboue all, the grievous miseries of the poore oppressed Christians, that there liued in most miserable thraldome amongst them, without hope of release: all which, he in the habit of a poore pilgrim, at libertie safely viewed, in the midst of these miscreants, being withall a little low hard fauoured fellow, and therefore in shew more to be contemned than feared. Yet vnder such simple & homely feature, lay vnregarded a most subtil sharp and piercing wit, fraught with discretion and sound iudgement, still applying to some good vie what he had in his long and painfull trauell most curiously obserued. He comming to IERUSALEM, and performing his deuotions there, saw the grievous miserie of the poore deuout Christians, so great and heauie, as that greater or more intollerable could none be: wherewith not a

A little grieved, he entred into a deepe discourse thereof with Simon the Patriarch and Abbot of the monasterie of the Christians (there before built by certaine deuout Italian merchants) and with the master of the Hospitallars, by whom he was fully enformed thereof, as of whatsoever else he required. After much graue conference, it was at length agreed vpon amongst them, That the Patriarch and the Grand-master, should in their owne, and the names of the other oppressed Christians, write their letters vnto the Pope and the other Christian princes, concerning their miseries; and to craue their aid for the recouerie of those holy places out of the hands of those cruell infidels: of which letters, the deuout hermit promised himselfe to be the trustie carrier, and of their petitions the most carefull soliciter. Whereupon the Patriarch and Grand-master in the name of the poore oppressed Christians, wrote their letters vnto this effect:

*We the citizens of the Holy citie, and countrey men of Christ Iesus, daily suffer those things which Christ our king suffered but once, in the last daies of his mortalitie. We are dayly buffeted, scourged, and pierced: euerie day some of vs are brained, beheaded, or crucified. We would flie from citie to citie vnto the remotest parts of the earth, and remooue out of the middle of that land, where Christ our Saviour wrought our redemption, to lead a poore exiled and vngaynt life; were it not impetie to leane the land (sacred with the birth, doctrine, death, resurrection, and assention of our Saviour) without inhabitants and priests: and that there should first lacke such as would endure death and martyrdom, than such as would inflict the same: and that there should not be which would willingly die for Christ, as in battell, so long as there were any that would fight against them. These things truly we most miserably suffer: yet was there a time when as our ancestors feared no such thing, either to themselves or their posteritie. And now perhaps the Christian kingdomes of the West, line likewise without the least suspicion of feare: but let them bee mooued by our example and testimonie. The strength of the Turks is dayly encreased, & ours diminished: The continuall gaining of new kingdoms giueth them courage: They haue already deuoured the whole world, in hope. The forces of the Turks are fiercer and stronger than the forces of the Saracens, their policies deeper, their attempts more desperat, their endowments greater, and their successe fortunater. Yet haue the Saracens attempted both ROMES; they haue besieged CONSTANTINOPLE, and haue wasted not only the Sea coasts of ITALY, but euen the heart of the land also. Then why should the kingdomes of the West presume themselves to stand in safetie and out of all perill, when as the chiefe fortress of the world haue becme so endangered? What may the rest of Christendome promise vnto it selfe, (eing that IERUSALEM (the seat and spectacle of the Christian religion) hath beene besieged, taken, sacked, rased and triumphed vpon? Seeing that of the Christian profession, remaine but the poore and weake reliques, in comparison of the ancient whole bodie? This land, which is dayly besprinkled with our blood, yea the blood it selfe crieth out for reuenge. And we your most humble suppliants, prostrate at your feet, call vpon the helpe, aid, mercie, faith and religion, of you most blessed Father, of the kings, princes and potentates; Christians not in name and profession onely, but in heart soule and spirit. Before the tempest thunder, before the lightning fall vpon you, auert from you and your children the storme hanging ouer your heads: defend vs your poore suppliants: deliuer your religion from most wicked and accursed slauerie. You shall in so doing, deserue immortall fame, and God shall requite your so great valour in this world with terrestriall kingdomes, and in the world to come with eternall blisse, whose sacred inheritance you shall haue defended from the rage of hell.*

With these letters, and plentie of other secret instructions, the deuout hermit returning into ITALY, and comming to ROME, deliuered his letters vnto Urban the second of that name, then Pope, with a full discourse of the miseries of the Christians vnder the Turkish thraldome, which he had seene at IERUSALEM; and other places as he trauelled; requesting his holy care for the redresse thereof: with whom he so preuailed, that shortly after, he calling a Councell at CLAREMONT in FRANCE, among other things, propounded the miserie of the poore oppressed Christians at IERUSALEM, as an especiall matter to be considered of. And hauing caused the aforesaid letters, directed vnto him and the other Christian princes, to bee openly read in the Councell, wherunto three hundred and ten bishops were then out of diuers parts of Christendome assembled, with the embassadours of all countreys, much mooued the whole assembly to compasion: at which time also the hermit, whose flowing eloquence fully counteruailed what wanted in his feature, standing vp in the midst of the Councell, deliuered his message in the name of the afflicted Christians, with their heauie gronings and teares : which as they could not be in letters expressed, so were they not hardly by the religious hermit (as by him who hauing both lately seene, both the miserie of the men, and desolation of the places, and at the heart touched with the greife thereof) so liuely represented, as that it mooued the whole assembly with the like sympathie of heauinesse and greife. Which the Pope perceiuing, tooke thereupon occasion to enter into a large discourse concerning that matter, with many effectual reasons perswading the fathers and princes there present, of the necessitie of so religious a war to be taken in hand, for the deliuerance of their oppressed brethren out of the thraldome of the infidels; and now as well with their present decree, as afterwards at their returne home into their countries, by all means to further the same. Which notable perswasion, with the heauie complaint of the hermit, and the equitie of the cause, so much mooued the whole counsell and the rest there present, that they all as men inspired with one spirit, declared their consent by their often crying out, Deus vult, Deus vult, God willet it, God willet it: which words so then vttered by way of applause, was in the great and most sacred expedition following, much vsed of the deuout Christians, as the fortunate signall of their cheerfull forwardnesse, euen in their most dangerous enterprises. Strange it were to tell, and hardly to be beleued (but that the ancient histories beare witnesse of the like) how far in one daies space the report of this religious decreed war, was by flying fame disperfed.

The Counsell dissolved, and the reuerend fathers returning euery man home into his owne country; it pleased God by their effectual perswasions so to worke with the rest of the Christian princes, and people in generall, that in all countries and prouinces in Christendome, were shortly to be seene men of all sorts in great number, with red crosses on their breasts (the cognifance of that sacred expedition) readie of themselves to spend both life and goods for the defence of the Christian religion, and recouerie of the Holy land. The number of whom is of diuers diuersly reported, but of most supposed to haue bene three hundred thousand fighting men: of whom the chiefe commanders were Godfrey Duke of LORRAINE, with his two brethren Enslace and Baldwin, all of the honourable house of BULLION; Hugh surnamed the Great, brother to Philip then the French king; Raymond and Robert, earles of FLANDERS; Robert duke of NORMANDIE; William the Conquerours sonne; Stephan de Valois earle of CHARTERS; Adam bishop of PORDIE, the Popes legat; and Peter the hermit, not to be numbered amongst the least, as chiefe author of this most famous expedition: vnto whom many other honourable princes joyned themselves as partakers of their trauels, though not with like charge.

The first that set forward in this expedition, was one Gualter Senfauier, a noble gentleman, with a great band of men: not long after whom, followed Peter the hermit, with fortie thousand mo: who both, traouelling thorow GERMANIE, HUNGARIE, and BVLGARIA, were glad oftentimes, especially in the further part of HUNGARIE and BVLGARIA to open themselves a way with the sword; and so with much labour, and no lesse losse, came at length to CONSTANTINOPLE: where they were not greatly welcome vnto the emperor Alexius Comnenus, who guiltie vnto himselfe of the vnlawfull meanes whereby he had extorted the empire from Nicephorus his predecessour, had that expedition of the Christians into the East, in distrust, as purposed against himselfe: vntill that fully resolved to the contrarie, by the hermit and others; and that a far greater power was coming after, for the inuasion of the Turks and recouerie of the Holy land, he was content to relieue them now wearie of their long trauell: & afterward to make room for the that were to come, shipped the ouer the strait of BOSPHORVS into ASIA; who marching forward into BITHYNIA, encamped their armie in the country not far from the cite of NICE. In the meane time Godfrey with his brethren, and diuers other princes that had joyned themselves vnto him, with the Germanes and Loranis, and the greatest part of the armie, followed the same way that the hermit had taken before him. At which time also Hugh the French kings brother, with the Legate, the two Roberts, (the one duke of NORMANDIE, and the other earle of FLANDERS) and the rest of the French commanders, passing ouer the mountaines into ITALY, came to ROME, with a wonderful great armie: where taking their leaue of the Pope, because they would be lesse troublesome vnto the cities and countries whereby they were to passe, they diuided their great armie into three parts; whereof the one part went to BRINDVSIVM, and the other to BARY, and the

An expedition agreed vpon by the Counsell, for the reliefe of the Christians oppressed in the Holy land.

The first commanders of the Christians in this expedition were the they said.

A the third to HYDRUNTVM, vnto whom also Bohemund, one of the great princes of APULIA, joyned himselfe with twelue thousand good souldiers that followed him: From these three ports the Christian armie departing, and crossing the ADRIATIKE, arrived in safetie at DURACHIVM, and nigh thereabout, vpon the coast of DALMATIA: from whence they trauelled by land thorow MACEDONIA to CONSTANTINOPLE, where they met with the duke Godfrey, and the rest of the armie: whom also at the first, Alexius the emperor is reported to haue but coldly entertained, as jealous of his owne state; vntill that better perswaded of their designements and good meaning towards him, confirmed by many rich presents sent vnto him from these strange princes, he joynd with them in league: whereto it was agreed, That the emperor during the time of this expedition, should furnish them with new supplies of men, armour, victuals, and whatsoever else they should want: in regard whereof, the princes on the other side, promised to restore againe vnto the empire, what prouinces, countries, or cities they should happily gaine out of the hands of the Turks and Saracins, the cite of IERUSALEM onely excepted: which agreement was afterward on the suspicious emperours part, but slenderly performed: Neuertheless this league so made, he graunted them passage; and so transported them ouer the strait into ASIA; onely Bohemund, for an old grudge betwix the emperor Alexius and his father, would not come to CONSTANTINOPLE, but marching with his armie thotow the vtter per MISIA and THRACIA, came sooner than any man had thought vnto the strait of HELLESPONTVS, and so passed.

Now had Gualter, and the hermit Peter, with their armie, lyen two months in the countrey about NICE, expecting the coming of the rest of the Christian princes: for why, they thought it not good, before their coming, to attempt any thing against the enemy, whom they knew to lie not far off verie strong. But the common souldiers, wearie of so long lying, and naught doing, and pinched with some wants; and withall disliking of Gualter their chiefe commander, and the hermit Peter, of whose integritie and holinesse they had a greater opinion than of his prouesse and direction; rose vp in mutinie, and displacing Gualter, made choice of one Raymond, a valiant German captain, for their generall: by whose conduct they tooke EXOXVM, a towne of purpose forsaken of the Turks. For they long before vnderstanding what a tempest of war was growing vpon them out of EVROPE, sought by all meanes to cut off these that were already come ouer, as the forerunners of a greater armie following, and therefore had left them this towne, as a bait to traine them out of their trenches. And after that the Christians were thus possessed of the towne, hauing laid certain strong ambushes, they draue out certaine herds of cattell the more to allure them: all which, certaine companies of the Christians brought in without any losse, the Turks still winking thereat. With which boote the Christians encouraged, went out (three thousand of them) to take in a little towne not far off, who were by the Turks cut off and slaine euery mothers son, as they were about to haue diuided the spoile: which other throw reported into the towne, discouraged euen the chiefe commanders of the armie, so that they resolved no more to try the fortune of the field, before the coming of their friends. Neuertheless the common souldiers, condemning them of cowardise, chose them a new generall, one Godfrey Burrell, whom they now requested not, but enforced to go out to reuenge the death of their fellows: which their rashnesse not long after turned to their owne destruction. For ten thousand of them going out of EXOXVM, to forrage the countrey, were by the Turks entraped, and almost all slaine, except some few which by speedie flight escaped. The Turks prosecuting their victorie, laid hard siege to them in the towne also, vntill they had partly with famine, and partly with the sword consumed the most part of them. The hermit with the poore remainder of his armie tooke his refuge to CINITE, a towne not far off, before abandoned by the Turks, where with much adoe he defended himselfe, vntill the coming of duke Godfrey, and the rest of the princes.

Castell Musas the Turke was now dead, hauing left vnto his son Sultan Salyman many large countries & prouinces, altogether gained from the Christians in ASIA, whom he held in great subjection & thraldome. This warlike prince hauing discomfited and almost brought to naught the hermits forces, was no lesse careful for the withstanding of the great armie following, which now being come into BITHYNIA, & lying before NICOMEDIA, remouing thence laid siege to the cite of NICE, called in ancient time ANTAGONIA of Antigonus, the son of Philip that built it, and afterwards NICA, of Nica the wife of king Lisimachus. In this cite dwelt many deuout Greeks, Christians; but in such thralldom vnto the Turks, as that they could not do any thing for the deliuerie of themselves. This siege endured longer than the Christian princes had at the first supposed: who although they to the vttermost of their power, forced the citie on three sides, yet was it still notably defended; new supplies still coming from the Turks by the lake of Ascanius joyning vpon the other side of the citie. But after that the Christians possessed of the lake, began on that side also to lay hardly vnto the citie, the Turks discouraged, and seeing themselves beset round with their enemies, yeelded vp the citie the fift of Iuly, in the yeere 1097, after it had bene fiftie daies besieged. But whilst the Christians thus lay at the siege, the Turks assailed that quarter of the campe where the Legat lay; by whom they were notably repulsd, and with great losse enforced to retire vnto the mountaines. In this citie amongst the rest of the Turks, was taken Solyman wife, with two of her children, whom the princes sent prisoners to Constantinople. This citie so woon, was according to the agreement before made, restored vnto Alexius the emperour, whose fleet had in that siege done good seruice, by taking the lake from the Turks.

The citie of Nice thus woon, the Christian princes remoouing thence with their armie; and marching thorow the countrey, came the fourth day after vnto a riuer which watered many rich pastures: where, as they were about to haue encamped for the comodiousnesse of the place; and refreshing of the armie, suddenly newes was brought into the quarter where Bohemund lay, now busie in casting vp his trenches, That the Turks with a great army were ready euen at hand to charge him. For Solyman hauing raised a great power of his owne, and aided by the Sultan of Persia his kinsman, was now come with an armie of three score thousand strong, to giue the Christians battell: of whose approach Bohemund aduertised, left the fortifying of his trenches, and putting his souldiers in array, set forward to meet him, sending word to the rest of the princes that lay a far off, to be readie as occasion should require, to relieue him. These two armies conducted by their most resolute chieftaines, meeting together, joyned a most fierce and terrible battell, where in a short space the Turks lay slaine vpon heapes, in such sort that they serued the Christians in steed of bulwarks. But whilst Bohemund thus preuaileth in the battell, certaine of the Turks horsemen wheeling about, brake into Bohemunds campe; (not as then altogether fortified, & but slenderly manned) where among the women, & other weake persons there left, they raised a great tumult & outcry, to the great appauling of them that were fighting in the battell: which Bohemund perceiuing, withdrew himselfe with certaine companies vnto the campe, from whence he with great slaughter repulsd the enemy. But returning againe into the battell, he found there a great alteration: for his souldiers whom before he had left, as it were in possession of a most glorious victory, were now so hardly laid vnto by the Turks, as that they were ready to haue turned their backs and fled. Neuerthelesse by his comming in, the battell was notably restored, and againe made doubtfull: when the enemy perceiuing how much the assailling of the campe had troubled the Christians in battell, sent out certaine troupes of horsemen againe to assault the same: and had not failed vndoubtedly to haue taken it, being as aforesaid not yet fortified, had not Hugh the French kings brother come in good time to the rescue: who comming in with thirtie thousand horsemen, after he had relieved the campe, entering directly into the battell, was notably encountered by a squadron of fresh soldiers of the Turks, by them of purpose reserved for such euent. There began a battell more terrible than the first, with most doubtfull victorie. But at the length, the Turks wearie of the long and cruell fight, and seeing most of their fellows slaine, began by little and little to giue ground, and so retired into the mountaines, which were not far off. In this battell which continued a great part of the day, were slaine of the Turks fortie thousand, and of the Christians about two thousand. The next morning Bohemund with the French kings brother, came againe into the field, in such order, as if they should presently haue giuen or receiued battell: where after they had staid a great while, and saw no enemy to appeare, they fell to the honest buriall of their dead: which were easily known from the Turks, by the red crosses vpon their garments, the cognisance of their sacred warfare. Solyman flying with the remainder of his armie, notably dissembled his losse, giuing it out that he had got the victorie: yet by the way as hee went, he burnt vp the countrey villages, and destroyed or carried away whatsoever else he thought might stand the Christians in any steed, if they should further follow after him, leauing nothing for them but the bare ground.

After this victorie, Bohemund and the Christian princes, without resistance matching through

- A through the hot and drie countreys of the lesser Asia, came to Antiochia, a citie of Pistidia, which they tooke with small labour: & so marching vnto Iconium the principal citie of Cilicia, neere vnto the mountaine Taurus, were there also of the citizens courtcouly receiued, where they staid certaine daies for the refreshing of the armie. From thence they set forward toward Heraclea, where a great power of the Turks were reported to be assembled. But they together with the garrison souldiers vpon the approach of the victorious armie of the Christians forooke the citie and fled. The citizens being Christians (as they were yet generally in all the prouinces of the lesser Asia, but in great subjection to the Turks) and now rid of their cruel masters the Turkish garrisons; came forth, and meeting the princes, gladly yeelded themselves with their citie vnto them, as vnto their deliuerers. Here the Christian princes fully instructed of the great feare and desperation of the Turks, who now in no place durst abide their comming; for the more speedie taking in of those countreys but lately oppressed by the Turks, diuided their armie into two parts, leauing the one part thereof with Baldwin and Tancred in Cilicia, for the full subduing thereof (who in short time tooke the cities of Tarsus, Edissa, and Manvssa, with all the rest of the countrey, the Turks not daring any where to abide their comming:) the other part of the armie in the meane time entering into the lesser Armenia, tooke the same from the Turks, which the princes gaue to one Palmuriz an Armenian, who had in that expedition done them great seruice. From thence they tooke their way into Capadocia, which they also subdued, driuing out the Turks in euery place, and tooke the cities of Cesarea and Socor, where they staid a few daies for the refreshing of the armie: with like success they passed through the rest of the prouinces of the lesser Asia, of late possessed by the Turks, still chasing them out before them, and setting at libertie the poore oppressed Christians of those countreys. Whereof Solyman (crauing aid of Axan the Persian Sultan his cousin) grievously complained by his letters to him directed in this sort. The famous citie of Nice, with the countrey of Romania, which we by your aid and power haue gotten from the kingdome of the Greeks, and of your bountie possessed: the Christians of the kingdome of France haue againe taken from vs. Thus was the late erected kingdome of the Turks in the lesser Asia, by these valiant Christian champions againe brought low, and they glad to retire themselves farther off into the mountaines and more Easterne countreys, vntill this heat was ouerpast; and that they, taking the benefit of the troubled state of the Greeke empire (afterwards rent in sunder by ambition and ciuile discord, the ruine of the greatest monarchies) recovered not onely their former state, but became also dreadful vnto the Greeke emperours themselves: vpon whom they dayly gained in one corner or other, still maintaining the honour of their estate, vntill the rising of the Othoman familie, as in the processe of this historie shall God willing be declared.
- These victorious princes then, and to the worlds end famous, not contented to their immortal praise, to haue thus driuen the Turks out of the lesser Asia, and recovered so many countreys; bound themselves, as well the princes as the common souldiers, by solemne oath; neuer to return againe into their countreys, vntil they had accomplished that sacred war, with the conquest of the Holy citie. So mounting together the high mountaine Taurus, and descending thence as into another world, they came to the citie Maresia, which they tooke without resistance, the Turks there in garrison, being by night before for feare fled: where the Christians for the refreshing of themselves, certaine daies staid. In the meane time Robert earle of Flanders with a thousand men at armes, was sent out to giue summons vnto a citie called Artasia, about fiftie miles distant from Antioch: when as the citizens beholding the ensignes of the Christians, suddenly tooke vp armes against the Turks there in garrison, which had of long holden them in subjection, and preuailling vpon them, slew them euery mothers sonne: whose heads they presented vnto the earle, and receiued him into their citie. The Turks to reuenge the death of their friends, and to recouer againe the citie before the comming of the rest of the armie, sent out about ten thousand men out of Antioch; forthwith was assembled a great power of them to haue hindered the further proceedings of the Christians: and being come neere to Artasia, they sent before certaine stragling companies, of purpose to draw the new come Christians out of the citie, lying in the meane time in ambush with the rest, of purpose to entrap them. With these stragling companies, the Flemings sallying out lustily, encountered, & easily put them to flight; the Turks in deed flying of purpose to bring them within the danger of the other, lying in Ambush. After whom the Flemings eagerly following, were before they were aware enclosed closed round with their enemies, and there had vndoubtedly perished, had not the citizens being Christians, presently sallied out, and right woorthily relieved them.

Shortly after the Christian princes marching forward with their armie, were encountered by the Turke at the riuer ORONTES, who had there thought to haue staid their farther passage: with whom Robert duke of NORMANDIE, who had the leading of the vaunguard, had a hard conflikt, vntill that the Turks discouraged with the sight of the armie still comming on, forooke the bridge, and betooke themselves to flight. So the Christians passing the riuer, came and encamped with their armie before the famous cite of ANTIOCH the one and twentieth day of October, in the yeere 1097: the gouernour whereof vnder the Persian Sultan, was one Cassianus (of some also honoured with the name of a king) who at the comming of the Christians, had with him in the cite seuen thousand horsemen, and twentie thousand foot of the Turks, with great store of victuals, and all manner of other prouisions necessarie for the defence thereof. This cite called in ancient time EPIDAPHANE, or EPIPHANE, and of the Hebrewes, REBLATHA, sometime the seat of the Sirian kings, and afterwards the Metropolitall cite of STRIA, hauing vnder it an hundred and fiftie bishops (famous for many things, and amongst others, for that it was the seat of the blessed Apostle Saint Peter, and first place whereas the professours of the Christian religion tooke the name of Christians) is situate vpon the riuer ORONTES, about twelve miles from the sea, and was then strongly fortified both by nature and art, being compassed about with a double wall; the vttermost whereof was of hard stone, and the other of bricke, with 460 towres in the same, and an impregnable castle at the East end thereof, whereunto was joyning a deepe lake, comming out of the great riuer which watered the South side of the cite. Round about this strong cite (one of the most assured refuges of the Turks) although it were in circuit great, lay the Christian princes encamped, except on that side which being defended with the high broken mountaines, is not there to be besieged. Vpon whom the Turks out of the cite, during the time of the siege, made many a fierce & desperat fall, being stil by the Christians most valiantly repulled: especially at the bridge which the Christians had made of boats for their more commodious passage too and fro ouer the riuer. In this fort was the siege continued, vntill the beginning of Februarie, with many a bloodie skirmish. At which time such abundance of raine fell, as that hardly could a man find any place to lie drie in: and the scarcitie of victuall grew so great in the campe, that many (horrible it is to say) to assuage their hunger, were glad to eat the dead bodies of their late slaine enemies. In these extremities, many died of hunger and cold; yea their horses also perished for want of meat, so that in the whole campe were scarcely left two thousand horses fit for seruice, the rest being either all dead, or brought so low, as that they were altogether vsueruiceable. These miseries daily increasing diuers men of great account whom no terror of the enemy could haue dismayed, began secretly to withdraw themselves out of the campe, with purpose to haue stolne home; among whom were Peter the heremit, author of this war, and Tancred the nephew of Bohemund, who taken by the way, and brought backe with the rest as fugitiues, were sharply reprooued by Hugh the French kings brother, as cowards, and traitors to their brethren and fellow souldiers, and so enforced to take a new oath for their fidelitie and perseuerance. Bohemund in the meane time going to ARETHUSA, a towne not far off, by good fortune cut off a great part of the Turks there in garrison: who after their vsual manner falling out to haue cut off the forrages of the Christians, were now themselves caught tardie: whereby the country for a time was more open for the distressed Christian souldiers to seeke abroad for reliefe. But this libertie so lately gained, lasted not long; when newes was brought vnto the campe, That the Turks in great number out of the prouinces about ALEPPO and DAMASCO, were comming to the reliefe of their besieged friends in ANTIOCH. Neuerthelesse the Christians trusting vnto their owne strength, & the strength of the place wherein they were encamped, lay still, and at their comming so encountered them that they slew 2000 of them, and put the rest to flight: In which conflikt the Christians got great store of prouision & victuals, which the Turks had thought to haue put into the cite. The heads of the slaine Turks the Christians set vpon stakes before the cite, to the more terror of the defendants. This ouerthrow of the Turks, wherein Cassianus had lost his eldest sonne; with others of his best capitaines, so daunted the besieged, that they requested a truce for a time of the Christian princes: which granted, they of the cite came oftentimes into the campe, and they of the campe likewise into the cite: Cassianus still expecting reliefe from the Persian Sultan. Whilst the Christian princes were thus Antioch in Syria besieged by the Christians.

The description of the famous cite of Antioch.

A thus busie in ASIA, the Venetians with a great fleet of two hundred gallies scouring the seas, vnder the conduct of Henric Contarenius the bishop, and of Vitalis the dukes sonne, meeting with the gallies of Pisa at the RHODES, and falling out with them, had with them a great fight, wherein the Venetians hauing the vpper hand, tooke eightene of their gallies, and in them five thousand souldiers: whom they seeing to be marked with the red crosse, the cognifiance of the sacred warre, they presently set at libertie together with the gallies, detayning onely thirtie of the better fort as hostages. After that, the Venetians sayling into IONIA, tooke the cite of SMYRNA, and spoiled all along the coasts of LYCIA, PAMPHILIA, and CILICIA, before for feare abandoned by the Turks.

B The truce before taken betweene the Turks and the Christians at the siege of ANTIOCH, being in short time after broken by the death of one Vollo a French man, slaine by the Turks: the war was againe begun, and the cite more hardly laid vnto than before. At which time the gouernour who in the time of this long siege, which had now continued nine months, had lost most part of his best souldiers, was glad for the defence of so great a cite to vse the seruice of diuers Christians, then dwelling in the cite. Amongst whom was one Pirrus, a citizen of great reputation, vnto whom he had committed the guarding of a tower, called the two Sisters, but afterward saint Georges tower. This Pirrus had secret intelligence with Bohemund prince of TARENTVM, with whom he agreed to giue him there entrance into the city, vpon condition, That he should of the other Christian princes procure the gouernment of the cite vnto himselfe; and that he, with the rest of the Christian citizens in the cite might be at his hands well vsed: VVhich thing being easily obtayned, and all things agreed vpon, Bohemund with his souldiers were by night by Pirrus let into the cite, who made way for the rest of the armie to enter. The cite thus taken, many of the Turks fled into the castell, the rest were put vnto the sword, man, woman, and child; and amongst them also many of the Christians, the furious souldiers taking of them no knowledge. Great wealth was there found, but small store of victuals. Cassianus the late gouernour flying out of the cite to saue himselfe, in wandring through the mountaines, fell into the hands of the Christian Armenians, who lately thrust out of IERVSALYM were fled thither for refuge, by whom he was there slaine. In the cite were slaine about ten thousand persons. Thus was the famous cite of ANTIOCH, which the Turks had long before by famine taken from the Christians, againe recovered the third day of Iune, in the yeere of our Lord God 1098. The poore oppressed Christians in IERVSALYM hearing of this so notable a victorie, gaue secret thanks vnto God therefore, and began to lift vp their heads in hope that their deliuerie was now at hand. Of this victorie, the princes of the armie by speedie messengers and letters certified their friends in all countries, so that in short time the fame thereof had filled a great part of the world. Amongst others, Bohemund prince of TARENTVM, vnto whom the cite was deliuered, sent the joyfull newes thereof vnto Roger his brother prince of APULIA: whose letters, as the most certaine witnesses of the historie before reported, I thought it not amisse here to set downe.

I suppose you to haue vnderstood, by the letters of your sonne Tancred, both of the great feare of some of vs, and the battels which we haue of late with our great glorie fought: But concerning the truce, and the proceeding of the whole action, I had rather you should be certified by my letters; than the letters of others. King Cassianus had required a time of truce: during which, our souldiers had free recourse into the cite, without danger, vntill that by the death of Vollo a Frenchman, slaine by the enemy, the truce was broken. But whilst it yet seemed an hard matter to winne the cite, one Pirrus a citizen of ANTIOCH, of great authoritie and much deuoted vnto me, had conference with me concerning the yielding up of the cite; yet vpon condition, That the gouernment thereof should be committed to me, in whom he had reposed an especiall trust. I conferred of the whole matter with the princes and great commanders of the armie, and easily obtained that the gouernment of the cite was by their generall consent allotted vnto me. So our armie entring by a gate opened by Pirrus, tooke the cite. Within a few daies after, the towne ARETHVM was by vs assaulted, but not without some losse and danger to our person, by reason of a wound I there received. I assure you much of the valour of your sonne Tancred, of whom I and the whole armie make such account and reckoning, as is to be made of a most valiant and resolute generall. Farewell from ANTIOCH.

lieutenant) with a great armie besieged EDDESSA, with purpose after the taking thereof, to haue G relieved the citie of ANTIOCH. But this citie being notably defended by Baldwin left there of purpose with a strong garrison for the defence thereof; the Turke fearing in the meane time to loose ANTIOCH, the safest refuge of the Turke in all those parts, rise with his armie and set forward against the Christians: where by the way it was his fortune to meet with Samsadulus, Cas- siann his sonne, but lately fled from ANTIOCH, by whom he vnderstood of the losse of the citie, and by what means the same was most like to be againe recouered: vpon which hope, Corbanas with his mightie armie kept on his way, with a full resolution to set all vpon the fortune of a battell. Whose comming much troubled the Christians; for that although they were possessed of the citie, yet was the castell still holden by the Turke. Neuerthelesse leauing the earle of TRIOLIS in the citie with a competent power for the keeping in of them in the castell, H they tooke the field with the whole strength of the armie, and so in order of battell expected the comming of their enemies: who courageously comming on as men before resolved to fight, joynd with them a most terrible and bloodie battell. Neither were they in the citie in the mean time idle; for that the Turke in the castell hauing receiued in vnto them certaine supplies from Corbanas, sallied out vpon them that were left for the safeguard of the citie, and had with them a cruell conflict. Thus both within the citie and without was to be seene a most dreadfull fight of resolute men, with great slaughter on both sides: yet after long fight and much effusion of blood, the fortune of the Christians preuailed, the Turke began to giue ground, and afterwards be-tooke themselves to plaine flight, whom the Christians hardly pursuing, made of them a wooderfull slaughter. In this battell were slaine of the Turke above an hundred thousand, and of the Christians about foure thousand two hundred. There was also taken a great prey: for besides horses and other beasts for burden, were taken also siue thousand camels with their lading. The next day, being the 28 of Iune, the castell was by the Turke (now despairing of releife) yielded vp vnto the Christians.

ANTIOCH thus taken, Hugh the French kings brother, surnamed the Great, was sent from the rest of the princes to CONSTANTINOPLE, to haue deliuered the citie vnto Alexius the emperour, according to the agreement before made. But he, guiltie in conscience of his owne foule dealing with them, vnto whom he had sent no reliefe at all during the long and hard siege of ANTIOCH; neither performed any thing of that he had further promised, and therefore knowing himselfe hated of them; had in distrust to great an offer of the princes, so euill deferued, and therefore refused to accept thereof. Whereupon Bohemund by the generall consent of the whole armie was chosen prince, or (as some call him) king of ANTIOCH.

The plague in the Christian
armie.

After this long siege and want of victuals, ensued a great plague in the armie of the Christians, the Autumne following, whereof it is reported fiftie thousand men to haue died, and amongst them many of great account. But the mortallitie ceasing, the Christians, in Nouember following, by force tooke RVGIA, and ALBARIA, two cities, about two daies journey from ANTIOCH: where dissention arising betwixt Bohemund & Raimond, who of all others only entreated at his preferment vnto the principalltie of ANTIOCH: Bohemund for the common causes sake, gaue way vnto his aduersarie, & retired with his soldiers backe againe to ANTIOCH; after whom followed the duke Godfrey, and the earle of FLANDERS with their regiments. The rest of the princes wintered some at RVGIA, some at ALBARIA, from whence Raimond made fun-drie light expeditions further into the enemies countrey: But the spring approching, the Christian princes with all their power tooke the field againe. Bohemund with them that remained with him, departing from ANTIOCH, besieged TORTOSA. Raimond in the meane time with the rest, besieging the citie of TRIOLIS: who become much more insolent than before, by reason of some fortunate roads he had made vpon the enemies the last winter, ceased not still to ma-ligne Bohemund and his proceedings: matter enough to haue diuided the whole power of the Christians, & to haue turned their weapons vpon themselves: which Bohemund wel considering, rise with his armie; and because he would not with his presence trouble the proceeding of the religious war, retired himselfe to ANTIOCH. After whose departure, Godfrey and the earle of FLANDERS, tooke GABELLA, a citie about twelue miles from LAODICIA, and from thence returned againe to the siege of TORTOSA, whether Raimond came also with his armie, hauing before driuen the gouernour of TRIOLIS to such composition as pleased himselfe, and to furnish him with such things as he wanted. Thus was TORTOSA hardly on three sides besieged

A by the Christians, but so notably defended by the Turke, that after three months hard siege the Christians were glad to depart thence: and marching alongst the sea side, spoiled the countrey about SIDON. But forasmuch as that citie was not easily to be woon, they left it, & encamped before PTOLEMAIS, which they also passed by: the gouernour thereof sending them out victuals, with such other things as they wanted; and vpon summons giuen, promising to yeeld the ci-tie after they had once woon the citie of IERYSALEM. From thence they came to CHARRA- RIA in PALESTINE, where they solemnly kept the feast of WHISONTIDE, and so to RAMA, which they found for feare forsaken of the Infidels. Marching from RAMA, and drawing neere to IERYSALEM, they in the vanguard of the armie, vpon the first desecring of the Holy citie, gaue for joy diuers great shouts and outcries, which with the like applause of the whole armie was so doubled and redoubled, as if therewith they would haue rent the verie mountaines and peared the highest heauens. There might a man haue seene the deuout passions of the most woorthie and zealous Christians, vttered in right diuers manners: Some, with their eyes and hands cast vp towards heauen, called aloud vpon the name and helpe of Christ Iesus; some, pro-strat vpon their faces, kissed the ground, as that whereon the Redeemer of the world sometime walked; others, joyfully saluted those holy places which they had heard so much of, and then first beheld: In briefe, euery man in some sort expressed the joy he had conceiued of the sight of the Holy citie, as the end of their long trauell.

The exceeding joy of the Christians vpon the first desecring of the Holy citie.

This most ancient and famous citie, so much renowned in holy writ, is situat in an hillie countrey; not warded with any riuer or fresh springs, as other famous cities for most part be; neither yet was it well seated for wood, or pasture ground: But what wanted in these, and such other benefits of nature, was by the extraordinarie blessings of the most highest, so supplied, as that the Iewes there dwelling, so long as they kept the ordinances of the Lord, were of all other people in the world iustly accounted the most happie and fortunate. Yet in those so blessed times, was this citie for the sinne of the people oftentimes deliuered into the enemies hand, and the glorie thereof defaced: as well appeareth by the whole course of the historie of holy Scripture, as also by the ancient and approoued histories as well of the Iewes themselves, as others.
Neuerthelesse, it still rise againe (though not in like glorie as before in the time of king Dauid, Salomon, and the other next succeeding kings) and so was still repleoted by the Iewes, vntill that at last according to the foretelling of our Sauour Christ, it was with a great and of all others most lamentable destruction, vtterly rased and destroyed by the Romans, vnder the leading of Vespasian the emperour, and his noble sonne Titus, fortie yeeres after our Sauour his precious death and passion. Sithence which time, it was neuer vntill this day againe repaired, or yet well inhabited, by the Iewes; but lying buried in the ruines of it selfe, all the raigne of Domitian, Ner- ua, and Trajan, vntill the time of the great emperour Aelius Adrianus, it was againe by him reedified about the yeere 136, and after the name of him called ÆLIA; who together with the name changed also in some part the ancient situation of the citie. For whereas before it was seated vpon the steepe rising of an hill, in such sort that towards the East and the South it ouerlooked the whole ground, hauing onely the temple and the castle called ANTONIA, in the highest part of the citie: Adrian translated the whole citie vnto the verie top of the hill, so that the place where our blessed Sauour suffred his most bitter passion, with the sepulcher wherein he was also laid, and from whence he in glorie rise againe, before without the citie, were then enclosed within the walles thereof, as they are at this day to be seene. Yet for all that the emperour being dead, in procelle of time this new built citie recouered againe the ancient name of IERYSALEM, whereby it hath euer since, and is at this day yet known. This citie so reedified, the emperour first gaue vnto the Iewes, whom he afterwards againe thrust out for their rebellion, and gaue it to the Christians to inhabit: ouer whom, one Marke, first bishop of the Gentiles there, had the charge: But forasmuch as the Romane emperours were at that time altogether idolaters and persecutors of the poore Christians, the church also at IERYSALEM, with others endured sundrie and many grieuous persecutions, vnder the emperours Antoninus Commodus, Seuerus Alex- iminus, Valerianus, Aurelianus, Dioclesianus, and Maxentius, vntill that at length Constantine the Great conuerted vnto the faith of Christ, about the yeere of Grace 320, suppressing the Pagan idolatrie, gaue generall peace vnto the afflicted church: whereby the Christian church at I- ERYSALEM, for the space of three hundred yeeres after, happily flourished vnder the Greeke emperours, vntill the time of the emperour Phocas; who hauing most cruelly slaine the good empe-

our Maurice with his children, and so possessed himselfe of the empire, gaue occasion thereby vnto Chosroe the Persian king, in reuenge of the death of Maurice his father in law, with all his power to invade SIRIA: who as a tempest bearing downe all before him, tooke also by force the citie of IERUSALEM, hauing that yeere, which was about the yeere six hundred and ten, slaine almost an hundred thousand christians. But Phocas the usurper being by them of his guard most cruelly slaine, and Heraclius succeeding in his steed, Chosroe was by him againe driuen out of SIRIA, and the Holy citie againe recouered, about the yeere 624. In these great wars against the Persians, Heraclius had vsed the helpe of the Arabians, called Scenite, a warlike people of ARABIA DESERTA, altogether giuen to the spoile: who, the wars now ended, expecting to haue received their pay, were contrarie to their expectation, and without all reason rejected by them that should haue paid them, with verie foule and contumelious words; as, that there was not money enough to pay the Christian soldiers of the Latines and the Greeks; much lesse those vile dogs (whom they so called, for that they had but a little before received the damnable doctrine of the false prophet Mahomet, the great seducer of the world, who euen in that time flourished.) Vpon which discontentment they at their returne revolted from the empire, and joyined themselves vnto their great prophet, and so afterwards vnto the Caliphs his successors, extending his doctrine, together with his soueraigntie to the vttermost of their power: and that with so good successe, that in short time they had ouerrun all EGYPT, SIRIA, the land of promise, and taken the Holy citie. With these (the disciples of Mahomet and his successors, the Sarafins, for so now they would be called) the Greeke emperours ensuing, had for certaine yeeres diuers conflicts, with diuers fortune, for the possession of SIRIA. But at length wearied out, & by them ouercom, they left the aforesaid countries wholly vnto their deuotion. Hereby it came to passe, that the Sarafins for the space of 370 yeeres following held those countries, with many others, in great subjection, oppressing still the poore Christians in IERUSALEM with most grieuous tributes and exactions: vnto whom they yet left a third part of the citie for them to dwell in, with the temple of the Sepulcher of our Sauour, and mount SION; not for any deuotion, either vnto them, or those places, but for that it yeilded them a great profit by the recourse of deuout Christians travelling thither: reseruing in the meane time vnto themselves, the other two parts of the citie, with the temple of Salomon, before reedified by the Christians. Now whilst the Sarafins thus triumph in the East, and not in the East onely, but ouer a great part of the West also, contenting themselves with such tributes as they had imposed vpon the subdued nations and countries: vp start the Turks, a vagrant, fierce, and cruell people; who first breaking into ASIA (as is before declared) and by rare fortune aspiring vnto the kingdome of PERSIA, subdued the countries of MESOPOTAMIA, SIRIA, with the greatest part of the lesser ASIA, and IVDEA, together with the Holy citie: who both there and in all other places held the poore oppressed Christians in such subjection and thralldom, as that the former government of the Sarafins seemed in comparison of this to haue beene but light and easie. Neither was there any end or release of these so great miseries to haue beene expected, had not God in mercie by the weake meanes of a poore heremit, stirred vp these most woorthie princes of the West to take vp armes in their defence, who hauing with their victorious armies recouered the lesser ASIA, with a great part of SIRIA, were now come vnto this Holy citie.

Tierusalem besieged by the Christians.

The gouernour of IERUSALEM vnderstanding by his espials, of the proceedings of the Christians, had before their approach, got into the citie a verie strong garrison of right valiant souldiers, with good store of all things necessarie for the holding out of a long siege. The Christians with their armie approaching the citie, encamped before it on the North; for that towards the East and the South, it was not well to be besieged, by reason of the broken rocks and mountaines. Next vnto the citie lay Godfrey the duke; with the Germans and Loranois; neere vnto him lay the earle of FLANDERS, and Robert the Norman: before the West gate lay Tancred, and the earle of THOLOVS: Bohemund and Baldwin were both absent, the one at ANTIOCH, the other at EBUSSA. The Christians thus strongly encamped; the fift day after gaue vnto the citie a fierce assault, with such cheerfulness, as that it was verily supposed, it might haue beene euen then woon; had they beene sufficiently furnished with scaling ladders: for want whereof, they were glad to giue buer the assault and retire. But within a few daies after, hauing supplied that defect, and provided all things necessarie, they came on againe afresh, and with all their power gaue vnto the citie a most terrible assault, wherein was on both sides seene great valour; po-licie,

A licie, & cunning, with much slaughter, vntill that at length the Christians wearie of the long fight, and in that hot country, and most fetuent time of the yeere fainting for lacke of water, were glad againe to forsake the assault, and to retire into their trenches: onely the well of Siloe yeilded them water, and that not sufficient for the whole campe; the rest of the wels which were but few, being before by the enemy either filled vp or else poysoned.

B Whilst the Christians thus lay at the siege of IERUSALEM, a fleet of the Genowais arrived at IOPPA; at which time also a great fleet of the Egyptian Sultans lay at ASCALON, to haue brought reliefe to the besieged Turks in IERUSALEM: whereof the Genowais vnderstanding, and knowing themselves too weake to encounter them at sea, tooke all such things out of their ships as they thought good, and so sinking them, marched by land vnto the campe. There was amongst these Genowais diuers enginers, men (after the manner of that time) cunning in making of all manner of engines fit for the besieging of cities: by whose device, a great moouing tower was framed of timber and thick planks, couered ouer with raw hides, to saue the same from fire: out of which the Christians might in safetie greatly annoy the defendants. This tower being by night brought close vnto the wall, serued the Christians in steed of a most sure forresse in the assault the next day: where whilst they sturue with like valour and doubtfull victorie on both sides, from morning vntill midday, by chance the wind fauouring the Christians, carried the flame of the fire into the face of the Turks, wherewith they had thought to haue burnt the tower; with such violence, that the Christians taking the benefit thereof, and holpen by the tower, gained the top of the wall: which was first footed by the duke Godfrey, and his brother Eustace, with their followers, and the ensigns of the duke there first set vp, to the great encouraging of the Christians; who now presing in on euery side, like a violent riuer that had broken ouer the banks, bare downe all before them. All were slaine that came to hand, men, women, and children, without respect of age, sex, or condition: the slaughter was great, and the sight lamentable, all the streets were filled with blood, and the bodies of the dead, death triumphing in euery place.

C Yet in this confusion, a woonderfull number of the better sort of the Turks, retiring vnto Salomons temple there to do their last deuoiure, made there a great and terrible fight, armed with dispaire to endure any thing; and the victorious Christians no lesse disdainig, after the winning of the citie, to find there so great resistance. In this desperat conflict, fought with woonderfull obstinacie of mind, many fell on both sides: but the Christians came on so fiercely, with desire of blood, that breaking into the temple, the foremost of them were by the prelle of them that followed after, violently thrust vpon the weapons of their enemies, and so miserably slaine. Neither did the Turks thus oppressed, giue it ouer, but as men resolute to die, desperately fought it out with inuincible courage, not at the gates of the temple onely, but euen in the midst thereof also, where was to be seene great heaps, both of the victors and the vanquished, slaine indifferently together. All the pavement of the temple swam with blood, in such sort, that a man could not set his foot, but either vpon some dead man, or ouer the shooes in blood. Yet for all that, the obstinate enemy still held the vaults and top of the temple, when as the darkness of the night came so fast on, that the Christians were glad to make an end of the slaughter, and to sound a retreat. The next day (for that proclamation was made, for mercie to be shewed vnto all such as should lay downe their weapons) the Turks that yet held the vpper part of the temple, came down & yeilded themselves. Thus was the famous citie of IERUSALEM with great bloodshed, but far greater honor, recouered by these woorthie Christians, in the yeere 1099, after it had beene in the hands of the infidels about foure hundred yeeres.

E The next day after, hauing buried the dead and cleansed the citie, they gaue thanks to God with publicke praiers, and great rejoycing. The poore Christians before oppressed, now overcome with vnexpected joy, welcomed their victorious brethren with great joy and praise; and the souldiers embracing one another, sparing to speake of themselves, freely commended each others valour. Eight daies after, the princes of the armie meeting together, began to consult about the choice of their king: amongst whom was no such difference, as might well shew which was to be preferred before the others. And although euery one of them for prowesse and desert, seemed woorthie of so great an honour; yet by the generall consent of all, it was giuen to Robert duke of NORMANDIE: who about the same time hearing of the death of the Conquerour his father, and more in loue with his fathers new gotten kingdome in ENGLAND, in hope thereof, refused the kingdome of IERUSALEM, then offered vnto him: which at his returne he found found possessed by William Rufus his younger brother, and so in hope of a better refusing the G woofle, vpon the matter lost both.

Godfrey duke of Buillon by the generall consent of the Christian armie chosen first king of Ierusalem.

After whose departure, Godfrey of Buillon duke of Lorraine (whose ensigne was first displaid vpon the wals) was by the generall consent both of the princes and the armie, saluted king. He was a great fouldier, and endued with many heroicall vertues, brought vp in the court of the emperour Henrie the fourth, and by him much employed. At the time of his inauguration, he refused to be crowned with a crowne of gold: saying, That it became not a Christian man, there to were a crowne of gold, where Christ the sonne of God had for the saluation of mankind, sometime wore a crowne of thorne. Of the greatest part of these proceedings of the Christians, from the time of their departure from Antioch vntill the winning of the Holy citie, Godfrey by letters briefly certified Bohemund, as followeth.

Godfrey of Buillon to Bohemund king of Antioch, greeting.

After long trauell, hauing first taken certaine townes, we came to IERUSALEM: which citie is enuironed with high hills, without riuers or fountaines, excepting onely that of Solomons, and that a verie little one. In it are many cisterns, wherein water is kept, both in the citie and the country thereabout. On the East are the Arabians, the Moabits, and Ammonits: on the South, the Idumeans, Aegyptians, and Philistians: Westward alongst the sea coast lie the cities of PTOLEMAIS, TIRVS, and TRIPOLIS: and Northward, TIBERIAS, CESAREA, PHILIPPI, with the country DECAPOLIS and DAMASCO. In the assault of the citie, I first gained that part of the wall that fell to my lot to assaile, and commanded Baldwin to enter the citie: who hauing slaine certaine companies of the enemies, broke open one of the gates for the Christians to enter. Raymond had the citie of David, with much rich spoile, yeelded vnto him. But when we came vnto the temple of Solomon, there we had a great conflict, with so great slaughter of the enemy, that our men stood in blood aboue the ancles: the night approaching, we could not take the upper part of the temple, which the next day was yeelded, the Turks pittifully crying out for mercie: and so the citie of IERUSALEM was by vs taken, the sixteenth of Iuly, in the yeere of our redemption 1099, 39 daies after the beginning of the siege, 409 yeeres after it fell into the hands of the Saracins in the time of Heraclius the emperour. Besides this, the princes with one consent saluted me (against my will) king of IERUSALEM: who although I feare to take vpon me so great a kingdome; yet I will do my deuoir, that they shall easily know me for a Christian king, and well deseruing of the vniuersall Faith. But lone you me as you do. And so farewell from IERUSALEM.

Whilest these things were in doing at IERUSALEM, such a multitude of the Turks, and Saracins their confederats (now in their common calamitie all as one) were assembled at Ascalon (a citie about fife and twentie miles from IERUSALEM) to reuenge the injuries they had before receiued, as had not before met together in all the time of this sacred war. Against whom, Godfrey (the late duke, and now king) assembled the whole forces of the Christians in those countries, and leauing a strong garrison in the new woon citie, set forward: and meeting with them, joynd a most dreadfull and cruell battell, wherein (as most report) were slaine of the Infidels an hundred thousand men, and the rest put to flight. The spoile there taken, far exceeded all that the Christians had before taken in this long expedition. Godfrey after so great a victorie, returning to IERUSALEM, gaue vnto God most humble thanks. The rest of the princes returned either to their charge, as did Bohemund to Antioch, Baldwin to EDessa; Tancred into GALLILEY, wherof he was created prince: or else hauing now performed the vttmost of their vowes, returned with honour into their owne countries. This was of all others the most honourable expedition that euer the Christians tooke in hand against the Infidels; and with the greatest resolution performed, for the most part, by such voluntary men, as mooued with a deuout zeale, to their immortall praise, spared neither life nor liuing in defence of the Christian faith and religion; all men woorthie eternall fame and memorie. Not long after ensued a great pestilence (the readie attendant of long war and want) wherof infinit numbers of people died, and among the rest Godfrey, the first Christian king of IERUSALEM, neuer to be sufficiently commended: who with the generall lamentation of all good Christians, was honourably buried ried in the church of the sepulchre of our Sauour on the mount CALVERIE, where our Sauour suffred his passion: in which the Christian kings succeeding him, were also afterwards buried. He departed this life the eighteenth of Iuly, in the yeere of our Lord 1100, when he had yet scarce raigned a full yeere. Whose tombe is yet at this day there to be seene with an honourable inscription thereupon.

After the death of Godfrey, the Christians made choice of Baldwin his brother, countie of EDessa; who leauing his former gouernment to Baldwin surnamed Burgensis, his neere kinsman, came to IERUSALEM honourably accompanied, and was there by the Patriarch on Christmas day with all solemnitie crowned king, in the yeere 1101. He aided by the Venetians and Genowais at sea, and by Bohemund king of Antioch by land, tooke from the Infidels the citie of CESAREA STRATONIS, standing vpon the sea side; and ouerthrew certaine companies of the Aegyptian Sultans at RAMA. But vnderstanding that the Christian princes of the West were coming to his aid with a new power; he glad thereof, went to meet them, and safely conducted them to IERUSALEM alongst the sea coast, by the cities of BERYTUS, SIDON, TIRE, and PTOLEMAIS, all yet holden by the enemies. At which time the Turks at Ascalon hauing receiued great aid from the Arabians and Aegyptians, invaded the country about RAMA: where betwixt them and the Christians was fought a most cruell battell, wherein the Christians receiued a most notable ouerthrow; many of their great commanders being there slaine; and among the rest Stephen earle of CHARTERS (but lately returned home from the former expedition, and now come backe againe) and Stephen earle of BVRVONDIE and THOLOVS: yea the king himselfe hardly escaped the enemies hands, and after many dangers came at length to IOPPA after it had bene constantly before reported him to haue been in that battell also slaine. Who hauing there in hast repaired his armie, came againe speedily vpon his enemies, fearing as then nothing lesse; and ouerthrew them with such a slaughter, as that they had small cause to reioyce of the former victorie. Neither were the rest of the Christian princes in the other parts of SIRIA and PALESTINE, in the meane time idle, but sought by all meanes to enlarge their territories. Tancred prince of GALLILEE, hauing raised a great power, tooke APAMEA, the Metropolitane citie of CÆLESYRIA, and after much toile vpon also the citie of LAODICEA. Baldwin also gouernour of EDessa besieging the citie of CARRAS, had brought the besieged Turks to such extremitie, that they were about to haue yeelded the citie: when suddenly hee was set vpon by a great armie of the Turks sent from the Persian Sultan, for the reliefe of the besieged; and being there ouerthrowne, was himselfe there taken, with Benedict the bishop, and one Ioscelin his kinsman: who after fife yeeres captiuitie, found means with the Turke that had taken them, to redeeme themselves, to the great offence of the Persian Sultan, & of the Sultan Solyman.

King Baldwin after the late victorie, liued for a season at some good rest in IERUSALEM, vnmolested by his enemies: but knowing his greatest safetie among such warlike people, to consist in armes, he vpon the sudden raised the whole strength of his kingdome, and laid siege to PTOLEMATS, otherwise called ACON, a citie of PHœNICIA standing vpon the riuaige of the sea; where he found such resistance, that he was glad to raise his siege and depart, hauing done nothing more than spoiled the pleasant places without the citie. By the way in his returne backe againe, it fortuned him to meet with certaine companies of the enemies aduenturers, by whom he was in a skirmish mortally wounded, although he died not thereof in long time after: for albeit that the wound was by his surgeons healed vp, yet was the griefe thereof so great, that at length it brought him to his end. Yet he notwithstanding the former repulse, the next yeere, encouraged by the coming of the Genua fleet, laid hard siege againe to PTOLEMAIS: both by sea and land, which after twentie daies siege was by composition yeelded vnto him.

Shortly after, the gouernour of ALERPO with certaine others of the Turks great captaines in those quarters, hauing joynd their forces together and so invaded the country about Antioch, were by Tancred (whom Bohemund at his departure into ITALY, had left gouernour of that citie) notably encountered and put to flight. At which time also the Caliph of AROPYT sending great forces both by sea and land against the king of IERUSALEM, was in both places discomfited, at land by the Christians, and at sea by tempest.

Bohemund in the meane time, with a great armie of voluntarie men, and others (wherein he is reported to haue had fife thousand horse, and fortie thousand foot) returning towards the Holy land, in reuenge of many injuries done by Alexius the emperour, vnto the soldiers of this sacred war, contrarie to his faith and promise to them before given : by the way landed his men in EPIRVS, and grievously spoiled the countrey about DIRRACHIUM, part of the emperours dominion. Neither made he an end of spoiling, vntill he had enforced the emperour for redresse of so great harmes, to make peace with him; and againe by solemne oath to promise all securitie and kindnesse, vnto all such Christian souldiers as should haue occasion to trauell too or fro through his countreies, during the time of this religious war. After which agreement hee put to sea againe, and so returned for IERUSALEM. But whilest he staid at ANTIOCH, hee shortly after there died in the yeere 1108, leauing the principalltie thereof vnto his yoong sonne Bohemund, a child vnder the tuition of his nephew Tancred.

Yet were the cities of BERYTVS, SIDON, and TYRE, amongst the sea coast, in the enemies possession : for the gaining whereof, Baldwin the king raised a great armie, and so came and laid siege to BERYTVS, which after many sharpe assaults he at length woon, the three and twentieth day of Aprill in the yeere 1111, and put to sword most part of them that he found therein. The same yeere also he, assisted by a fleet sent vnto him out of NORWAY, besieged the citie of SIDON : which the citizens seeing themselves now beset both by sea and land, at length yeelded vnto him by composition, the nineteenth day of December. After which victorie he dismissed the fleet, and returned himselfe in triumph to IERUSALEM. Now of all the famous cities alongst the sea coast of PHENICIA and PALESTINE, from LAODICEA to ASCALON, was onely the citie of TYRE that remained in the hands of the enemies : which citie Baldwin also hardly besieged; neuertheless, it was so well defended by the Turks, that after he had all in vaine lyeen before it by the space of foure months, he was glad to rise with his armie and depart.

It fortuned, that within two yeeres after, the Turks with a mightie armie sent from the Persian Sultan, invaded the countrey of CELESYRIA, where spoiling all before them as they went, they came and encamped vpon the sea coast neere vnto TYBERIAS. Against whom Baldwin gathered the whole strength of his kingdome, with whom also Tancred (who now reigned in ANTIOCH, the yoong Bohemund being dead) with the countie of TRIPOLI, and the rest of the Christian princes, joyned their forces : who altogether marching forward, came and encamped, not far from the enemie, being in number far more than they. Mendus generall of the Turks armie (for so I find him called) vnderstanding of their approach, sent out certaine companies of his men to skirmish with them : against whom the Christians also sent out others; who encountering them, easily put them to flight, being before commanded so to do, of purpose to draw the Christians into the danger of a greater strength, lying in ambush to intrap them : which according to the Turks desire fell out. For the Christians fiercely pursuing the flying enemie, fell into the ambush, and so before they were well aware, were beset on euerie side with their enemies : vnto the rescue of whom, other companies of the Christians comming in, and others likewise from the Turks, both the great armies were at length drayn into the field, where betwixt them was joynd a most fierce and terrible battell, with great slaughter on both sides. But at length the multitude of the Turks preuailling, the Christians were put to the worse, and so glad to flie : after whom the fierce enemy hardly followed, not without great slaughter. In which flight the king himselfe hardly escaped, with Arnolphus the Patriarch. Whilest Baldwin was thus busied abroad, the Turks & Saracins from ASCALON, came & besieged IERUSALEM, being then but weakly manned : but hearing of the kings comming, & that the armie of the Christians dayly increased with new supplies out of the West by sea, they retired home againe, hauing burnt certaine storehouses full of corne, and spoiled such things as was subiect to their furie.

Long it were to recount all the hard conflicts and combats this king had with the Saracins and Turks, which for breuitie I passe ouer, contented to haue briefly touched the greatest. In the last yeere of his raigne, hauing for certaine yeeres before liued in some reasonable peace, he made an expedition into AEGYPT, where he with much difficultie woon PHARAMIA, a strong citie vpon the sea coast, which he joynded vnto his owne kingdome. After that he went to the mouth of the riuer NILVS, and with great admiration, learned the nature of that strange riuer. And hauing therein taken abundance of fish, returned into the citie, and there with the same feasted himselfe with his friends. But after dinner he began to feele the griefe of his old wound; and growing thereof sicker and sicker, returned with his armie toward IERUSALEM, where by the way neere vnto a citie called LARIS, he died (to the great griefe of all the Christians) in the yeere 1118. His dead bodie being brought backe vnto IERUSALEM, was there roially buried,

neere vnto his brother Godfrey, after he had reigned eightene yeeres : whose sepulchre is yet there also to be seene, fast by the sepulchre of his brother.

The late king thus dead and buried, the Christians with one consent made choise of his cousin Baldwin surnamed Brugenis, gouernour of EDESSA : who by the name of Baldwin the second, was the second of Aprill in the yeere 1118, solemnly crowned king of IERUSALEM. He was of stature tall and well proportioned, of countenance comely and gracious, hauing his haire thinnie and yellow, his beard mingled with some gray haire hanging downe to his breast; his colour fresh and liuely for one of his yeeres. He was a man of great courage, and therefore no lesse redoubted of his enemies than beloued of his subjects, who had in him repored great hope both for the defence and enlarging of that new gained kingdome. Against him the same Sommer the Caliph of AEGYPT, aided by the king of DAMASCO and the Turks, in reuenge of the losse he had in the expedition the yeere before receiued, raised a great power to inuade him both by sea and land. Against whom Baldwin also opposed himselfe with his whole strength, and so came and encamped within the sight of his enemies. In which sort, when both armies had lyeen the one facing the other by the space of three months, they both rose : the Christians fearing the multitude of the Turks, and the Turks the valour of the Christians, and so retired without any notably thing doing.

This yeere died Alexius the Greeke emperour, who euen from the beginning of this sacred war, secretly repined at the good successe of the Christians in SYRIA, although his empire were thereby greatly enlarged : after whome succeeded Calo Ioannes his sonne, who all the time of his raigne right worthily defended his territories in the lesser ASIA against the inuasion of the Turks.

Not long after, Gazi one of the greatest princes of the Turks in the lesser ASIA, with the king of DAMASCO, and Debeis king of ARABIA, joyning their forces together, with a great armie inuading the countrey about ANTIOCH, came and encamped not far from ALEPPO : against whom Roger prince of ANTIOCH, not expecting the comming of Baldwin and the other Christian princes his confederats, but presuming of his owne strength, went forth with greater courage than discretion, whereunto his successe was answerable : for encountering with them at too much ods, he was by them in a great battell ouerthrowne, wherein he himselfe was slaine with most part of his armie. Of which so great a slaughter, the place wherein this battell was fought, was afterward called, The field of Blood. But whilst the Turks after so great a victorie, carelessly and at pleasure roame vp and downe the countrey, Baldwin setting vpon them, ouerthrew them with a great slaughter, and so put them to flight. After this victorie gained by the Christians the fourteenth of August, in the yeere 1120, king Baldwin in great triumph entered into ANTIOCH, and so joynded that principalltie vnto his owne kingdome.

The yeer following, the Turks with another armie, inuaded the same countrey againe : for repenting of whom, whilst Baldwin with the other Christian princes were making their preparations, it fortuned that Gazi their great commander suddenly died of an Apoplexie; vpon whose death they retired without further harme doing. Neuertheless the next Spring, the king of DAMASCO aided by the Arabians, entered againe with a great power into the countrey about ANTIOCH, and there did some harme : for the Antiochians now destitute of their owne prince, and Baldwin (who had taken vpon him their protection) being far off, and otherwise busied at IERUSALEM, were much more subiect vnto the inrodes of their enemies (still at hand) than before when they had a prince of their owne still present amongst them. But Baldwin aduertised thereof, was making towards them with a puissant armie, sooner than they had thought it could haue bene possible. Of whose approach the Turks vnderstanding, retired againe out of the countrey : after whom, the king thinking it not good to make further pursuit, turned a little out of the way, and tooke by force GARAZB, one of the strongest castles of the kings of DAMASCO, built but the yeere before; which becaule it was not without great charge and danger to be holden, he rased downe to the ground.

Baldwin notwithstanding that hee had many times thus honourably repulsed his enemies, wisely considering how he was on the one side beset with the Turks, and on the other side with the Saracins (which yet reigned in AEGYPT, the kingdome of IERUSALEM lying as it were in the mouth of them both) thought it good betime to pray aid of the Christian princes of EUROPE, and to that purpose had sent diuers his ambassadors vnto diuers of them, but especially vnto the Venetians; whom of all others he thought fittest at his need to yeeld him reliefe by sea. It fortuned in the meane time, that Balas the Persian Sultan with a great armie of the Turks, inuaded the countrey about Antioch, whereof Baldwin vnderstanding (although he certainly knew he should ere long receiue aid from the other Christian princes his friends, but especially from the Venetians, & might therefore with great reason haue protracted the war vntil their coming, yet being therewith much moued, or else his destinie so requiring) raised such forces as he had of his owne, and without longer staying for his friends, with greater courage than good speed, set forward: and so joyning battell with the enemy, was therein ouerthrowne, with the greatest part of his armie, and himselfe taken prisoner in the fight, with certaine other of his best commanders; who altogether were carried away captiues vnto Carras.

Ierusa besieged by the Saracins.

Vpon the report of this ouerthrow, and taking of the king, the Caliph of Aegypt, on the other side tooke occasion with all his power to inuade the kingdome of Ierusalem; and hauing in himselfe purposed the utter ruine thereof, beside the great armie which he sent thither by land, which lay encamped not far from Ascalon, he put to sea an huge fleet also, of seuen hundred saile, for the distressing of the sea townes, which he well knew were not otherwise to be wooit: This fleet of the Sarasin kings (for Aegypt with the kingdomes of Tynes and Morocco were yet in possession of the Saracins) arriuing at Ioppa, there put a shore their land forces, and hardly besieged the towne both by sea and land. But whilst they thus lay in great hope to haue woon the towne, Dominicus Michael, duke of Venice, stirred vp by Calixtus then bishop of Rome, was come to Cyprus with a fleet of two hundred saile, for the reliefe of the Christians in Syria, and the Holy land: And hearing of the distresse of Ioppa, nothing dismayed with the number of the enemies fleet, hasted thither, and came so suddenly vpon them, that he had (as some report) ouerthrowne them, before they could put themselves in order, or be in readinesse to fight: or as some others say, after a great and doubtfull fight, hauing sunke or taken a great number of them, and put the rest to flight, he obtained of them a most glorious victorie. With like good fortune also, were the Saracins ouerthrowne in a notable battell at land, neere vnto Ascalon, by the lord Euface, vnto whom the defence of the kingdome was committed after the taking of the king, who not long after so great a victorie died.

Ioppa relieved (as is aforesaid) the duke of Venice travelled by land to Ierusalem, where he was honourably receiued by Guarimund the Patriarch, and the confederation before made betwixt king Baldwin & the Venetians, vpon the same conditions solemnly againe renewed.

Tyre besieged by the Christians.

The Saracins thus notably discomfited both by sea and land, and the Christians thereby not a little encouraged, and joyning their forces together with the Venetians, came and the first of March laid siege vnto the ancient and strong cite of Tyre: which they hauing beset both by sea and land, gaue thereunto many a sharpe assault: which the Turks as men fighting for their liues, and wiues, right valiantly repulsed. In which sort the siege was continued longer than the Christians had at the first thought should haue needed: yet at length, after foure months siege, the Turks fore weakened with often assaults, and hardly pinched with want of food, all their store being spent, yeelded the cite by composition. Thus was the cite of Tyre (the most famous port of Phoenicia) yeelded vnto the Christians the nine and twentieth of Iune, in the yeere 1124. The third part of this cite was giuen vnto the Venetians, according to the composition made betwixt them and the kings of Ierusalem, That of all such cities as were by their helpe woon from the Infidels in Syria, they should haue a third part, with one street, and free traficke in all the rest of the cities of the kingdome of Ierusalem. Shortly after was king Baldwin set at libertie for the ransom of an hundred thousand ducats, after he had bene eightene moneths prisoner among the Turks.

The duke of Venice hauing now spent almost three yeares in this sacred expedition, & well confirmed the state of the Christians in Syria, returning home, by the way tooke the islands of Chios, Rhodus, Samos, Mitylen, and Andrus, with the cite of Modon in Peloponessus; all places belonging vnto the Greekes empire. Which hee did in reuenge of the injuries done by the emperour, in the time of his absence, who enuying at the successe of the Christians in Syria, as had his father Alexius before him, had in the absence of the duke, infected the territories of the Venetians, for the which he was now justly requited with the losse of a good part of his owne.

Baldwin also not vnmindfull of the injuries vnto him before done by the Turkes, in requital thereof, thereof inuaded the countrey about Damasco; and there in three notable battels ouerthrew the king, and spoiled the countrey: wherein he tooke so great a prey, that therewith he redeemed his daughter, whom he had at the time of his deliuerance left in hostage with the Turks for the payment of his ransom. He also ouerthrew the Saracins at Ascalon, who aided by the Caliph of Aegypt, had sundrie times inuaded the countrey about Ierusalem. And so hauing well repressed his enemies, for a space liued in peace.

Not long after, Hugh Paganus first master of the Templars, (an order of knights first begun in the raigne of this Baldwin) before sent to craue aid of the Christian princes of the West, against the Turks and Saracins, returned with a great number of zealous Christians, ready to lay downe their liues for defence of the Christian faith and religion: with whom Baldwin and the other Christian princes of Syria joyning their forces, set forward and besieged Damasco; the regall fear of the Turks in those quarters. But such was the strength of this cite, with the valour of the defendants, and contagiousnesse of the aire, that the Christians (the heavens as it were then fighting against them) were glad to raise their siege in vaine begun, and so to retire.

Whilst things thus passed in Syria, Fulke countie of Tyren, Mayn, and Anio, a man almost of threescore yeeres, hauing as he thought best disposed of his things at home, had for deuotion sake taken vpon him an expedition into the Holy land. In the time of which his preparations, embassadours came vnto him from king Baldwin, offering him in marriage Melisenda (or as some call her Margaret) his eldest daughter, with the succession into the kingdome of Ierusalem in dowrie, if he should suruiue the king; and in the meane time to content himselfe with the cities of Tyre and Ptolemais: of which offer he accepted, and so held on his journey before intended. It fortuned about three yeeres after, that the king fell dangerously sicke, and feeling his death drawing on, hauing laid aside all regall dignitie, caused himselfe to be remooued out of his owne palace, into the Patriarchs house, which was neerer vnto the temple of the Sepulchre: and there calling vnto him Fulke the countie, his sonne in law, with his daughter, and his sonne Baldwin, then but two yeeres old, in the presence of the Patriarch, and diuers other princes & great commanders, commended vnto them the gouernment and defence of the kingdome, appointing Fulke to succeed him. And taking vnto himselfe the habit and profession of a monk, if he should haue longer liued, presently after gaue vp the ghost the two and twentieth day of August, in the yeere 1131; whereof he reigned with much trouble thirteene yeeres, and was solemnly buried in the temple vpon mount Caluarie, with the other two kings Godfrey and Baldwin, his predecessors.

The kings funerall ended, the princes of the kingdome with one accord made choise of Fulke the old countie, earle of Anio, for their king: who the sixteenth day of September, was with all solemnitie by William the Patriarch crowned in Ierusalem. This man in the beginning of his raigne, besides his troubles abroad, was also vext with domesticall and intestine discord: Pontius countie of Triopolis, seeking by force of armes to haue rent the dukedome of Antioch from the kingdome: and Hugh countie of Ioppa, for feare of due punishment for his treason, joyning himselfe with the Saracins of Ascalon, and so with them infesting the territories of Ierusalem, to the great hurt of the Christian state, and aduantage of the infidels. Which troublesome broiles were yet afterwards by the king, partly by force, partly by the mediation of the Patriarch & other princes (who seeing the danger like thereof to ensue, had entreated themselves) well againe appeased. Vengeance yet neuertheless still following both the aforesaid traitours: Pontius being shortly after slaine by the Turks, and Hugh dying in exile.

Besides these domesticall troubles, the Turks also inuaded the countrey about Antioch, where they were by the sudden comming of the king ouerthrowne, with the losse of their tents, and exceeding great riches. And that nothing might be wanting vnto the disquieting of the state of that new erected kingdome, not long after, John the Constantinopolitan emperour (together with the empire, inheritor also of his fathers malice, against the proceeding of the Christians in Syria) with a puissant armie passing through the lesser Asia, and by the way taking by force Tarsus the metropolitall cite of Cilicia, with the whole prouince thereunto belonging, came and besieged Antioch; which Fulke but a little before had together with Constance, the daughter and heire of the late duke of Antioch, giuen in marriage to Raymond countie of Poitv, for that purpose sent for out of France. But in this so dangerous a state of that Christian kingdome, the other zealous Christian princes interposed themselves as mediators diatours betwixt the emperour (pretending the same to belong vnto his empire) and Raymund G that was in possession thereof. And in fine brought it to this end, That Raymund for the present submitting himselfe vnto the emperour, should from thenceforth hold his dukedome of him as of his lord and foveraigne: vpon which agreement the emperour returned vnto TARSUS, where he wintred, and so afterwards vnto CONSTANTINOPE.

Much about the same time, Sanguin one of the Turkes great princes, invading the countrey about TRIPOLIS, besieged the castell of MONTE-FERRAND: vnto the reliefe whereof, Fulke comming with his armie, was by the Turkes ouerthrown; and for the safegard of his life, glad to take the refuge of the castell, the countie himselfe being in that battell taken prisoner. After which victorie, the Turkes laid harder siege vnto the castell than before: the besieged in the meane time being no lesse pinched within with famine, than pressed without by the enemy. In this the kings hard distresse, the other princes hauing raised the whole power of the kingdome, were comming to his reliefe: whereof the Turke vnderstanding, offered of himselfe to giue them all leaue freely to depart, and to set the countie at libertie, so that they would deliuer vnto him the castle: of which his offer they gladiy accepting, yeelded vp the strong hold, and so departed. The king by the way meeting with the armie, thanked his friends for their forwardnesse, and so returned to IERSALEM.

Ca's Joannes
v. Grecke em-perour seeketh to recover the city of Antioch

About foure yeeres after, John the Constantinopolitan emperour, with a great armie came againe into SYRIA, with purpose to haue vnted the famous cite of ANTIOCH vnto his empire, and so to haue made a way into the kingdome of IERSALEM, whereafter hee had now a good while longed. But comming thither, in hope to haue found the Cilicians and Syrians readie to haue receiued him, he was deceiued of his expectation, being shut out by the Latins, and not suffred to enter, but vpon his oath, and that with some few of his followers; and so after due reuerence done vnto him, quietly to depart without any stir or innouation in the city. In reuenge of which disgrace, at his departure he gaue the suburbs of the city as a prey vnto his greedie souldiers; pretending the same to be done for want of victuals: who made hauocke of whatsoeuer came to hand, not sparing the verie fruit trees, but cutting them downe to dresse their meat withall. Hauing thus vnder colour of necessitie, reuenged the disgrace receiued, he returned into CILICIA, and there wintred: where one day for his disport, hunting of the wild boare; and hauing wounded him with his boare speare, the wild beast therewith enraged, and with all his force bearing forward vpon the weapon, forced the emperours hand backward vpon the point of a poysoned arrow, that was hanging in a quier at his backe, and so was therewith lightly wounded. Neuerthelesse, as light as the wound was, such was the strength of the poyson, that the griefe thereof still increasing, and his hand and arme more and more swelling, there was no remedie to be found, but that his arme must be cut off; which desperat and vncertaine cure he abhorring, and in the extremitie of his paine oftentimes pleasantly saying, That the Greeke empire was not to be gouerned with one hand: ouercome with the strength of the poyson died. In whose place succeeded his yongest sonne Emanuel, Alexius and Andronicus his two elder sonnes being both dead at his setting forth vnto this so vnhappy expedition.

T's death of Ca's Joannes
the Grecke em-perour.

The miserable death of Fulke
king of Ierusalem.

It fortuned about this time also, the kingdome of IERSALEM being now at peace, that Fulke the king with the queene his wife, lying at the cite of PTOLEMAIS in the time of Autumne, it pleased the queene for her disport, to walke out of the cite, vnto certaine pleasant fountaines thereby in the countrey; for whose companie the king would needs go also, with certaine of his courtiers, where by the way it chanced that certaine boyes running along the field, put vp an hare that was sitting in a furrow: after which, all the courtiers on horsebacke galloped a maine, with notable outerie and hallowing. Amongst the rest, the king to be partaker of the sport, forcing his horse to the vtermost of his power, in the midst of his course fell, together with his horse foundring vnder him, and in falling, chanced to fall with his head vnder the horse: with whose waight, and the hardnesse of his saddle, he was so crushed, that the braines came out both at his nose and eares. In this pitifull case being taken vp for dead, and with great heauinesse carried backe; he yet breathing, lay speechlesse three daies, and so died the thirteenth of Nouember, in the yeere of Grace 1142. His dead bodie afterwards brought to IERSALEM, was there with great magnificence, and the generall lamentation of all his subjects, buried with the other kings his predecessours.

Now had the late king left behind him two sonnes, Baldwyn about the age of thirteene yeeres, and

A and Almerike about the age of seuen. Of the elder of these two, the Christian princes made choice, who by the name of Baldwyn the third, was together with Melesinda his mother, partner with him in the kingdome, vpon Christenmas day with great solemnitie crowned king of HE-RUSALEM, in the yeere 1142. About which time Sanguin the Turke, taking hold of the discord betwixt Raymund prince of ANTIOCH, and Joscelin countie of EDESSA, came and with a great power besieged EDESSA, the countie being at the same time absent: And did so much, that at length he tooke the cite by vndermining of it, where the bloodie Turke exercised all manner of crueltie vpon the poore Christians in the cite. By the losse of this famous cite, so large a territorie fell againe into the hands of the Turkes, as that three archbishops were thereby drawne from the church of ANTIOCH. The Turke encouraged with this victorie, straightwaies after besieged COLOGNBAR, another strong towne of the Christians: where one night drinking liberally with his friends, he was by one of them in his drunkennesse stabbed, and so slaine, and the siege raised. In whose stead Noradin his sonne succeeded.

Baldwyn, in the first yeere of his raigne, recovered from the Turkes the castle of SOBAE, a strong hold beyond JORDAN, which hee notably fortified, for the defence of that side of his kingdome against the incursions of the Turkes. But the next yeere vndertaking an expedition against the king of DAMASCUS, he was by Noradin the Turke, the kings sonne in law, so hardly beset in his returne, as that it was accounted a thing miraculous, how he with his armie escaped his hands.

C The report of the losse of EDESSA with the miseries there endured by the Christians, being bruted through all parts of Christendome, greatly moued the Christian princes of the West. Whom Eugenius the third, then bishop of Rome, ceased not both by himselfe and by his Legates to stirre vp to take that sacred warre in hand. And therein wrought so effectually, that almost in euerie prouince of Christendome preparation was made for the reliefe of the distressed Christians in SYRIA. Of all others, Conrade the third then emperour of GERMANYE was most forward, who aided by the Germane princes and others, with an incredible number of voluntarie men out of all parts of Christendome, had raised a most puissant armie, and therewith set forward on this sacred expedition. Of this his deuout purpose he had before certified Emanuel the Greeke emperour, through whose countries hee was to passe, crauing that hee might by his good fauour so doe, and for his money to be relieued with victuals, and other such things as hee should haue need of for himselfe or his people; promising in most quiet and peaceable manner to passe, without any harme doing vnto his territories or subjects. All which the Greeke emperour, commending his zeale, seemed in most large tearmes willingly to condiscend vnto. Neuerthelesse he inwardly repined thereat, wishing indeed no better successe vnto the Christians in this so honourable an expedition, than did the infidels themselves, as by the sequell of his doings well appeared. For Conrade with his populous armie, indeed a terrour vnto the Greekes, entering into the frontiers of the Constantinopolitane empire, found all things in shew friendly (for why Emanuel had before giuen out strait command, that good store of victuals and all other necessities should be readie at all places to be sold as the armie was to passe:) but they were not farre come into the countrey, but that in the taile of the armie still followed certaine strong companies of the Greekes, to keepe the souldiers from stragling from their ensignes, roming about in the countrey, now and then cutting them short, as they tooke them at aduantage. And still the further that they travelled, the more it was to be seene in the countenances of the discontented Greekes, how vniwelcome guests they were. Yet still on they went through the countries of their dissembling friends, little differing from open enemies, vntill they came to PHILIPPOPOLIS: in departing from whence, such contention rose betwene them that were in the reuerard of the armie, and the Greekes that followed them, that it was like to haue come to plaine battell, had not those broiles, by the discretion of some of the wiser sort, been in good time appeased. So marching on they came to ADRIANOPELE, & in a few daies after to the plaine called CHEROBACH, through which the riuier MELAS hath his course; which in Summer being almost drie, in Winter or any other great downefall of water, right suddenly ouerfloweth his bankes, and so drowneth the whole countrey, that then it seemeth no more a riuier, but a sea; and swelling with the wind, is not to be passed ouer, but by great boats: This riuier then suddenly rising by night, by reason of the great raine that then fell, in such abundance, as if the flood-gates of heauen had ben opened, so ouerflowed the place wherein the armie lay encamped vpon the side thereof, that with the violence violence of the water were carried away: not onely manie weapons, saddles, garments, & such other the souldiours necessities: but euen the horses and mules, with their burdens, yea and great numbers of armed men themselves also, a most miserable and lamentable thing to behold. Many valiant men there fell without fight, and died no man killing them: to be tall, helped riot; neither did valour stand them in any stead, they perished like hay, and were carried away like chaffe, with such outcries and lamentation, that they which saw it, verely said, That the wrath of God was broke into the campe: such a suddaine inundation had ouerwhelmed all: that happie was hee could make shift for himselfe, without regarding one another. This misfortune sore troubled the emperor with his whole armie. Neuertheless, the water being againe fallen, and all put in so good order, as in such a confusion was possible, he marched on vnto the imperiall cities which the suspicious and malicious Greeke, had before notably fortified and so strongly manned with armed men glistning upon the wals, in such sort as if it should haue presently been assaulted.

Comrade approaching the cite, was not suffered to enter, but perswaded by the Greeke emperor forthwith to transport his armie ouer the strait, with promise to supplie his wants with what- soeuer he should require. Which was done with such hast, as if nothing had beene farther to haue been regarded, but onely to haue them shipped ouer: in which seruice the Greekes spared no labour, or kind of vessel, that might serue to transport them. The Greeke emperor in the meane time, by men secretly appointed for that purpose, keeping account of the number that passed, vntill that they wearied with the multitude, ceased farther to number them. But when they were once shipped ouer, then began the couert mallice of the Greeke emperor forthwith to appeare. For besides that they trusting vnto his promises, had brought little or no provisions ouer with them, the country people by his appointment brought nothing vnto them to sell, as before: and they of the townes and cities shut their gates against them as they marched, not affording them any thing, but at an extreame rate, for which they would first receiue their money by ropes cast downe from the wals, and then deliuer them what they pleased therefore; yea and oftentimes bought at all. Amongst many other vile practises, not becoming Christians, the malicious Greekes, to poyson the souldiours, mingled lime with the meale which they sold vnto the armie, whereof many of the hungrie souldiours greedily feeding, died. Whether the Greeke emperor were priue thereto, or no, is not certainly knowne; but certaine it is, that he caused counterfeit money to be coined, of purpose to deceiue them: and in breefe, that there was no kind of mischief to be practised against them, which either hee himselfe deuised not, or set not others to deuise; to the intent that their posteritie, terrified by this so vnfortunat expedition, might for euer be afraid to take the like in hand againe. And that nothing might be wanting that mallice could deuise, he had secret intelligence with the Turkes themselves, concerning the strength of the armie, plotting vnto them the meanes how the same might best be defeated: whereby it came to passe, that some part thereof was by Pamplano, a capitaine of the Turkes, overthrowne neere BATHIS, and many slaine. But attempting to haue done the like vnto that part of the armie that marched through PHRIGIA, they were themselves ouertaken in their own deuise, and overthrowne, with a great slaughter. After which, the Turkes in great number, to stay the Christians further passage, kept the riuer of Mæander, encamping vpon the farther banke of that winding riuer, with a most huge armie. There these worthy Christians right well declared, that it was but their patience, that the Grecian legions that had before so long followed them, with their countries and cities they had passed by, were not vnto them become a prey. For the emperor comming vnto the riuer side, where was neither bridge nor boat to passe ouer, and finding the great armie of the Turkes on the other side, readie to giue him battell if hee should aduenture the riuer, with their archers standing vpon the verie banke side: he retired a little out of the danger of the floud, and there encamping, commanded his souldiours to refresh themselves and their horses that night, and to be readie against the next morning to ioine battell with their enemies they were so farre come to seeke for. Little rest serued him that night, early in the morning before day he arose, and arming himselfe, put his whole armie in order of battell: as did also the enemy on the other side of the riuer, with their battalions orderly placed, and their archers vpon the banke side, readie to giue the first charge vpon the Christians, if they should aduenture to come ouer. Both armies thus standing in readinesse the one in sight of the other, and nothing but the winding riuer betwixt them, the emperor before resolved to fight, with cheerefull countenance and speech encouraged his men as followeth:

That

That this expedition was of vs taken in hand, for Christ his sake, and for the glorie of God, and not of man, you know right well fellow souldiours. For, for this cause hauing contemned a pleasant life at home, voluntarily seperated from our neere and dearest friends, we endure miseries in forren countries; we are exposed vnto dangers; we pine with hunger; we quake with cold; we languish with heat; we haue the earth our bed, the heauen our covering: and although we be noble, famous, renowned, rich, ruling ouer many nations; yet weare we alwaies our gorgets as necessarie bonds, and are with them and our armor loaded, as was the greatest seruant of Christ, Peter, surcharged with two chaines, and kept with foure quaternions of souldiours. But these Barbarians (diuided from vs by this riuer) to be the enemies of the crosse of Christ, whom we of long haue desired to encounter wishall, in whose blood (as Dauid saith) we haue vowed to wash our selues: Who is there that knoweth not, except he be altogether blockish, and will not with open eyes see, nor open eares heare? If we wish to ascend straight way into heauen, (for neither is God vnjust, that he knoweth not the cause of this our journey, or will not in recompence giue vnto vs the immortal fields, and shade dwellings of Paradise, which hauing forsaken our owne dwellings, haue chose rather for his sake to die than to liue) if we call to remembrance what things these men of vncircumcised hearts do commit against our friends and countrymen, if we remember what grievous tortures they inflict vpon them, or if we be any thing touched with the compassion of their innocent blood, vnworthily spilt; stand now courageously and fight valiantly, and let not any feare or terror daunt vs. Let these Barbarians know, that by how much Christ our master and instructor doth excell their false prophet and seducer, author of their vaine impietie; so much are we superiours vnto them in all things. Seeing therefore we are an holy campe, and an armie gathered by the power of God, let vs not cowardly lose our selues, or feare for Christ his sake honourably to aduenture our liues. For if Christ died for vs, how much more right is it that we for him should die also? vnto this so honourable an expedition, let vs also giue an honourable end: let vs fight in Christs name, with a most assured hope of an easie victorie. For none of them (I trust) shall be able to abide our force, but shall all giue way, euen to our first charge. But if we shall die (which God forbid) there shall be an honourable place of our buriall, where soeuer we shall for Christ fall. Let the Persian archer for Christ his sake, strike me, I will die in an assured hope; and with that arrow, as with a chariot, I will come vnto that rest, which shall be to me deerer than if I should with a base ordinarie kind of death in my sinnes end, my daies in my bed. Now at length let vs take reuenge of them, with whose impure feet our kinsmen and Christian brethren troden downe, are gone into that common sanctuarie, in which Christ our Saniour, equall and associat to his father, is become a companion of the dead. We are those mightie men, we all haue drawne our swords, which stand about the lively and diuine sepulchre, as about Solomons bed: wherefore we that be free borne, let vs take out of the way these Agarens, the children of the bondwoman; and let vs remooue them as stones of offence out of the way of Christ: whom I know not why, the Grecians feed up as greedie wolues to their owne destruction, and with shame sat them with their blood; when as with courageous minds and thoughts befitting wise men, they ought so to haue bene driuen from their prouinces and cities, as rauening wild beasts from their flocks. Now for as much as this riuer, as it seemeth, is not, but by some aduenture to be passed ouer, I my selfe will shew you the way, and be the first that shall take it. Let vs, served together, forcibly breake into the riuer, and we shall well enough ride through it. I know that the water beaten backe by our force, will be as a stand, and breake the course, returning as it were backward. By not unlike meanes the Israelits in antient time on foot passed ouer IORDAN, the course of the riuer being staid. This attempt shall be spoken of in all posteritie; it shall by no tract of time be worne out or forgotten, but still remaine in fresh remembrance, to the great dishonour of the Turkes, whose dead bodies overthrowne at this riuer, shall lie like a mountaine, and be scene as a Trophy of our victorie, vnto the worlds end, and our immortal praise and glorie.

Hauing thus said, and the signall of battell giuen, euery man hauing before by deuout praiere commended himselfe vnto almightie God: he was the first that put spurs to his horse, and tooke the riuer; after whom followed the rest, so close, and so forcibly, with such a terrible outerie, that the course of the water, being by the force of their horses staid, and as it were beaten backe towards the fountaine, the whole armie passed ouer with lesse trouble than was feared. And then charging the Turkes, already discouraged to haue seene them so desperately, and contrarie to their expectation, to haue passed the riuer; after some small resistance put them to flight, wherein such infinit numbers of them fell, the Christians like fierce lyons pursuing the chace, that all the val-lies ran with blood, and the fields were couered with the bodies of the dead. Many of the Italians were wounded with the Turks arrowes, and but few or none slaine. But what a multitude of the enemies there fell, the sundrie and hugie heapes of bones, to be compared vnto great hills, did long time after well declare; whereat euerie man that trauelled that way did woorthily wonder, as did I my selfe (saith Nicetas Choniates) in reporting this historie. Not much vnlike that, is reported of the Cimbers, slaine by Marinus in such number, that of their bones the countrey people about MARCELLIS where the field was fought, long time after made wals for the defence of their vineyards.

After this so great a victorie, the Christians without resistance came to ICONIUM, the chiefe seat of the Turkish kings in the lesser ASIA, which they hardly besieged. Neuertheless, such was the strength of the citie, being strongly fortified both by nature and art, together with the valour of the defendants; that lying there long, they little preuailed, pressed in the meane time with greater extremities and wants in the campe, than were the besieged in the citie: whereupon ensued such a mortalitie, people daily without number dying in the armie, that the emperour was glad to raise his siege and to returne into his countrey. The chiefe cause as well of this so great a mortalitie, as of the ouerthrow of so notable an action, most men ascribe vnto the malice of the Greeks; who not without the priuie of their emperour (as it was commonly bruted) mingled lime with the meale which they brought to sell into the armie, whereof the hungrie souldiers desirously feeding, were therewith poysoned, and so miserably died. Of the certaine time of this journey of the emperours into ASIA, authors agree not; howbeit most refer it vnto the yeere 1146.

This expedition, though not so fortunat as was at the first well hoped of, yet profited the Christian common weale in this, That the Turks therewith thoroughly busied, and doubtfull of the euent thereof, Baldwin in the meane time fortified GAZA (sometimes a famous citie of the Philistines, but as then ruinous) which serted as a most sure bulwarke for the defence of that part of his kingdome toward EGYPT; and also for the distressing of ASCALON, the onely refuge of the Egyptians, then left in that countrey: which strong citie standing vpon the sea side, he with all the power of his kingdome afterward besieged both by sea and land; vnto the reliefe whereof, the Caliph of EGYPT, after it had bene sixe moneths by the Christians besieged, sent a strong fleet of three score and ten gallies. At which time also on the other side Noradin the Turke, who had now got into his hand all the kingdome of DAMASCO, to withdraw the Christians from the siege of ASCALON, besieged PANEADA, from whence he was by the valour of the citizens repulsed, as was also the Caliph's fleet at sea, and the siege at ASCALON continued. Where at length the Christians after long batterie had made a breach in the wall, but giuing thereunto an assault, they were with great losse of their men repulsed, and the breach againe by the enemy repaired; who to the greater despite of the Christians, hanged ouer the walles in roapes the dead bodies of their slaine: with which spectacle, the chiefe commanders of the armie were so moued, that they with all their power returned againe to the assault, with a full resolution to gage thereon their whole forces: which they so couragiously performed, that the besieged discouraged with the great slaughter of their men, and now with true valour overcome, craved parley: and so couenanting that they might with their liues in safetie depart, agreed to yeeld vp the citie, which they accordingly performed. The spoile of the citie was giuen to the souldiers, and the government thereof vnto Abnericke, the kings brother, earle of IOPPA. By this victorie, great securitie was gauiued vnto that side of the kingdome, the enemy hauing now no place left in those parts whereon to set his foot.

The honourable expedition of Lewis the French king, by the malice of the Greeks, and enuie of other Christian princes of Syria, frustrated and brought to naught.

About the same time also (or as some write euie at the same time together with the emperour) Lewis the French king, the eight of that name, tooke vpon him the like expedition for the reliefe of the Christians in the Holy land: who setting forward with all the chivalrie of FRANCE, and accompanied with diuers other great princes, with a right puissant armie came to CONSTANTINOPLE, where he was by Emanuel the emperour honourably receiued, with all the outward shewes of fained courtesie that could be deuised. But hauing passed the strait and landed in ASIA, he found nothing answerable to that the dissembling Greeke had before most largely promised. And to distress him the more, was by false guides before corrupted by the emperour, conducted through the most desolate and barren countreys, where by the way a wonderful number of his souldiers perished of hunger and thirst: many of them also being cut off in the the strait and difficult passages, or as they straid from the armie by the Greeks themselves, appointed by the malicious emperour for that purpose. Yet after many dangers passed, and his armie sore wasted, he came at length into SYRIA, and laid siege vnto DAMASCO, the royall seat of Noradin the Turkish king; which he so notably impugned that the defendants were almost out of hope to be able for any long time to hold him out. Neither had it otherwise hapned, had not enuie the inseperable attendant of all honourable actions, frustrated so great an hope: for the besieged Turks being brought to great extremitie, and now euie at the point to haue yeelded the citie, certaine of the Christian princes of that countrey, vnderstanding that the king had promised the government of that so famous a citie vnto Philip earle of FLEANDERS, if it should be woen; and secretly grudging to haue a stranger preferred before themselves; corrupted also (as some say) with the Turks gold, fraudulently persuaded the king to remooue from that part of the citie where he lay and might in fine haue taken the same; vnto another far stronger: where, after he had lyen a great while, struiuing with no small extremities, he was inforced for want of victuals, to raise his siege and to depart. And so without any thing done woorth the remembrance, returned againe into FRANCE, detesting the verie name of Emanuel the Greeke emperour; by whose sinister dealing, so notable an expedition was brought to be of none effect, to the great discouraging of all other Christian princes for taking the like againe in hand.

Now had the state of the Christians in SYRIA for certaine yeeres after the aforesaid expeditions, rested in good peace: when Noradin the Turke (moued with some injuries done by the Christians vnto the Turks and Arabians, who by the leaue of king Baldwin dwelt in the Forrest of LYBANVS) came and straightly besieged PANEADA, a citie of the Christians there by: vpon whom the Christians in the citie, now brought vnto great extremitie, made a most desperat sally, and had with the Turks a sharpe and cruell fight: but oppressed with the multitude & enforced to retire, they were so hardly pursued, that the Turks together with them entered the citie, and put to sword all that came in their way. Neuertheless, the greater part of the citizens (by good fortune) had in good time before retired themselves into the castle, which was of great strength, and there stood vpon their guard. Of whose distress, with the taking of the citie, Baldwin hearing, raised a great armie, & so set forward to relieue the. But Noradin hearing of his coming, & doubtfull of his owne strength, after he had take the spoile of what he could, set fire on the citie, & so departed. The citizens thus deliuered, repaired againe the wals of the citie, the kings power still defending them. Noradin with his power all the while lying close in the woods not far off, still awaiting the offer of some good opportunitie to take the Christians at aduantage, which shortly after fell out according to his owne desire: For the king doubting no such matter, but supposing him to haue been quite gone, hauing at his returne sent away all his footmen, followed after himselfe accompanied onely with his horsemen, and they also not verie strong: but as he was passing the riuer IORDAN, he was suddenly set vpon by Noradin and the Turks, and after a sharpe conflict ouerthrowne. The king himselfe with some few hardly escaped to SAPHET, a towne thereby; most part of his nobilitie being there either slaine or taken prisoners: amongst the rest, Bertrand of BLANQUEFORT, mastet of the Templars, with diuers others of great name fell at that time into the enemies hands, and so were carried away prisoners.

Paneada taken and sacked by the Turks.

Paneada againe repaired by the Christians.

After this victorie, Noradin strengthened with new supplies from DAMASCO, came againe and besieged PANEADA, in good hope that the citizens discouraged with so great an ouerthrow of the king, and out of hope to be by him relieued, would now either yeeld the citie, or else not be able long to hold it out. But the king contrarie to his expectation, had in shorter time than was thought possible, raised a great power; and aided by the prince of ANTIOCH and the countie of TRIPOLIS was marching to the reliefe of his citie: of whose approach Noradin vnderstanding, although he had made diuers breaches in the wals, & brought the citizens almost vnto vter despair, vnto with his armie and departed. And so Baldwin hauing now twice relieued the besieged citie, returned also to IERUSALEM.

Many an hard conflict with the Turks had this young king afterwards, during the fortunate time of his raigne: wherein that troublesome kingdome happily flourished amidst the miscreants, all which to recount, were long and tedious. Yet among other things, it is woorth the remembrance, how that Noradin the Turke, then king of DAMASCO, besieging SUBTA, a castle belonging to the kingdome of IERUSALEM, was in a set battell by Baldwin ouerthrowne and put to flight, with the losse of the greatest part of his armie. King Baldwin had before married

ried Emanuel the Greeke emperours neece: and now the same emperour by Guido Stephanus, and Trissilus his embassadours, requested to haue giuen him againe in marriage one of the kings nigh kinswomen. Vnto whom the king after mature deliberation had concerning that matter, offered him Matilde, an honourable ladie, the sister of the countie of TRIPOLIS; whom the emperour refused: and afterward by the consent of the king, made choice of Mary the daughter of Raymund prince of ANTIOCH lately dead. Which the countie of TRIPOLIS taking in cuill part, in reuenge thereof, by certaine men of warre whom he put to sea, grieuouly infected the frontiers of the emperours dominions. Now during the time, that the marriage was in solemnizing, the king made his abode at ANTIOCH, at which time he fortified the castle of PONTISFER vpon the riuer ORONTES, against the incursions of the enemies. But lying there, he according to his wonted manner, to prevent sicknesse, vpon the approach of Winter tooke physicke of Barac a Iew, the countie of TRIPOLIS his physician. After the taking whereof, he fell presently into the bloudie flux, and afterward into a consumption: whereby it was verely supposed, that he was poysoned by the Iew, and the rather, for that some little part of the same medicine that was left, being giuen to a dog, he thereof in short time died. The king thus languishing in paine, to change the aire, remooued first to TRIPOLIS, & afterward to BERYTUS; where he departed this trouble some life, to liue with his Sauour Christ in blisse for euer. His dead bodie was afterward with the generall mourning of his subjects conueied to HIERSALEM, and there solemnly entered by the bodie of his father. He departed the 13 of Februarie in the yeere of grace 1163 when he had reigned 21 yeeres. He was a man so gracious, that not onely his friends, but euen the infidels themselues (as it is reported) lamented his death. Inasmuch that Noradin king of DAMASCO, his antient enemy, being incited by some of his captaines to inuade his kingdome at such time as his funerals were in solemnizing, refused so to doe, answering, That compassion and regard was to be had of the just sorrow of the Christians his subjects; for that they had lost such a king, as the like was hardly againe to be found in the world.

But leauing the kingdome of HIERSALEM, with the greater part of SYRIA, thus victoriously gained from the infidels: let vs for the orderly continuation of our historie, againe returne to see the proceedings of the Turkes at the same time in the lesser ASIA also: wherein they yet held the state of a kingdome, though not so great as before the coming of the princes of the West into those countries. After the death of Sultan Solymán (with whom duke Godfrey and the other Christian princes had much to doe as they passed into SYRIA) as is afore said, one Muhamet succeeded him: betwixt whom and Masut, Sultan of ICONIUM, great discord arose, which at length brake out into open warre, to the farther weakening of that late shaken kingdome. For the maintenance of which quarrell, as profitable for his state, John Comnenus the Greeke emperour, gaue aid to Masut against his enemy Muhamet. Neuerthelesse in short time the two infidels (professing both one superstition) became friends, and joyning their forces, ouerthrew the emperour with his whole armie, as he lay at the siege of ICONIUM, at which time he himselfe with much adoe escaped by flight. Masut afterwards hauing got into his hands the whole kingdome of the Turkes, at the time of his death deuided the same amongst his three sonnes: Vnto Chasibhan his eldest sonne hee gaue ICONIUM his cheefe citie, with the townes and prouinces subiect thereunto: Vnto Iagupasan his other sonne (or rather as some will haue it, his sonne in law) he allotted AMASIA and ANCYRA, with the fruitfull country of CAPADOCIA and the places adioyning: But vnto Dadune his other sonne (or sonne in law) hee gaue the great cities of CESARIA and SEBASTIA, with the large countries thereabouts, all sometime part of the Greeke empire, but then the portions of the Turkes. Long it was not after this deuision of the kingdome, but that these brethren after the manner of ambitious men, forgetting of the bonds both of loue and nature, fell at discord among themselves; the Sultan seeking the destruction of Iagupasan, and he likewise of him, and that not by secret meanes, but euen by open force of armes. Emanuel the Greeke emperour in the meane time wishing the destruction of them both, heartely reioycing thereat, and by his embassadours secretly animating the one against the other, yet in open shew more fauouring the part of Iagupasan than of the Sultan, by whose aid he obtained against him many a notable and bloudie victorie: insomuch, that the Sultan wearie of the quarrell, was glad not onely by his embassadours to seeke the emperours fauour, but euen in person himselfe to go and meet him, as he came with his armie out of SYRIA, and

and so to accompanie him vnto CONSTANTINOPLE, where he was together with the emperour most honourably receiued, with all the signes of joy and triumph that could possibly be deuised. The emperour no lesse reioycing to be sued vnto by so great a prince, than did the Sultan at his so honourable entertainment.

Among other quaint deuises of many, for the solemnizing off so great a triumph, there was an active Turke, who had openly giuen it out, that against an appointed time he would from the top of an high tower in the tilt-yard, flie by the space of a furlong. The report whereof had filled the citie with a woonderfull expectation of so strange a noueltie. The time prefixed being come, and the people without number assembled; the Turke according to his promise, vpon the top of the high tower shewed himselfe, girt in a long and large white garment, gathered into many plites and foldings, made of purpose for the gathering of the wind: wherewith the foolish man had vainely perswaded himselfe to haue howered in the aire, as do birds vpon their wings, or to haue guided himselfe as are ships with their sailes. Standing thus howering a great while, as readie to take his flight; the beholders still laughing, and crying out, Flie Turke, flie, how long shall we expect thy flight? The emperour in the meane time dissuading him from so desperat an attempt: and the Sultan betwixt feare and hope hanging in doubtfull suspence what might happen to his countymeian. The Turke, after he had a great while howered with his armes abroad (the better to haue gathered the wind, as birds do with their wings) and long deluded the expectation of the beholders: at length finding the wind fit, as he thought for his purpose, committed himselfe with his vaine hope vnto the aire: But in steed of mounting aloft, this foolish Icarus came tumbling downe headlong with such violence, that he brake his necke, his armes and legs, with almost all the bones of his bodie. This foolish flight of the Turke gaue such occasion of sport and laughter vnto the vulgar people, alwaies readie to scoffe and jest at such ridiculous matters, that the Turkes attending vpon the Sultan, could not walke in the streets vnderded; the artificers in their shops shaking their armes with their tooles in their hands, as did the Turke, and still crying out Flie Turke, flie: whereof the emperour hearing, although he could not chule but thereat smile himselfe, as not ignorant of the scoffes and taunts of the vulgar people; yet in fauour of the Sultan, who was not a little grieued therewith, he commanded such their insolencie to be restrained.

The solemnitie of the triumph ouerpassed (which by an ominous earthquake at the same time happening, was somewhat obscured) the emperour to shew his wealth, and to gratifie the Sultan, gaue vnto him many rich and royall presents, with such a masse of treasure, as that he much woondered thereat. In requital whereof, and in token of his thankfulness, he againe honoured the emperour with the name of his Father, and rearming himselfe by the name of his Sonne, promised to restore vnto him the citie of SEBASTIA, with the territorie thereunto belonging, then part of Dadune his inheritance. Neuerthelesse, all this was nothing else but meere dissimulation, as afterward by prooffe appeared. For returning home, hee thrust Dadune indeed out of SEBASTIA, which he spoiled with the countrey thereabout; but forgetfull of his promise, kept it wholly to himselfe: and by force tooke also from him the citie of CESARIA, with the countrey of AMASIA, by him before but lately possessed. In like manner, he bent his forces also vpon Iagupasan his other brother, who in the very preparation of those wars died: by whose vntimely death the citie of ANCYRA, with all his dominions in CAPADOCIA, fell into the Sultans hands. Who now possessed of all his fathers kingdom, and swelling with pride, forgetting all former curtesies, inuaded the emperours territories, and tooke from him the citie of LAODICEA in PHRYGIA, where he did great harme; as also in the countrey thereabouts, killing the people as he went, or else carrying them away with him captiues. For the repressing of which outrages, the emperour with a strong armie passed ouer into ASIA, and there in the frontiers of his territories fortified DORILEVM against the incursions of the Turkes. In performing whereof, he to the example and stirring vp of others, carried the first basked of stones himselfe vpon his shoulders; and vfed such farther diligence, that in short time the citie was compassed about with strong wals, and deepe ditches, maugre the Turkes, who ceased not with continuall alarms and skirmishes to haue hindred the worke. With like care and for like purpose he also fortified SVELVM, another strong hold: and leauing in either place a strong garrison, returned againe to CONSTANTINOPLE. ried Emanuel the Greeke emperours neece: and now the same emperour by Guido Stephanus, and Trissinus his embassadours, requested to haue giuen him againe in marriage one of the kings nigh kinswomen. Vnto whom the king after mature deliberation had concerning that matter, offered him Matilde, an honourable ladie, the sister of the countie of TRIPOLIS; whom the emperour refused: and afterward by the consent of the king, made choice of Mary the daughter of Raymond prince of ANTIOCH lately dead. Which the countie of TRIPOLIS taking in euill part, in reuenge thereof, by certaine men of warre whom he put to sea, grieuouly infected the frontiers of the emperours dominions. Now during the time, that the marriage was in solemnizing, the king made his abode at ANTIOCH, at which time he fortified the castle of PONTISFER vpon the riuer ORONTES, against the incursions of the enemies. But lying there, he according to his wonted manner, to preuent sickness, vpon the approach of Winter tooke physicke of Barac a Jew, the countie of TRIPOLIS his physician. After the taking whereof he fell presently into the bloudie flux, and afterward into a consumption: whereby it was verely supposed, that he was poysoned by the Jew, and the rather, for that some little part of the same medicine that was left, being giuen to a dog, he thereof in short time died. The king thus languishing in paine, to change the aire, remooued first to TRIPOLIS, & afterward to BARYTUS; where he departed this troublesome life, to liue with his Saviour Christ in blisse for euer. His dead bodie was afterward with the generall mourning of his subjects conueied to HIERSALEM, and there solemnly entered by the bodie of his father. He departed the 13 of Februarie in the yeere of grace 1163 when he had reigned 21 yeeres. He was a man so gracious, that not onely his friends, but euen the infidels themselves (as it is reported) lamented his death. Inasmuch that Noradin king of DAMASCO, his antient enemy, being incited by some of his captaines to inuade his kingdome at such time as his funerals were in solemnizing, refused to doe, answering, That compassion and regard was to be had of the just sorrow of the Christians his subjects; for that they had lost such a king, as the like was hardly againe to bee found in the world.

But leauing the kingdome of HIERSALEM, with the greater part of SYRIA, thus victoriously gained from the infidels: let vs for the orderly continuation of our historie, againe returne to see the proceedings of the Turkes at the same time in the lesser ASIA also: wherein they yet held the state of a kingdome, though not so great as before the coming of the princes of the West into those countries. After the death of Sultan Solymán (with whom duke Godfrey and the other Christian princes had much to doe as they passed into SYRIA) as is afore said, one Muhamet succeeded him: betwixt whom and Masut, Sultan of ICONIUM, great discord arose, which at length brake out into open warre, to the farther weakening of that late shaken kingdome. For the maintenance of which quarrell, as profitable for his state, John Comnenus the Greeke emperour, gaue aid to Masut against his enemy Muhamet. Neuerthelesse in short time the two infidels (professing both one superstition) became friends, and joyning their forces, ouerthrew the emperour with his whole armie, as he lay at the siege of ICONIUM, at which time he himselfe with much adoe escaped by flight. Masut afterwards hauing got into his hands the whole kingdome of the Turkes, at the time of his death deuided the same amongst his three sonnes: Vnto Chizashlan his eldest sonne hee gaue ICONIUM his cheefe citie, with the townes and prouinces subiect thereunto: Vnto Iagupasan his other sonne (or rather as some will haue it, his sonne in law) he allotted AMASIA and ANCYRA, with the fruitfull country of CAPADOCIA and the places adioyning: But vnto Dadune his other sonne (or sonne in law) hee gaue the great cities of CESARIA and SEBASTIA, with the large countries thereabouts, all sometime part of the Greeke empire, but then the portions of the Turkes. Long it was not after this deuision of the kingdome, but that these brethren after the manner of ambitious men, forgetfull of the bonds both of loue and nature, fell at discord among themselves: the Sultan seeking the destruction of Iagupasan, and he likewise of him, and that not by secret meanes, but euen by open force of armes. Emanuel the Greeke emperour in the meane time wishing the destruction of them both, heartely reioycing thereat, and by his embassadours secretly animating the one against the other, yet in open shew more fauouring the part of Iagupasan than of the Sultan, by whose aid he obtained against him many a notable and bloodie victorie: inasmuch, that the Sultan wearie of the quarrell, was glad not onely by his embassadours to seeke the emperours fauour, but euen in person himselfe to go and meet him, as he came with his armie out of SYRIA, and

and so to accompanie him vnto CONSTANTINOPLE, where he was together with the emperour most honourably receiued, with all the signes of joy and triumph that could possibly be deuised. The emperour no lesse reioycing to be sued vnto by so great a prince, than did the Sultan at his so honourable entertainment.

Among other quaint deuises of many, for the solemnizing off so great a triumph, there was an actiue Turke, who had openly giuen it out, that against an appointed time he would from the top of an high tower in the tile-yard, flie by the space of a furlong. The report whereof had filled the citie with a woonderfull expectation of so strange a noueltie. The time prefixed being come, and the people without number assembled; the Turke according to his promise, vpon the top of the high tower shewed himselfe, girt in a long and large white garment, gathered into many plites and foldings, made of purpose for the gathering of the wind: wherewith the foolish man had vainely perswaded himselfe to haue howered in the aire, as do birds vpon their wings, or to haue guided himselfe as are ships with their sailes. Standing thus howering a great while, as readie to take his flight; the beholders still laughing, and crying out, Flie Turke, flie, how long shall we expect thy flight? The emperour in the meane time dissuading him from so desperat an attempt: and the Sultan betwixt feare and hope hanging in doubtfull suspense what might happen to his countryman. The Turke, after he had a great while howered with his armes abroad (the better to haue gathered the wind, as birds do with their wings) and long deluded the expectation of the beholders: at length finding the wind fit, as he thought for his purpose, committed himselfe with his vaine hope vnto the aire: But in steed of mounting aloft, this foolish Scarus came tumbling downe headlong with such violence, that he brake his necke, his armes and legs, with almost all the bones of his bodie. This foolish flight of the Turke gaue such occasion of sport and laughter vnto the vulgar people, alwaies readie to scoffe and jest at such ridiculous matters, that the Turkes attending vpon the Sultan, could not walke in the streets vnderided; the artificers in their shops shaking their armes with their tooles in their hands, as did the Turke, and still crying out Flie Turke, flie: whereof the emperour hearing, although he could not chafe but thereat smile himselfe, as not ignorant of the scoffes and taunts of the vulgar people; yet in fauour of the Sultan, who was not a little grieued therewith, he commanded such their insolencie to be restrained.

The solemnitie of the triumph ouerpassed (which by an ominous earthquake at the same time happening, was somewhat obscured) the emperour to shew his wealth, and to gratifie the Sultan, gaue vnto him many rich and royall presents, with such a masse of treasure, as that he much woondered thereat. In requitall whereof, and in token of his thankfulness, he againe honoured the emperour with the name of his Father, and tearing himselfe by the name of his Sonne, promised to restore vnto him the citie of SEBASTIA, with the territorie therunto belonging, then part of Dadune his inheritance: Neuerthelesse, all this was nothing else but meere dissimulation, as afterward by prooffe appeared. For returning home, hee thrust Dadune indeed out of SEBASTIA, which he spoiled with the country thereabout; but forgetfull of his promise, kept it wholly to himselfe: and by force tooke also from him the citie of CESARIA, with the country of AMASIA, by him before but lately possessed. In like manner, he bent his forces also vpon Iagupasan his other brother, who in the very preparation of those wars died: by whose vntimely death the citie of ANCYRA, with all his dominions in CAPADOCIA, fell into the Sultans hands. Who now possessed of all his fathers kingdom, and swelling with pride, forgetting all former curtesies, inuaded the emperours territories, and tooke from him the citie of LAODICEA in PHRYGIA, where he did great harme; as also in the country thereabouts, killing the people as he went, or else carrying them away with him captiues. with so good successe as before, being many times cut off by the garrisons of the late fortified townes: which grieuances still encreasing, caused the emperor to expostulate with the Sultan, as with an vnthankfull man, and forgetfull of so great kindnesse before done vnto him, as the establishment of him in his kingdome came vnto: who with no lesse vehemencie vpbraided him againe with vnconstancie and breach of promise, as well for fortifying the aforesaid places contrarie to the league betwixt them, as for that hauing promised much more, he had thereof performed nothing. Thus vnkindnesse dayly growing vpon euerie trifle, as it commonly falleth out among men of great spirit, and jealous of their owne honours: it was dayly expected when the matter should fall out into open & bloodie war; both of them being men of great valour, and apt to reuenge the least iniurie to them offered. Yet was it the Sultans manner warily to manage his wars by his politike and expert capitaines: whereas the emperor being of an hotter nature, and couragious about measure, commonly in all his great expeditions aduentured his owne person, without respect what danger might thereof ensue vnto himselfe or his state. Long it was not but that the emperor fully resolved to be reuenged of so many wrongs done vnto him and his subjects by the Turks, raised the whole power of his empire both in EVROPE and ASIA, in such sort as if he had therewith purposed, not onely to haue raised to the ground ICONIUM, the regall seat of the Turkish Sultan, but euen vtterly to haue destroyed the whole nation of the Turks. Thus with a most puissant and populous armie, well appointed of all things necessarie, he passed ouer into ASIA, and so in good order marching through PHRYGIA, LAODICEA, CHONAS (called in ancient time PASSAS) S. ARCHANGEL, LAMPIS, CÆLENAS (where the head of the great and famous riuer MÆANDER riseth, whereinto the riuer MARSYAS falleth) and from thence to CHONIA, he with cull lucke, and woofe speed, passed by MYRIOCEPHALON, an old ruinous castle, ominous by the name thereof, as by the event in short time after it prooued. And albeit that he marched verie circumspectly, still intrenching his armie in euerie place where he lodged; yet could he make but small speed, by reason of the multitude of his cariages, and of the base people that attended the same. The Turks in the meane while oftentimes shewing themselves in troups; and in places of aduantage, skirmishing sometime with one part of the armie and sometime with another, but neuer daring to aduenture the fortune of a iust battell: yet by such meanes were the victuals of the armie oftentimes cut off, and the passages for the emperor made verie dangerous. And the more to distresse the Christians in their long triuall, they found the countrey before them of purpose destroyed by the Turks, and the water in many places poysoned, whereof the Christians vnadvisedly drinking, fell into many grieuous diseases, especially the flux, and thereof died in great number. The Sultan in the meane time, although he had in readines a right puissant armie of his owne, & had procured great aid from the Persian Sultan his kinsman and chiefe supporter: yet fearing the doubtfull event of war, and loath to aduenture his whole estate vpon the fortune of a battell, fought by his embassadours (sent for that purpose) to grow to some peace with the emperor, and that vpon such honourable conditions, as by the wiser sort were thought not to bee at any hand refused: which large offers, the Sultan as desirous of peace, made vnto him not once, but againe and againe; which the emperor neuertheless (reposing great confidence in his owne power, and prickt forward by the gallants of the court, better acquainted with the braue triumphs of peace than the hard wars of the Turks) proudly rejected; and so dismissing the embassadours, scornfully willed them to tell their master, That he would giue him answer vnto his requests vnder the wals of ICONIUM. Which caused the Sultan, now out of all hope of any reconciliation to be made betwixt the emperor and him, with all his power to take the straits of ZIBRICA; whereby the armie of the Christians, departing from MYRIOCEPHALON must of necessitie passe. The entrance into these straits was by a long valley, on either side enclosed with high mountaines, which toward the North rising and falling according as the hills gaue leaue, opened into diuers large vallies, which by little and little growing againe straighter and straighter, with high and craggie rocks hanging ouer on either side, and almost touching one another, gaue vnto the painefull traveller a most hard and difficult passage.

Into this so dangerous a valley, the emperor not fearing the enemies force, desperately entered with his armie, hauing neither provided for the clearing of the passages, or safetie of his cariages, in no other order than as if hee had marched through the plaine and champain countrey, although it were before told him (that which he shortly after, but too late, saw) that the

enemie had strongly possessed both the straits and the mountaines, to hinder his farther passage. The vanguard of his armie was conducted by John and Andronicus, the sonnes of Angelus Constantine, accompanied with Macroductus Constantine and Lapardas Andronicus: In the right wing was Baldwin, the emperours brother in law; and in the left Maurozomes Theodorus: After them followed the drudges and scullions, with an infinit number of carters and other base people, attending vpon the cariages, with the baggage of the whole armie: Next vnto these came the emperor with the maine battell, consisting for the most part of right valiant and worthie souldiers: The rereward was shut vp by Andronicus Contostephanus, with a number of most resolute men. They were not faine entered into these straits, but that the Turks from the mountaines and broken cliffes, shewed themselves on euery side, deliuering their deadly shot from the vpper ground vpon the Christians below, as thicke as haile. Neuertheless the sonnes of Angelus with Macroductus and Lapardas, and the vanguard, casting themselves into a three square battell in forme of a wedge, with their targuets in manner of a penthouse cast close together ouer their heads, and their archers on euery side lustely bestowing their shot amongst the thickest of their enemies, by plaine force driue them out of the straits they had before possessed, and caused them to retire farther off into the mountaines; and so hauing made themselves way, with little or no losse passed those dangerous straits: vntill that at length hauing recovered the top of an hill, very commodious for their purpose, as the case stood, they there staid, and presently encamped themselves. And happily, with like good fortune might the rest of the armie haue passed also, had they in like order, and with like courage, presently followed after. But failing so to doe, and troubled with the multitude of their cariages, which could not possibly make any way through those strait and rough passages (but troubled themselves one another, as also the whole armie) they were from the vpper ground miserably ouerwhelmed with the multitude of the Turkish archers, whose arrowes fell as thicke vpon them from the mountaines, as if it had been a perpetual tempest or shoure of haile, to the great disordering & dismay of the whole armie: which the Turks quickly perceiving, and therewith encouraged, in great numbers came downe from the mountaines where they had before houered ouer the heads of the Christians, and forcibly entering the plaine ground, and comming to handy blowes, first ouerthrew the right wing; where Baldwin himselfe seeking to restore his disordered companies, and to stay the furie of the enemie, (now raging in the blood of the Christians) with a troupe of valiant horsemen breaking into the thickest of them, as became a worthie capitaine, was there compassed in with the multitude of his enemies, and slaine, together with all his followers, and the greatest part of the whole wing by him commanded. With this victorie the Turkes were so encouraged, that comming down with all their power, they stopped all the waies whereby the Christians were to passe, who as men coup'd vp in those dangerous straits, were not able either to defend themselves, or to helpe one another: but inclosed as deere in a toyle, and one troubling another, were the cause both of the destruction of themselves and others. For by reason of the straitnesse of the place, neither could they that were before, retire, either they that were behind in the rereward, come forward to relieue the one the other, as need required: the cariages also, which were many, and in the middle of the armie, seruing them to no other purpose than to the hurt of themselves. There were the beasts that serued for burden, together with the souldiours, ouerwhelmed with the Turkes shot, the vallies lay full of dead bodies, the riuers ran mingled with the blood of men and beasts, in such terrible manner, as is not by pen to be expressed. For the Christians not able either to goe forward, or retire, were there in those straits slaine like sheepe: if any courage or sparke of valour were by any shewed against the enemie, fighting at so great aduantage, it was but lost, seruing to little or no purpose. And to increase these miseries, the Turks in scorn shewed vpon the point of a lance the head of Andronicus Bataza, the emperours nephew, who comming with an armie out of PAPHLAGONIA, and HERACLEA PONTICA, against the Turks of AMASIA, was now by the way by them ouerthrowne and slaine. The report whereof, confirmed by the sight of his head, and the consideration of the desperat danger wherein the whole armie presently stood, so troubled the emperor that hee was at his wits end: and with drie teares (if it may be so said) dissembling his inward greefe, as one out of comfort, stood doubtfull which way to turne himselfe. For the Turks hauing suffred the vanguard to passe, with all their power charged the emperours maine battell, as his cheefe strength, nothing doubting, but that hauing once ouerthrowne it, they should easily and at pleasure ouerthrow the rest. had the emperor attempted to haue driuen the enemy out of those straits, and so to haue opened a way for his armie to haue passed, but all in vaine, the power of the Turkes still increasing, and they at great aduantage notably maintaining the passages before by them taken. Neuertheless, seeing no lesse danger in staying still, than in going forward, he with a few of his best souldiers, armed with despair, and resolu'd to die (vnto which kind of men nothing is terrible) set forward directly vpon his enemies, willing the rest with like resolution every man to make for himselfe the best shift he could. And so with many wounds and sturdie blows both giuen & receiued, he by plaine force and might of hand brake through the thickest of his enemies, and so escaped out of those straits, as out of a trap. But yet not without many wounds receiued in his person, and himselfe so wearied as that he was not able to lift vp his helmet, being beaten close to his head, and in his targuet were found sticking thirtie of the Turkes arrowes or thereabouts, the manifest tokens of his danger. The other legions seeking to follow the emperor (for other way they had none) were on every side hardly assailed by the Turkes, and infinite numbers of them slaine; beside many others that perished in those straits, ouerborne and troden to death by their owne fellows. Yea such as had the fortune to escape out of one of these perillous straits, were forthwith slaine in the next: for this so dangerous a passage through the mountaines, was deu'd (as is aforesaid) into seuen vallies, which giuing faire and broad entrances, the farther a man went, grew still straiter and straiter, all which straits the Turkes had before strongly possessed. At which time also, the more to increase the terror of the day, the light sand raised with the feet of the men and horses, was with the violence of a most tempestuous wind which then blew, carried so forcibly and thicke, that both the armies grappling together, as if it had been in the darkenesse of the night, killed whomsoever they met withall, without respect of friend or foe, by which error many were euen of their owne friends slaine. In every place lay great heapes of the Turkes slaine together with the Christians, and with them great numbers of horses and other beasts for carriage, so that those vallies where this bloodie conflict was, seemed to bee nothing els but a large burying place of the Turkes and Christians with their horses: But the greater number was of the Christians that perished, and they not altogether of the common sort, but euen of the bravest capitaines, and the emperours nearest kinsmen. The violence of the wind ceasing and the day clearing vp, there was of all others to be seene (a most wofull spectacle) men yet aliue, some wounded, some whole, couered some to the middle, some to the necke, with dead carcasses, in such sort, as that they were not able with any struggling to get out: who with their hands cast vp towards heauen, with ruthfull voices cried out for helpe to such as passed by; but all in vaine, for every man possessed with the common feare, and by their danger measuring their owne, passed by them without compasion, as more carefull of their owne safetie, leauing them yet liuing as men to be numbered among the dead.

The emperor in danger to haue been taken, makes

The emperor himselfe, as a man almost now spent, being got out of the danger, stood a while to breath himselfe vnder the shaddow of a wild pear tree, without any page or man to attend him; whom a poore common souldior espying, and moued with compasion, came vnto him, and offering him the best seruice he could, helped him vp with his helmet, and buckled vp his armour, which before hung dangling here and there about him: when in the meane while a Turke comming in vpon him, had taken his horse by the bridle, in hope to haue led him away prisoner: whom for all that, the emperor as wearie as hee was, with the truncheon of his broken lance which he had yet in his hand, stricke downe to the ground, and so cleau'd himselfe of him. Presently after came also another sort of the stragling Turkes, readie also to haue seized vpon him and to haue taken him prisoner, of whom he slew one with the aforesaid horsemans staffe, and with his sword stricke off the head of another of them, and so kept them off vntill that by the comming in of ten of his owne souldiors hee was relieved. Departing thence with purpose to haue joined himselfe vnto the legions that were gone before in the vauward, hee had not gone farre but that he was much troubled by other Turkes that hee met, and the heapes of the dead bodies that lay in his way: yet at last, hauing with much labour and more danger passed those straits, and a river running thereby, being glad in many places to ride ouer the dead bodies of his owne people, and some other of his owne souldiors now resorting vnto him; he there saw Iohn Catagene, a noble and right valiant gentleman that had married his necce, fighting alone against a great number of the Turkes, to be compassed in and slaine; whom he was no way able to relieve. Which Turkes also seeing him passe by, followed after him as after a most rich prey, in hope hope to haue either presently taken or slaine him: whom neuertheless hee (encouraging the small companie he had about him) notably repul'd; and so sometime marching forward, and againe as occasion required, making a stand, came at length long looked for but most welcome, vnto the legions that were gone before, not so sorry for their owne hard estate, as carefull of his danger.

But before he could come to those his legions, he readie to faint for thirst, commanded water to be brought him out of the river that ran fast by; which after he had tasted, and by the vnplesant tast thereof, perceiued the same to be infected, he ferring a deepe sigh, said, O how unfortunately haue I tasted Christian blood: whereunto an audacious and malapert souldior there present, and more bitter than the cruell time it selfe, replied; Emperour, thou didst not now, thou didst not now, I say, first, but long since, and oftentimes, drinke the blood of the Christians, euen vntill thou wast drunke againe, at such time as thou didst with most grievous exactions vex and deuour thy poore subiects. Which reprochfull speech the emperor put vp in silence, making as if hee had not heard it. With like patience he also forbore the same rayling companion, at such time as he seeing his treasures hardly beset and in danger to be taken by the Turkes, to animate his souldiors, willed them to doe what they could to rescue the same, and to take it for their labour. This treasure (said this impudent fellow) should before haue been giuen vnto thy souldiors, rather than now when as it cannot be recovered but with great danger and bloodshed: and therefore, if thou be a man of valour, as thou wouldest bee accounted, and as the present case requireth, valiantly charge the Turkes (now readie to carrie it away) thy selfe, and so recover thine euill gotten goods. Whereunto the emperor answered no more but, Good words souldior, and so put it vp, as did Dauid the railings of Shimei. Shortly after the comming of the emperor vnto these legions of his vanguard (the onely remainder of his armie that was left whole and vnbroken) came also Andronicus Comostephanus, who had the leading of the rereward, with diuers others of great place, who had by good fortune escaped the furie of the Turkes. The miseries of that day (not well to be expressed) being ended by the comming on of the night, the Christians sat in the campe oppressed with a generall heauinesse, leaning their heads vpon their elbowes, and considering the present danger wherein they were, scarcely accounted themselves among the liuing: the Turkes in the meane time to increase their feare, all the night running about the campe, & crying aloud vnto such of their countymen in the campe, as had abjured their religion, or for other respects had taken part with the imperials, that they should that night get them out of the campe, where-as otherwise if they staid vnto the morning they should be all but lost men. In this so great an extremitie the emperor not knowing what to do, calling together his chiefe commanders, declared vnto them the desperate danger they were in, together with his resolution: which was, secretly himselfe to flie, and to leaue the rest, every man to make what shift he could for himselfe. Which his base determination, so foule as fouler could not be, they all wondering at, as proceeding from a distraught mind: and by chauce ouerheard by one of the common souldiors, that stood without the tent, the same souldior fetching a deepe sigh, in detestation thereof, cried out with a loud voice, What meanes the emperor: and so turning himselfe vnto him, said: Art not thou hee that hast thrust vs into this desolat and strait way, and cast vs headlong into destruction? and hast as it were in a mortar enclosed vs in these rockes and mountaines, readie as it were to ouerwhelme vs. What had we to doe with this vail of mourning, and mouth of hell? Wherefore came wee into these mischieuous and rough straits? What can wee particularly complaine of the Barbarians, which in these inextricable windings and straits haue thus entangled and beset vs? Is it not thou that broughtst vs hither? And wilt thou now as sheepe appointed to the slaughter, thy selfe betray vs? With which so sharpe a reprehension the emperor thoroughly pierced, changed his former determination for flight, resolu'ing now to stand by it, whatsoeuer happened. But what should hee now doe beset with his enemies, still readie to deuour him? helpe he saw none, either in himselfe or to be expected from others; nought remained but death and despair. In this extremitie, all mans helpe now failing, it pleased the most mightie (which chastiseth and healeth againe, which striketh and yet giueth life, and suffereth not the staffe of the sinners alwaies to rage into the portion of the iust) with mercifull eye to looke downe vpon these distressed men, and with an vnwonted kind of clemencie to touch the Sultans heart, in such sort, as that he which but the other day stood in dread of the emperor, and now hauing him as it were in his power, was overcome with his miserie: or as in times past hee by Husai ouerthrew the counsell of Achitophell, and changed the mind of Abſolon to follow ſuch aduiſe as ſhould bring him to deſtruction: ſo then G alſo he turned the mind of the Turkiſh Sultan, that (perſuaded by certain of the chiefe men about him, who in time of peace had uſed to receiue great gifts and preſents from the emperor) he of his own accord by his embaffadors offered peace vnto the emperor, before that he in ſo great diſtreſſe ſued vnto him for any; & that vpon the ſelfſame conditions they had made their leagues before. The Turks in the meane time ignorant of the Sultans reſolution, early in the morning were ready to aſſault the emperours campe, in hope at once to haue ouerthrowne his whole power; and with a barbarous outcrie ſtill riding about it, came ſo nigh, that with their arrowes they ſlew diuers of the Chriſtians within their owne trenches: Againſt whom the emperor ſent out Iohn the ſonne of Conſtantinus Angelus, and after him Macrodocus Conſtantinus, but to little or H no purpoſe. In the meane time came one Gabras, a man of the greateſt reputation among the Turkes, embaffadour from the Sultan, by whole commandement the Turks ceaſed farther to aſſault the campe. This Gabras comming vnto the emperor, and after the manner of the Barbarians, honouring him with reuerence done euen downe to the ground: Firſt preſented him with a goodly horſe, whole furniture was all of ſiluer, as if it had beete for triumph, and a faire two edged ſword. Afterwards falling into a large diſcourſe concerning a peace to be made, and with many kind words, as with an enchantment, appeaſing the emperours heauineſſe conceiued of his late loſſe; he among other pleaſant conceits then vttered, ſeeing the emperor in a rich roab of yellow ouer his ſhoulder, told him, That that colour was not fit for war, as ominous and portending euill lucke: whereat the emperor a little ſmiling, gaue it him with the fortune thereof: and receiuing the horſe and ſword ſent him from the Sultan, ſigned the peace. Amongſt other conditions of the peace (which the dangerousneſſe of the time ſuffred not the emperor curi- I ouſly to examine; one was, That DORILEVM and SVBLEVM before by him fortified, and the ground of this vnfortunate war, ſhould be againe raiſed. Peace thus beyond all hope being concluded, and the emperor deliuered of a great feare, purpoſed another way to returne home to auoid the ſight of the ſlaine: yet was he by his guides, euen of purpoſe as it was thought, lead backe the ſame way, to behold with his eyes thoſe miſerable ſpectacles of the ſlaine, which could not with any teares be ſufficiently lamented: for the ſtraits were made plaine, the vallies were K raiſed into hills, and the foreſt lay couered with the carcafſes of the ſlaine: no man paſſed by, but with heauineſſe and griefe, calling by name vpon their friends and familiars there loſt. Ha- uing againe paſſed thoſe dolefull ſtraits, the Turks were againe in the taile of the armie: for it was reported, that the Sultan repenting himſelfe to haue ſuffered his enemies ſo to eſcape out of his hands, had giuen leaue vnto ſuch as would, to purſue them, but followed not himſelfe with his whole power as before; for moſt of the better ſort of his ſouldiers loaded with the ſpoile, were now returned home. Yet theſe that followed after the armie, ſlew many, eſpecially ſuch as were weake or wounded, and ſo vnable to follow the reſt: although the emperor to helpe the matter, had for the repulſing of them, placed the beſt of his captaines and ſouldiers in the rearward. Being come to CHONAS, and now out of feare of his enemies, he gaue vnto euerie one of his hurt ſouldiers money to pay for the curing of their wounds, and to bring them into their coun- L ties. And comming to PHILADELPHIA, there ſtaid for the reſieſhing of himſelfe after ſo great miſeries. In his returne he raiſed SVBLEVM according to his promiſe, but not DORILEVM: whereof the Sultan by his embaffadors complaining, he answered, That what he had, enforced thereunto by neceſſitie, promiſed, he greatly forced not to performe. In reuenge whereof, the Sultan ſent out one of his moſt valiant captaines, called Atapacke, with foure and twentie thou- ſand good ſouldiers, choſen out of his whole armie, with ſtrait charge to waſte and deſtroy all the emperours prouinces and townes, euen vnto the ſea ſide, without ſparing man woman or child; and in token thereof, to bring with him ſome of the ſea water, an oare, and ſome of the ſea ſand: who according to his charge, ſpoiled PHRIGIA with the cities along the riuier ME- ANDER, euen vnto the ſea ſide. And ſo returning with a rich prey, by the way ſpoiled what be- fore he had left vtouched. But in paſſing the riuier MEANDER, when he feared leaſt, he fell in M to the hands of Iohn Batza the emperours nephew, and of Ducas Conſtantine, a moſt valiant captaine, of purpoſe ſent againſt him by the Emperour with a great power; where he was by them ſlaine together with all his armie, and the rich bootie hee had taken all againe recovered. Many other hard conflicts paſſed after this betwixt the Imperials and the Turks, the one continually ſeeking to auoy the other; all which for that therein nothing fell out much woorth the remembrance, remembrance, I for breuitie willingly paſſe ouer. In theſe endleſſe troubles died Emanuel the Greeke emperor, when he had by the ſpace of eight and thirty yeeres woorthily gouerned that great empire, hauing in the time of his ſickneſſe but a little before his death taken vpon him the habit of a monke, in token he had forſaken the world. All the time of his raigne he was no leſſe jealous of the Chriſtian princes of the VVelt than of the Turks in the Eaſt, and therefore euer delt with them vnkindly. In time of war he was ſo laborious, as if he had neuer taken felicitie but in paine; and againe in peace ſo giuen ouer to his pleaſure, as if he had neuer thought of any thing elſe. After whoſe death the Turkiſh Sultan, without reſiſtance inuading the frontiers of the empire, tooke SOZOPOLIS with diuers townes thereabout in PHRIGIA; and long beſieged the famous citie of ATTALIA, and ſo dayly encroched more and more vpon the prouin- ces of the empire, joyning the ſame vnto his owne, which was no great matter for him to doe, the Greeke empire being then no better gouerned than was the chariot of the Sunne (as the Poets ſaigne) by Phaeton, far vnfit for ſo great a charge: for Alexius Comnenus, otherwiſe cal- led Porphyrogenitus, being then but a child of about twelue yeeres old, ſucceeding his graue father in the empire, after the manner of children altogether following his pleaſure; his mother with his fathers kinſmen and friends, who about all things ought to haue had an eſpecial care of his education, neglecting the old emperors truſt in them repoſed, followed alſo their owne delights, without regard of the ruine of the common weale. Some enamoured with the beautie of the young empreſſe, gaue themſelues all to brauerie, and the courting of her: other ſome in great au- thoritie with no leſſe deſire in the meane time, with the common treaſures filled their emptie co- C fers: and a third ſort there was (of all the reſt moſt dangerous) who neither reſpecting their ſenſuall pleaſure, neither the heaping vp of wealth, looked not ſo low, ayming at the verie empire it ſelfe. As for the common good, that was of all other things of them all leaſt regarded. Amongſt theſe third ſort of the ambitious, was one Andronicus, the couſin of the late emperor Emanuel, a man of an haughtie and troubleſome ſpirit, whom he the ſaid emperor Emanuel had for his aſpi- ring, moſt part of the time of his raigne kept in priſon, or elſe in exile, as he now was, being by him not long before, for feare of raiſing of new troubles, confined to liue far off from the court at OENUM: who now hearing of the death of the emperor Emanuel, of the factions in court, Andronicus applies of the childiſhneſſe of the young emperor Alexius, giuen wholly to his ſports; and the great men put in truſt to haue ſeene to his bringing vp and to the gouernment of the empire, ſome like bees to flie abroad into the countrey, ſeeking after money as the bees do for honie; ſome others in the meane time like hogs, lying ſtill and ſatiating themſelues with great and gainefull offices, wallowing in all exceſſe and pleaſure, to haue no regard of the honour or profit of the common weale: thought it now a fit time (in ſuch diſorder of the ſtate) for him to aſpire vnto the empire, after which he had all his life time longed. That he was generally beloued of the Conſtantino- politans, yea and of ſome of the nobilitie alſo, he doubted not: for them he had long before by his popular behauiour gained, together with the diſtruſt of the late emperor, jealous of his eſtate; which as it coſt him his libertie, ſo miſſed it not much but that it had coſt him his life alſo: but now that he was dead, wanted nothing more than ſome faire colour for the ſhadowing of his ſoule purpoſe. Amongſt many and right diuers things by him thought vpon, was a claule in the oath of obedience which he had giuen vnto the emperor Emanuel and Alexius his ſonne, Ambition con- red with the (which oath he had deliuered vnto him in writing) That if he ſhould ſee, heare, or vnderſtand of any thing dangerous or hurtfull to their honour, empire, or perſons, he ſhould forthwith be- tray it, and to the vttermoſt of his power withſtand it: which words (not ſo to haue becne wrested) as beſt ſeruing for his purpoſe, he tooke firſt occaſion for to worke vpon. And as he was a ſtout and emperourly man, thereupon writ diuers letters vnto the young emperor his cou- ſin, vnto Theodoſius the Patriarch, and other ſuch as he knew well affected vnto the late empe- rour Emanuel: wherein among other things which he wiſhed to be amended in the preſent go- uernment, he ſeemed moſt to complaine of the immoderat power and authoritie of Alexius, then preſident of the Council: who in great fauour with the young emperor, and more inward with the empreſſe his mother that was ſuppoſed to ſtand with her honour, ruled all things at his pleaſure, in ſo much, as that nothing done by any the great officers of the empire, or by the em- perour himſelfe, was accounted of any force, except his approbation were thereunto annexed: whereby he was growne vnto ſuch an exceſſiue pride, hauing all things in his power, as that no man could without danger, as vpon the venomous Baſiliſke, looke vpon him. Of which his exceſſiue excessive and insolent power Andronicus by his letters now greatly complained, mooued thereunto (as he would haue it beleued) with the care he had of the yong emperours safetie, which could not (as he said) long stand with the others so great power, which he therefore (as in due bound) wished to be abridged: aggrauating withall the infamous report of Alexius his too much familiaritie with the emperesse, which first muttered in court, afterwards flew (as he said) throughout the whole world. The reformation of which things, as tending to the danger of the person of the emperour, and dishonour of the state, he forsooth as one in conscience bound, with great grauitie and eloquence (being a verie learned man) both in open speech and writing most earnestly desired: and thereby so wrought, as that he was generally accounted for a man of great experience (as indeed he was) and a faithfull counsellor to the state, a thing much to haue bene wished. Wherefore leauing Oenum, the place whereunto he was by the emperour Emanuel in a sort banished, traouelling towards Constantinople, he gaue it out in euerie place where he came, what he had sworne, and what he would for his oaths sake do: vnto whom men desirous of the change of the state, & such as gaue credit vnto the report long before giuen out, That he should at length become emperour; flockt in great numbers, as birds about an owle to see him, and with vaine praises to chatter about him. In this sort he came as farre as Paphlagonia; in euerie place honourably receiued, as if he had bene a deliuerer of his countrey sent from God. And in the imperiall citie he was not longed for of the vulgar people onely, as their light and load star: but diuers of the nobilitie also by secret messengers and letters, perswaded him to hasten his comming, and to take vpon him the gouernment; assuring him that there would be none to resist him, or to oppose themselves against his shadow, but all readie to receiue him: Especially Atalie the yong emperours sister by the fathers side, with her husband Cesar (who being a woman of a great spirit, and grieuing much to see her fathers empire made a prey vnto Alexius the president, and the emperesse her stepmother, whom she naturally hated) had raised a great and dangerous tumult in the citie against them both, which was not without much bloodshed appeased: and now ceased not by often and most earnest letters (to her owne destruction and her husbands, as it afterwards fell out) to pricke forward Andronicus and to hasten his comming: who by letters and messengers dayly comming vnto him from the court, still more and more encouraged, leauing behind him the countrey of Paphlagonia, came to Heraclia in Pontus, and still on towards the imperiall citie, with great cunning and dissimulation winning the hearts of the people as he went. For who was so sponie hearted, whom his sweet words and abundant teares flowing from his gracious eies, as from two plentifull fountaines downe by his hoarie cheeks, might not haue mooued? All that he did or desired was (as he said) for the common good and libertie of the emperour. By which meanes he had drawne vnto him a wonderfull number of the rude countrey people by the way as he came. But comming into Bythina, he was by Iohn Ducas gouernour of the great citie of Nice, shut out as an enemy to the state, and so at Nicomedia also. Neuerthelesse, passing by those cities, he held still on his way, vntill at length he was nere vnto a castle called Charace, encountered by Andronicus Angelus, sent with a great power against him, by the great president Alexius; who otherwise as an effeminate man giuen ouer to his pleasure, spending the greatest part of the night in rioting by candle light, and most part of the day in his bed, with courtaines close drawn as if it had bene night; yet doubtfull now of the comming of his enemy, left nothing vndone which he thought might helpe for the assuring of his estate. Many of the nobilitie of whom he stood in doubt, he gaied vnto him by meanes of the emperours mother: who by her rare beautie, sweet words, and gracious behauiour, as with a line drew all men vnto her: Other some he ouercame with gifts and great summes of money, whereof he now made no spare: And so wrought the matter that no man of any account or marke, went ouer to Andronicus. Whoneuerthelesse with such followers as he had, joyning battell with Angelus (sent against him, as is before said) ouerthrew him and put him to flight. Wherewith Alexius much troubled, in great displeasure and without reason, called Angelus (now fled to Constantinople) to an account for the money deliuered vnto him for the defaying of the charges of that vnfortunat war: who seeing his misfortune to be so taken as if he had framed it himselfe, and of purpose betrayd the armie committed to his charge; by the counsell of his six sonnes, being all men of great valour and wisdome, first tooke the refuge of his owne house: but finding himselfe there in no safetie, with his wife and his said sonnes (two of which came afterwards to be emperours) presently presently fled ouer the strait to Andronicus: Who seeing of him comming towards him, is reported to haue vsed this text of Scripture, Behold I will send mine Angel before thy face, to prepare thy wayes, alluding to his name of Angelus, as the presage of his good successe. Wherefore encouraged with the coming of these noblemen his kinsmen, he without longer stay marched directly vnto the sea side, and there a litle about Chalcedon encamped almost right ouer against Constantinople: causing many great fires (more than needed) to be made in his armie, to make it seeme vnto them of the citie greater than indeed it was; and with the sight thereof to keepe the citizens in suspence, with the doubtfull expectation of some great matter to ensue. Wherein he was no whit deuiued; for they hauing him now as it were in sight, leauing their worke, ran some to the sea side, some vp to the hills & high towers to behold his armie a far off, willing with their friendly looks, if it had ben possible, to haue drawne him ouer the strait into the citie. Alexius knowing himselfe not able by land to encounter with so strong an enemy (for now some which on foot could not goe ouer to Andronicus, were secretly in heart already with him, other some thought themselves sufficiently to shew their fidelitie vnto the emperour, if sitting still at home, they should take part with neither: for so haue subtil heads & aspiring minds for the furtherance of their desires taught the common people both to say & thinke) thought it best by sea to auert the present danger: And therefore commanded all the emperours gallies (being before rigged vp and readie) to be strongly manned and put to sea, for the keeping of Propontis and the strait of Bosphorus, that Andronicus should not that way passe. Now had hee determined to haue made especiall choice of some assured friend of his owne for to bee generall of this fleet, as he had done of the captaines and masters, being all his owne kinsmen or domesticall seruants: but as he was about to haue so done, Contostephanus (surnamed the Great captaine) opposed himselfe against it, challenging that place as due vnto himselfe, before all others: So that overcome by his authoritie (which it was no time for Alexius now to dispute) he was glad to commit the charge and trust of the whole fleet vnto him, as generall. Thus hauing (as he thought) made the sea sure, he sent ouer vnto Andronicus; as from the emperour (for all was done in his name) one George Xiphilinus, with letters and other instructions, wherof the effect was, To command him forthwith in peace to returne vnto the place from whence he came; and not farther to trouble the state: promising him in so doing, the emperours fauour, with many great honors and preferments to bee afterward bestowed vpon him; which otherwise might turne to his vtter destruction. Which letters Xiphilinus hauing deliuered, and done his message, is reported to haue secretly aduised Andronicus to proceed in his purpose, and not in any case to yeeld to that which was of him required: wherewith Andronicus encouraged, proudly rejected the graces offered, and willed the messenger to tell them that sent him, That if they would haue him to returne vnto the place from whence he came, they should first displace the proud president Alexius, and call him vnto an account for the villanies he had done; Then the emperours mother they should deprive of her honours, and shut her vp as a Nun into some cloyster, there to learne to amend her life; And last of all, that the emperour according to his fathers will, should take vpon himselfe the gouernment, and not be ouertopt by others, by whose too much authoritie, his maiestie & honour was (as he said) too much impaired. But within a few daies after, Contostephanus, the great captaine and generall, carried ouer all the gallies to Andronicus, leauing nothing but their names for the president in his rolls to looke vpon: whose reuolt about all other things encouraged Andronicus, and cast Alexius enen into the bottom of despaire. For now Andronicus his friends flockt together in the citie, not secretly as before, but openly in all places: and such as wished a change in the state, impudently scoffing at Alexius, passed ouer the strait to Chalcedon in great numbers to Andronicus, where hauing filled their eyes with the beholding of his goodly person, his cheerefull countenance, and reuerend age, and their eares with his sweet words and great promises, returned home merrie and joyfull as if they had been in some terrestriall paradise, filling the citie with his praises. After that Andronicus his two sonnes, Iohn and Stannell, with diuers others, whom the president had cast in prison, were set at libertie, and other of his chiefe fauourits laid fast in their roomes: As for Alexius; the president himselfe, with all his friends and faction in the court, they were taken and committed to the keeping of the guard: a right strange alteration. But about midnight Alexius himselfe was secretly conueyed out of the court vnto the Patriarchs house, & there kept with a stronger guard than before. A wonderfull change and worth the marking, a man so honourably borne, but yesterday in greatest honour attended vpon upon with many thousands, all at his command, hauing the power to spill or saue: to day in bonds, in disgrace, in miserie and despair, and not so much as a page to wait vpon him. Which he taking very grieuouly, yet complained of nothing more, than that they which had the keeping of him, would not suffer him to sleepe nor take any rest. Of whose miserie, the Patriarch taking pittie (although he had of him very euill deserued) yet cheered him vp with comfortable words, perswading him with patience to endure his hard fortune, and not with such speeches as fitted not his present state, to prouoke his keepers to vse him euill. Within a few dayes after early in a morning, he was brought out of the Patriarchs house, and set vpon a very little bad jade, and so with a ragged clout vpon the top of a reed in manner of an ensigne, carried before him in derision, was brought to the sea side; and there cast into a little boat, was so brought to Andronicus, by whose commandment, with the generall consent of the nobilitie, he for his euill government shortly after had his eyes put out. This was the miserable end of the immoderat power, or rather of the insolent soueraigntie of Alexius: who, had hee with more moderation and vigilancie governed, might both haue kept Andronicus out of the cite, and himselfe from so great miserie; hauing at his command all the emperours treasure, his galleies, with most part of the strength of the empire. Now came the noble men ouer apace to Andronicus: the last that came, was the reuerend Patriarch Theodosius, with the chiefe of the cleargie: of whose approach, Andronicus hearing, went out of his tent to meet him, and falling downe (as great as he was) flat at his horses feet, and in a while after arising againe, kissed the Patriarks foot, calling him, The emperours fauour. The louer of vertue, The defender of the truth; and comparing him with the famous father Iohn Chrysostome, omitted not any honourable title he could possibly deuise to giue him. But the deuout Patriarch, that had neuer seene Andronicus before, hauing now well viewed him, and marked his sterne countenance, his subtil nature, his craftie and dissembling manners, his exceeding stature, being almost tenne foot high, his stately gate, his proud looke, his continuall seueritie, and melancholic silence: as it were pitying them that to their owne destruction had called such a man in, said: Hitherto I haue heard, but now I haue also seene, and plainly knowne: and fetching a deepe sigh, adioyned thereunto that saying of the Prophet Dauid: As wee haue heard, so haue we also seene. In which words, he couertly quipped the dissembled meeting and submission of Andronicus: and withall called to remembrance the words of the emperour Emanuel, wherewith he had many times so painted forth Andronicus vnto the Patriarch, as if hee would most liuely haue represented him vnto his view.

All things in the cite and in the pallace set in order according to Andronicus his mind, by his two sonnes, and leaue giuen vnto the emperours friends to come ouer vnto him, and to be acquainted with him; at length Andronicus himselfe departing from DAMALUM, in a gallee crossed the strait, oftentimes by the way merrily singing that saying of the heavenly Psalmist: Returne my soule into thy rest, because the Lord hath done well vnto thee, hauing deliuered my life from death, mine eyes from teares, and my feet from falling. The emperour with his mother Xene, then lay not in the pallace at CONSTANTINOPLE, but at another princely house of his in the countrey neere vnto PHILOPATIUM, as Andronicus had appointed: whether Andronicus first went, and comming vnto his presence, most humbly prostrate before him, with sobbing and teares, as his deceitfull manner was, kissed his feet. As for the emperesse his mother, he lightly saluted her, and as it were but for fashion sake, not dissembling in his countenance the old grudge he bare against her. And so without longer stay went vnto his tent provided for him not farre off, round about which, all the great noble men had pitched their tents also, flocking vnto him as chickens seeking for refuge vnder the hens wings. Hauing there staid with the emperour a good while, he was desirous to goe vnto the imperiall cite, and to see the late Emperour Emanuel his countess graue. Where entering into the monasterie of our Ladie, where he was buried, and comming to his tombe, hee wept bitterly, and roared as it were mainly out. So that diuers of the flanders by, ignorant of his dissembling nature, by way of admiration said: O what a wonderfull thing is this! O how he loved the Emperour, his cousin, although his fierce and cruell persecutor! And when one of his kinsmen would haue pulled him from the tombe, saying that he had torrowed for him ynough; he would not be remoued, but requested them to suffer him yet a little to tarry by the tombe, for that he had something in secret to say vnto the dead. And so with his hands cast vp and close together, as if he had prayed, and his eyes fast fixed vpon the tombe, he moued his lips, and secretly said something, but what, no man could tell. Some said it was some charme or incantation. But others more pleasantly conceited, said, (and as it afterward appeared more truly) that Andronicus did then triumph ouer the dead emperour Emanuel, and reuell with his ghost, with these or like words: I haue thee now fast, my cruell persecutor, by whome I haue been driuen vnto many great extremities: and hauing wandred almost all the world ouer, haue thereunto bene made by thee a common by-word. But now this tombe rising up with seuen tops; and prison, out of which thou canst not start, holdeth thee oppressed with a dead sleepe, out of which thou shalt not be awaked, but by the founding of the last trumpe. And now will I be reuenged of thy posteritie, and satisfie my selfe as a lyon with a fat prey; and take sharpe reuenge of all the wrongs thou hast done mee, when I haue once possessed my selfe of this royall citie.

After that, visiting all the emperours stately houses, but staying in no place long, hee disposed of all matters of state, according to his owne pleasure. Vnto the young emperour hee allowed hunting, and other his vaine delights, with keepers joyned vnto him, to watch not onely his going in and out, but also that no man should talke with him of any matter of importance. For all the government of the state he tooke vnto himselfe: not for that he wished so well therunto, about others, but so to driue from the court all them of the contrary faction to himself, that were able to doe any thing, and had before borne some sway. The fouldiers, whose helpe he had vsed in aspiring to the gouernment, he rewarded with great bountie; all great offices & preferments he bestowed either vpon his owne children, or other his great fauourits; diuers of the nobilitie, of whom he liked not, were by him in short time diuied into exile: some were by him deprived of their fight, & some others cast in prison, not knowing any cause why, more than that they were by him secretly condemned for that they were of the nobilitie, or had done some good seruice for the state, or excelled for their personage, or some other thing that grieved Andronicus, or els for the sparke of some old displeasure which yet lay hidden as fire taked vp in the ashes. So that the state of that time began to grow most miserable: & the trecherie, euen of men neereft in blood, seeking the destruction one of another, for to serue their own turns, or to gratifie Andronicus, most horrible: not only one brother betrayed another, but euen the father his son, & the son his father, if Andronicus would haue it so. Some accused their neereft kinsmen, that they had desired Andronicus his proceedings; or that without regard of him, they more fauored Alexius the yong emperour, then, a great offence. Yea (such was the mischief of the time) that many in accusing others, were themselves accused; & charging others of treason against Andronicus, were themselves charged by them whom they accused, & so clapt vp both together in one prison. Neither were they of the nobilitie only, which were enemies to Andronicus, thus hardly dealt withall; but euen some of his great fauorits and followers also: For some whom but yesterday he had vsed most kindly, and enroled amongst his best friends, vpon them to day he frowned and tyranized most cruelly: so that you might haue seene the same man the same day (as it is reported of Xerxes, his admirall) to be crowned and beheaded, to be graced and disgraced. In so much, that the wisest sort deemed Andronicus his praifings, to be the beginning of a mans disgrace; his bountie, his vndoing; and his kindnesse, his death. The first that tasted of his tyrannie, was Mary, the daughter of Emanuel the emperour, who for the hatred she bare vnto Alexius the late president, and the emperesse her mother in law, had (as is aforesaid) about all other, wished for his comming: but was now by one Pterigionites (sometime an Eunuch of her fathers, corrupted by Andronicus, hauing in his aspiring mind purposed the vtter destruction of all *Emanuel*s posteritie) cunningly poysoned; as was her husband Cesar, who liued not long after her, poysoned also (as was supposed) with the same cup that his wife was. Now amongst others of the late emperours house, none had cuer stood more in his light, than had the faire emperesse Xene, the yong emperours mother, whom now he ceased not most bitterly (though wrongfully) to accuse, as an vtter enemy both vnto the emperour and the state; making as if he would leaue all, and againe depart, if he were not remooued from the emperour her sonne: and by his running so incensed the giddy headed vulgar people against her, that they came flocking vnto Theodosius the good Patriarch, ready to teare him out of his clothes, if he consented not vnto the remoouing of the emperesse, as Andronicus had desired. So a counsell being called of such his fauorits and others, as were not like indifferently to heare her cause; but assuredly to condemne her: the guiltlesse emperesse after many things falsely laid to her charge, was accused of treason: as that she should by her letters haue solicited Bela, king of HUNGARY, her brother in law, to inuade BRANITZOR & BALLIGRABE, two strong places belonging to the empire: Whereupon she was condemned, and shamefully cast cast into a most filthie prison nere vnto the monastier of S. DIOMEDE. Amongst other noblemen called vnto this wicked counsell, were Leo Monastierites, Demetrius, Tornicus, and Constantinus Petrenus: who not yet altogether deuoted to Andronicus, being asked their opinions concerning the emperesse, said, They would be glad first to know, Whether that counsell against his mother, were called by the emperors consent or no? With which speech, Andronicus appeared to the heart as with a sword, in great rage start vp and said, These are they which encouraged the wicked president to all his villanies, lay hands vpon them. Whereupon they of his guard in threatening manner shooke their weapons and swords at them, as if they would euen presently haue slaine them: And the tumultuous common people, catching them by their cloaks as they came out, pulling them some one way, some another, were so fierce vpon them, as that they had much adoe to escape out of their hands with life. Now lay the faire emperesse (but the other day one of the greatest princes of the East, and honoured of all her subjects) in great miserie and dispaire, scorned euen of her base keepers, euerie houre expecting the deadly blow of the hangman. Yet was not the crueltie of Andronicus against her, so any thing assuaged, but greening that she yet breathed, shortly after assembled againe the former counsell, the ministers of his wrath, demanding of them, What punishment was by law appointed for such as betraied any towne or prouince of the empire? whereunto answer being giuen in writing, That it was by the law, death: he could no longer hold, but that he must in great choller breake out against the poore emperesse, as if it had ben she that had done it. And therupon the wicked counsellors crying out with one voice, that she was to be taken out of the way, as they had before agreed: by & without longer stay, a damned writing was subscribed by the yoong emperor her son, as if it had ben with the blood of his own mother, whereby she was (I abhor to write it) most vnworthily condemned to die. The men appointed to see this most horrible and cruell execution done, were Manuel, Andronicus his eldest son, & Georgius Augustus, his neere kinsman; who both dismaied at the very mentioning of the matter, not regarding the emperors command, said plainly, That they neuer before consented vnto the death of the emperesse, but had cleane hands of so hainous an offence, and therefore would now much lesse see her innocent bodie dismembred in their sight. At which v unexpected answer Andronicus much troubled, with his fingers oftentimes pluckt himselfe by the hoarie beard, and with burning eies casting sometime vp his head, & sometime downe, sighed at his owne most miserable tyrannicall estate, fretting inwardly that they which were nearest vnto him, whom he thought he might euen with a becke haue commanded to haue done any mischief, abhorring his crueltie should refuse to doe the thing he so much desired to haue done: yet repressing his anger for a while, within a few daies after he againe commanded her to be strangled; which was accordingly done by Constantinus Tryphichus, and Pterigionites the vngracious eunuch; by whose helpe he had before poysoned Mary the emperors daughter, with Cesar her husband, as is before declared. Thus perished this great emperesse, cruelly strangled in prison, by these two wicked men, the mercilesse executioners of Andronicus his wrath. Her dead bodie lately adorned with all the graces of nature, euen vnto the admiration of the beholders, was without more adoe secretly raked vp in the sand fast by the sea side: a poore sepulchre for so great a person.

What might not Andronicus now do to others, that durst thus cruelly to deale with the yoong emperours owne mother, and neere friends? yet was all couered vnder the pretence of the common good, and safetie of the state and empire. And the more to shadow Andronicus his secret purposes, as not proceeding of any priuat or hidden malice, or aspiring humour, from which he of all men would seeme most free; and the more to manifest his deuotion and loyalty vnto the yoong emperor his cousin, he was the onely persuader vnto the rest of the nobilitie, to haue him solemnly crowned (which as yet by reason of his tender age he was not); & at the time of his coronation, with his owne shouldders supported him vp, as he was (after the manner of that solemnitie) carried vnto the great church, and so backe againe; the Crocodils teares still plentifully running downe his aged face, as if it had bene for exceeding joy: which many of the meaner sort beholding, and deeming thereof the best, highly commended his kindnesse, accounting the yoong emperor thrice happie, in so graue a gouernour, and faithfull a counsellour; who in loue and kind affection towards him, seemed not inferiour vnto his naturall father: so cunningly had he vnder the vail of pietie, shadowed his most execrable treacherie; as that in the very plotting thereof, he was accounted most louing and kind. But hidden treason, be it neuer

so well dissembled, must at length shew it selfe. So Andronicus hauing got into his power both the emperor and the empire, and the chiefe friends of the late emperor Emanuel being taken out of the way or else driuen into exile, thought it now high time for himselfe to aspire vnto that high soueraintie after which he had so many yeares longed. Wherefore calling together a Countsell of his flatterers & fauourites, whom he had for such purpose promoted vnto the highest places of state (all or most part of the graue counsellors and friends of the late emperor Emanuel being now displaced, or otherwise taken out of the way) he as a man onely carefull of the common good, declared vnto them the dangerous state of the empire, by reason of a rebellion raised in BYTHINIA at NIC, by Isaack Angelus, & Theodorus Catacuzenus; and another at PHYLISIA, by Theodorus Angelus; requiring their graue aduice for the suppressing thereof, who not ignorant of their lords purpose (as therof before sufficiently instructed) answered with one consent, That of such great mischiefe, there would be no end, except he were joynd in fellowship of the empire together with Alexius, by his grauitie and deepe wisdom to supply what wanted for the good gouernment of the state in the yoong emperor his cousin. At which speech, the by-standers (being in number many, and for the most part the followers of Andronicus his flatterers) gaue a great shout, & as if it had bene already granted, with one applause cried out, Long live Alexius and Andronicus the Greeke emperours; and that with such a vehemencie, as if they would therewith haue rent the verie heauens. The bruit thereof flying abroad into the citie, forthwith you might haue seene euerie street and corner of the citie full of the vulgar people, with some also of better sort, swarming together like bees, and founding the praises of Andronicus (who now was come out of his house into the court, with a world of people following him) and crying out, Long live the Emperours Alexius and Andronicus: with which loud acclamation mixt with the heauie sighings of many good men (for all were not mad of that frenzie) the yoong emperor awaked, and seeing the court full of people, and Andronicus by them saluted his fellow in the empire: knowing now no other remedie, thought it best to yeeld vnto the time, and so with the rest flattering the old tyrant, welcomed him full sore against his will, by the name of his Fellow and companion in the empire: which he now in dissembling manner seeming vnwilling to take vpon him, and refusing the place offered; was by the rout of his flattering fauourites enforced to his owne great contentment, to yeeld to their request: some of them with both their hands carrying him vp, vntill they had as it were against his will placed him in the imperiall seat, prepared for him fast by the yoong emperor: others in the meane time, no lesse busied in pulling off his priuat attire, and putting vpon him the imperiall robes.

The next day, when this participation of the empire should be published, and they both proclaimed emperours, the name of Andronicus was set before the name of Alexius: whereof his fauourites (though some others interpreted it otherwise) gaue this reason, That it fitted not with the maiestie of the empire, that the name of a boy should be set before the name of so reuerend, graue, wise, and excellent a man as was Andronicus his companion in the empire. Shortly after, Andronicus being brought into the great temple to be crowned, then first began to shew vnto the people a cheerfull countenance, and setting aside his sterne looke, after his long deuotion done, filled the vaine peoples heads with many large promises of a more happie forme of gouernment than before. All which prooued nothing but meere dissimulation and deepe deceit, that cheerfulness of countenance and speech serving but for a while to couer his inward and couert most inhumane crueltie. And the more to deceiue the world, the ceremonies of his coronation past, at such time as he should for the consummation and confirmation of all, receiue the sacred and dreadfull mysterie, the pledge of our redemption, not without due reuerence to be named, much lesse with impure hands touched: after he had receiued the bread and taken the cup in his hand, he with a most deuout countenance framed of purpose to deceiue, & his eies cast vp to heauen, as if his soule had there already bene (the fairest maske of hypocritie) swore by those dreadfull mysteries, and most deeply protested in the hearing of the people standing by, that he had taken vpon him the fellowship of the empire, for no other end or purpose but to assist Alexius his cousin in the gouernment, and to strengthen his power: whereas his secret meaning was nothing lesse, as shortly after appeared. For after a few daies spent in feigned deuotions for the prosperous beginning of his empire, he forthwith turned his mind vnto other his more secret but most wicked and execrable designs. And hauing about all things purposed the death of the yoong emperor, he called together them of the counsell, his owne creatures and corrupt ministers of his wickednesse, who had now oftentimes in their mouths that saying of the Poet:

Est mala res multos dominari: vnicus esto, Rex dominusq;

An euill thing it is to be ruled by many,
One king and one lord, if there be any.

and that the old age of an Eagle was better than the youth of a Lark: So by the generall consent of that wicked assembly, unworthie the name of a graue counsell, a decree was made, That Alexius should as a man vnfit for the gouernment of the state, be deprived of all imperiall dignitie, and commanded to liue a priuat life. Which disloyall decree of the conspirators was yet scarcely published, but that another more cruell, came out of the same forge, That he should forthwith be put to death, as one vnwoorthie longer to liue. For the execution of which so horrible a sentence, Stephanus Hagiochristophorites (one of the chiefe ministers of Andronicus his villanies, and by him promoted euen vnto the highest degrees of the honours of the court) with Constantinus Trypsicus, and one Theodorus Badibrenus, captaine of the tormenters, were sent out; who entring his chamber by night, without compassion of his tender age, or regard of his honour, or innocencie, cruelly strangled him with a bow string: which detestable murder so performed, Andronicus shortly after comming in, spurned the dead bodie with his foot, railing at his father, the late emperor Emanuel, as a forsworne and injurious man; & at his mother, as a common whore. The head was forthwith stricke off from this miserable carcas (the mirrour of honours vnstabilitie) and left for the monstrous tyrant to feed his eyes vpon: the bodie wrapped vp in lead, was in a boat carried to sea, by Io. Camaterius, and Theodosius Chumenus, two of Andronicus his noble fauourits; who with great joy and glee, returned with the same boat to the court, as if they had done some notable exploit. But long continueth not the joy of the mischieuous, vengeance still following them at the heeles, as it did these two; who not long after, with the rest that conspired the innocent emperours death, all or most part of them came to shamefull or miserable end. Thus perished Alexius the emperor, not yet full fifteen yeeres old: in the third yeare of his raigne, which time he liued more like a seruant, than an emperor, first vnder the command of his mother, and afterwards of the tyrant which brought him to his end.

Who joyeth now but old Andronicus, made young againe as should seeme by his new gained honours: for immediately after the murder committed, he married Anne the French kings daughter, (as some report) before betrothed to yong Alexius; a tender and most beautifull ladie, not yet full eleven yeeres old, an vnfit match for threescore and tenne. And in some fort as it were to purge himselfe and his partakers of the shamefull murder by them committed, and to stop the mouths of the people, he by much flatterie and large promises, procured of the bishops a generall absolution for them all, from the oath of obedience which they had before giuen vnto the emperor Emanuel and Alexius his sonne: which obtained, he for a while had the same bishops in great honour, and shortly after in greater contempt, as men forgetfull of their duties and calling. After that, he gaue himselfe wholly vnto the establishing of his estate, neuer reckoning himselfe thereof assured so long as he saw any of the nobilitie, or famous capitaines, that fauoured Emanuel, the late emperor or Alexius his sonne, aliue: of whom some he secretly poysoned, as Mari the emperor Emanuel daughter, with her husband Cesar; some, for light occasions he deprived of their sight, as he did Emanuel and Alexius, the sonnes of the great and noble captaine Iohn Comnenus; Andronicus Lapardus, whose good seruice he had oftentimes vsed; Theodorus Angelus; Alexius Comnenus, the emperor Emanuel his base sonne: Some he hanged, as Leo Synesius, Atanell Lachanus, with diuers others: Some he burnt, as Mamalus, one of the emperor Alexius his principall secretaries; all men of great honour and place. For colour whereof, he pretended himselfe to be forrie for them, deeply protesting, that they died by the seruerie of the law, not by his will, and by the iust doome of the Iudges, whereunto he was himselfe (as he said) to giue place; and that with teares plentifully running downe his aged cheekes, as if he had ben the most sorrowfull man aliue. O deepe dissimulation, and Crocodiles teares, by nature ordained to expresse the heauinesse of the heart, flowing from the eies as shoures of raine out of the clouds: in good men the most certaine signes of greatest griefe, and surest testimonies of inward torments,

A but in Andronicus you are not so, you are far of another nature, you proceed of joy, you promise not vnto the distressed pittie or compassion, but death & destruction! How many mens eies haue you put out? how many haue you drowned? how many haue you deuoured? Most orille nobilitie that fauoured the late emperor Emanuel & Alexius his son, thus taken out of the way by Andronicus, strook such a feare into the rest, that for safegard of their liues, they betooke themselves to flight, some one way some another, neuer thinking themselves in safetie so long as they were within the greedie tyrants reach; whereof shortly after ensued no small troubles, to the shaking of the state of the whole empire. Isaack Comnenus, the emperor Emanuel his nigh kinsman, tooke his refuge into CIPRVS, & kept that island to himselfe. Alexius Comnenus, Emanuel his brother son, fled into SICILIA, & there stirred vp William king of that island against Andronicus: who with a great army landing at DYRACHIVM, tooke the city, & so from thence without resistance passing through the heart of MACEDONIA, spoiling the countrey before him as he went, met his fleet at THESSALONICA; which famous city he also tooke by force, & most miserably spoiled it with all the countrey therabout, in such sort, as that he brought a great feare euen vpon the imperiall citie it selfe: vnto which so great euils Andronicus (entangled with domestick troubles, & not knowing whom to trust) was not able to giue remedie, although for shew he had (to no purpose) sent out certaine of his most trusty ministers with such forces as he could spare. For the majestic of his authoritie growing still lesse & lesse, & the number of his enemies both at home and abroad daily encreasing, & the fauor of the vnconstant people (who now began to speake hardly of him) declining: he vncertain which way to turne himselfe, rested wholly vpon tyrannie, prescribing in his feare, not only the friends of such as were fled, & whom he distrusted, but sometimes whole families together, yea & that for light occasions, sometime those who were the best of his fauourits, whose seruice he had many times vsed in the execution of his crueltie. So that now no day passed, wherin he did not put to death, imprison, or torture, one great man or other. Whereby it came to passe, that the imperiall citie was filled with sorrow & heauinesse, euery man hanging the head, and with silence couering his inward griefe, not without danger to haue been then vttered. Amongst many others appointed to this slaughter, was one Isaack Angelus, a man of great nobilitie, whom Hagiochristophorites (the chiefe minister of Andronicus his tyrannie, and for the same by him highly promoted) suspecting, as one that bare no good will to the emperor; (caule enough of death) came to his house to apprehend him; & finding him at home, after some few hot words, commanded him to follow him. Whereat the noble man making some stay; and abhorring the verie sight of the wretch, as vnto him ominous and fatall: Hagiochristophorites himselfe began to lay hands on him, reuiling his followers, that they had not forthwith drawn him out of his house by the haire of his head, vnto the prison by him appointed. For they touched with the honour of the man, and moued with compassion, forced him not, but stood still as beholders. Isaack seeing himselfe thus beset, and no way now left for him to escape, resolving rather there presently to die than shortly after to be murdered in prison, drew his sword as the rest were about to haue laid hands vpon him, and at the first blow cleft the wicked head of Hagiochristophorites downe to his shoulders: and so leauing him wallowing in his owne blood, and like a desperat man laying about him amongst the rest, made himselfe way through the middest of them. And so embred with blood, with his bloodie sword yet in his hand, running through the middest of the citie, told the people what he had done; and crying vnto them for helpe in defence of his innocencie, fled into the great temple, there to take the refuge of the sanctuarie: where he had not long sit, in the place where the guiltie flying thither for refuge, vsed to sit, & confessing their offence, craue pardon of such as go in and out; but that the temple was filled with the multitude of people flocking thither out of all parts of the citie, some to see the nobleman, some to behold what should become of him: for all men thought that he would before the going downe of the sunne (notwithstanding the reuerence of the place) be drawne thence by Andronicus, & put to some shamefull death. Thither came also Iohn Ducas, Isaacks vncke, and his sonne Isaack to increase the tumult; not for that they were any thing guiltie of the death of Hagiochristophorites, but for that they had before become furies vnto the suspitious tyrant, for their kinsman Isaack. & he likewise for them; by whose trespass they well knew themselves now brought into no lesse danger than if they had been abettors therunto. And beside them also, many other there were, which standing in doubt of their owne estate, & fearing the like might happen to themselves, prickt forward with hard speeches the common people flocking thither, instantly requesting them to stay there, and to stand by them now at their need, being so injuriously wronged, whose pitifull complaints moued right many to take part with them. At which time also, no man yet comming from the emperor (being as then out of the citie) to repress the sedition, nor any of the nobilitie opposing themselves, no friend of Andronicus appearing, none of his bloodie ministers or officers, shewing themselves, nor any that did so much as speake a good word in his behalfe, or in dislike of the tumult, the boldnesse of the seditious people increased, euery man in so great libertie, saying what he list, and after their rude manner one encouraging another. So spent Isaack that long night, not thinking (God wot) of an empire, but still expecting the deadly stroke of Andronicus. Yet had he with great entreating, so prevailed, that diuers of the assembly shutting the church dore, and bringing lights into the church, staid there with him all night, and by their example caused some others to stay also. The next morning by the breake of the day were all the citizens flockt againe vnto the temple, cutting the tyrant to the deuill, as the common enemy of mankind, wishing vnto him a shamefull death, and the honour of the empire vnto Isaack. At that time by fortune, or rather God so appointing it, Andronicus was out of the citie at his pallace of MELVDIVM, on the East side of PROPONTIS, where he was by nine a clocke at night certified of the death of Hagiochristophorites, and of the tumult of the people: yet that night stirred he not, either did any thing more, but by short letters aduised the people to pacifie themselves, and not by foolish rebellion to cast themselves into farther danger. In the morning, Andronicus his fauourits began to shew themselves, and to do what they might to haue appeased the tumultuous multitude; yea and presently after came Andronicus himselfe, and landed with his imperiall gally at the great pallace in the citie. But with the enraged people, naught preuailed either the persuasions of the one, or report of the presence of the other: for they all as vpon a signall giuen, and as men inspired with one spirit, or stirred vp with the same furie, flockt together into the temple of SOPHIA, one encouraging another, and scoffing at such as stood by as idle lookers on, without weapons in their hands, reuiling them, and calling them rotten lymms that had no feeling of the common harme. After that they broke open the prisons, and set at libertie the prisoners, as fittest instruments for the increasing of the tumult, who were not all notable offenders of the dregs of the people, but many of them borne of good houses, and for some light fault, or inconsiderate word (whereof euery man was in those times bound to giue an account) or for some friends offence against Andronicus, there laid fast: these of all others most animated the people, in such sort, as that they which before for feare of the danger, did but softly murmure vnto themselves against Andronicus, did now openly joyne themselves with the rest of the base seditious. Then might you haue seene some with their swords and targuets, some also in their armour, but the greatest part armed but with clubs and stauies and other such like rude weapons, armed of furie, hastily taken vp in their shops as by chance they came first to hand, running forth in euery place. By this assembly of the most furious and promiscuous people, was Isaack hoysed vp, and with a generall applause saluted emperor. At which time one of the sextons of the church, with a ladder tooke downe Constantine the Great his crowne of gold (which for a monument hung ouer the holy altar) and set it vpon Isaack his head: Which he at the first seemed vnwilling to weare, not for that he was not desirous ynough of the empire, but for that he feared the excreame danger of the matter, and thought those things that were then done, to be but as it were a sick mans dreame, like ynough straight way to vanish; beside that, he feared in so doing, the more to exasperat Andronicus: which his vncle Iohn Ducas (of whom we haue before spoken, standing by him) perceiuing, plucking off his owne cap, and shewing his old bald head, requested the people, that if his nephew did refuse it, they would set it vpon his. Whereunto the people with a great outcrie answered, that they would no more yeeld their obedience vnto an old bald man, as hauing receiued many harmes from the hoarie haire of Andronicus; and therefore for his sake, hated euery old man, more fit for Charons boat and his coffin, than for the empire, and especially if he had a forked beard or bald head, as had Andronicus and this Ducas. Thus was Isaack by the tumultuous multitude inuested in the empire. And so royally mounted vpon one of the emperours horses, richly furnished with a saddle and trappings of gold, which they had by chance gotten, was by them brought from the temple vnto the court; Basilius Camaterus the Patriarch waiting vpon him, whom the headstrong people had enforced against his will, to confirme with his authoritie what was by them done for the establishing of Isaack in the empire. Andronicus at his comming to the great pallace, perceiuing first by the confused crie of the tumultuous multitude,

Atitude, and afterward by that which he saw with his eyes, how the world went; calling vpon his old friends and flattering fauourits, thought first by their helpe to haue repressed the furie of the rebellious: who as friends of his better fortune, and not of himselfe, were now for the most part shrunk from him; and those which were left, so faintly comming on, as if in his quarrell they had had no mind to spend their liues: with which heartlesse companie, Andronicus fearing to oppose himselfe against the furie of the multitude, with his bow and arrowes in his hand, got him vp into the highest tower of the pallace (called CANTENARIA) and from thence bestowed certaine shot among the people. But seeing that to bee to no purpose, and better persuaded to doe more with them with faire words, than such vaine words; he from the top of the tower cried aloud vnto them, That if they would hold themselves contented, and depart, he would by their consent resigne the empire vnto his sonne Manuell: whereat the people more enraged, spared not to poure forth most reprochfull words in contempt both of himselfe and his sonne. And so furiously brake into the court, by one of the gates called CAREIA: which Andronicus beholding, and now out of all hope, casting from him all his habillements of honour, and disguising himselfe, fled againe vnto his galleie, accompanied onely with Anna his wife, and Maraptica his minion, and so returned to MELVDIVM, his pallace from whence hee came. Isaack but yesterday in the bottome of despaire, and shadowed as it were with the hand of death, by the strange change of fortune to day mounted vnto the highest type of worldly honour, entering the pallace, was there againe with the greatest applause of the people that might bee, saluted emperor. From whence hee forthwith sent out certaine companies of his most assured friends and followers, to apprehend Andronicus: who now as a man at once forsaken both of his friends, and of his better fortune, secretly fled with his wife and his paragon before remembered, to CHILE, attended vpon onely with a few of his trustie seruants which had of long time serued him before hee was emperor. There taking ship, with purpose to haue fled vnto the Taurocyrthes (as not thinking himselfe safe in any province of the empire) hee was twice or thrice by foule weather put backe againe, the wrought sea abhorring (as it seemed) to carrie him that had so polluted it with the dead bodies of the innocent by him slaine; and still threatening (as it were) to deuour him. Thus strangely stayed by foule weather, or more truly to say, by the reuenging hand of the highest: hee was found by such as were sent out to seeke after him; and being by them apprehended, was with two great yron chaines fast locked about his proud necke, and heauie giues vpon his legs, cast into the castle of ANEMA: and in that miserable habit shortly after presented to the emperor Isaack, yet busied in appeasing and reforming of the disordered citie: where by the way as hee went, he was by the people most shamefully reuiled, and injuriously vsed; some plucking him by the beard, some by the haire of his head, some other in the meane time playing with his nose, and bobbing him in the face, with a thousand other despights done vnto him; especially by such women, as whose husbands he had before murdered or depriued of their sight. Afterward being committed to the hatefull furie of the people, he had his right hand cut off; and was againe committed to the same castle, without meat, drinke, or other comfort: where after he had laine a few dayes, hauing one of his eyes put out, hee was set vpon a foule leane cammell, with his face toward the taile thereof, and so as it were in triumph led through the market place, his bald head all bare, as if it had bene a dead mans skull taken out of a charnell house, in a short old coat; so miserable a spectacle, as might haue exprest a fountaine of teares out of the eyes of a right hard hearted man. But the bedlem and most insolent citizens, especially they of the baser sort, as cookes, coblers, curriours, and such like, flocking about him like bees (without regard that he had but the other day worne vpon his head the imperiall crowne, then honoured by them as a god, and extolled vnto the heauens; that they had not long before solemnly sworn vnto him obedience and loyalty) ran now as men out of their wits, omitting no kind of villanie they could deuise to doe vnto him: Some thrust nailes into his head, some cast durt in his face, some the dung both of men and beasts, some prick him in the sides with spits, some cast stones at him as at a mad dog, and other some opprobrious and despightfull words, no lesse grievous vnto him than the rest. Amongst others, an impudent drab comming out of the kitchen, cast a pot full of scalding water in his face. And in brieft, their outrage so exceeded, as if they had striuen among themselves who should do him the greatest villanie. Hauing thus shamefully as in a ridiculous triumph, brought him into the theatre, they there betwixt two pillars hanged him vp by the heeles, where hauing suffred all these despitfull indignities, with many moe, not without offence to be named, he with an inuincible courage yet still held his patience, not giuing one euill word: but sometimes saying, Lord haue mercie vpon me: and otherwhiles, Why doe you breake a brused reed? yet the furious people nothing moued with the calamitie of so great a man, of all others now the most miserable, stripped him of his bad clothes as he hung, and cut off his priuities. One among the rest, to make an end of him, thrust his sword in at his throat vp to the hilt as he hung; other two with their long swords, proued their strength, who could strike farthest into his buttocks. Thus miserably perished this famous emperor, after he had reigned two yeeres. That which was left of his bodie (for many had carried away some peeces thereof) being taken down from the place where he hung, was cast into a base vault in the theatre, where it for a space lay, as the lothsome carcasse of some wild beast, and the miserable spectacle of mans fragillitie: for Isaack the emperor would not suffer it to be buried. Howbeit afterwards, the furie of the people ouerpasse, it was by some more charitable men remoued thence, and laid in a low vault nere vnto the monasterie of the Ephori: which as Nicetas Choniates (author of this historie, speaking of the time wherein he liued) sayth, is yet there vndisfolued to be seene. He was a man most honourably descended, of stature tall, and well proportioned: in his countenance far a certaine reuerend majestie, adorned with such notable vertues, as might haue made him worthily to haue been compared vnto the greatest emperors of his stock and familie, had he not obscured the same with too much ambition and crueltie, whereof the one caused him to lead the greatest part of his life in prison or exile, the other brought him vnto such a most shamefull end.

Isaack Angelus his successeur, by the fauour of the people thus exalted vnto the empire, at the first gouerned the same with great lenitie and moderation, as if he had altogether abhorred from the effusion of his subjects blood. But afterwards not a little troubled, both with forraigne enemies, and domesticall rebellion, besieged in the imperiall citie, by such of the nobilitie as thought themselves no lesse worthe of the empire than himselfe: for repressing of which insolencies, and the assuring of his state, he became so seuer in chastising the offenders, and such others as he had in distrust, that he was counted of most men not inferiour in crueltie to Andronicus his predecessor; few daies passing without the condemnation or execution of one great man or other, besides them of the meaner sort, of whom he seemed to make no great reckoning: whereby he in few yeeres lost the loue and fauour of his subjects, who before had him in great honour, and became vnto them no lesse odious than was before Andronicus. Vpon which generall dislike of the people, his ingratefull younger brother Alexius (by him before for a great summe of money redeemed from the Turks) tooke occasion to rise vp against him, and by the fauour of the souldiours, deprived him together both of the empire and his sight: and hauing put out his eyes, thrust him into a Monasterie, there to liue as it were out of the world, as a man condemned to perpetuall darknesse, after he had reigned nine yeeres and eight moneths, being not yet full fortie yeeres old: Whether it were the reuenging hand of God for the hard measure vsed to Andronicus, or not, I leaue it to the wisest to consider; who in his deepe prouidence, wherewith hee best gouerneth all things, would haue a moderation vsed in punishment of our most capitall enemies, as hauing alwaies before our eyes the slipperie state of power and authoritie: & that as all worldly things are subject to change, so by the iust judgement of God it oftentimes falleth out, that what hurt we do vnto others, the same we may receive againe from others. In these so great and strange mutations of the Constantinopolitane empire, (which I haue somewhat more at large prosecuted, not so much for the noueltie of the matter, although it were right strange, as for that out of the losses and ruine thereof, the greatnesse of the Turkes for the most part grew) Clizasthan Sultan of Iconium, after the death of the emperor Emanuel, found meanes to take from the empire diuers strong townes and castles in the lesser Asia, together with a great part of the countrey of Phrigia: Alexius Andronicus, and Isaack the succeeding emperours, troubled with dangers neerer home, hauing nothing to oppose against him, but faire intreatie, and rich presents; so redeeming for a while an vnstirre peace, with no lesse charge, in short time to be renewed againe. This great victorious Sultan (for so he may of right be called) holding in his subjection a great part of the lesser Asia, now a man of great yeeres, dying, left behind him foure sonnes, Masut, Coppatine, Reucratine, and Caichofroes, all men growne. Amongst whom he deuided his kingdom. Vnto Masut he bequeathed Amasia, Ancyra, Doryleum, with diuers other pleasant cities of Pontus:

A vnto Coppatine he assigned Melytene, Cesarea, and the colonie now called Taxara: vnto Reucratine he allotted Aminsum, Docba, with some other cities vpon the sea coast: but vnto Caichofroes, he left Iconium his regall seat, and with it Lycaonia, Pamphilia, and all the countries thereabouts as far as Cottianum. Of these fourte, Coppatine long liued not after his father, for whose inheritance Reucratine prince of Docba, and Masut prince of Ancyra (his two brethren) fell at variance, and so at last into open war. But Masut finding himselfe too weak for his warlike brother Reucratine, yeelded vnto him the territories, which he saw he must needs forgo; and glad now to keepe his owne, so made peace with him. Reucratine being a man of an ambitious and haughtie spirit, with his forces thus doubled, denounced war vnto his brother Caichofroes; who doubting his owne strength, fled vnto the emperor Alexius Angelus for aid, as had his father done before him vnto the emperor Manuel, although not with like good fortune. For the emperor but of late hauing obtained the empire by the deposing of his brother, and altogether giuen to pleasure, reputing also those domesticall waies of the Turks, some part of his owne safetie; sent him home without comfort, as one strong enough of himselfe to defend his owne quarrell against his brother.

The sonnes of Clizasthan at variance among themselves.

Howbeit he was scarcely come to Iconium, but that he was by Reucratine expelled thence, and driuen to flee into Armenia, where he was by Lebune king of that country, a Turke also, honourably receiued and courteously vsed, but yet denied of the aid he requested: the king pretending that he was already in leaguer with Reucratine, and therefore could not; or as some thought, fearing the dangerousnesse of the matter, would not intermeddle therein. Wherewith the poore Sultan vtterly discouraged, returned againe to Constantinople, and there in poore estate, as a man forlorne, passed out the rest of his daies.

Now hauing thus passed through the Turkish affaires in the lesser Asia, together with the troubled estate of the Constantinopolitane empire, no small cause of the Turks greatnesse; the course of time calleth vs backe againe before wee passe any further, to remember their proceedings also at the same time, and shortly after, in Siria, Iudea, Egypt, and those more Southerly countries, where these restless people ceased not by all meanes to enlarge their empire, vntill they had brought all those great kingdoms vnder their obedience.

After the death of Baldwin king of Hierusalem, of whom we haue before spoken, Americus his yoonger brother earle of Ioppa and Ascalon, being then about seuen and twentie yeeres old, was by the better good liking of the cleargie and people, than of the nobilitie, elected king: not for that there wanted in him any good parts woorthie of a kingdom, but for that some of them enuied vnto him so great an honour. Neuerthelesse he was (as we said) by the generall consent of the people elected, proclaimed, and by Americus the Patriarch with all solemnitie crowned the seuenteenth day of Februarie, in the yeare of Grace 1163. To begin whose troubled raigne, the Egyptians first of all denied to pay vnto him their woonted tribute. In reuenge whereof, he in person himselfe with a puissant armie entred into Egypt; and meeting with Dargan the Sultan, ouerthrew him in plaine battell, and put him to flight: who to stay the further pursuit and passage of the Christians, cut the bankes of the riuer Nilus, and so drowned the countrey, that the king was glad to content himselfe with the victorie he had already gotten, and so to returne to Hierusalem.

Americus first king of Hierusalem.

The next yeere, Americus was againe drawn downe with his power into Egypt, by Dargan the Sultan, to aid him against Saracon: whom Noradin the Turke, king of Damascus, had sent as generall with an armie, to restore Sanaar the Sultan before expelled, and to depose Dargan. In which expedition Dargan being slaine, and Saracon hauing woon certaine townes, kept them to himselfe: Sanaar doubtfull of his good meaning, joynd his forces with Americus, and by his helpe expelled Saracon out of Egypt. But whilest Americus was thus busied in Egypt, Noradin the Turke making an inroad into the frontiers of the Christians nere vnto Tripolis, was by Gilbert Lacy, master of the Templars in those quarters, and the other Christians, when he least feared, so suddenly set vpon, that he had much adoe by flight to saue himselfe; halfe naked for hast, most of his followers being at the same time slaine. In reuenge of which disgrace, he not long after with a greater power came and besieged Arcthusa: For reliefe whereof, Bohemund prince of Antioch, Raymund the yoonger, earle of Tripolis, Calaman gouernour of Cilicia, and Toros prince of Armenia came with their power. Of whose coming the Turke hearing, raised his siege and departed. After whom these Christian princes eagerly gerly following, were by the Turks shut vp in certaine deepe and rotten fennes (whereinto they had vnadvisedly too far entred) and there with a great slaughter ouerthrowne. In which conflict, all the chiefe commanders of the armie were taken, except the prince of ARMENIA, who foreseeing the danger, had retired, after he had in vaine dissuaded the rest from the further pursuit of the flying enemy. The prince of ANTIOCH there taken, was about a yeare after for a great summe of money redeemed; but the countie of TRIPOLIS was after eight yeares strait captiuitie hardly deliuered. Noradin after this victorie returning againe to the siege of ARETHUSA, in few daies woon the towne: and encouraged with so good successe, and the absence of the king, laid siege to the cite of PANADE, which was also deliuered vnto him, vpon condition that the citizens might at their pleasure in safetie depart.

At the same time Saracoon generall of Noradin his forces, tooke from the Christians two castles; the one in the countie of SIDON, the other beyond IORDAN vpon the borders of ARABIA, both in the custodie of the Templars: twelue of whom the king at his returne hanged vpon treason.

Shortly after Saracoon, king Noradin his great man of war, with all the power of the Turkes, came downe againe into EGYPT, with purpose to haue fully subdued all that notable kingdome vnto his lord and master. Of whose power, Sanar the Sultan standing in dread, praied aid of Ammericus, promising vnto him beside his yearly tribute, the summe of fortie thousand ducats for his paines. The matter fully agreed vpon, and all things now in readinesse; Ammericus set forward with his armie, and encountering with Saracoon and his Turkes at the riuer NILVS, ouerthrew him in a great battell: yet not without some losse, for the Turkes in their flight lighting vpon the kings carriages with the whole baggage of the armie, and ouerturning them that had the charge thereof, caried away with them a most rich prey: whereby it came to passe, that as the Christians had the victorie, so the Turkes enjoyed the spoile.

Saracoon after this ouerthrow hauing againe gathered together his dispersed souldiers, tooke his way to ALEXANDRIA, where he was by the citizens receiued: after whom the king following, gaue no attempt vnto the cite, for that he knew to be but vaine, but encamped close by the side of the riuer NILVS, from whence the cite was chiefly to be victualled. Whose purpose Saracoon perceiuing, and betime foreseeing the distresse of his whole armie for want of victuals, if he should there long stay: leauing there his sonne Saladin (or as some call him his nephew) with a thousand horsemen for the keeping of the cite, secretly by night departed thence himselfe with the rest of his armie: and passing through the deserts, did great harme in the vpper parts of EGYPT.

Saladin left in EGYPT. Of whose departure Ammericus vnderstanding, was about to haue followed him, but that he was otherwise perswaded by the Egyptian captaiues to continue his former purpose for the gaining of the cite. Wherefore now after the departure of Saracoon, he began to approch the wals, and with diuers engines of war to disturbe the defendants: wherewith the citizens (better acquainted with the trade of marchandize, than the feats of war) discouraged, began now to consule among themselves for the turning out of those troublesome guests whom they had so lately receiued: which Saladin perceiuing, certified Saracoon his vnde thereof, requesting his speedie reliefe in that his so dangerous estate, and with much intreatie perswaded the citizens for a while to hold it out, vntill he might from him receiue answer: of all which the Christians and Egyptians without, hauing intelligence, laid so much the harder vnto the cite. Gladly would Saracoon haue done what hee was by his nephew requested: but perceiuing it to be a matter of no lesse danger than difficultie, he by the means of Hugh countie of CESAREA, & one Arnolphus another noble Christian, both then prisoners with him, concluded a peace with the king: whereupon the cite was forthwith yeelded vp, and Saladin with his Turkes suffred in safetie to depart. At which time also all prisoners were on both sides freely and without ransom set at libertie. Thus Saracoon for this time disappointed of his purpose for the conquest of EGYPT, returned backe againe to DAMASCO: and Ammericus with great glorie to ASCALON, where he armed with his armie the 21 of September in the yeare 1167.

In this late expedition, king Ammericus on the one side enflamed with the wealth of EGYPT, and on the other, encouraged with the weaknesse of that effeminate people, resting for the most part vpon forreigne strength; had purposed himselfe to inuade the kingdome, & so if possibly he might to ioyne it to his owne. For colour wherof, it was pretended that the Sultan contrary to his faith before giuen, had secretly fought to ioyne in league and amitie with Noradin the Turke, king

A king of DAMASCO. The chiefe stirrer vp of the king vnto this war, was one Gérbert master of the Templars; who in respect of the aid by them of his order to be giuen, had obtained of the king, after the victorie gained, to haue the cite of PELVSIVM with all the rich countrey about the same, giuen vnto him and his brethren the knights of the order for euer: Vpon which hope, he contrarie to the mind of many of the knights, for the furtherance of that war, gaged his whole wealth and credit, with all the treasure of his house. So all things now in readinesse, for so great an enterprise, Ammericus with his armie set forward in October, and hauing in ten daies passed the sandie desert, came to PELVSIVM; which cite he after three daies siege tooke by force, and put to sword all them that were therein, without respect of age, sex, or condition: which cite he according to his promise before made, gaue vnto the Templars. After that, he began also to besiege CAIRE, at which time his fleet lacked the cite of TAPIVM. In the meane time, Sanar the Egyptian Sultan, considering the danger he was in, to satisfie Ammericus his greedie desire, offered to pay him twentie hundred thousand ducats to withdraw his forces: and forthwith sent him one hundred thousand, for the ransom of his sonne and his nephew taken prisoners at PELVSIVM: and for the rest to be paid within few daies after, he gaue two of his nephews hostages. Neuerthelesse the payment he deferred from day to day, of purpose in the meane time to raise the whole power of EGYPT, as also to receiue aid from the Turkes by Saracoon, which he dayly expected: of whose speedie comming Ammericus vnderstanding, left part of his armie at PELVSIVM, & with the rest went to haue met him: but missing him by the way, Saracoon with his Turkes came in safetie to CAIRE vnto the Sultan as he had desired. Wherfore Ammericus dismayed with the multitude of two so great armies now joynted together, retired backe againe to PELVSIVM, and there taking with him the garrison before left, returned home to IERUSALEM: hauing in that expedition (begun with the breach of faith) laid the foundation of the ruine of his kingdome, as in few yeeres after it by prooffe appeared, by the euill neighbourhood of the Turkes, by that meanes brought downe into EGYPT.

Saracoon the Turke after the departure of Ammericus, easily perceiuing a most fit time and opportunity to be offered for him now to obtaine that, which he had in vaine before both sought and fought for; encamped with his armie neere vnto CAIRE, and notably counterfeited himselfe of all others the most deuoted friend of the Sultans: so that betwixt them two passed all the kind tokens of loue and friendship, that could possibly be deuised: the Sultan oftentimes feasting the Turke; and in kindnesse likewise being feasted of him: But at length going as his manner was vnto the campe to visit him, he was by the Turkes slaine. So Saracoon hauing brought to passe what he desired, and entering the cite with his armie, was by the great Caliph (from whom the Egyptian Sultans, as from their superiours, the true successours of their great prophet Mahomet tooke their authoritie) appointed Sultan, the first of the Turkes that euer enjoyed the same: which royall dignitie he had not possessed fully a yeere, but that he was taken away by death. In whose steed Saladin his brothers sonne, by and by stepped vp: who altogether a martiall man, not regarding the reuerend majestic of the Caliph (as had his vncle Saracoon, & all the Egyptian Sultans before him) with his horsemen made stricke out his braines; and not so contented, vtterly rooted out all his posteritie, the better to assure himselfe and his successours the Turkes in the possession of his new gotten kingdome: and after that diuided the great treasures of the Egyptians among his Turkes, to encourage them the more to follow him in his warres against the Christians.

How the kingdome of Egypt first fell into the hands of the Saracens, with the notable alterations thereof.

This glorious kingdome so much spoken of in holy Scripture, and renowned of the learned historiographers of all ages, after the ruine of the Romane empire, was sometime part of the Constantinopolitane empire, and a notable member of the Christian common weale; vntill that about the yeere of our Lord 704, the Egyptians wearie of the pride & cotterousnes of the Gracians, reuolted from them vnto the Saracens, whose superstition they also receiued, and so vnder the government of the Saracen Caliphs, the successours of the false prophet Mahomet liued about 464 yeares, vntill that now being inuaded by Ammericus, they praid aid of Noradin the Turke, Sultan of DAMASCO: who vnto their reliefe sending Saracoon with an armie, repulsed indeed the Christians, but oppressing their libertie, tooke vnto himselfe the kingdome, which he left vnto his nephew Saladin, in whose posteritie it remained vntill it was from them againe taken by the Circassian slanes the Mamalukes: vnder whose seruile government it was holden of long time, vntill that by the great emperor of the Turkes Selymus the first, it was againe conquered, and the Mamalukes

gerly following, were by the Turks shut vp in certaine deepe and rotten fennes (whereinto they had vnaduisedly too far entred) and there with a great slaughter ouerthrowne. In which conflict, all the chiefe commanders of the armie were taken, except the prince of ARMENIA, who foreseeing the danger, had retired, after he had in vaine dissuaded the rest from the further pursuit of the flying enimie. The prince of ANTIOCH there taken, was about a yeare after for a great summe of money redeemed; but the countie of TRIPOLIS was after eight yeares strait captiuitie hardly deliuered. Noradin after this victorie returning againe to the siege of ARETHUSA, in few daies woon the towne: and encouraged with so good successe, and the absence of the king, laid siege to the citie of PANADE, which was also deliuered vnto him, vpon condition that the citizens might at their pleasure in safetie depart.

So Saracon hauing brought to passe what he desired, and entering the citie with his armie, was by the great Caliph (from whom the Egyptian Sultans, as from their superiours, the true successours of their great prophet Mahomet tooke their authoritie) appointed Sultan, the first of the Turkes that euer enjoyed the same: which royall dignitie he had not possessed fully a yeere, but that he was taken away by death. In whose steed Saladin his brothers sonne, by and by stepped vp: who altogether a martiall man, not regarding the reuerend majestic of the Caliph (as had his vnckle Saracon, & all the Egyptian Sultans before him) with his horsemen made stricke out his braines; and not so contented, vterly rooted out all his posteritie, the better to assure himselfe and his successours the Turkes in the possession of his new gotten kingdome: and after that diuided the great treasures of the Egyptians among his Turkes, to encourage them the more to follow him in his warres against the Christians.

This glorious kingdome so much spoken of in holy Scripture, and renowned of the learned historiographers of all ages, after the ruine of the Romane empire, was sometime part of the Constantinopolitane empire, and a notable member of the Christian common weale; vntill that about the yeere of our Lord 704, the Egyptians wearie of the pride & couetousnes of the Grecians, reuolted from them vnto the Saracens, whose superstition they also receiued: and so vnder the government of the Sarafin Caliphs, the successours of the false prophet Mahomet liued about 464 yeeres, vntill that now being inuaded by Almericus, they praied aid of Noradin the Turke, Sultan of DAMASCO: who vnto their reliefe sending Saracon with an armie, repulsed indeed the Christians, but oppressing their libertie, tooke vnto himselfe the kingdome, which he left vnto his nephew Saladin, in whose posteritie it remained vntill it was from them againe taken by the Circassian slauers the Mamalukes: vnder whose seruile government it was holden of long time, vntill that by the great emperor of the Turkes Selymus the first, it was againe conquered, and the Mamaluks utterly destroyed: In the government of whose posteritie, the mightie emperors of the Turks, it hath euer since remained as part of their empire, vntill this day, as in the proceſſe of this historic God willing shall appeare.

1170 Saladin thus possessed of the great kingdome of Egypt, and all things set in such order as he thought best for the newnesse of his state, with a great armie entred into the land of Palestine, in the year 1170, and there besieged Daron; which towne he woon, and ouerthrew such as were sent by king Americus to haue relieved the same: with which small victorie contenting himselfe, as with the good beginning of his rising fortune, he returned backe againe into his kingdome. Yet was his armie so great and populous, as that the like armie of the Turkes had neuer before bene scene in the Holy land. Wherefore Americus considering in what great danger he stood, his kingdome now being on both sides beset by the Turks, sent out his embassadours vnto the Christian princes of the West, to craue their aid for the defence of that kingdome which their fathers had woon. And for the same purpose went himselfe in person vnto the emperour of Constantinople, of whom he was royally entertained, and afterwards sent backe loaded with the promises of great matters, as were also his embassadours from the princes of the West. All which for all that sorted vnto nothing, but vanished into smoake.

1171 The year following, viz. 1171, Saladin besieged Petrea, the metropolitall cite of Arabia: but hearing that Americus with a great power was comming to the reliefe thereof, hee raised his siege and retired. As he did also the next year after, hauing in vaine attempted the strong castle of Mont-Royal, on the further side of Jordan. In like manner also the third year he came againe into the Holy land, and spoiled the countrey beyond Jordan: but hearing of the kings comming against him, he forthwith returned againe into Egypt. All these light expeditions, this politike prince made not so much for hope of victorie, or to prooue his enemies strength, as to traine his souldiers, especially the effeminate Aegyptians, and to make them fitter to serue him in his greater designs.

1173 Shortly after died Noradin Sultan of Damasco, and in his time a most notable champion of the Turks, after he had reigned nine and twentie yeares. Vpon whose death Americus forthwith besieged the cite of Panabe, in hope to haue againe recouered the same: but he was by the widow of the late dead Sultan, for a great summe of money and the deliuerie of certaine noble prisoners, intreated to raise his siege and depart. So hauing sent away his armie, and travelling with his ordinarie retinue to Tiberias, where hee had the summer before bene sicke of the flux, feeling himselfe not well, he returned on horsebacke by Nazareth and Neapolis to Hierusalem, where his old disease increaseth vpon him, he was also taken with a feuer: wherewith after he had bene some few daies grievously tormented, hee requested his physicians with some gentle potion to loose his belly, which was now somewhat staied: which they refusing to do, he commaunded the potion to be giuen him vpon his owne perill, hap thereon what hap should: which being giuen him, and his belly againe loosed, he seemed therewith to haue been at the first well eased; but his wonted feauer with great vehemencie returning, before his weake & spent bodie could be with conuenient meats refreshed, he suddenly died the tenth of Iuly, in the year 1173, when he had reigned about ten yeares. His dead bodie was with the great lamentation of all his subjects, solemnly buried by his brothers. Hee was a most wise prince, and withall right valiant, amongst many most fit for the government and defence of that troublesome kingdome so hardly beset with the infidels, if it had pleased God to haue giuen him longer life.

Baldwin the fourth of that name seventh king of Hierusalem.

Fourte daies after the death of Americus, was Baldwin his sonne, then a youth about thirtene yeares old, by the generall consent of the nobilitie chosen king, and by Americus the Patriarch in the temple with great solemnitie crowned in the year 1173: vnto whom, as not yet by reason of his tender age, fit himselfe to mannage the waightie affaires of the kingdome, Raymond countie of Tripolis was by the whole consent of the nobilitie appointed tutor to supply what was wanting in the yooing king.

Noradin, Sultan of Damasco (dead as is aforesaid) left behind him Melechala his sonne, yet but a youth, to succede him in his kingdome. Whose government the nobilitie disdaining, sent secretly for Saladin Sultan of Egypt, vnto whom at his commaing they betrayed the cite of Damasco, the regall seat of the Turkes in Syria. Whereof Saladin possessed, and entring into Celestria without resistance, tooke Heliopolis, Emissa, with the great cite of Cesarea:

A Cesarea; and in fine, all the whole kingdome of Damasco, the cite of Arrethusa onely excepted. But thus to suffer Melechala the yooing prince to be wronged, and the kingdome of Damasco to be joynd vnto the kingdome of Egypt, was of the wiser sort thought not to stand with the safetie of the kingdome of Hierusalem, lying in the middle betwixt them both. Wherefore the countie of Tripolis, gouernour of that kingdome, made out certaine forces to haue hindred his proceeding. At which time also, Colobed prince of Parthia and Melechala his vncle, sent certaine troupes of Parthian horsemen to haue aided his distressed nephew, who were by Saladin ouerthrowne and almost all slaine, neere vnto Alippo where Melechala lay. As for the countie of Tripolis and the other Christian princes, with whom Saladin in the newnesse of his kingdome had no desire to fall out; he appeased them with faire intreatie, and rewards: vnto the countie hee sent freely the hostages, which yet lay for his ranfome at Emissa: vnto the other princes he sent rich presents: and therewith so contented them all, that they returned without any thing doing against him. After which time, three or foure yeares passed in great quietnesse, to the great strengthening of him in those his new gotten kingdomes. At length vpon the comming ouer of Philip earle of Flanders, the Christian princes in Syria encouraged, consulted of an expedition to be made into Egypt, whereof Saladin hauing intelligence, drew downe into that countrey the greatest part of his strength. But Philip disliking of that expedition, and the rather for that he saw no great cheerefulness in the countie of Tripolis and the rest, thereunto; they with one consent changed their purpose for Egypt, and turning their forces quite contrarie way, miserably and without resistance wasted the countrey about Emissa and Cesaria.

C Whilest the Christians were thus busied in Calostria; Saladin on the other side tooke occasion out of Egypt to invade the kingdome of Hierusalem: of whose comming king Baldwin hauing intelligence, with such small forces as he had left, hasted himselfe to Ascalon. In the meane time Saladin with a great armie was entred into the holy land, where burning the countrey before him, and raging in the blood of the poore Christians, hee came and encamped not farre from Ascalon; and stricke such a feare vpon the whole countrey, that they which dwelt in Hierusalem, were about to haue forsaken the cite: As for the king himselfe, he lay close within the cite of Ascalon, not daring to aduenture vpon so strong an enemy. Wherewith Saladin encouraged, and out of feare of his enemies, disperſed his armie, some one way some another, to forage the countrey. Which the king perceiuing, secretly with all his power issued out of the cite, if happily so he might ouertake the Sultan vnawares. Neither was he deceived in his expectation: for comming suddainly vpon him, and secretly charging him, he had with him for a good space an hard and doubtfull battell, vntill that the victorie by the power of God, at length enclining to the Christians, Saladin with his Turkes fled, ouerthrowne with a great slaughter, most part of his great armie being either there slaine, or lost afterward with hunger and cold. This victorie fell vnto the Christians the 25 day of Nouember in the year 1177, not without the mightie hand of God; the Turke hauing in his armie about six and twentie thousand horsemen, and the king not past foure hundred horse with some few footmen. After which victorie, Baldwin in great triumph returned to Hierusalem, and there shortly after with great care and diligence repaired the decayed wals of the cite.

E Saladin in reuenge of this ouerthrow, made diuerſe incursions into the frontiers of the Christians, and did great harme, especially in the countrey about Sidon. For the repressing whereof, the king put himselfe in armes, and going against him, ouerthrew part of his armie, as they were carying away a great bootie. Of which ouerthrow Saladin vnderstanding, came in such hast with the rest of his armie, as if it had been a suddaine tempest vpon the Christians, then in great securitie deuinding the spoile; of whom they slew a great number, and put the rest to flight: In which so suddaine a confusion, Otto, grand master of the Templars, and Hugh the earle of Tripolis his sonne in law, were both taken prisoners. The earle himselfe with a few fled to Tyre: the king also at the same time was glad to shift for himselfe, and by flight to saue himselfe as he might. After which victorie, Saladin besieged a strong castle which the king but the year before had built vpon the banke of the riuer of Jordan, and giuen it to the Templars, with the countrey round about; which castle Saladin tooke by force, and put to sword all that were therein, except some few whom he carried away prisoners. By this victorie Saladin became dreadfull vnto the Christians in Syria, which caused them, especially such as had any charge, with more vigilancie cie to looke about them. Yet shortly after, a peace was for a time concluded, betwixt the Sultan and the king; whereby their troubled estates breathed themselves, almost the space of two yeares.

But this so welcome a calme was by domestick troubles againe by the kings friends suddenly troubled. For the countie of TRIPOLIS, to whom the government of the kingdome was committed, comming towards HIERUSALEM, being by the suggestion of his enemies brought into suspicion with the king, as if he had affected the kingdome, was to his great disgrace by the way commanded to stay. The chiefe authors of which discontentment, were the kings mother, a woman of a turbulent nature, and her brother the kings steward; who in the absence of the earle had wrought the kings sickle mind according to their owne appetites. But the rest of the nobilitie wisely foreseeing vnto what great danger that discord might tend; in despite of them, with much labour, caused him to be sent for againe, and so reconciled vnto the king: By which meanes, that dangerous fire of dissention was for that time appeased, which afterwards brake out againe, to the vtter ruine of that kingdome.

Saladin now wearie of the league he had before made with king Baldwin, as no longer standing with his haute designs, renounced the same, and raising a great power in ÆGYP, set forward toward DAMASCO. Of whose comming king Baldwin hauing knowledge, with the whole power of his kingdome went to haue met him, not farre from the dead Sea, and there encamped at an old towne called PETRA. But Saladin turning out of the way, into the kings territorie, came and encamped before MOUNT-ROIAL, a castle which Baldwin had giuen vnto the Templars, about three daies march from the place where the king lay.

There Saladin with the spoile of the countie refreshing his armie, now wearie of long travail, set forward againe, and so without resistance arriued with his armie at DAMASCO. At the same time the Turks capitaines about DAMASCO, BOSTRUM, and EMISSA, perceiving the frontiers of the Christians thereabout, to be kept but with small strength, passed ouer JORDAN, and spoiling a great part of GALILEE, besieged the castle of BURY, at the foot of MOUNT-TABOR, not farre from the cite of NAIM; which castle they in few dayes tooke, and hauing there made a great slaughter, carried away with them about five hundred prisoners. Saladin being come to DAMASCO, called together all the garrisons of that kingdome, and joyning them vnto the forces he brought out of ÆGYP, entered into the Holy land: at which time the countie of TRIPOLIS, gouernour of the kingdome, lay sicke of a burning feauer. Neuertheless the king encouraged by the knights of the order, went out with his armie against him; and encountering with him nere vnto a village called FRONTOBERT, ouerthrew him in a great battell, wherein, and afterward in the flight, most part of the Sultans armie perished. Saladin himselfe being glad by speedie flight to escape the danger, and so by long marches to get him againe to DAMASCO.

In reuenge of this ouerthrow, Saladin hauing repaired his armie, and sent for his fleet out of ÆGYP, came and besieged BERRYVS both by sea and land: at which time also his brother, whom he had left gouernour in ÆGYP, besieged DARUM, a strong towne in the vttermost bounds of the kingdome of HIERUSALEM towards ÆGYP. Both whose forces Baldwin being not able at once to repress, by the counsell of his nobilitie thought it best first to relieue BERRYVS, as the place of greater importance. And for that purpose set forward with his armie by land, hauing also rigged vp three and thirtie gallies at TYRE, for the releefe thereof by sea. Of which preparation Saladin vnderstanding, as also of the kings comming (by letters intercepted by his scouts, directed to the besieged, for the holding out of the siege, with promise of speedie reliefe) he presently rose with his armie, and departed: whereof the king being aduertised, retired to SEPHOR.

Not long after, Saladin according to his ambitious nature, desirous about measure to extend the bounds of his kingdome, and seeing the successe of his attempts against the king of HIERUSALEM not answerable to his desire, conuerted his forces vnto the countries more eastward: and passing the river EUPHRATES, and entering into MESOPOTAMIA, partly by force, partly by corruption, got into his hand the cities of EDESSA, CARRAS, and diuers others. In which time the king of HIERUSALEM tooke occasion first to spoile the country about DAMASCO, and after that, diuers other places of the Sultans kingdome, making hauock of whatsoever came in his way, and so laded with the spoile of the Turkes, retired to HIERUSALEM.

Saladin

Saladin with victorie returning out of MESOPOTAMIA, in reuenge of the injuries done vnto him in his absence, marched directly to ALEPPO, the strongest cite of the Christians in that part of SYRIA, which about all other he longed after: where hee had not long liuen, but that it was by the treason of the gouernour deliuered into his hands, with all the countie thereabouts: wherewith the Christian princes were so discouraged, that they euen then began to feare greater matters to ensue. The prince of ANTIOCH sold TARSVS, the metropolitick cite of CILICIA, to Rupinus prince of ARMENIA; for that he saw it was not without great charge and danger to be by him defended, being so farre from him, and Saladin as it were now slept in betwixt him and it.

At the same time king Baldwin, at NAZARETH fell sicke of a feauer: the leprosie also his old disease growing dayly more and more vpon him: in so much that despairing of his life, he called vnto him Guy Lusignan countie of IOPPA and ASCALON, vnto whom he had before espoused Sybilla his eldest sister, and in the presence of his mother, the Patriarch, and all the chiefe commanders of the souldiers of the sacred war, appointed him gouernour of the kingdome, reseruing vnto himselfe only the title of a king, with the cite of HIERUSALEM, and a yearely pension of ten thousand duckats: All which was done to the great disgrace and discontentment of the countie of TRIPOLIS the old gouernour.

It was not long, but that Saladin hauing breathed himselfe a little, after so great labours, came againe into the Holy land, where he tooke many castles and did infinit harme; in so much that the countie people were glad for feare to forsake their houses and to fle into cities. The Christian armie in the meane time lying fast by at SEPHOR, not once moouing, although many a faire occasion were offered: For the chiefe commanders affectionated vnto the countie of TRIPOLIS, and enuying at the preferment of Guy the new gouernour, were vnwilling to fight, but finding one excuse or other, suffered the enemy at his pleasure to spoile the countie, and so in safetie to depart, which he had neuer before done in those quarters.

Petra in reuenge
besieged by the Turks.

Within lesse than a moneth after, Saladin with a great armie well appointed with all the habiliments of war, needfull for the besieging of a cite or strong castle, came againe into the land of PALESTINE; and passing through the countie beyond JORDAN, sat downe at last before PETRA, in hope by the taking thereof, to haue made his passage betweene ÆGYP and DAMASCO more safe. Of which his purpose king Baldwin hauing knowledge, and taught by the euill successe of late, to what small purpose it was to commit the managing of his wars vnto a generall so euill beloued, and lesse regarded, as was Guy his brother in law; sent against him with his armie Raymund the countie of TRIPOLIS, the old gouernour, whom he had againe restored vnto the government, and displaced Guy. Of whose comming Saladin hearing, raised his siege after he had lien there a moneth, and so departed.

A little before this expedition, the king still growing sicker and sicker, his foule disease still increasing, by the common consent of the nobilitie appointed Baldwin his nephew by his sister Sybilla, a child but of five yeares old, to succeed him in the kingdome; and the countie of TRIPOLIS to haue the government of the state during the time of his minoritie. This Sybilla the kings sister, was first married to William the yoonger, marquisse of MOUNT-FERRAT, who dying within three months after, left her with child with this his posthumus sonne Baldwin, now by his vnkle deputed vnto the hope of the kingdome. After whose death she was married to Guy Lusignan, countie of IOPPA and ASCALON, the late gouernour: who taking in euill part this the kings designement, especially for the government of the kingdome by the countie of TRIPOLIS; departed from the court as a man discontented vnto his cite of ASCALON: whereof the Patriarch and the princes of the sacred war, fearing (and that not without cause) great danger to ensue, came to the king, then holding a parliament at the cite of ACON, most humbly requesting him for auoiding of further danger and the safetie of his kingdome, to receiue againe into his fauour the countie Guy his brother in law, and to make an attonement betwixt him and the countie of TRIPOLIS. But this their request forced to no purpose, so that the parliament was dissolved without any thing for the good of the commonweale in that point concluded.

Discord in the court of Hieru-salem.

After that time the kingdome of HIERUSALEM began still more and more to decline. In the old king Baldwin (sicke both in bodie and mind) was almost no hope: in the yoong king (yet vnfit for so great a burthen) much lesse: and the dissention betwixt the two counties Guy and

Christian princes of the West for aid.

Raymund with their fauorits, was like enough to bring great harme vnto the state. Besides that, the countie of TRIPO LIS seating the power of Guy his enemy, was thought to haue secret intelligence with Saladin the Turke, in so much that the king was almost in purpose to haue proclaimed him traitour. Wherefore the king now rested onely vpon the counsell of William archbishop of TYRB, and the masters of the knights of the sacred war: by whose aduise he sent Heraclius Patriarch of HIERUSALEM, Roger Molins master of the knights of S. Iohns, and Arnold master of the Templars, embassadours vnto Lucius the third, then Pope, vnto Fredericke the emperour, Philip the French king, and Henrie the second king of ENGLAND; to declare vnto them the dangerous state of that Christian kingdome, and to craue their aid against the infidels. These embassadours comming to the Counsell then holden at VERONA, with great grauitie and diligence in the presence of the Pope and of the emperour, declared the hard estate of the Christians of the East, with their humble request vnto them for aid: in such sort that they moued them, with all the princes there present, to compassion. From thence they were by the Pope directed vnto Philip the French king, with whom hauing dispatched their affaires, they from him passed ouer into ENGLAND, & afterward into GERMANYE: and had at length brought their negotiation to so good passe, that in euerie place great preparation was made for a great expedition to be vnderaken against the Turks, for the reliefe of the Christians in the East: with which good newes, the embassadours returning to HIERUSALEM, filled the sicke king with the hope of great matters. But greater quarrels shortly after arising betwixt the Pope and the emperour; and sharpe war likewise betwixt the French king and the king of ENGLAND, and the other Christian princes also being at no better quiet, the notable expedition that had with the expectation thereof so filled the world, was againe laid aside and quite dashed. Whereof king Baldwin vnderstanding both by messengers and letters from his friends, oppressed with grieue and heauinesse, more than with the force of his discafe (a man for his prowesse and painefullnesse not inferior to any his predecessours) died without issue the 16 day of May, in the yeare 1185, being but siue and twentie yeares old, whereof he had reigned twelue. His bodie was afterward with the generall mourning of his subjects, solemnly buried in the temple neere vnto the mount CALVARY, together with his predecessours the kings of HIERUSALEM.

King Baldwin thus buried, Baldwin the fift of that name, yet but a boy, was crowned king. But then began the sparks, which had of long lien raked vp & hidden in the ashes, to break out into a great fire: For Raymund countie of TRIPO LIS, contended the whole gouernment of the kingdome, & tuition of the king, to be due vnto him, by the appointment of the late king & consent of the nobilitie; and did so much, that he had almost obtained it to haue bene confirmed vnto him in open parliament. But Sybilla, a woman of a most haughty spirit (sister vnto the late king, & mother vnto the yoong king yet liuing) prickt forward her husband Guy, in no case to giue place vnto his competitor Raymund: and so animated him, that by the helpe of his owne fauorits, and the countenance of Boniface marquisse of MOVNT-FERRAT, who euen then was come with a great power into SIRIA, he extorted from the nobilitie whatsoever hee desired. But seven moneths were scarce well passed, but that this yoong king Baldwin was dead and buried: poisoned (as was reported) by his mother, for the desire shee had of the kingdome her selfe: whose death she with all secretie concealed, vntill she had obtained of the Patriarch and other princes of the kingdome, that Guy her husband might be proclaimed king: So by her meanes it was so wrought, that vpon one and the selfe same day, the yoong king Baldwin was buried by his vncle, and Guy the countie crowned. This yoong king Baldwin by reason of his tender yeares and short raigne, is of some not reckoned amongst the kings of HIERUSALEM: howbeit, seeing he was by his vncle and the princes of that time, thought woorthy of the kingdome, let him also haue his place amongst the rest, as the eight king of HIERUSALEM.

When Guy was thus possessed of the kingdome, the countie of TRIPO LIS seeing himselfe out of all hope of the gouernment, and highly therewith discontented, did what he might by all meanes to crosse the doings of the king: whose sicke and aspiring mind Saladin prickt dayly more and more forward, promising him his helping hand whensoever hee should need; which countie the countie desirously imbraced. For now the fatall period of the kingdome of HIERUSALEM drew fast on, and all things tended to destruction, discord raigning in euerie place: which Saladin well perceiuing (after that he had compacted with the countie) by messengers sent of purpose, invited the Turks, Saracins, & Egyptians, as men agreeing in one and the same religion,

A gion, generally to take vp armes in so fit an oportunitie of the discord of the Christians, assuring them of great prey and spoile, besides the honour of the conquest. The citie of PTOLEMAIS was the place by him appointed, where all this power should meet: whether such a multitude of the barbarous Mahometanes (partly for the hatred of the Christian religion, partly for the hope of the rich spoile which Saladin had promised them) came flocking out of all places, that in short time there was met together about fiftie thousand horsemen, besides an infinit number of foot. And vnto such as could not safely passe by the borders of HIERUSALEM, to them the false countie gaue safe conduct, by the counties of TIBERIAS, NAZARETH, and GALILEY.

All the power of the infidels thus assembled, Saladin laid siege vnto the citie of PTOLEMAIS: which the Templars and the knights Hospitalers had notably fortified and strongly manned, (as before vnto them giuen by the kings of HIERUSALEM to defend against the infidels) and therein now were both the masters of both those honourable orders, with the whole flower of the knights of their profession. Vnto this citie, Saladin gaue a most terrible assault vpon May day in the morning, in the yeare 1187; which was by the Christians notably defended, and the enemy with great slaughter still beaten downe. In the heat of this assault, the two great masters falling out, with certaine troupes of their most readie horsemen, assailed the enemies campe, and bearing down all before them, raised there a great tumult: and by and by turning vpon the backs of them, that were assaulting the citie, made there an exceeding great slaughter. Infomuch, that Saladin dismayed, first with the confusion in his campe, and now with the suddain danger behind him, was glad to giue ouer the assault, and to turne his whole forces vpon them: where was fought a most bloodie and terrible battell. Amongst others that there fought, the countie of TRIPO LIS, now an enemy vnto God and his country, disguised in the habit of a Turke, notably helped the infidels, and meeting with the great master of the knights Hospitalers, vnhorred him, who surcharged with the waight of his armour, and oppressed with the multitude of his enemies, there died. Neuertheless, such was the valour of these woorthie men, and new succour still comming out of the citie, that Saladin hauing in that battell, and at the assault, lost fiftene thousand of his Turks, was glad with the rest to betake himselfe to flight. Neither was this so notable a victorie gained by the Christians without blood, most part of the woorthie knights Hospitalers being together with their grand master there slaine.

D Saladin by this ouerthrow perceiuing, that by open force he should not be able to doe much against the Christians, thought it good vnto his forces to joyne also pollicie. Wherein the false countie of TRIPO LIS was the man he thought best to make choice of, as his fittest instrument to worke by. Him hee compacted withall to seeke for grace at the king of HIERUSALEM his hands, as of his dread soueraigne, and after so long discord, to sue to be reconciled vnto him, as now wearie of the Turkes amitie, with whom he should make shew to be vterly fallen out. At which time also (to giue the matter the better grace) Saladin of purpose with a great armie came and besieged TIBERIAS, a citie of the counties iurisdiction: for the reliefe whereof, the traitorous countie craued aid of the king and the other princes of the sacred warre. Who with an armie, though not great, yet very well appointed, came according to his desire, & encamped neere vnto the fountaine of SOPHOR: where they had not long stayed, but that they met with the huge armie of the Turkes, being in number one hundred and twentie thousand horse, and one hundred and sixtie thousand foot: with whome they joyned a most sharpe and terrible battell: which by reason of the extremitie of the heat of the weather (it then being the twelfth of Iuly) and the approach of the night, was againe giuen ouer; both armies (as if it had been by consent) retreating. The next day the battell was againe begun, wherein the Turkes by the treason and shamefull flight of the false countie of TRIPO LIS, gained the victorie. In this battell Guy the king himselfe, with Gerard master of the Templars, Boniface marquisse of MONT-FERRAT, and diuers others, men of great marke, were taken prisoners. And to say the truth, in this battell was broken the whole strength of the Christians in the East.

F The Christian commonweale by the treason of the false countie thus betrayed vnto the Infidels, Saladin without any great resistance had the cities of PTOLEMAIS, BELIS, and BERRIVS deliuered vnto him: in all which places, he vsed his victorie with great moderation, not enforcing any Christian (more than the Latines) to depart thence, but suffering them there still to remaine, as before, yeelding vnto him their obedience, with such tribute as he had imposed vpon them. With like good fortune, he within the space of one moneth tooke all the port townes betwixt SIDON and ASCALON, alongst the sea coast, excepting only the auncient citie of TYRE; vnto the citie of ASCALON also he laid siege by the space of nine daies: but loath to stay the course of his victorie, by the valour of the defendants resolued there to spend their liues, hee departed thence, and marched directly vnto HIERUSALEM, the chiefe citie of that kingdom. And approaching the same, gaue summons thereunto, perswading the citizens yet whiles they had time to yeeld themselves, together with the citie, vnto his mercie. Which they refusing to doe, he inclosed the same with his armie, and by the space of foureteene dayes laid hard siege vnto it, leauing nothing vndone or vnattempted that might helpe for the gaining thereof. At which time the citizens considering the danger they were in, and that the strength of the kingdom with the flower of their chiuallie were in the late battell lost, and that they were not now to expect any forraigne aid, agreed vpon certaine conditions to yeeld vp the citie: which were, That such Christians as would, might remaine still, with their libertie and goods; and that such as would not, might in safetie depart, with so much of their goods as they could carie vpon their backs. These conditions being by Saladin granted, the holy citie was vnto him deliuered the second of October in the yeare 1187; after it had been by the Christians holden frō the time that it was by Godfrey of BULLON & other Christians woon, about 89 yeares. Saladin entring into the citie, prophaned first the temple of the Lord, conuerting it vnto the vse of his Mahometane superstition, the other churches he vsed as stables for his horses; onely the temple of the sepulchre, was by the Christians for a great summe of money redeemed and so kept vndefiled. The Latine Christians he thrust out of the citie, yet with leaue to carrie with them such things as they were able themselves to beare: who trauiailing with heauie burdens, but much more heauie hearts, some to TRIPOLES, some to TYRE, some to ANTIOCH (for onely these three cities were now left vnto the Christians in SYRIA) were by the false countie of TRIPOLES by the way lightened of their burthens, to the increasing of the heauinesse of their hearts, most of them being by him and his followers spoiled of that little they had by the mercie of their enemies saued in the ruine of their state.

Vnto the other Christians that were naturall Syrians, Greekes, Armenians, Georgians, and such like, Saladin appointed certaine places of the citie for them to dwell in, where some of their posteritie were long time after to be found. All the monumens of the Christians were by the barbarous Mahometanes and Turkes defaced, onely the sepulchre of our blessed Sauour Christ, with the monument of Godfrey of BULLON, and his brother Baldwin, for the reuerence of the men were by them spared. In these so great troubles, about twentie thousand of the Christians perished: amongst the rest, the countie of TRIPOLES was shortly after found dead in his bed, and (as some say) circumcised, a manifest token of his reuolt, not from the king onely, but from the Christian faith also.

HIERUSALEM thus woon, Saladin returned againe to the siege of ASCALON, which after he had by the space of tenne dayes most straitly besieged, was vnto him by composition deliuered: wherein amongst other things agreed vpon for the safe departure of the citizens, was comprised also, that he should freely set at libertie Guy the king, and Gerard master of the Templars, both before taken prisoners, as is before declared; which he afterward performed.

Thus the victorious Turke still vrging his good fortune, departing thence, attempted to haue taken TRIPOLES; but hauing made some prooffe of his owne forces, and the valour of the defendants, he was glad to giue ouer the siege, and to depart as he came. Marching thence with his armie, because he would leaue no place vnattempted, he laid siege vnto the citie of TYRE, where Conrad: marquisse of MONTFERRAT was a little before arriued with Isaack Angelus the Greeke emperours fleet, and a supplie of certaine companies of good fouldiors. Vnto which place were come great numbers of the poor distressed Christians fled from HIERUSALEM, and other places, so that the citie was full of men.

This citie Saladin most furiously assaulted, but was by the Christians notably repulsed, not without the great losse of his best fouldiors. At which time also the admirall of SICILIA dispatched his fleet at sea, and landing his forces, came vnlooked for vpon the backe of him: so that hauing his hands full before by them of the towne, and charged behind by these newcome enemies, he was glad to retire in such hast, as that he left his tents with all that therein was, vnto the spoile of the Christians.

Within a few daies after, Saladin hauing againe repaired his armie, invaded the countrey about

The famous city of Antioch betrayed vnto the Turkes.

- A about ANTIOCH: with fire and sword destroying whatsoever was subject to his furie, euen to the gates of the citie; but knowing that so strong a citie was not without great charge and long siege to be woon, he thought it good to make prooffe if it might by pollicie or corruption bee gained. Wherein he so cunningly dealt with the Patriarch, that he had by his meanes, the castle (otherwise almost impregnable) for gold betrayed vnto him. By meanes whereof, hee in short time became lord and master of that famous citie, (about ninetie yeares before hardly gained by the whole power of the Christians, after eleuen moneths siege) and with it fiftie and twentie cities, moe that depended of the fortune thereof, with all the prouinces belonging therunto, alwayes deemed to haue been the third part of the kingdom of HIERUSALEM.
- B The losse of this so great a citie, together with the ruine of the whole kingdom, had in short space filled euery corner of Christendome with the heauie report thereof. Wherewith the Christian princes of the West (namely Frederick the Getmane emperour, with Frederick his sonne duke of SUBVIA, Philip the French king, Henry the second, king of ENGLAND, Otto duke of BVRGUNDIE, Leopold duke of AUSTRIA, with many other great princes and prelates of GERMANIE, ITALIE, and other places) not a little moued, as also with the pittifull complaints of the embassadours at the same time sent from the distressed Christians; and the effectuall persuasions of Clement the third then Pope: promised, and all, or most part, indeed made great preparations; which they afterwards, though not all at once (as letted by other occasions) but at diuers times employed for the most part, with the danger of their owne persons against the Turks; for the reliefe of the poore oppressed Christians, and recouerie of the holy land: but with what success, shall hereafter God willing be declared.

Of which so great preparations made against him, Saladin not ignorant, set at libertie Guy the king of HIERUSALEM, whom contrarie to his promise made at ASCALON, hee had now detained a yeare in prison; yet before his enlargement exacting of him an oath, Never by force of armes afterwards to seeke to recouer his kingdom, or to reuenge the wrongs hee had sustained: hoping thereby to stay the comming of the other princes in his quarell. Which oath for all that, the Pope dispensed withall, as extorted by constraint from him, at such time as Saladin had longer detained him in prison than of right he should.

- Guy now at libertie, and yet in mind a king, came to TYRE, but could not be there receiued, the citizens hauing before sworn their obedience vnto Conrad: marquisse of MONTFERRAT, by whom they had been notably defended against the furie of Saladin. Wherefore departing thence with such power as he had, and the dispersed Christians daily repairing vnto him out of all parts of SYRIA, he came and besieged PTOLEMAIS: Where he had not long lien, but that first came vnto him the Venetian fleet, with them also of PISA, and after them the Flemmings with a fleet of fiftie saile, who all joyned their forces together for the winning of the citie. But whilest the Christians thus lay at the siege of PTOLEMAIS, came Saladin with a great armie to the reliefe of the besieged: where betwixt him and the Christians was fought a great bataille, wherein the Christians at the first had the better; but afterward fainting, and readie to flie, had there vndoubtedly receiued a notable ouerthrow, had not Geoffrey Lyssnan, the kings brother, (left for the guarding of the campe) in good time come in with new supplies: and not only staid their flight, but also repressed the farther pursuit of the fierce enemy, now almost in possession of the desired victorie. Neuerthelesse, there were two thousand Christians there slaine, and amongst them Gerard, master of the Templars. Saladin by that which was now done, perceiuing how hard a matter it would be for him by land to relieue his citie, sent for the fleet which he had strongly rigged vp at ALEXANDRIA, and so by force put new supplies both of men and victuals into the besieged citie. Wherewith the Turks encouraged, made often sallies vpon the Christians; and in despite of the Christian religion, whipped the image of Christ crucified, which they had for that purpose, in the sight of the Christians set vp vpon the top of the wall. With the same fleet also he so scoured the seas, that no victuals or new supplies of men could that way without great danger be brought vnto the campe; whereby such scarcitie and want of all things began shortly after to arise among the Christians, that some of them not able longer to indure the famine, fled vnto the Turkes campe, then lying not farre off, crying out for bread. Of which distresse in the campe of the Christians, Saladin knowing right well, both by such fugitiues as daily came ouer vnto him, and by his owne espials, yet made shew as if hee vnderstood nothing thereof: but suddainly rising with his armie (as doubtfull of his owne strength) departed, leauing his campe full of all manner of victuals. Whereof the Christians vnderstanding, and supposing him to haue for feare been gone indeed, in great numbers halted vnto the forsaken campe, as vnto a most desired prey: where, whilst they were gorging themselves, Saladin suddenly returning, and getting betwixt them and home, made of them a great slaughter. Nevertheless, the Christians hauing now lien before the citie six months, continued the siege all the Winter, ouercomming with patience the hardest difficulties, in hope of aid from the other Christian princes, whose comming they expected with the first of the next Spring: during which time, many an hot skirmish passed betwixt them and the Turkes both by sea and land.

Fredericke the emperor setteth forward towards the Holy land.

Whilst the Christians thus lay at the siege of Ptolemais, Frederick the emperor with diuers of the great Germane princes, and others, before resolved vpon an expedition for the recovery of the Holy land, and the reliefe of the distressed Christians in Syria: hauing now raised a great armie, furnished with all things necessarie for so long a journey, set forward from Ratis: Boghe, and so comming to Vienna, and passing through Hungaria, Bulgaria, and Thracia, arrived at length at Constantinople, where he was by Isack Angelus the emperor that then reigned, honourably entertained: but indeed more for feare and fashion sake than for any loue, or godd will: for that he after the suspicious manner of the Greekes, hauing in distrust so great a power of the Latine emperors, withheld rather for his absence, than his presence. And therefore ceased not in what he might to hasten his passage ouer into Asia, pretending for the colour thereof, The necessitie the Christians had of his present aid: So the emperor with his armie passing ouer the strait, and without resistance marching through the greatest part of the lesser Asia, entered into Lycania, where meeting with a great power of the Turkes, that were come from the Sultan of Iconium to stay his further passage, hee ouerthrew them in a great battell; and so marching directly on to Iconium, tooke it by force, and gaue the spoile thereof vnto his souldiers, in reuenge of the injuries before done vnto his vnckle the emperor Conrade, by the Sultan of that citie. Departing thence, and marching through Cilicia, he in another battell ouerthrew the Turkes, that hauing taken the straits of the mountaines had thought to haue staied his farther passage into Syria. After that he tooke the citie Philomelia, which the Sultan had strongly fortified, which he rased to the ground, and put to sword all the people therein, for that they contrarie to the law of nations, had slaine such messengers as he had sent vnto them for the summoning of the citie. In like manner he entered into the lesser Armenia, where he took the citie Meliten, and subdued all the countrey thereabouts: vnto the reliefe whereof, the Turkes comming with a most huge armie, were by him with an exceeding great slaughter ouerthrowne and put to flight. After that, entering into Comagena, and meeting with Saphadin, Saladin his sonne, with a great armie of the Turkes, he ouerthrew him in the plaine field, and discomfited his whole armie. But whilst he too eagerly pursueth the enemy he had then in chase, his horse foundring vnder him, as he passed the riuer Saleph, he was so ouerthrowne, and his foot hanging fast in his thirrop, drawne through the deepe riuer, and almost drowned; and at the farther side of the riuer was so plunged by his horse, at his landing, that he was taken vp for dead. Yet breathing a little, and casting his eyes vp to heauen, with much adoe he vttered these few words, Lord receive my soule: and so in the hands of them that tooke him vp, gaue vp the ghost, vnto the great griefe and hindrance of the Christian commonweale: for Saladin hearing of his approach, was so afraid of him, as that he began to doubt, not how to keepe that he had before won in Syria, but how to defend himselfe in Egypt. Thus miserably perished this worthy emperor, the tenth of Iune, in the yeare of grace 1190, being then of the age of seuentie yeares, whereof he had with much trouble reigned eight and thirtie. His dead bodie was caried along with the armie, and afterward with all funerall pompe buried in the cathedrall church at Tyre.

emperor's sonne chosen generall of the Christian
armie.*

Fredericke the emperor thus dead, Fredericke his sonne duke of Suevia, was by the generall consent of the princes in the armie chosen generall in his steed: vpon whom with the rest of the armie, yet mourning for the death of the emperor, the Turkes gaue a sudden and fierce charge, in hope so to haue ouerthrowne them: But finding greater resistance than they had before supposed, and hauing lost some of their men, they with like speed that they came, retired againe. Now began famine (one of the ordinarie attendants of great armies) to increase in the campe: for why, the Turkes for that purpose had before destroyed, or carried away all that was in the countrey, leauing nothing for the Christians more than the bare ground. Wherefore

- A Fredericke turning a little out of the way, came to Antioch, which was easily deliuered vnto him, and his hungrie souldiers well refreshed by the citizens, being as yet for the most part Christians. But he had not there staied past fifteene daies for the refreshing of his armie, but that the plague (the handmaid of famine and another scourge of the greatest multitudes) began to rage among his souldiers, in such sort, that he was glad with his armie to forsake the citie and to get him abroad againe into the open field: where forthwith newes was brought vnto him, that Dodequin generall of such forces as Saladin had sent for out of Egypt (which were not small) was by great journeis comming towards him: against whom he in good order set forward, with his fathers corse still carried in the midst of his armie. These two armies meeting together, and both willing to fight, joyned a great and doubtfull battell, fortune enclining now to the one side, and by and by to the other; the Christians exceeding their enemies in valour, and they then againe in number. At length the Christians in the vanguard began to retire; and they that seconded them were also hardly charged: when Fredericke mindfull of his fathers valour, with a troupe of valiant horsemen brake into the enemies battell, with such force, that the Turkes were glad to giue ground: after whom Leopold duke of Austria comming presently on with his footmen, brought such a feare vpon the whole armie of the Turkes, that they betooke themselves to speedie flight. In this battell were foure thousand of the enemies slaine, with small losse of the Christians; and about one thousand more taken prisoners, with fifteene of their ensignes. After which victorie, Fredericke marching further in Caelo-Syria, pacified Ladicea then in mutinie, and like to haue been deliuered vnto the Turkes. He also with a little labour tooke Berythus with diuers other cities of Syria, which before belonging vnto the kings of Hierusalem, were now reuolted vnto the Turkes. So afterward comming to Tyre, he there solemnly buried his father (dead, as is before said): & from thence certified Guy the king (still lying with the other Christian princes at the siege of Ptolemais) of his comming: who forthwith sent the Marques of Mont-Ferrat, with part of the fleet to transport him with his people that were left, by sea: for that by land he could not so safely haue come, being now but weake, for meeting with Saladin; who with a great armie lay still houering about his besieged citie, intentiue to all opportunitie. So was duke Fredericke with his souldiers yet left, safely by sea conducted from Tyre to the campe at Ptolemais, and there joyfully received by the king and the other princes, with the generall applaus of the whole campe.

In the meane time the Turkes sayling out of the citie of Ptolemais, had done great harme among the Christians, by whom they were not without some losse againe repulsd. But after the comming of duke Frederick and his Germans, it was thought good by the generall consent of all the great commanders in the armie, that the citie should be assaulted round: and to that purpose was euery mans regiment appointed what place to assaile. The king himselfe with the Templars and the Italians from Pisa, vndertooke that part of the citie which was toward the sea: vnto duke Frederick and his Germans was allotted all betwixt the bridge ouer the riuer Beie, and the bishops palace: the Venetians, Genowaies, and knights Hospitalers, were appointed vnto the rest of the wall as farre as the court of Raymond: the Friselanders, Flemings, and Hollanders, tooke vp all the rest of the wall vnto the sea side. Thus was the citie at once in euerie side assailed by the Christians, with such furie, as if they had thereon purposed to gage their whole forces; seeking by a thousand wounds, and a thousand kinds of death to haue by their scaling ladders, gained the top of the wals; the Turkes with no lesse courage still beating them down againe. But in the heat of this so dreadfull and desperat an assault, Saladin still houering aloofe, came now vpon the sudden & assailed the camp of the Christians, filling the same with feare and tumult: whose charge they that were left for the defence of the same, at the first notably receiued, but finding themselves too weake, began to giue ground; by which means the Turkes tooke certaine tents with some ensignes, and fired some other of the paulions of the Christians, hauing slaine somewhat more than an hundred of the defendants.

- F The Christians in the meane time little preuailling in the assault, & troubled with the danger of their campe, retired to the reliefe thereof. But the Turke perceiuing himselfe too weake for the whole power of the Christians, retired also; yet not with such hast, but that he had there almost lost himselfe. This notable assault was giuen the fourteenth of October: after which many light skirmishes passed betwixt the Christians and the Turkes, but more for bootie than for any other great purpose.

betwixt the Turks and the Christians.*

*Ptolemais assaulted by the

In the meane time, diuers great princes of the West that had vowed themselves vnto this sacred warre came thither, whose number rather increased the want of victuals than furthered the seruice. At which time also the discord betwixt Guy the king (whose wife and children were now dead) and Conrade marquisse of MONT-FERRAT (who had married Isabell the late queenes sister, by whom he pretended a claime vnto the title of the imaginarie kingdome) did much harme vnto the proceedings of the Christians: So pleasing a thing these haughtie stiles be vnto the losie minds of the ambitious. Shortly after the Christians yet lying at the siege, the contagion and famine still encreasing, it fortuned that duke Frederick fell sicke of the plague, whereof he died: and with the great mourning of the whole armie, was afterward solemnly buried fast by his father in the cathedrall church at Tyre. After whose death the Christians attempted no great matter against the citie, although they were oftentimes by the Turkes prouoked, but lay still strongly entrenched, expecting some greater aid from the princes of the West.

Now all the hope of the Christian affaires in SIRIA, and in the land of PALESTINE, rested vpon the coming of the two mightie princes, Philip the second of that name king of FRANCE, and Richard the first king of ENGLAND: who hauing agreed betwixt themselves, with their combined forces to relieue the distressed Christians of the East; and againe (if it were possible) to repaire the broken state of the kingdome of HIERSALEM, were now met together at MARSEILLES in PROVENCE. From whence the French king first departing with his fleet for CICILIA, and with a prosperous gale for certaine daies holding on his course, & now come nigh vnto the island; was by force of a furious tempest suddenly arising, so tossed and tumbled in the deepe, that many of his ships there perished, eaten vp of the sea; others by force of weather driuen vpon the sands and rocks, were there broken all to pieces; and the rest some with their masts broken, some with their tacklings and sailes rent, and all in generall fore weatherbeaten, with much adoe arrived at MESSANA the desired port: at which place king Richard afterwards (but with better fortune) arrived with his fleet also. Both the kings now met together, resolved there to winter: the French king enforced by necessity so to doe, for the repairing of the late losses he had receiued, as well in his people and prouision, as in his shipping; all which was to be relieved by new supplies out of FRANCE: and the king of ENGLAND staying to take order for the dowrie of his sister Joan (widow of William the late king of CICILIA) with Tancred the base sonne of Roger, that had now aspired vnto the kingdome of that island. About which matter great stirs arise betwixt king Richard the queenes brother, and Tancred the new king, in so much that it was like to haue broken out into open warre, had it not to the good contentment of king Richard bene otherwise taken vp, and so the controuersie ended. But whilst these two great kings thus wintered in this fruitfull island, and oftentimes as good friends met together, sometime for their disport, and sometime to confer of their so waightie affaires; the way (as was thought) to haue appeased all former displeasure, and to haue encreased loue: it fell out cleane contrarie, jealousy and distrust, not onely reuiuing the old, but also still raising new quarrels betwixt them, to the great hinderance of the common good by them intended: which may serue for a warning to all great princes, willing to continue in amitie & to hold a good opinion one of another. Neuer to see one the other; or comming so to an interview, nor to conuerse or stay long together: which as it is not often done without the danger of their persons, so can it not possibly be long continued, but that it will engender in themselves as well as in their followers, jealousy, enuie, hatred, and mistrust (as we haue before said) and hereafter in the course of this historie may appeare.

There was an old quarrell betwixt these two great kings, Richard and Philip, about Adela the French kings sister; whom Richard hauing before (his father yet living) affianced, had now rejected, as her whom his aged father Henrie the second had too familiarly vsed: and in steed of her, to the great disgrace of the French, espoused the ladie Berengaria, daughter to the king of NAVARR: which indignitie with diuers others, then arising betwixt the French and the English, as then with great heart burning smouldred vp in respect of the common cause then in hand, afterwards brake out againe, to the shamefull overthrow of this most honourable expedition, and lamentable disturbance of both realmes.

Winter past, and the Spring now come, the French king not altogether the best pleased: first loosed from MESSANA, and with his fleet in safetie arrived at PTOLEMAIS, where he was by the Christians, now the third yeere lying at the siege, so joyfully receiued, as if he had bene

A to them sent with succours from heauen. After whom, shortly after followed also king Richard; of whose fleet (by force of weather fore beaten & dispersed) two ships by the rage of the tempest driuen a ground vpon the coast of CYPRUS, were by the island people spoiled, and the men that in them had hardly escaped the danger of the sea, with most barbarous inhumanitie, some slaine and some taken prisoners: the rest of the fleet arriving there also, were with like inciuillitie forbidden to land; the Cipriots readie at hand in all places to keepe them off. With which so great an indignitie the king iustly moued; and by force landing his people, with incredible celeritie and successe ouerran the whole island, neuer ceasing vntill he had made a full conquest thereof, and taken Isaack Comnenus, commonly called the king of that island, and of some (for what reason I know not) emperor of the Griffons, prisoner: yet was he indeed neither king nor emperor, but being a man of great nobilitie and power, and of the honourable stocke of the Comneni, had in the troublesome raigne of Andronicus Comnenus the emperor, his cousin, laid hold vpon that fruitfull island, and there tyrannized as a reputed king; vntill that now he was by king Richard taken prisoner, and for his vnfaithfull dealing sent fast bound in chaines of siluer into SIRIA. The king thus possessed of the whole island, there at LIMOZIN married the ladie Berengaria the king of *NAVARR*s daughter, brought thither by Joan late queene of CICILIA, the kings sister. And so disposing as he thought best of all things for the safe keeping of the island, he forthward againe with his fleet towards SIRIA. Where by the way he light vpon a great ship of the Sultans, laded with victuals & other warlike prouisions for the reliefe of the besieged; all which became a prey vnto him. So holding on his course, hee at length arrived at PTOLEMAIS, where he was by the French king, and the rest of the Christians there lying, most honorably receiued.

Now had the citie of PTOLEMAIS bene three yeares besieged by the Christians, and notably defended by the Turkes: during which time many an hot assault and bloodie skirmish had passed betwixt them. And now the eies of all men were fixed vpon the two kings of ENGLAND and FRANCE, vnto whom all the rest offered their obedience and seruice. The Christian campe was great, composed especially of Englishmen, Frenchmen, Italians, and Almaines; not them that were left of the emperor Frederick his armie (for they were for the most part dead, or else returned home againe into their countries) but of such as (moued with the zeale they bare vnto this religious war) came dayly in great numbers thither: as did also many others of diuers nations, desirous in some measure to be partakers of so honourable a war.

These religious and vertuous Christians thus lying at the siege, had with much painefull labour vndermined one of the greatest towres of the citie, called the Accursed Towre, with some part of the wall also, by meanes whereof they were in hope to find a way into the citie. Wherefore all things being now in a readinesse for the firing of the mine, it was thought good by generall consent, that an assault should also at the same time be giuen vnto the citie. And thereupon euery regiment was by lot appointed which part of the wall to assaile, which they all with great courage vndertookey. In the heat of which assault, the aforesaid vndermined towre with some part of the wall (the timber whereon it staid, now burnt) fell down with a great fall, laying open a fair breach for the Christians to enter. Wherewith the Turkes dismayed, forthwith craued to come to parle: which graunted, they for safegard of their liues yielded forthwith to giue vp the citie, and to restore vnto the Christians the Holy Crosse, with two thousand captiues, and two hundred horsemen, such as they should require of all them that were in the power of Saladin; besides 200000 Constantinopolitane duckats, to bee by him giuen vnto the two kings, for the cost by them bestowed in the siege. For payment whereof, the Turkes in the citie were to remaine as hostages vnder the safe keeping of the Christians, so that if all the covenants aforesaid were not within fortie daies performed by Saladin, they should all for their liues be at the kings mercie. So was this strong citie, after it had been almost three yeares besieged, deliuered vp vnto the Christians the 12 of Iulie, in the yeare 1191. The first that entred were the Germanes of AUSTRIA, who as if they had been the only men by whose valour the citie had been won, at their first entrie presumptuously aduanced their ensignes vpon the top of the walls, to the great offence of all the rest of the Christian princes, but especially of king Richard, who not vnwoorthely for his princely courage commonly called Richard Cœur de Lyon, not brooking so proud an indignitie; caused the ensignes of Leopold their duke, to be puld downe, and soiled vnderfoot; which shortly after gaue him occasion of repentance, as shall be hereafter seene.

An old grudge betwixt Philip the French king and Richard king of England

The two kings possessed of the citie, deuided the same, with all the people and spoile thereof G betwixt them, without regard of the rest of the other noble Christians, that had sustained the whole trauaile of that long siege: for which cause most part of them, seeing themselves so deluded, withdrew themselves from them, & with one consent sent them word, That they would forsake them, except they were made partakers of the gaines, as they had beene of the paines. Which the two kings to content them, promised they should. Howbeit, they delayed so long their promises, that many worthie men, constrained by pouertie, departed discontented from them into their countries.

But long it was not, that this one citie, so lately gained, could containe these two great kings; whom two large kingdomes could not retaine in peace. For albeit that they were in bodie together present, and in one, and that a most honourable action, combined; yet were they in hearts H farre asunder, and their secret designs much different: enuie and distrust still reuiuing vnkindnes past, and ministring new matter of greater discontentments. King Richard, according to his noble nature, was of nothing more desirous, than to haue the warre continued, vntill they had made a full conquest of SYRIA & the land of PALESTINE; and for that cause requested the French king to bind himselfe together with him by solemne oath, there to stay yet three yeares, for the regaining of those countries. But he in mind long before estranged from king Richard, and in his deepe conceit plotting matters neerer home better fitting his purpose, would by no meanes be persuaded so to do; but still found one occasion or other for to colour his departure. And shortly after (as the French Chronicles report) falling extreemely sicke, he requested king Richard and the other Christian princes to come vnto him: vnto whom being come, he in few words declared his purpose of returne, as followeth:

I cannot (my lords) longer endure the inclemencie and intemperature of the aire in this extreame hot season. If my death might profit the Christian Religion, or any one of you, or the Christian commonweale; there should be no distemperature whatsoever, that could seperate me from you, or withdraw me from hence. But more may the life of one absent, serue and profit you, than the death of him present. I must of necessitie depart, yet at my departure I will leaue you five hundred men at armes, and tenne thousand footmen, the flower and choice of all the forces of Fraunce, vnder the conduct of my cousin Odo, duke of BVRGONDIE, vnto whom I will giue pay and intertainment, with a continuall supplie of all things for them necessarie. K

labours, and made his returne in France.

This excuse of the French kings, king Richard could not take in good part: but said, That it was apparant to all men, that he abandoned the warres in SYRIA, to returne into FRAVNC, for no other end or purpose, but the more easily to inuade the prouinces of GVIEEN and NORMANDIE, now disarmed of their garisons, and so subject to his mallice. Which point hee so virged, that the French king could haue no leaue with his honour to depart, vntill such time as he had by solemne oath bound himselfe vnto king Richard, not to attempt any thing, either by force or fraud against him, or any thing of his, vntill fiftie dayes were expired after king Richard his return home. Which how well it was by the French king obserued, I leaue it to the report of the histories of that time. And so the French king, not to be intreated longer to stay, leauing behind him the aforesaid number of men he had promised, embarking the rest of his armie, and accompanied with three tall ships of the Genowayes his friends, and Ruffin Volta their admirall, departed from PTOLEMAIS to TYRE, the first of August; and two daies after, loosing thence alongst the coast of ASIA, and cutting through the Mediteranean, arrived at length in the mouth of the riuer of TYBER, and from thence went to ROME: where after he had visited Pope Celestine, and the famous places of that most renowned citie, he returned againe to his fleet, and so by sea arrived in sicilie in FRAVNC; hauing in that great expedition, so honourably by him intertained, performed nothing answerable to that the world looked for.

After the French king, followed Leopold duke of AUSTRIA, with his Germans: and not long M after him, the Venetians also, with them of PISA and GENOA. Of whose departure Saladin vnderstanding, and that the Christian forces were thereby much empaiied, refused either to pay the money, or to restore the prisoners, as was promised at the giuing vp of PTOLEMAIS: threatening moreouer to chop off the heads of all such Christian captiues as he had in his power, if the king should shew any extremitie vnto the pledges of the citie. Neuerthelesse, shortly after he sent his embassa-

A embassadours with great presents vnto the king, requesting a longer time for the sparing of his pledges; which his request, together with his gifts, the king refused to graunt or accept. Whereupon Saladin forthwith caused such Christian captiues as were in his power, to be belicaded: which albeit king Richard vnderstood, yet would hee not preuent the time before agreed vpon for the execution of his prisoners, being the 20 day of August: vpon which day hee caused the Turks prisoners, to the number of 2500 (or as the French and Germans write, to the number of 7000) in the sight of Saladins armie to be executed.

The losse of the strong towne of PTOLEMAIS, much empaiied the reputation of Saladin, euen among his owne people; as it commonly falleth out, that the euill successe of a great commander in his affaires, altereth the good will, affection, and opinion, especially of the vulgar sort; B which iudge of all things by the euent. And albeit that his losses were great, and such as much daunted him: yet he thought it best, as the case then stood, to make them greater, and with his owne hands (as it were) to ruinate and ouerthrow such townes and cities as he saw hee could not keepe, rather than to suffer them whole and vndefaced to fall into the enemies hand. So carried headlong with despair, he caused all the townes he had alongst the sea coast in SYRIA and PALESTINE, to be sacked and ruinated, and their wals ouerthrowne; especially such as were of most importance, and like to stand the Christians in stead, namely PORPHIRIA, CESAREA, IOPPA, ASCALON, GAZA, and ELAM, with diuers other castles and citadels in the countries thereabouts; most part whereof were againe by king Richard and the Templars fortified and repeopled, although Saladin in the meane time did what he might to haue letted the same.

C Nothing more hindred the good proceeding of the Christian princes, in this, and other their most honourable expeditions against the Infidels, than the discord among themselves; one still enuying at anothers honour, and every one jealous of his owne. Great strife and heart burning there had beene betwene the two kings of FRAVNC and ENGLAND, during the time they were together in this sacred expedition, to the great hinderance of the same: No lesse contention had there ben betwixt Guy the late king of IERUSALEM, and Conrad marques of MONTFERRAT, about the title of that lost kingdom: whereby the whole power of the Christians in SYRIA was deuided into two factions. Richard king of ENGLAND, Baldwin earle of FLAUNDERS, Henrie earle of CHAMPAINE, the knights Hospitallers of Saint Iohn, the Venetians, and Pisans, taking part with Guy: And Philip the french king, Odo duke of BURGONDIE, Rodolph earle of CLAREMONT, the Templers, the Genowayes, the Lantgraue of THURIN, Leopold duke of AVSTRIA, and Robert countie of NASSAU, taking part with Conrad the marques. But Conrad shortly after the taking of PTOLEMAIS being slaine, by two of the desperate Assassins, or (as some others say) by two desperate russians (suborned thereunto by the prince of TORONE, in reuenge of the dispite done vnto him by the said marques, by taking from him Isabell his espoused wife) as he was walking in his citie of TYRE and doubting no such treason: king Richard seeing now a fit occasion offered for the vtter extinguishing of that claime, and how to intitle himselfe vnto that kingdom; persuaded the aforesaid Isabell (the widow of the late Marques, and in whose right hee had laied claime vnto the kingdom) to relinquish that so troublesome a title, and to take to her husband Henrie earle of CHAMPAINE, his nephew, E vnto whom he gaue the citie of TYRE: Guy the king exclaiming to the contrarie, as of a wrong done vnto himselfe. Shortly after he began also to temper with Guy, persuading him to resigne vnto him that little right and interest hee had in the kingdom of IERUSALEM, and in lieu thereof to receiue at his hands the kingdom of CIPRUS. Which his offer the poore king was glad to accept. By which exchange Guy became king of CIPRUS: and Richard, king of IERUSALEM; which honorable title he afterwards, as some report, vsed in his stile, as did some others his successors the kings of ENGLAND after him. So Guy with all his wealth passing ouer into CIPRUS, took possession of the kingdom, where he long liued not. Neuerthelesse, that pleasant kingdom continued in his familie of the Lusignans, by the space of about 283 yeares afterwards: vntill that at length that familie failing in the posthumus sonne of Iames the bastard, last king of that Island, it fell into the hands of the Venetians: by whom it was holden as a part of their feignorie almost an hundred yeares, vntill that it was in our fresh remembrance again from them taken by Selymus the second, great emperour of the Turks, in the yeare 1571, as in the proesse of this historie shall in due place (God willing) be declared.

Now was king Richard, for the increase of his honour, more desirous than before of the citie

of Hierusalem, as the most precious and honourable prize of all that religious warre. And thereupon with all the power of the Christians then at his command, set forward from Ptolemais, and was come on his way as farre as Arsua, a towne situate betwixt Cesarea and Ioppe. In the vauward was king Richard himselfe, with the Englishmen: after whom followed Odo, duke of Burgundie, with his French: and in the rereward Jaques de Auenes, with the Flemmings, Brabanders, and Wallons, who after the death of their countie Philip at the siege of Ptolemais, had put themselves all vnder his regiment. Saladin with a great armie still at hand, and as it were attending vpon them, first with certaine ambuscadoes charged the rereward, and so afterward came on with his whole power: vpon whom Jaques turning himselfe, with his Flemmings, receiued the charge with great assurance, and so long themselves endured the same, vntill the French came in to their succours, and after them the English also. There was fought a notable battell, and great valour shewed both on the one side and the other, but especially by them of the Turkes part; who knew well the purpose of the Christians for the besieging of Hierusalem, and that thereon depended their only hope, and that hee that could hold the same, might almost assure himselfe to carrie away the glorie of that warre. The French and English in that battell honorably stroue who might shew the greatest valour: neither would the Low countrey men vnder Jaques their generall, seeme to bee any thing behind them. This sharpe conflict began about noone, and continued vntill the going downe of the Sunne. King Richard (as some write) was there wounded with an arrow; and Jaques valiantly there fighting, was slaine, hauing sold his life deere, to the great admiration of the infidels, and dying left the victorie vnto the Christians. It is reported, that in this battell were slaine moe Turks and Sarafins than in any one battell within the memorie of man before: of the Christians were not lost any great number, either any man of name, more than the aforesaid Jaques, the valiant generall of the Flemmings.

The next day the Christians remooued to Bethlem, a towne about the mid way betwixt Ioppe and Hierusalem. But Winter now coming fast on, and want of victuals like ynough to increase, the king changing his mind for the siege, returned with the greatest part of the armie to Ascalon, which he that Winter new fortified, the wals thereof being before by Saladin in his despaire demolished: the duke of Burgundie, with his Frenchmen, all that while quietly wintering at Tyre. In the meane time, the power of the Christians was that Winter greatly diminished, some one way departing from the campe, and some another: The Italians for the most part, with them of Pisa (who in these three yeares warres had struen with the Venetians for the honour of their seruice) were now returned home, as were the Venetians themselves also. Neuertheless, Winter now past, and the Spring time come, king Richard took the field againe, and came to Bethlem: where by the way hee met with an exceeding great number of cammels, charged with great store of victuals and munition, sent by Saladin out of Egypt to Hierusalem, all which he tooke. But purposing to haue gone on to the siege of Hierusalem, he was by the backwardnesse of the French glad to change his purpose, and to returne to Ptolemais: for the Frenchmen, perswaded by the duke their generall (who well knew the French kings mind) That if any thing woorth remembrance were done, it was to bee done by them, and that the glorie thereof should wholly redound vnto the king of England, as there in person present, and to his Englishmen; shewed themselves so vnwilling to the siege, as that therein was nothing done; to the great griefe of that worthy prince. At which time also news was brought vnto king Richard, How that Philip the French king (forgetfull of his solemne promise made before his departure out of Syria) had now invaded the countrey of Normandie, and excited earle John (the kings brother, a man of an haucie & aspiring nature) to take vpon him the kingdome of England in his absence: as had before in like case William the yonger brother serued duke Robert his elder brother, then absent at his fathers the Conquerours death, in the first facted expedition vnder Godfrey of Buillon. Wherefore king Richard, beside the present difficulties, fearing least while he was so far off in wars for defence of the Christian commonweale, he might lose his kingdome at home; thought it best to grow to some good end with Saladin, and so to make his returne. But the politicke and warie Sultan, not ignorant of the discord of the Christians, and that their forces daily decayed in Syria; either of the troubled estate of the kings affairs at home in his kingdome, or of his desire to returne; would not hearken to any other conditions of peace, but such as might both for the present, weaken the forces of the Christians in Syria, and discourage glad to change conditions to co clude a peace with Saladin,

A discourage others that had a mind to come thither afterward, while they should see that for naught they should trauell to conquer that, which in the end they must of necessity restore againe. The conditions he offered, were, That the Christians should forthwith restore what defect they had woon in those three yeares wars, Ptolemais only excepted; and that from thenceforth for the space of fife yeares the Turks should not in any thing molest the Christians, but to suffer them in peace to liue by them: which hard conditions (for that no better could be had) the King was glad to accept, and so concluded a peace. Whereby the labor and trauell of the two great kings, and so many nations with them, were all become frustrat and vaine; hauing now to no purpose lost their men, their money, their time, their hope, their blood, their long trauell, so that they must now in one houre forgoe; nothing more left vnto the poore Christians in Syria, than the cities of Antioch, Tyre, and Ptolemais.

B This done, king Richard leauing the affairs of Asia vnto the charge of Henrie countie of Champagne his nephew, shipping the greatest part of his people, with his wife Berengaria first for Sicilia and from thence for England, where they in safetie at length arrived, followed shortly after with some few himselfe; where by the way by extremitie of weather, he was in the Adriatique driuen to land vpon the coast of Histria: where traouelling with a small retinue homewards in the habit of a Templar, he was discovered and taken prisoner by Leopold duke of Austria, whom he had before disgraced at the winning of Ptolemais (as is before declared): who now glad to haue him in his power, made prize of him, and sold him to Henrie the emperor, for fortie thousand pounds; by whom he was kept prisoner by the space of a yeare and three months, and then ransomed for the summe of an hundred and fiftie thousand pounds.

C About this time died the great Sultan Saladin, the greatest terror of the Christians: who mindfull of mans fragilitie and the vanitie of worldly honours, commanded at the time of his death no solemnitie to be vsed at his buriall, but onely his shirt in manner of an ensigne, made fast vnto the point of a lance to be carried before his dead bodie as an ensigne; a plaine priest going before, and crying aloud vnto the people in this sort: Saladin Conquerour of the East, of all the greatnesse and riches hee had in his life; carrieth not with him after his death any thing more than his shirt. A fight woorthie so great a king, as wanted nothing to his eternall commendation, more than the true knowledge of his saluation in Christ Iesu. He reigned about sixteen yeares with great honour, and dying left nine sonnes, which were all murdered by Saphradin their vnkle, excepting one called also Saphradin Sultan of Aleppo, who by the fauour and support of his fathers good friends, saued himselfe from the treacherous practises of his vnkle. Of this Saphradin the vnkle, descended Aledin Sultan of Acre, and Coradin Sultan of Damascus and Hierusalem: Saladin his great kingdome being by them now againe rent in pieces.

The death of Saladin in short time bruiet abroad, with the discord amongst the Turks and Sarafins, about his domitions; put Celestinus (then Pope) in good hope, that the cite of Hierusalem might in that change and hurle, be easily againe recovered, and that kingdome established. But when hee had in vaine dealt to that purpose with the kings of France and England (then altogether busied in their wars the one against the other) he perswaded Henrie the sixt, then emperor, to take the matter in hand: who (for that he well could not, or else would not himselfe in person vnder take that long expedition) sent Henrie duke of Saxony his lieutenant with a great armie into Astat vnto whom were joynd two Legats, Conradus Archbisshop of Mentz another of the electours, and Conradus the bisshop of Hainbols. At which time also many other great princes tooke vpon them that holy war, namely, Herman Langraue of Thuringia, Henrie Palatine of Rhenus, Henrie duke of Brabant, Conrad marques of Moravia, Frederick duke of Austria, and Albertus Hapsburgensis, with some others: vnto whom also joynted themselves the bisshops of Breme, Halberstat, and Ratibon, and diuers other great prelates. Who hauing passed through Hungarie and Thracia, and by the Greeke emperor Alexius Angelus relictued with all things necessarie, were by the Gracian ships transported vnto Antioch, and so by land came to Tyre, and from thence to Ptolemais, with purpose to haue gone to relieue the Germans besieged in Tiber; who before their coming were all by treason slaine and the cite rased, wherefore being come to the ruins thereof, they departed thence to Sidon, which they found also abandoned by the Turks. After that they tooke Berithus, which cite they fortified, and so went to besiege TORONE; which citie when they had brought vnto the extremitie as that it must needs (as it was thought) either yeeld or bee taken, the Turkes came on so fast to the reliefe therof, that the Christians were glad to raise their siege and to be gone: which they in garrison at BERITHUS perceiuing, & seeing the enemy to approach them, they abandoned the citie, and ioyning themselves vnto the rest of the armie marched all together to IOFFE, a little before iui-nated, which they now againe fortified. But the enemy comming to BERITHUS, and finding it forsaken rased it downe to the ground, and so in few moneths space was BERITHUS both repaired and rased in the yeere 1197.

But whilest the Christians were repairing the citie of IOFFE, the Turks proud of that they had done at BERITHUS, came now to disturbe also the fortifying of that place. Of whose coming the Christians vnderstanding, remooued by night about five miles from the citie, of purpose to draw the Turks vnto a conuenient place for battell. The Turks thinking them to haue bene fled for feare, sent part of their armie to assaile the citie: and with the other followed after them disorderedly, as if it had bene after men they had had in chase. Vpon whom the Christians turning, had with them at the first a sharpe encounter, but afterwards put them to flight: in which conflict certaine thousands of the Turks fell; of whom the Christians taking the spoile, and hauing put the rest to flight, returned againe vnto the fortifying of the citie. But the joy of this victorie was by the sudden death of two of the greatest princes in the armie, greatly diminished: for the duke of SAXONIE hauing in the battell taken great paines in performing the parts both of a woorthie generall and valiant souldier, had ouer heated himselfe, and thereupon without regard of his health taking cold, died of a feauer the fourth day after. The duke of AUSTRIA mortally wounded in the battell, died also the night following.

About this time, or not long after, died Celestinus the pope, author of this expedition; and Henrie also the Germane emperour: after whose death great troubles began to arise in GERMANYE about the chusing of a new emperour. Whereof the bishop of MOGUNTIA, then chiefe commander of the armie of the Christians in SIRIA, one of the electors, and the other Germane princes with him hauing intelligence, could not by any persuation or prayers of the poore Christians (in whose quartell they were come) bee perswaded longer to stay, but that needs home they would goe. Indeed home they went the same way that they came. After whose departure the Turks tooke IOFFE, hauing one of the ports betraied vnto them by one of the citie, at such time as the Germanes were in garrison, after the manner of their countrey, vpon S. Martins day were carelesly making merrie together in their pots: vpon whom, so furcharged with wine, the Turks entring by the port giuen vnto them, put them all with the rest of the Christians to the sword, and so afterwards rased the citie downe to the ground: Of which victorie they became so proud, that they had thought without stop to haue driuen the Christians quite out of SIRIA: but by the coming of Simon countie of MONTFORT (a most valiant and expert capitaine sent thither by Philip the French king with a regiment of tall soldiers, at the instance of Innocentius Tertius that succeeded Celestinus in the papacie) and by ciuill discord their raigning among the Turks themselves for foueraigntie, their furie was repressed, and a peace betwixt them and the Christians concluded for the space of ten yeares; during which time the Turks promised not to molest the Christians in TYRE or PTOLEMAIS: which hapned in the yeere 1199 (or as some others say 1198.) After which peace so concluded, the woorthie countie returned again with his souldiers into FRANCE: with whom we also will repaire into the lesser ASIA (whither the course both of the time and of the historie now calleth vs) to see the other greater affaires of the Turks in those Eastern countie; leaving for a season these poore remainders off so many Christians in TYRE and PTOLEMAIS, now for a while in peace; but to be ere long deuoured of the infidels their enemies; as in the processe of this Historie shall in due time and place appeare.

The

The ruine of the Turks first Empire in Persia: with the successe of their second kingdome in the lesser ASIA
under the Adan Kings.

No kingdome or Empire vpon earth (were it neuer so flourishing or great) was euer yet so assured, but that in the reuolution of time, after the manner of other worldly things it hath as a sicke bodie been subject vnto many strange inuolutions and changes; and at length come to nothing: so fared it now with the Turkish empire, which first planted by Tangrolipix in PERSIA and the other far Eastern countie, increased by Acan his sonne, and so by the Turkish Sultans their successors (although their names and doings, as too faire off, be not vnto vs all knowne) for the space of one hundred and scientie yeeres continued, must now (I say) giue place vnto a greater power; and settle it selfe elsewhere, the ineuitable destinie thereof so requiring. It fortuned that about this time (when in the space of a few yeeres such mutations as had not before of long bene scene, chanced in diuers great monarchies and states) that the Tartars or rather Tatars, inhabiting the large, cold, and bare countie in the North side of ASIA (of all others a most barbarous, fierce, and needie nation) stirred vp by their owne wants, and the persuation of one Zingis (or as some call him, Cangis) holden amongst them for a great prophet, and now by them made their leader, and honoured with the name of Vlu-Chan, that is to say, the Mightie king (commonly called the great Cham) flocking together in number like the sand of the sea; and conquering first their poore neighbours of condition and qualitie like themselves, and easie enough to bee entreated with them to seeke their better fortune, like swarms of grasshoppers sent out to deuour the world: passed the high mountaine CAUCASUS, part of the mountaine Taurus of all the mountaines in the world the greatest, which beginning neere vnto the ARCHIPELAGO, and ending vpon the orientall OCEAN, and running through many great and famous kingdomes diuideth ASIA into two parts: ouer which great mountaine, one of the most assured bounders of nature, that had so many worlds of yeeres shut vp this rough and savage people, they now passing without number, and comming downe (as it were) into an other world, full of such natures pleasant delights as neuer were to them before scene, bare downe all before them as they went, nothing being now able to stand in their way. Old Zingis their fortunate leader dead in this so great an expedition, Hoccat his sonne, eldest of his twelue brethren, a man of great wisdome and courage, tooke vpon him his fathers place: who sending part of his great armie for the subduing of the countie Westward, turned himselfe with a world of people towards the East: where hauing subdued the Bactrians and Sogdians, with diuers others he entred into INDIA, and subduing that rich countie on both sides the riuer INDUS, euen to the East OCEAN, there in the countie of CATHAI built the famous citie of CAMBALU, in circuit eight and twentie miles about; for pleasure and plentie of all things necessarie for the life of man, of all the cities of ASIA the chiefe: where the great Cham of TARTARIE still resiant as in his imperiall citie, commaundeth ouer one of the greatest and strongest empires of the world. In whose kingdome also, in the prouince of MANGY more towards the East, hee hath another most famous citie called QUINSAY, of all the cities in the world the greatest, in circuit an hundred miles about, as M. Paulus Venetus writeth, who himselfe dwelt therein about the yeere 1260. It is situate in a lake of fresh water, and hath in it twelue thousand bridges: of which, some are of such an heighth that tall ships with their sailes vp may easily passe vnder them. In this populous citie the great Cham hath for the keeping thereof, alwaies thirtie thousand men in garrison. The Tartar kingdome thus planted in CAMBALU, Hoccat contenting

ting himselfe with the rich pleasures of INDIA, afterward manag'd his wars by his lieutenants, G being for the most part his brethren, or other his nigh kinsmen; of whom hee sent out with his armies some Northward, some Westward, and some toward the South: by whom he subdued the the Arachosians, Margians, and diuers other great nations, & entering into PERSIA, subdued the country, with all PARTHIA, ASSYRIA, MESOPOTAMIA, & MEDIA. At this time in the citie BALCH or BELCH, in the country of CHORASAN in the farthest part of PERSIA, reigned ouer the Turks one Curfumes, of the Greekes called Corsantes; who finding himselfe far too weake to stand before the Tartarians, fled with all his people, leaving vnto them both the citie and the country, which he and the Turks his predecessours had euer since the time of Tangrolipix possessed: which citie the Tartars raised and tooke the country to themselves. In this generall flight of the Turks, when as euery man was glad to make what shift he might for himselfe, Curfumes their Sultan died, the last of the kings of the Selzuccian family that reigned ouer the Turks in PERSIA: whose sonne Vngan Chan taking vpon him the leading of such multitudes of Turks as followed his father, seized vpon the great citie of BABYLON, now called BAGADAT, nere vnto the ruines of the old BABYLON: where hauing put to the sword all the inhabitants thereof, he there, and in the country thereabout seated himselfe with the Turks his followers: but long he had not there rested, but that the Tartars hearing thereof, pursued him, tooke him prisoner, & expelled thence all his people. There was at the same time also another kingdom of the Turks at NACHAN a citie in PERSIA, giuing name vnto the country wherein it stood, not farre from CHORASAN: wherein then reigned one Solyman of the Oguzian family, as had diuers other of his progenitors before him, who terrified with this dreadfull storme so suddenly risen out of the North, and warned by the sudden fall of the Selzuccian Sultan & his kingdome, of farre greater fame and power than himselfe or his, fled also with such his subjects as would follow him into the lesser ASIA. But of him and his proceedings more shall bee said hereafter in the rising of the victorious Othoman family, as lineally from him descended. After this the Tartars together with their good fortune still extending the bounds of their empire, conquered ARMENIA the greater, with the countries of CHOLCHIS and IBERIA: so that now their empire was become of all others the greatest and most flourishing. This great conquerour (the Tartar) had in his proud conceit purposed to haue subdued all ASIA, and to haue made the sea the onely bounder of his empire: but overcome with the delicacies of INDIA, hauing diuided amongst his people those great provinces and fruitfull countries, with the rich cities and pleasant fields, he so rested, embracing the maners and superstition of the people he had overcome. Long it were and farre from our purpose to recount all the famous victories and conquest of this bare Northern people; suffice it to the historie we haue in hand, that the Turks were by them then driuen out of PERSIA, with the countries thereabouts, and their Togran kingdome (as they call it) first founded by Tangrolipix, there extinguished, about the yeare of our Lord 1202. The Turks thus driuen out of PERSIA and their kingdome ouerthrowen, retired themselves into the lesser ASIA, possessed by the Turkes their countrymen, long before brought thither by Cutlu-Muses and his sonnes (as is before declared) and by them euer since in some part, though with diuers fortune, holden. Where these Turkes now arriuing out of PERSIA vnder the leading of Aladin, the sonne of Kei Husein, descended also of the Selzuccian family in PERSIA, and taking the opportunitee offered them by the mortall discord of the Latines with the Greekes, and the Greekes among themselves, seized vpon CILICIA with the countries thereabouts, and there first at SEBASTIA, and afterward at ICONIUM, erected their new kingdome; which of this Aladin is by the Turkes called the kingdome of the Aladin kings, although their names were not all so.

Now about this time, and within the course of some few yeares after, such great and strange mutations happened in the Constantinopolitane empire, as had not therein at any time before beene scene: whereby the whole estate of that great empire which sometime commanded ouer a great part of the world, was almost vtterly subuerted, and a fit opportunitee giuen vnto the Turks and infidels for the sure setting of themselves, and establishing of their kingdomes both in SYRIA and the lesser ASIA: which briefly to run thorow shall not be from our purpose; their affaires prospering by these troubles, and their proud and stately empire that now braueth all the rest of the world, being raised out of the ruines of that Christian empire; and at this present triumphing euen in the same imperiall citie wherein these so great innouations hapned through the

A the working of ambitious heads, to the lamentable ruine and destruction of a great part of the Christian commonweale.

Alexius the vsurper, but now emperor, not contented (as is before declared) traitorously to haue deprived Isaack his elder brother of his empire and sight together; sought also after the life of the young prince Alexius, his brothers sonne, and heire apparent of the empire: who seeing the villanie committed in the person of his father, saved himselfe by flight from the furie of his vncke, and so accompanied with certaine great lords of the Greekes, his fathers friends, fled to craue aid of the Christian princes of the West, whom the Greekes commonly call the Latins. And first he tooke his way to Philip the Germane emperor, who had married Irene his sister, the emperour Isaack his daughter, by whom he was most honourably receiued and entertained. This great ladie, not a little moued with the miserie of her father, and the flight of her brother, ceased not most instantly to sollicite the emperor her husband, not to leaue vnreueged so great a villanie, by the example thereof, dangerous vnto himselfe and others, of like maiestie and state. She declared vnto him, what an execrable indignitie it was, to see her father, the emperor, unworthely imprisoned, deprived of his empire, and sight, and of the societie of men, by his brother, that had by him receiued and recovered his life, his light, and his libertie: and to see the heire apparent of the empire banished by the wickednesse of his vncke, to wander vp and downe here and there like a beggar: a great part of which disgrace, as shee said, redounded vnto her selfe, the daughter of Isaack, and sister to the young wandering prince, and to himselfe also the sonne in law, vnto the vnfortunat emperor her father. Moreouer she said, that the murderer Alexius durst neuer haue beene so hardie as to commit so great and detestable a villanie, if he had not lightly regarded and contemned the maiestie of the said Philip: whom if he had had in any reuerence or honour, or at all feared, he durst not haue attempted so villanous an act. This Greeke ladie, moued with just griefe, with these and such like complaints so preuailed with her husband, that he promised her to be in some part thereof reueged, which he could not for the present performe, letted by the wars he then had with Otho his competitor of the empire. At the same time it fortuned, that great preparations were in making in FRANCE and ITALIE, and diuers other places of Christendome, for an expedition to be made against the Turks into the Holy land. The chiefe men wherein were Theobald countie of CHAMPAIGNE (a man of great fame, and generall of the Christian D armie) Boniface marquisse of MONT-FERRAT, Baldwin earle of FLANDERS and HENULT, and Henrie his brother earle of S. PAUL, Henrie duke of LOVAIN, Gualter earle of BREAME, with diuers other noble gentlemen, which to name were tedious; vnto whom resorted also many valiant and deuout Christians out of diuers parts of Christendome, ready to haue spent their liues in that so religious a war: so that now the number of them was great, and the armie right populous. But being thus assembled together, they thought it not best to take their way to CONSTANTINOPLE, through HUNGARIE and THRACE, and so to passe ouer into BITHYNIA; for that the Greekes had still in all former times shewed great vncourtesie vnto the Latins, in passing with their armies that way: and therefore they thought it much better now, by the way of ITALIA to take their journey by sea into the Holy land; and for their transportation, especially to vse the helpe of the Venetians, whom they found much the easier to be intreated, for that by the means also great an armie, they were in hope to scoure the Adriaticke (then much infested by the Dalmatians) as also to recouer IADERA, with some other cities vpon the coast of SCLAVONIA, before reuolted from their state to the Hungarians, as indeed they afterward did. But by the way as this armie was marching out of FRANCE, and come into PIERMONT, the noble countie of CHAMPAIGNE, generall thereof, there fell sick and died, to the exceeding griefe & sorrow of the whole armie: in whose stead, the marquisse of MONT-FERRAT, a man of great nobilitie, and well acquainted with the wars of the East, was chosen generall. This great armie, transported by the Venetians into SCLAVONIA, took IADERA, with diuers other port townes along the sea coast, and hauing there done what the Venetians most desired, was about again to haue ben embarked for SYRIA, and so into the holy land. But the yong prince Alexius in the meane time had by himselfe and the noble Grecians (fled with him for feare of the tyrant) so wrought the matter with the Latine princes of the West, especially with Innocentius tertius the Pope, with Philip the emperor his brother in law, and Philip the French king, that they pitying his estate, & induced also with some other considerations more proper vnto themselves, took him as it were into their protection, commending by letters & messengers for that purpose sent vnto the armie (which they might command) the defence both of himselfe and his cause: who with the commendation of three so great princes, comming G to the armie yet lying at IADERA (expecting but a faire wind for to haue passed into SYRIA) was there of them all most honorably receiued, as the sonne of an emperour, and as became one vnto them so highly commended. And he himselfe also, as one that knew his good, was not in any thing wanting vnto himselfe, but recommended himselfe to their protection, as a poore exiled prince in distresse, yet of a good and liuely spirit, gracious in speech, beautifull to behold, and very yong; and withall, fully instructed by the noble Grecians that were with him, in all things that might serue to further his purpose. And forasmuch as this great armie was composed of diuers nations, especially of the French, Italians, and Venetians, not all to be by one meane moued, he fitted every one of them with such motiues as hee thought might most preuaile with them: Vnto the French he promised to pay the great summes of mony they had borrowed of the Venetians, for the furnishing of themselves in this war: Vnto the Venetians he promised to recompence the for all the injuries they had sustained by the late Constantinopolitan emperours, especially by the emperor Emmanuel (who for that they had refused to aid him in his wars against William king of SYCILE, did in one day confiscate all the goods of the Venetian marchants within his empire, of a wonderfull value: & afterwards contrarie to the law of nations, shamefully intreated their embassadours sent vnto him, amongst whom was Henry Dandulus, now by fortune generall for the Venetians in the armie: who moued as well with the wrong in particular done vnto himselfe, as with the common, desired to be reuenged both of the one and of the other; which although he could not haue of Emanuel himselfe, being long before dead, yet was he still desirous to haue it of some one of the Greeke emperours, whosoeuer he were: Vnto the Pope and the Italians, both he and the noblemen with him, had before promised, That the Greeke Church should for euer acknowledge the supremacie of the church of ROME, and from thenceforth submit it selfe therunto, as vnto the soveraigne iudge of all the churches of Christendome: which caused the Pope Innocentius by letters, by legates, by embassadours, and by all other meanes possible, to further the cause of the yong prince Alexius, so combined with his owne: alleadging the diuersitie of opinions in matters of religion, betwixt the Greekes and the Latines, to haue been the chiefe cause that the Mahometanes had not been long agoe by their vniued forces subdued, or vtterly rooted out. In briebe, the yong prince spared not to promise most bountifull rewards in generall to all that should take his part against his vnle the usurping emperour.

By this meanes, the deuout warre, taken in hand for the reliefe of the poore Christians in SYRIA, was laid aside, and the same forces that should haue bene therein employed, now conuerted against the Greeke empire, to the great weakening of that side of the Christian commonweale, and aduantage of the common enemies; who might then easily haue bene oppressed, had he with the vniued forces of the Christians been on this side charged home, as he was on the farther by the Tartars. The Grecian warre thus resolued vpon, it seemed best vnto the great commanders of the armie, to march directly to CONSTANTINOPLE, as to the head of the Grecian state, and place where the tyrant whom they sought after, was resident. In the mean time it was by them given out through all the Greeke cities which the emperour had strongly manned and fortified for the staying of their passage, that their purpose was not to make warre against the Grecians their friends, but onely to restore their lawfull emperour vnto his former state and honour: And that forasmuch as euery cite and towne in ancient GREECE had appointed rewards, and almost diuine honors vnto such as had deliuered them from tyrants, they should now more fauourably receiue and intreat them that came to restore vnto euery cite, and to euery man in generall, their former libertie and honour. And so vpon the resolution for CONSTANTINOPLE, embarking their armie, and passing through the Ionian sea into the Egeum, and so without let through the straights of Helespontus into Propontis, and entering the straits of Bosphorus Thracius, which deuide EUROPE from ASIA, they came to an anker euen in the face of the cite. In this fleet were two hundred and fortie saile of tall ships, sixtie gallies, seuentie ships for burden, and one hundred and twentie saile of victualers: which all together made a most braue shew, couering that strait in such sort, as that it seemed rather a wood than a part of the sea. Thus for a space they lay facing the cite, attending if happily vpon the comming and sight of so great a fleet, and the report of so puissant an armie as the yong prince Alexius had brought with him, any tumult or sedition might arise in the cite. But the warie tyrant had so well provided therefore beforehand, that the citizens although they in heart fauoured the yong prince, and wished him him well, yet durst they not once moue or stirre in his quartell. Whilest the fleet thus lay, embassadours came from the isle of CRETE, in two great gallies, with three banks of oares, yeclding vnto the yong prince that goodly island, with all the townes and cities therein: which he forthwith gaue vnto the marquisse of MONTERRAY, generall of the armie, thereby to encourage the other great commanders of the armie to do the vttermost of their deuoir, in hope of recompence and rewards answerable to their deserts and valour.

Before the arriual of this fleet, Alexius the emperour had with a great chaine made fast the entrance of the hauen betwixt CONSTANTINOPLE and PERA, and appointed twentie great gallies well manned for the keeping thereof: but a great gale of wind arising, the generall sent out the greatest and strongest ship in the fleet (of her greatnesse and swiftnesse called the Eagle) which with all her sailes vp, carried with a full gale of wind, by maine force brake the chaine, and made a way for the rest of the fleet to enter: which the Greekes in the gallies seeing, for feare fled, leauing the gallies for a spoile vnto the Venetians, by whom they were all taken, but not a man found in them. The hauen thus gained, Theodorus Lascaris the emperours sonne in law, was presently readie vpon the shore with a select companie of the brauest gallants of the cite and of the court, to haue hindered the Latines from landing; who running their ships a ground, landed with such cheerefulness and courage, and with such hast, that in one moment you might haue seene them leape out of their ships, take land, enter into the battell, and lay about them like mad men. This hote skirmish endured a great while, for that they were onely footmen that sustained this brunt, for the horses could not so soone be landed, and the Greekes were brauely mounted. All this great fight the Constantinopolitans beheld, with doubtfull hearts expecting what should bee the euent thereof: There were in the cite sixtie thousand of the flower of Greece, which brauely falling out, made the battell much more doubtfull; yet such was the valour and resolution of the Latines, that in fine the Greekes discomfited, were glad to retire themselves againe into the cite; but with what losse, was not certainly knowne: ease it were to guesse, that it was right great; for that the old tyrant Alexius discouraged therewith, and doubtfull of his owne state, with Theodorus Lascaris his sonne in law, and some few others of his trustie friends (hard to be found in so dangerous a case) the next night following secretly fled out of the cite, carying away with him a wonderfull masse of treasure (which hee against all such euents had caused to bee secretly hidden by his daughter Irene, in a monastrie of Nuns within the cite, whereof she was the abbess) and so saved himselfe.

The flight of the tyrant once bruted, the next morning the Constantinopolitans taking the old emperour Isaack out of prison, saluted him againe for their emperour, rejoycing greatly for his deliuerance, and the safegard of his life: and after that opened the gates of the cite vnto the Latines, calling and saluting them by the names of the reuengers and sauours of the libertie of the Greekes, as also of the life and maiestie of their emperour; they requested them that they might see and salute Alexius their yong prince, whom they had so long desired: and so was the cite of CONSTANTINOPLE, by the submission of the citizens, for that time saved from sackage and spoile. The old emperour thus deliuered, and together with his sonne Alexius againe placed in the imperiall seat, gaue the most heartie thanks that possibly he could vnto the Latine princes, for that by their bountie, charitie, and valour, the Greeke empire had bene deliuered out of a long and miserable seruitude: and for his owne particular, that he had receiued of them so great good, that albeit his sight could not be restored to him againe, neuertheless, hee acknowledged his life, his libertie, his empire, his countrey, his sonne, to haue bene vnto him by them restored, and he likewise to them: for which their so great deserts he could not (as hee said) render them condigne thanks, or deuise rewards or honours answerable to their demerits and valour: and that therefore he did ratifie and confirme whatsoever his sonne had before promised vnto them for his deliuerance: and not onely that, but farther promised, That if they were not therewith contented, hee would of his owne bountie giue them better contentment, not meaning they should goe discontented, that had saved his life, and otherwise so highly pleased him. Hereupon this good old emperour began to consult with his friends about the meanes whereby he might satisfie and content the Latines in such things as the yong prince his sonne had vnto them promised. And to the intent that the citizens of CONSTANTINOPLE might the more willingly doe that he was to command them, and the more cheerefully pay such impositions as hee was to lay vpon them, hee intreated all the Latines to retire themselves out of the cite into their their campe or about their ships, which they accordingly did. But the imposition being set downe, and what euerie man was to pay, seemed vnto the Greeks (as men of long accustomed to receiue tribute of others, and not to pay tribute to others) a matter most heauie and intollerable. In this verie instant that this exaction was required, died the old emperour Isaack, who hauing of long beene kept in a darke and stinking prison in continuall feare of death, and now deliuered and restored to his empire, could not endure so sudden and vnexpected a change, both of the aire and of his manner of liuing, but so suddenly died.

At this exaction imposed for the contentment of the Latines, the light Constantinopolitans grieuouly murmured and exclaimed, saying, That it was a villanous thing to see the Greeke empire engaged and bound (by a yooing boy) vnto a couetous and proud nation, and so to bee spoiled and bared of coyne: That the great and rich island of Crete lying in the midst of the sea, was by him giuen as a gift vnto the Latines: That the cite of Constantinople and the Greeke church, had by him beene enforced and constrained to yeeld vnto the See of Rome, to receiue the opinions of the Latine church, to submit it selfe vnto the obeisance of old Rome, from whence it had once happily departed euer since the time that the empire was by Constantine the Great translated thence to them. Thus euerie one said for himselfe, in particular: thus all men said in generall. And therof the noble men in their assemblies, and the vulgar people in their meetings, grieuouly complained: whereupon a great sedition and tumult was raised in the cite. Some presently tooke vp armes, and the common people all enraged ran furiously disordered vnto the palace, with a purpose to haue committed some great outrage vpon the person of the yong emperour Alexius: who in that so sudden an insurrection, as might well haue troubled a right constant man, without longer stay resolved vpon a most wholesome and necessarie point for the appeasing of the peoples furie; vnto whom (assembled in a woonderfull multitude) he shewed himselfe from aboue in his pallas, promising them to remaine in their power, and not from thenceforth to do any thing without their aduice and liking; but wholly to depend vpon them: with which good words the people held themselves well content, and so was the tumult for that time appeased. But forthwith the yong emperour considering the iniurie done vnto him, began to burne with the desire of reuenge and to change his purpose. Hee could not together satisfie the citizens and the Latines: for if he would keepe his promise with the Latines, he must of necessitie offend his owne people; neither was there any meanes to bee found to satisfie both the one and the other. But thinking himselfe more bound to keepe his promise with the Latines, whose forces he knew not how to withstand, he sent secretly to request the marques of Mont-Ferrat, generall of the armie, to send him about midnight certaine companies of souldiers into the cite, assuring him to receiue them in by a gate nere vnto the pallas, which should be opened vnto them by certaine of his trustie seruants there left for that purpose. Of this plot Alexius Ducas (of his birtle browes surnamed Murzus, whom of a base fellow the emperour Isaack had promoted vnto the greatest honours of the court) was not ignorant, who being a man of an aspiring mind, and in these troublesome times hauing long thirsted after the empire, tooke now this occasion to worke vpon.

The night following, he by his agents, men instructed for the purpose, raised a tumult in the cite, not inferior vnto that which had happened the day before: and at the same instant, as if he had had nothing to do in the matter, came suddenly vnto the yong emperour in the dead time of the night (which he might at all times do, by reason of the great confidence the emperour had in him) and with a sad countenance told him, That the people were vp againe in an vprore, and especially they of his guard, and that they were comming towards him to do him some violence for the loue he bare vnto the Latines. With which vnexpected newes the yong emperour terrified, demanded of him as of his most faithfull counsellor, what were best in that case for him to doe? Who presently embracing him in his night gowne, lead him out by a secret dore into a tent hee had of his owne in the court, as if hee would there haue kept him safe: but far was that from his traitorous thoughts; who departing from him, as if he had gone to appease the tumult, had before taken order, That he should presently after his departure, be cast in bonds, and so be clapt vp into a close stinking prison. Which done, the false traitor openly shewing himselfe, made an oration vnto the people, wherein he shewed himselfe to haue great compassion of the Greeke empire, & of the Greeks his countrymen themselves, especially in that they were gouerned by a youth unfit for the gouernment, who suffered himselfe to be misse-led according to the pleasure

A pleasure of the Latines. And that it was high time for the cite of Constantinople, the seat of the Greeke empire, to looke about it, and to haue an eie vnto it selfe, sith it was betrayed & sold by them which ought to preferue and keepe the same: that they had now need of a man that loued his countrey and countrymen, before that which yet remained of the Græcian name were vterly extinguished by the Latines.

This his speech, fitted of purpose vnto the humour of the seditious, was receiued with the great outcrie and applause of the windie headed people: Some cried out that hee, and none but he, was to be made chiefe of the common weale that was by them to be established: other some cried as loud to haue him made generall of the armies and forces of the state: but the greatest crie was to haue him chosen and created emperour; whereunto the rest giuing place, hee was by the generall consent of the tumultuous people, without longer stay, chosen and proclaimed emperour.

Alexius the traitour, by no lawfull election or rightfull succession, but onely by the furie of the tumultuous people, thus created emperour; was of nothing more carefull than how to breake the forces of the Latines, of whom onely he now stood in dread. And therefore to begin withall, he first attempted by certaine gallies filled with pitch, flax, brimstone, and such like matter apt to take fire, to haue burnt the Venetian fleet: which gallies so set on fire & carried with a faire gale of wind amongst the fleet, had beene like enough to haue done great harme, had it not by the warinesse of the Venetians bene preuented: who being good sea men, & not vnacquainted with such deuises, easily and without danger auoided the same, by keeping themselves aloofe one from another in the sea. This finenesse forcing to no purpose, he to colour the matter sent certaine messengers to the generall, and other commanders of the armie, to giue them to vnderstand that that which was done for the firing of the fleet, had beene done without his priuie, by the malice of the tumultuous people; and that for his part he would be glad of their fauour and friendship, assuring them likewise of his, and promising them to aid them both with men and money, and whatsoever else they should haue need of in their wars against the infidels. Whereunto an answer was giuen by Dandulus the Venetian generall, That he would beleue it, when Alexis the sonne of the emperour Isaack, whom the Latines had placed in the empire, should assure them thereof, and intreat for the people, vpon whom the fault of that outrage was laid: which answer the more moued the traitorous tyrant, to rid himselfe cleane of the feare of the yong prince, by taking him out of the way; to the intent to hinder the people of the hope and great desire they had to grow to some peace with the Latines, by taking him out of prison, and receiuing him againe for their emperour: For the people (by nature mutable, and not desirous of the good of themselves, but according to the occurrences present, without any great regard of that they haue already done, or ought to haue done) began now to repent themselves of that they had done against the yong emperor Alexis in the fauour of the tyrant, and commonly said, That they must find some meanes, whatsoever it were, to remedie their fault together with their troubles. Wherefore Murzus fearing this sudden mutation of the people, with his owne hands most villanously strangled the yong prince Alexis in prison, hauing as yet not reigned much about six months, and immediately after caused it to be bruited abroad, That the said yong prince despairing of his estate, had as a man desperat hanged himselfe.

The tyrant in vaine hauing thus attempted the burning of the fleet, and still fearing the reuenging sword of the Latines, resolved now by plaine force to meet them in the field, and there to dare them battell. So hauing made readie and armed the whole strength of the imperiall cite, he with cheerefull speech encouraged his souldiers, requesting them valiantly to maintaine and defend their countrey of Greece, the monuments of their fathers, the glorie of their ancestors, their honour present, and the future hope of their posteritie: that hauing before their eyes the wals of their cite, within which they were borne, nourished, and brought vp in hope of great matters, they would haue pitie and compassion of their temples, their wiues, their children, and in no case to suffer them to fall againe into so miserable and wretched a seruitude, but rather to die a thousand deaths. And the more to grace this his enterprise taken in hand for the defence of his countrey (as he would haue the world to beleue it) with the colour of a superstitious deuotion also, hee caused the priests in their ecclesiastike attire and ornaments, to march forth in the armie, with an ensigne, hauing in it displayed the picture of the Virgin Marie. So couragiously marching forward, hee first charged that quarter of the campe where Baldwin win the countie of FLANDERS lay, where at the first was fought a right fierce and doubtfull battell. But afterward the alarm running throughout all the campe of the Latines, and new supplies comming in on euery side, the Greekes were put to the worse, and enforced againe to retire into the citie, hauing lost a great number of men, together with their superstitious ensigne. It was a wonderfull thing to see, with what rare agreement the Latines, being of diuers nations, continued this expedition vnderaken against the Greekes. Seuentie two daies was the citie of CON-STANTINOPLE straightly besieged by the Latines both by sea and land, without giuing any time of rest or repose day or night vnto the besieged, fresh men comming still on to the assault, as the other fell off, and in such sort troubled the Greekes in the citie, that they knew not well what to doe or which way to turne themselves. The Venetians, vnto whom was committed the charge to assault that side of the citie which was toward the haven, vpon two great galleies made fast together, built a strong tower of wood, higher than the wals and rampiers of the town, out of which they both with shot and fire-works much troubled the defendants, wherewith they in the time of the assault approaching the wall, by their fine deuises fired that side of the citie:

by the rage whereof, a great number of houses were burnt, with many other stately buildings and ancient monuments of that famous citie: and had at that present gained a great tower neere vnto the port, destitute of defenders, had not the tyrant himselfe in good time come with new supplies to the rescue thereof. In like manner, the French, with the rest, assailed the other side of the citie by land, where they were to fight not against the defendants onely, but against deepe ditches, high and strong wals, and bulwarkes also: neuertheless, such was the valour and furie of the Latines, with the desire of victorie, as that they were not with any difficulties to be dismayed; but pressing still on, by a thousand dangers, at length after a most sharpe assault they gained one of the greatest bastillions on that side of the citie, called the Angels tower, and so by plaine force opened a way both for themselves and the rest into the citie. Wherof Alexius vnderstanding, and stricke with present despaire both of his state and life, the night now comming on, fled with Euphrosina the emperour Alexius his wife, and Eudocia her daughter, whome hee had married when he had reigned about a moneth and 16 daies.

The tyrant, author of all this mischiefe and of the calamities ensuing, thus fled, and the Latines furiously entering; the priests and religious men in their surplices, and other ecclesiastique ornaments, with their crosses and banners (as in solemne procession) met the Latines, and falling downe at the souldiours feet, with floods of teares abundantly running downe their heauie countenances, besought them, but especially the captaines and commanders, to remember the condition of worldly things, and contenting themselves with the victorie, the glorie, the honour, the empire, the immortalitie of their name, to abstaine from slaughter, from burning, from spoiling and ransacking of so beautifull a citie: And that seeing they were themselves men, they would also haue pitie of men: and being themselves captaines and souldiours, they should also haue compassion vpon captaines and souldiours; who although they were not so valiant and fortunate as they were, yet neuertheless were both captaines and souldiours: And that they would keepe and preserve their citie, whereof (if they ruinated it not) they might haue much more pleasure and commoditie, than if they should destroy the same, which as it had been the principall seat of the Greeke empire, so might it now bee of the Latines: That seeing they had thereof had a carefull regard, as then belonging to another man, they ought now vpon better reason to haue more care thereof, being their owne: That the authors of all these troubles and mischiefes, Alexius the elder, and Atirzule, had already receiued a reward answerable to their follies, in that they were driven into exile: That they would haue pitie and compassion of an innocent and vnfortunat multitude of poore people, oppressed and grievously tormented with the often tyrannies of their murderous lords and gouernours: That in so doing, God the Lord of hostes, the giuer and guider of batels, the God of mercie, would therefore reward them: To conclude, they humbly besought them to pardon their citizens, to put on the hearts of gracious and mercifull lords and fathers, not of enemies and rough masters, of forgivers, not of reuengers: and to vnderstand by their teares, their miserable estate and woes passed. With this so humble a submission and complaint of the religious, some of the better sort were happely moued: but with the common sol-diors, breathing nothing but victorie, with their weapons in their hands, and the spoile of an empire in their power, what auailed prayers or teares? euery man fell to the spoile, and in so great choice and libertie of all things, fitted his owne disordered appetite, without respect of the wrong or

A or injurie done to others: onely from the effusion of innocent blood they abstained; they whose liues they sought after, being already fled, together with the tyrant. Other injuries and outrages (so great as that greater could none be) were in euery place so rife, that euery street, euery lane, euery corner of the citie was filled with mourning and heauinesse. There might a man haue seene noblemen earst of great honor, and reuerend for their hoarie haire, with other citizens of great wealth, thrust out of all they had, walking vp and downe the citie weeping and wringing their hands, as men forlorne, not knowing where to shroud their heads. Neither staid the greedie rage of the insolent souldiours within the wals of mens priuat houses, but brake out into the stately pallaces, temples, and churches of the Greekes also, where all was good prize, and nothing dedicated to the seruice of God; lest vnpolluted and defaced, no place vnsoiight, no corner vnrisht:
B right lamentable and almost incredible it were to report all the miseries of that time. Some of the Greeke Historiographers, men of great marke and place, and themselves eye witnesses and partakers of those euils, haue by their writings complained to all posteritie, of the insolencie of the Latines at the winning of the citie, to their eternall dishonour: but that disordered souldiours in all ages in the libertie of their insolent victorie, haue done such outrages, as honest minds abhorre to thinke vpon. Thus Constantinople, the most famous citie of the East, the seat and glorie of the Greeke empire, by the miserable ambition and dissention of the Greekes for soveraigntie fell into the hands of the Latines the twelfth of Aprill, in the yeare 1204, or after the account of others, 1200.

C CONSTANTINOPLE thus taken, and the tyrants put to flight, the princes and great commanders of the armie held a counsell, to consider what were best to be done concerning the citie and the new gained empire: for after so great a victorie, they thought it not good to raise so auen-cient and important a citie, feared as it were a watch tower vpon the theatre of the world, ouer-looking both ASIA and EUROPE from the one to the other, as an eye of the vniuersall; and so commodiously planted, as was no other citie of the world, for the keeping vnder of the enemies of the Christian Religion: but that it were much better to place there a Latine gouernour, to establish there the Latine lawes and customes; and to vnite the Greeke church as a member vnto the church of ROME. In which consultation, some were of opinion, not to haue any moe emperours in Christendome but one; and therefore to make choice of Philip the Germane em-perour, author of this warre, whose wife Irene was the onely daughter and heire of the late em-perour Isack Angelus, vnto whom by all right the inheritance of her fathers empire belonged.
D But the greater part, considering that the troubled affaires of GREECE, in so great a change and newnesse of the empire, had need of the personall presence of a prince, thought it better to make choice of one among themselves, who there still resiant in that place, might at all times giue aid vnto the Latines in their sacred warres, taken in hand against the infidels: which opinion as the better, was approued of them all. The cheefe men in this election of the new emperour, were Baldwin countie of FLANDERS and HAINAULT, Henry his brother, Lewis countie of BLOYS, Symon de Montfort, John de Dammartin, Gualter de Brienne, Hugh countie of S. Paul, E John countie of BRENNES, Bonsface marquis of MONT-FERRAT, Stephen countie of PERCH, and siue gentlemen of VENICE: vnto whom also were joynd two Bishops of SYRIA, the one of BETHLEM, the other of PTOLEMAIS, who had oftentimes come to the campe of the Latines to stirre them vp for the taking in hand of the sacred warre in SYRIA; with two bishops of FRANCE also, namely of SOISSONS and TROYES in CHAMPAGNE, &c. the abbot of LEMBLEY.
These great lords and prelates assembled into the church of the holy Apostles, after they had therewith great deuotion craued of God to inspire them with his spirit, for the choice of a good and just prince: fit for so great a charge; with one consent made choice of Baldwin countie of FLANDERS and HAINAULT for emperour of GREECE: a braue and valiant prince about two and thirtie yeeres old, who was afterward the sixteenth day of May in the yeare 1204 (or after the computation of others in the yeare 1205) in the great temple of S. Sophia solemnly F crowned by Thomas Maurocenus Venetian, first Patriarch of the Latines in CONSTANTI-NOPL. From which time the Greeke church in CONSTANTINOPLE began to receiue the rites and ceremonies of the Latines, and to acknowledge the supremacie of the church of ROME.

It was not long after that CONSTANTINOPLE was thus taken by the Latines, but that

himselfe, fled into THESSALIE, and from thence vnto Leo Scurus (then a man of great fame among the Greekes) who tyrannising at NAUPLUS, as had his father before him, was in these troublesome times growne greater by surprising of the two famous cities of ARGOS and CORINTH: by whose meanes he cunningly entrapped Alexius Ducas, surnamed Murzus the traitor; and for a secret grudge not commonly knowne, put out his eyes: himselfe an exiled man being a most heauie enemy vnto the other also exiled; and himselfe thrust out of the empire, a deadly foe vnto the other, oppressed with the like calamitie. Shortly after which losse of his sight, he was by chance taken by the Latines, and so brought backe to CONSTANTINOPLE, where he was for murdering the young emperor Alexius, worthily condemned vnto a strange and horrible kind of death: for, cast off from an high tower, and tumbling heeles ouer head downe, ward, he was with the waight of himselfe, and violence of the fall, crushed all to peeces, and so miserably died: a death too good for such a traitour. Not long after it fortun'd also, that Alexius himselfe wandering vp and downe in THRACIA, was by the marquisse of MONT-FERRAT going against SCYRVS, taken and stript of his great treasure, and whatsoeuer else hee had; and so sent away naked, long time after in beggers estate wandered about in ACHATA and PELOPONNESVS, now farre vnlike that Alexius which sometime proudly raigned in CONSTANTINOPLE: but such is the assurance of euill gotten honour. He hearing that Theodorus Lascaris, his sonne in law, raigned in ASIA, and there held the state of an emperor, rejoyced not thereat as a kind father in law, but inwardly greued thereat as an enemy, forie that any other but himselfe should be honoured with the title of the Greeke emperor: in which malicious humour he sayling out of GREECE into ASIA ouer the Ægeum, came secretly vnto the Turkes Sultan Iathatines his old acquaintance, then lying at ATTALIA, (which famous citie he had not long before taken from the Christians) vnto whom he declared his heauie estate, and how his empire had been rent from him, as well by the Greekes as the Latines; requesting, that by his meanes he might be restored againe into some part thereof, especially that in the lesser ASIA, which was by Theodorus Lascaris, together with the honour of the Greeke emperor, vnjustly (as he said) detained from him. This Iathatines, now Sultan of ICONIUM, was the younger sonne of Sultan Aladin; who not long suruiuing his father Cai-Chosroë, left his kingdome vnto his two sonnes, Azadin and Iassadin, of the Greekes called Azatines and Iathatines: where long it was not, but that these two brethren falling out for the foueraigntie (which admitteth no equalitye) Iathatines was by Azatines his elder brother driuen into exile, and for the safegard of his life glad to flie vnto this Alexius, then rainging at CONSTANTINOPLE, by whom he was honourably entertained, and as some write, conuerted and baptised. But Azatines the Sultan shortly after dying, this Iathatines returning home againe, and renouncing the Christian religion, was by the Turkes receiued for their Sultan: of whom the emperor Alexius in like extremitie now craueth aid. The Sultan not forgetfull of his owne troubles before passed, or of the kindeesse hee had receiued, and moued with the pitifull complaint of his old friend, together with his large offers, beside that he was in hope to share out some good part of whatsoeuer he got for himselfe; tooke him into his protection, and forthwith sent embassadours to Lascaris, threatening vnto him all extremities, except he did forthwith giue place vnto Alexius his father in law, vnto whom as vnto the Greeke emperor, those countries which were by him possessed, of right (as he said) appertained. With which vnexpected message, Theodorus was not a little troubled, as fearing both the Sultans power, and the inclination of the people to their old emperor. Neuerthelesse, hauing propounded the matter in counsell, and finding the minds of his subjects well affected towards him, and a readinesse in them in his quarrell to aduenture their liues; he encouraged therewith, accompanied onely with two thousand choise horsemen, together with the Sultans embassadour, without farther stay set forward to PHILADELPHIA: the Sultan at the same time with Alexius (whom he carried with him as a bait to deceive the people withall) and twentie thousand Turkes, besieging the citie of ANTIOCH, situate vpon the winding banks of the river MEANDER. Which the emperor Theodorus well vnderstanding, and that the Sultan by gaining that strong citie (standing vpon the passage of the great river, the bounder of his empire) should open a faire way for himselfe into the heart of ROMANIA ASIATICA, to the great hazard of his whole empire, resolved with those few he had, to doe what hee might to relieue his citie. And so setting forward vpon the spur, carrying nothing with him more than a little victuall: and now come neere vnto the citie, sent before the Sultans embassadour, following him

Antioch besieged by Iathatines.

A at the heeles. Who comming vnto the Sultan, and telling him of the emperours approach with so small a power, could hardly perswade him that it was so, although hee bound it with many oathes: yet at length perswaded of the truth of the matter, and that indeed it was so, hee in all haste put his armie in the best order he could vpon such a suddain, but not to his best aduantage, being hindered so to do, by the straitnesse of the place wherein he lay. Of the two thousand select horsemen in the emperours armie, were eight hundred Italians, all most resolute men, who giuing the first charge, brake through the midst of the Sultans armie, disordering his whole battell as they went; after whom followed also the Greekes, though not with like courage: but those Italian horsemen now deuied from the rest, & in number but few, in comming back againe, were by the disordered Turkes, some on horseback, some on foot, so beset on euery side, as that there was no way left for them to passe, but there valiantly fighting were altogether slaine, hauing both before and at the time of their death, made such a slaughter of the Turkes, as is hardly to be beleueed to haue been possible for so few men to haue made. The Greekes also hardly laied to by the Turkes, and discouraged by the slaughter of the Latines, were euen vpon the point to haue fled: when as the Sultan, now almost in possession of a certaine victorie, descrying the Greeke emperor, and trusting to his owne great strength, singled him out, being as readie as himselfe to meet him; when as at the first incounter, the Sultan with his horsemans mase gaue him such a blow vpon the head, as might haue killed a bull, so that the emperor therewith astonied, fell downe from his horse: who yet euen in the fall comming something againe vnto himselfe, and although dismounted, yet quickly recovering his feet, with his faulchion hoxed the hinder legs of the mare whereon the Sultan rid, being a most beautifull beast and of a woonderfull height; which now suddainly faultering vnder him, and so the Sultan tumbling downe as from an high tower, before he could recouer himselfe, had his head cut off by the emperor: which by and by put vpon a lance, and so holden vp, with the sight thereof so dismaied the Turkes, that stricken with a suddaine feare, they presently fled, leauing the victorie vnto the emperor, before more than halfe ouercome: who for all that considering his small number, durst no farther pursue them, but entering the citie, gaue thanks to God for so great a victorie. Vnto whom the Turkes shortly after sent their embassadours, and so vpon such reasonable conditions as it pleased him to set downe, concluded with him a peace. Alexius himselfe, author of these troubles, taken in this battell and carried to NICE, was by the emperor his son in law, notwithstanding his euill deserts, well intreated and vsed.

Whilest the Latins thus spend those forces in subuerting of the Greeke empire, which should haue been employed for the releefe of the Christians in SYRIA; and that the Greeke emperor Lyscaris was thus troubled with the Turkes; the affaires of the Christians in SYRIA and the Holy land, grew still worse and worse. Whereof the knights Hospitallers and Templars (the cheefe champions of the Christian religion in those countries) greatly blained Americus the king of CYPRUS, for that he being so neere at hand, and hauing married Isabella, the heire of that kingdome, and so in her right taken vpon him the title of the king of HERUSALEM, gaue himselfe wholly to pleasure, doing nothing for the defence or reliefe of the poore distressed Christians, or repressing of the Turkes: who although they were yet in league with the Christians there, and at some discord also among themselves, yet spared not, as occasion serued, still more and more to encroach vpon them, and by building of new castles & fortresses, to cut them short. Of all which things, the aforesaid knights by their embassadours certified Innocentius the Pope, requesting his fatherly care for the remedie therof; certifying him withall, That there was yet liuing one Mary, the daughter of the marquisse of MONT-FERRAT, a ladie of rare beautie, whom they as her tutors, had brought vp in hope of the kingdome; and now were readie to bestow her vpon some such man as he should thinke wortheie of her, together with the right she had vnto the kingdome. Herevpon Innocentius discharging Americus of the title of the kingdome of HERUSALEM, gaue it to John countie de Brene of DAUPHINIE in FRANCE, a man of great fame and valour, then in armes with the other Latin princes against the Greekes. Who now returning home, commended his earldome to his brother, and with such power as he was able to make, setting forward, came first to VENICE, where he was royally entertained: and from thence sayling to CONSTANTINOPLE, was with like honour receiued by the emperor Henry, and so at length the first of September arrived at PTOLHMAIS in SYRIA, where he was with the great rejoycing and applaue of the people receiued as their king. And the last of the same moneth marrying the aforesaid ladie Marie at Tyre, was there together with her with great solemnitie crowned king in the year 1209: which Americus the old king of Cyprus hearing, shortly after died for griefe. Neither wanted this noble gentleman, thus honoured with the title of a kingdome, some that eniued at his promotion, and therefore commonly called him in diuision, a king, but still with this addition, Sans Ville, that is to say, without a towne.

Now was the ten yeares peace before taken betwixt the Turkes and the Christians in Syria, at the coming ouer of Simon marquisse of Mont-Ferrat (as is before declared) almost expired: which had not so much giuen to those poore remnants of the Christians some time of rest and breathing, as had the discord of the Turkes among themselves; which hauing by the space of nine yeares continued betwixt Noradin and Saphadin for the foueraignetic, was now by the death of Saphadin ended. Noradin contenting himselfe with the gouernment of Aleppo: and Corradin and Meledin, the two sonnes of Saphadin, deuiding their fathers kingdome betwixt them, the one taking vnto himselfe Damasco and Syria, and the other the great kingdome of Egipt, but all enemies vnto the Christians.

About this time also, or not long after, Innocentius tertius, yet Pope, summoned a generall counsell to Lateran, whereunto besides a multitude of great bishops and other reuerend prelates, repaired also the honourable embassadours of most of the princes of Christendome: vnto whom so assembled, among other things was propounded the dangerous estate of the Christians in Syria, and how the same was by the helpe of the Christian princes of the West to bee relieved. Whereunto all the fathers and princes there assembled, easily gaue their consent: and thereupon were some appointed in euery countrey and prouince to publish this decree of the Counsell, for the reliefe of the oppressed Christians, and to stirre vp the deuout people, for the vndertaking of so religious a warre. The chiefe furtherers of this sacred expedition (to be thus taken in hand against the infidels) were the bishops of Germanie, especially the three great bishops of Mets, Cullen, and Trivers, whose example moued also many others, all which to rehearse were tedious. Out of France also were sent Henry the countie of Nivers, and one Gualter, the kings great chamberlaine, with a great number of the gallant youths of France, and so out of diuers other places also: So that at length such a number of men were met together at diuers ports of the Adriaticke, as made vp a fleet of two hundred saile: which with a prosperous wind carried ouer into Syria, arrived in safetie at Ptolemais, the chiefe cite of the Christians, now that Hierusalem was lost. After whom followed also Andrew, king of Hungarie, long before bound both by his fathers commandement and his owne promise, for the vndertaking of that sacred expedition: with whom came also Lewis duke of Bavaria, and Leopold duke of Austria, with their forces all well appointed: vnto whom also, John king of Hierusalem joined himselfe with his power. Great hope and expectation there was of some great matter to haue ben done, now that so great forces of the Christians were thus met together. Who setting forward from Ptolemais, & the first day marching into Gallilee, by the way met with certaine companies of the Turkes, whom they easily ouerthrew & put to flight. The next day they came to the riuer of Iordan, where they also distressed certaine of the Turkes garisons. There the king of Hungarie bathing himselfe in the riuer, forthwith (as one discharged of his vow & promise) returned with all his power vnto Ptolemais, & so from thence back again into his countie, all the rest of the army of the Christians crying out vnto him to the contrary: who after the kings departure still marching on, came to the mount Tabor. But shortly after, winter now coming on, and many of their cattell dying for cold and want of meat, they returned some to Ptolemais, some to Tyre, and there wintered. King John and the duke of Austria in the meane time tooke a castle betwixt Cesarea and Capha, called The castle of Pilgrims, from whence they much troubled the Barbarians thereabouts, all that winter. Vpon the appearance of the Spring, and the armie againe met together, it was thought best by all the great commanders (that for so much as the kingdome of Egipt was the chiefe maintenance of the Mahometan superstition against the Christians in those parts; and that so long as it stood vpright, they should not be able to do any great matter in Syria) to attempt the conquest thereof, as an exploit best becoming their valour, and so great preparations: for that that kingdome being once subdued, the cite of Hierusalem with all the land of Palestine, would of themselves without more adoe yeeld vnto them. And for as much as the famous cite of Damia, called in ancient time Pelusi, not much inferiour to Alex-

ANDRIA,

ANDRIA, was the first and most commodious port for their purpose, as neere vnto Syria, and that by the taking thereof, they should haue a faire entrance into the great riuer Nile, with the command of a most rich and pleasant countrey about it: they resolved to begin the warre: and thereupon embarking themselves with all things necessarie for so great an enterprise at Ptolemais, and carried with a faire wind, they in short time arrived at the desired port. Now that rich and ancient cite, the key of that side of the kingdome, stood about a mile from the sea, & somewhat distant also from the great riuer, enuironed with a nauigable ditch or cut, drawn out of the Nile, in manner of an island as a man commeth from Syria by land, and compassed about with three strong stone walls, the worke of the good emperor Aelius.

The situation of Damia in Aegyptus.

Pertinax, and of him as some affirme called also Aliopolis. At the mouth of this cit, as you should enter vnto the cite, stood a strong watch-towre for the defence thereof, and round about it a number of faire houses in manner of a prettie towne entrenched. Beside that, for the more safetie thereof, the same cut was barred with a great strong yron chaine, in such sort as that it was not possible for any ship, without breaking of the same, to enter. The Christians with their fleet entring the mouth of the riuer, and comming to this cut, by great strength brake the chaine; but thinking so to haue made their passage vnto the cite, they found a greater stay at the watch-towre, which strongly built of square stone, and well stored with warlike engines of all sorts, and a good garison of valiant souldiers, staied their further passage, ouerwhelming them as they approached, with shot, fire, stones, timber, and such like, before provided for that purpose.

The Christians (after the manner of the fight of that time) had vpon certaine flat vessels build certaine high towers of wood for the assailing of the watch-towre: in the approaching whereof, they were not only troubled with the enemy, but with the tumult and stir of their owne people also; some crying that they should yet draw neerer vnto the towre; other some crying out as fast, to haue the bridges cast out, whereby to enter: and the enemy likewise with much clamour encouraging one another for the repulsing of the Christians. So the souldiers hindred the mariners to do their businesse, and the mariners the souldiers. In the midst of this hurly burly and tumult, one of the wooden towers surmounting the rest in heighth, ouercharged with the presse of men, fell, and in falling made such a noise, as if heauen it selfe had fallen, where in a moment (as it were) was presently to be seene a most heauie spectacle: many ouerwhelmed with the falling of the towre lay there crushed to death; some grievously hurt, and yet not dead, lay oppressed with the timber, crying out for helpe; others bruised or hurt, but not ouerwhelmed, for feare of further harme, leapt some into the Nile, some aboard the other ships nere by, some crying out of his arme, some of his leg, some of his head or other part of his bodie, to the great discomfort of the rest, in so much that the assault was for that time giuen ouer.

King John (as well for his valour as for the title of the king of Hierusalem, chosen general of the armie) after he had appeased this tumult, and giuen the charge of them that were maimed or hurt, vnto skillfull surgeons, & buried the bodies of such as were found drowned or ouerwhelmed; with cheerefull speech encouraged the rest of his souldiers, perswading them not to bee discouraged with the accident of the fall of a towre, which was neither to be imputed to their cowardise, or the valour of the enemy, but onely to the chance of war.

In the meane time Meledin the Egyptian Sultan, had with a great armie encamped himselfe within the sight of Damia, thereby to encourage the besieged, and to fill them with hope of reliefe: sending them oftentimes by the riuer, newes, messages, victuals, souldiers, armour, and whatsoeuer else they wanted. The chiefe cause of his staying there, was to take occasion for the surprizing of the Christians, if any should be offered, either by chance or their owne negligence. Euery day some skirmish or other passed betwixt our men and the Barbarians, our men still carrying away the victorie: yet could these Barbarians neither be drawn forth vnto battell, neither could our men keepe them from victuals; for as much as they had the riuer of Nile at command, whereby victuals were out of the vpper part of Egipt in great abundance conueighed into the Sultans campe: Whereas on the contrarye part, the same riuer diuiding it selfe into many armes, in some places here and there overflowing, in another cut into many ditches and channels, and in some other pent vp by wals and caufies, gaue vnto our men a thousand displeasures. And therefore seeing that the Sultan would neither giue nor accept of battell, they resolved againe to lay siege to the towre. Wherefore hauing with great cunning, vpon two ships made fast together, framed a towre of most strong timber, equall in heighth vnto the watch-

tower, they brought the same neere vnto the Turks tower, and the suburbs adjoining thereunto, after which followed also all the rest of the fleet well appointed for the assault. At which time the all the rest of the armie at land, stood in battell ready ranged, as well to discourage them of the towne, as that the Sultan should not be able to helpe them without the hazarding of battell. There began a fierce and cruell assault; they of the suburbs right valiantly defending themselves against their enemies. Within these suburbs, the tower, and the trenches, dwelt not only Egyptians (the naturall inhabitants of the countrey) but also Arabians, Persians, Syrians, Indians, Moores, and Ethiopians, who were there resiant, for that, that cite was a publike mart wherunto all kind of marchandize were brought from faire out of the remotest parts of the world, and so from thence in like manner transported also: which encouraged them the more to fight for the defence of their liues and goods, the two things which men hold most deare: and in like sort animated our men vnto the assault, as well in the quarrell of the Christian religion, as to enrich themselves with the spoile of those rich nations. The Christians with their ships drew as neere as possibly they could vnto the land, to the intent that vpon the banke of the riuer, they might come to fight hand to hand, and man to man, and so come close vnto their enemies: But the Barbarians on the other side, fought by shot and all other means they could to keepe them farther off, and so from landing.

all of a Christian.

That which most feared the Egyptians, was that as one of our ships by chance ran a ground vpon that side of the riuer where the enemy lay, and being boarded by the enemy, thronging in as fast as he could, and there making a cruell slaughter: one of the Christian souldiers going downe vnder the hatches, made there a great hole, whereby the water abundantly comming in, sunke the ship before the enemy was aware, and so drowned a great number of the Egyptians; together with the Christians. At which time also the high towre built vpon the two ships, joyning now close vnto the watch-tower, and mating the same, dismayed the defendants with the strangeness thereof, as with a miracle, in such sort, that they stricken with a great feare, as now being to fight with a strange, hardie, and cruell kind of men, without any great resistance forsooke the towre and fled. The watch-towre thus taken, and they that should haue defended the same, some slaine, and some fled: they in the suburbs discouraged, and flying away were many of them wounded from aboue out of the watch-towre, but now gained by the Christians. At which time also the other ships landed the souldiers, who entering the suburbs, put all they found there to the sword, euen vnto the last man. There was found great abundance of victuals; but faire greater store of riches, in so much that it seemed to haue beene the spoile of ARABIA, PERSIA, and the rich INDIES.

vaine assaulted.

Now yet remained the strong towne of DAMIATA, which was forthwith assaulted by the Christians, more to prooue if in that heat and suddaine feare it would be yeilded, than for any hope they had by force to win it. But hauing done what they could both by scaling and by other engines, they gained nothing but hard blowes and wounds, and so retired. Neuerthelesse, they lodged themselves in the suburbs, and laied a great part of the armie betwixt the Sultan and the besieged cite, to the intent that no supplie or victuals should be brought vnto it; yet both the enemy oftentimes attempted to haue entered the cite, and the besieged to haue sallied out, but both the one and the other were letted to doe what they would haue done, and that not without the great losse of their men: for why, the towne was now on euery side so inclosed by the Christians, as that no man could enter in or out thereof. Whilest the Christians thus lay at the siege, it fortuned that the riuer of NILE swelling with a great Easterne wind, rose aboue the bankes, and so overflowed the places wherein the Christians lay, that they could keepe nothing drie, and that most part of their victuals were therewith spoiled. With which vnseasonable rising of the riuer the Christians not a little troubled, by commandement of Pelagius the Popes legate, gaue themselves to fasting and prayer, by the space of three daies: But the wind falling the fourth day, and the riuer againe decreasing, they gaue themselves more earnestly to prayer than before, thanking the Almighty, that as he had put them in a great feare, so he had in mercie againe comforted them.

Now with long lying began victuals to grow scant in the Sultans campe, so that he was glad to send away halfe of his armie vp againe into the countrey of CAIRE. At which time also it chanced (as if it had beene in an extreme and common danger of the Mahometan superstition) that embassadours sent from Corradin Sultan of DAMASCO and Hierusalem, vnto the princes

A ces of the Christian armie, came to sue for peace, both for himselfe and his brother the Egyptian Sultan, promising in regard thereof againe to restore vnto them the Holy crosse, and whatsoever else himselfe, his father, or Sultan Saladin had before taken from them: of which their offer, most part of the armie liked well, saying, That they had therefore taken vp armes for the recouerie of that which had beene before gotten, and gained by the valour of the worthy Christian captaines, and had of late beene taken from them; and to blot out the ignominie of the losse thereof, to the end it should not be said, that they could not leaue whole and entire vnto their children, what their fathers had got; when they had the keeping thereof; neither hauing lost it, be able againe to recouer it: that all these things being restored, there rested not any further occasion of waite, or let to stay them as most victorious conquerours to returne home. Neuerthelesse Pelagius, Pope Honorius his Legat (for Innocentius in the preparation of the wars was before dead at PERUSTUM) with king John, the masters of the knights Hospitalars and Templars, the duke of AUSTRIA, and the Germanis, were of opinion to the contrarie: alleging, That this sacred warre was vnderaken generally against the infidels, and for religions sake against the Mahometan superstition, whereof the kingdome of EGYPT was the chiefe seat and stay; and that therefore they ought especially to impune that. Which perswasion, together with the authoritie of the persuaders, so preuailed, that the Sultans large offers were rejected, and so the embassadours dispatched without any thing obtained of that they came for. Whereupon Corradin feareng that the Christians would at length come to HIERUSALEM, as the place they most desired; and doubting how he should be able to defend the same, forthwith rased the wals thereof, and the more to deface it, ouerthrew and pluckt downe most of the goodly houses, and other stately buildings therein, sparing yet the Tower of DAVID and the Holy Sepulchre; which he is said to haue done at the humble request and intercession of the Christians of diuers countreies, which yet dwelt there mixt with the Turks and Saracens.

unill refused.

Whilest the Christians thus lay at the siege of DAMIATA, the plague began to arise in the campe, whereof so many died, that it began to repent the great commanders of the armie that they had so much harkened to the perswasion of the Legate (a man making no profession of armes) rather than to the sound aduise of others, who by long experience taught the sudden alteration of matters of war, would willingly haue accepted of the Sultans large offers: So began D Pelagius the Legate to be generally euill spoken off. There were now already six moneths past since the beginning of the siege, and the Sultan lying in sight had not with him so great an armie as before, but onely the flower and choice of his people, hauing (as we haue before said) for want of victuals sent away the rest vp againe into the country. Now it fortuned that the Christians, as men wearie of the long siege, stood not so carefully vpon their guard, with watch & ward, as before, but gaue themselves more to ease: which the Sultan perceiuing, drew neerer vnto the towne, in hope vnder the couert of the silent night, to send new supplies vnto the besieged; which companies by him appointed for that seruice, courageously set forward, in hope to haue decciued the Christian sentinels, and so indeed came neere vnto the towne vnscene or discouered. And now the foremost of those companies were already entered the towne; when the Christians perceiuing them, and raising an alarme, put themselves in armes, and so furiously assailed the hindermost of them, and in such sort, that they which were before within, and those that were but now entered, fearing least the enemy in that hurly burly should pell mell enter in with the rest, shut them out of the gates, exposed to the butchery, where they were all presently cut in peeces.

Successes
vnto the besieged.

The Christians encouraged with this victorie, the next day leauing a great part of the armie before the towne to continue the siege, presented themselves before the Sultans campe to giue him battell: who for all that well considering that the losse of a battell might endanger the whole state of his kingdome, would by no means be drawne out of his trenches, but lay still; where-with the Christians, especially the Frenchmen (in their first charge naturally furious) greedily incouraged, attempted to haue forcibly entered their rampiers; but not with successe answerable to their courage. For the Egyptians perceiuing the small number of their enemies, notably requelled them, and in sine enforced them to retire, hauing lost Gualter one of their chiefe commanders, with diuers others: yea king John in assailing the camp, lost many of his men, & grievously burnt in his face, hardly escaped himselfe with life. After which discomfiture they resolued not to thinke of any thing els but of the siege, & about all things to provide that no succours should be brought

vnto the towne. They in the citie more straitly beset & besieged than before, & now brought vnto extreame necessitie & famine, & out of all hope of reliefe, assembled themselves to consult of their affaires, and what were best for them to doe in so dangerous a state: Some one or other of them by night or otherwise secretly flying into the campe. And that more was, the citie had vnto doubtedly beene yeilded by the greater part, had not the chiefe commanders within mured vp the gates, and commaunded that none of the inhabitants vpon paine of death should come vpon the wals, or rampiers, to the intent they should not get out or cast themselves from aboute vnder the wals into the ditches. The chiefe commanders and captaines went here and there vpon and downe the citie, to searce and view all things, especially the shops and storehouses, where finding small store of Wheat, they deuided it in small portions among themselves: the common people inforced with want, eat whatsoeuer came to hand, were it lawfull or vnlawfull, or forbidden by their superstition, wholsome or vnwholsome, good or bad, salt or fresh, roasted or raw; and so prolonged their liues with such things as they could find. Now the besieged, not able to endure these extremities of the Famine (being the passion that most grievously and often troubleth mankind) they were also attached with the wrath of God: for the Plague (the furie whereof had before attained the campe of the Christians, and afterward quite ceased) was now got into the citie, where it made a great slaughter: which mortalitie day by day in such sort increased, that men were not onely now no more to be found, to visit, comfort, succour, serue, and helpe the sick; but were wanting also to burie them, to draw them out of their beds and houses, and to seperate the liuing from the dead: the streets and houses full of dead bodies, gaue forth a most horrible stinke, with a most grievous and infectious aire: there was not any place cleare from the plague, or any man that could boast that he had not beene attained therewith, or the feare thereof; and remedie was there none. The rage and furie of these two deuourers, the Famine, and Plague, deuoured them without number, chusing rather so to die, than to submit themselves vnto their enemies; or to humble themselves so low, as to craue their fauour. That they within were thus pinched with famine, the Christians knew: but that the plague so raged among them, they knew not. Now the Christians had of purpose cast vp certaine trenches and barricades, for the keeping in of such as the famine should enforce to come out of the towne; thinking that the besieged, to ease their wants, would thrust the baser sort of the people and vnprofitable mouths out of the citie, vnto whom the Christians meant not to giue any passage: for they hauing long before so straitly enuironed the citie, as that no reliefe could be brought vnto it, lay now still expecting when the besieged, enforced by necessitie, should yeeld themselves; and so without losse of any man, to become masters of so strong and rich a towne. It was now more than a yeare that the Christians had thus lien at the siege of DAMIATA, when as certaine of the souldiours vpon a brauerie aduentured with a few scaling ladders to mount the wall: in which doing, finding no resistance, and withall hearing so great silence, as if there had beene no bodie within the citie; they stood still a great while hearkening, but seeing that dumbe silence still to continue, they returned vnto the campe, giuing the captaines to vnderstand how the matter stood; who at the first thought it to be some policie and finenesse of the deceitfull enemy: yet afterward they thought it good to aduenture certaine men, to proue their fortune, and to cause certaine companies well appointed to scale one of the bulwarkes of the citie, in such sort, as if they should haue gone against a puissant enemy, that had had the power to resist them. And hereupon were scaling ladders brought forth, and all things made readie, as for a great assault. So the Christians courageously mounting the ladders, without resistance tooke the bulwarke. But as they were entering farther into the towne, a small companie of the Turkes and Barbarians (all the souldiours that the furie of the plague had left, and they also with the famine and infection of the aire very weake and feeble) met them, and began to make some small resistance, but to no purpose, being forthwith all cut in pieces. Which done, the matter wherewith the gates of the citie were mured, was presently remoued, the gates set open, and the Christians with ensignes displayed let in. But euen at the very entering in at the gates, they were attained with a most greivous and horrible stinke, they saw a faire citie dispeopled, and that which was most fearefull to behold, the streets couered with bodies of the dead, and such a dreadfull desolation, as might moue euen the enemy himselfe to compalsion. The Christians were entred, as men appointed to haue done a great execution, and to haue made the channels run with blood, as men iustly prouoked with the long siege and the paines they had endured; they had their swords and weapons in their hands,

DAMIATA without resistance taken by the Christians.

DAMIATA was surprised by the Christians.

A hands, but found none against whom to vse them: for a man could not enter into any house, or goe into any street, but hee must passe ouer the dead, or others which being not yet altogether dead, were miserably drawing toward their end. Of seientie thousand persons in the citie, were not found about three thousand alieue, and those for the most part yet young children: for all the rest were dead, taken away either with the sword, famine, or the plague; the greatest part whereof lay yet stinking about the ground vnburied. These three thousand that were left, were so maigre and poore, that pitie it was to behold them: vnto whom their liues were graunted, vpon condition that they should make cleane the citie, and burie the dead, which they were three moneths in doing.

B Thus was DAMIATA taken by the Christians the fift day of Nouember, in the yeare 1221, after it had ben more than a yeare by them besieged. The spoile there taken was great, for besides the rich marchandise brought thither from farre, was found great store of gold, siluer, and precious stones. The Christians thus enriched (and the citie made cleane) staid there more than a yeare after, as in a Colonie wherein they had been willing to dwell, forgetfull of their owne countrey. In the beginning of these warres, the princes of the armie had with one consent agreed, That whatsoeuer citie or territorie should by them be taken from the Turkes or Infidels, should be giuen vnto the king of IERUSALEM, whom after the departure of the king of HUNGARIE they had made generall of the whole armie. But now that the citie was taken, Pelagius the legat, pretending, That by the vertue of his legation, it belonged vnto him to dispose of all things taken in that sacred warre, (as a man not vnmindfull of his matter) adjudged the citie from thenceforth to belong vnto the See of ROME: With which indignitie & wrong, the king inwardly discontented (and yet for the authoritie of the Legate, dissembling the matter) withdrew himselfe, and so retired to PTOLEMAIS.

C The yeare following, Pelagius went to see the armes of the Christians to corrupt with rust, and nothing doing: considering the desire and hope he had vtterly to haue ruined the infidels, together with their superstition, commaunded, That euery man should againe take vp armes for the prosecuting of this warre against the Sultan, and the besieging of CAIRE. But for all that, when he had commanded what he would, or could, the souldiours little regarding his command, with one voice cried out, That they would not be commanded by any, but by the king of IERUSALEM onely. So that the Legate, enforced by the souldiours, was glad to send vnto the king, to request him to returne againe vnto DAMIATA, and to take vpon him the charge for the managing of that warre, taken in hand for the defence of the Christian religion: who for all that excused himselfe from so doing, one while by his owne particular affaires, another while by his owne indisposition: yet in fine, pressed and overcome with the prayers and requests of the other Latine princes, he returned to DAMIATA, at the selfe same time that the duke of BAVARIA arrived there with a goodly companie of braue men, brought thither out of his owne countrey, after he had been now from thence ten moneths absent.

D The Legate desirous of the prosecution of this warre, requested and vrged the king, with the rest of the princes and great commanders, without delay to take the field, telling them, That the enterprife of the Holy warre was growne old, and cold, by those long delaias and protracting of the time: and that they which kept wars so far from home, ought to make hast to force the enemy, to take all occasions to lose no time but euer to be doing, and to proue all things for the annoyning of the enemy: and that that was the way, whereby the woorthies of ancient times, both kings and emperours, had gained vnto themselves empires, glorie, greatnesse, and wealth: That it was for them that were invaded and assailed, vpon whose liues depended the safetie of their countrey; their wiues, their children, and goods, to delay and prolong the time as they might, to delude the enemy, to frustrate his designs, to defeat his attempts, and with delaias to dally him off, vntill that hauing thereby weakned his forces, he should together with his courage loose also his hope: CAIRE (he said) to be indeed a great citie, but yet that the greatest cities that euer were, had by warres become great desarts, forced by the power of their puissant and speedie enemies: And that great empires, as were those of the Sultans, ought not to be invaded or assailed by any foraine force, if they were not at the first onset ouerthrowne, or at leastwise so weakned, as that they could not afterwards lift vp their heads or recouer themselves; for otherwise, that they which had prepared a destruction for others, should fall into the same themselves: That it behooued either not to haue attempted or assailed AEGYPT at all; or else now after it had beene

once assailed, not so to giue it ouer before it were conquered. The king of HIERUSALEM, whether it were that he were pricked with the grieke, That being called the king of the Holy land, he could not haue the citie of DAMIATA (vnder his leading and conduct woon by the Christians come to the sacred war) giuen vnto him by the Legate; or that he had before prouoed that the higher countrey of EGYPT was not without great and manifest danger to be attempted; said, That that he would not in any case go: allcasing that honorable and sacred war to haue been taken in hand, onely for the recouerie of the Holy land, and not for the winning of MEMPHIS, BABYLON, or THEBES in EGYPT; which after they were taken, would not for any long time continue in their fidelitie or allegiance, and could not possibly be kept by force: Whereas SYRIA, by Godfrey of BULLON and the other great princes his associates, entred into, conquered and possessed; and since his time, by diuers other Christian kings and princes holden, was in right their owne: And that therefore he greatly commended the forwardnesse, the diligence, the courage, the desire, and whatsoeuer thing else Pelagius commended: but that hee ought to employ the same in SYRIA, and not there where no need was, or from whence no profit was to be drawne or expected. Neuerthelesse the Legat wedded to his owne opinion, by the power of his authoritie, commanded the king of HIERUSALEM, the duke of BAVARIA, with the rest of the great commanders and capitaines, to take vp their armes and to get them into the field vpon the expedition by him appointed against the Sultan; threatening the paine of the high sentence of excommunication against him or them, that should shew themselves backward or unwilling to doe what he had commanded. So as it were enforced by the Legat, they began with euill will and woofle speed to set forward in August, in the verie hottest time of the yeare. At which time the Sultan beholding the great armie of the Christians, in number about seuentie thousand, retired as a man afraid into such places as he thought best, farther off: which the Legat seeing (as one not acquainted with the feare of war) rejoyced greatly, as if the victorie had bene already more than halfe gained; commending vnto the heavens them that he saw courageously marching forward, saying, That fortune alwaies fauoured the valiant, and that vnto cowards all things fell still out to the woorst. By the way the Christians seized vpon a bridge, which the enimie had made ouer the NILE, and cut in peeces such companies as were left for the keeping thereof. So marching on, they drew neere vnto CAIRE, and there in the sight of that great and rich citie, encamped: where running vp and downe, the more to terrifie them of the citie, prouoked them to battell, vpbraiding vnto them their lazines, their cowardise, and sloth, brauing them (if they were men) to come out: Yet for all that, they would not so do, but keeping themselves close and couert within the citie, let them alone to brag and boast at their owne pleasure. This siege continued long, of purpose protracted still from day to day by them of the citie: and the great opinion the Christians had of their owne valour, with the small regard they had of their enemies, made them so proud and carelesse, that they remembered no more to take good care of the warre, of their dutie, their watch, or their sentinels: their confidence was in their owne valour and good fortune, not considering or remembering that they were come into EGYPT, and that they had put themselves within the trenches, fallies, channels, and cuts, of a deceitfull riuer, which not only brought victuals vnto their enemies, but also fortified them; who by how much they were the lesse valiant and lesse vnderstood of the art of war, the more they vsed of craft and subtiltie for the preserving of themselves. So the craftie enemies drew the Christians out at length, abusing them with many delays and deceits; making semblance of great feare, to make themselves the lesse to be feared; and more contemptible in their doings, to the end that they knowing the passages and straights of the countrey, and reseruing themselves vnto the occasions and advantages both of the time, and of their enemies, might circumuent them and entrap them at such time as they least feared any such matter. The Christians, at all aduenture had encamped themselves in a low ground, within the banks and caues of that fennie countrey, vnder the couert thereof, thinking themselves safe as in their tenthes, against all sudden fallies or attempts of their enemies. But these places wherein they lay, were soft and durty, for so much as the countrey people vsed at their pleasure to water them by channels & flues out of the riuer of NILE: which now pluckt vp and opened, the riuer began to rise and overflow all. Then too late they perceived themselves taken as in a grin, without power to defend themselves, or to make any resistance, or by any other meanes to shew their valour. So the riuer still arising and overflowing, gaue vnto the Turks and Egyptians good hope of their wars, and of a victorie more desired than

A than hoped for ouer a warlike and victorious people. All the ground where the Christians lay encamped, was couered with water, so high that the victuals were corrupted, and no place left for a man to stand or lie drie in.

Now at the same time the Egyptians had taken the high places, with the passages vpon the wals and banks in that drowned countrey, to the intent that the Christians should not be able to retire or to saue themselves out of the bogs and marishes couered ouer with water. So was their rash valour and presumptuous confidence in themselves, exposed vnto the enemies shot and furie; and when they would by force haue defended themselves, their hardinesse was overcome by the craftie subtiltie of the weak enimie. Then began euery man to crie out against Pelagius the Legat, accusing, condemning, and railing at him: the king himselfe they blamed not, for that he had done his dutie, in dissuading of this expedition, and was contrarie to his good liking himselfe drawn into this warre, the charge whereof he had not without great intricacie taken vpon him: neither might he with his credit well complaine of this misfortune, least in so doing, he might seeme to haue had no comfort in himselfe. But as for the Legate, what counsell could he then giue, what counsell could hee then take for himselfe? They of VENICE, PISA, and GENOA, left at DAMIATA, were indeed strong at sea, but how could they come to relieue him at CAIRE? And how, or by what forces could the Christians breake out of the banks and flues of the cuts and channels; which winding in and out with a thousand inextricable turnings, inclosed them, beset also on euery side with the victorious enimie. After they had been thus couert vp, and enuironed with the waters three daies, you might haue seenie the poore soldiers in euery place fall downe dead for want of food and sleepe, and so perisha in the water; the like miserable kind of death, the rest were also in short time after to expect: other helpe was there none but to yeeld vnto necessitie, and to accept of such conditions as it should please the proud enimie to propound. Now the Sultan desired not so much their liues, as the libertie of his countrey: and therefore required to haue the citie of DAMIATA againe restored vnto him, and all things else in such sort as was before the besieging thereof: and so the Christians without more adoe to depart his countrey. Hard conditions, if a man respect the hope whereupon the Christians had vnderaken this war, and were so come into EGYPT, with the toyle by them there endured: but vnto him that will but enter into the consideration of mens affaires, and especially in martiall matters, it will seeme but an accident to be yeelded vnto, the like whereof hath oftentimes happened vnto the greatest men of the world. These conditions (such as they were) were by the distressed Christians accepted of. But when they were brought to DAMIATA, and there propounded vnto the Christians there left, a great contention began to arise among them: Some said that they would not accept of them, or surrender the towne, which being kept would be a stay for all the affaires of the Christians in the East, and a most commodious place for them to haue recourse vnto; but being restored and lost, carried away with it all the hope of the Christians, and that therefore it were better to indure all extremities than to receiue such dishonourable and hurtfull a peace. Others of the contrarie opinion said, That they ought not to forsake them that were in danger before CAIRE, nor to expose them vnto the butcherie, but to haue a Christian compasion of so many thousands of soules as there lay distressed, seeing they might bee saued by the surrendrie of that one towne: Townes (they said) consisted of the number of men; and not men of the enclosures of wals and ditches. They that were of this opinion, for the deliuering vp of the towne, seeing the other obstinately set downe to the contrarie, withdrawing themselves from the counsell, presently tooke vp armes, and by force entered the houses of them that were of contrarie opinion, and tooke from them their weapons, by that means alid pelforce to constrain them to yeeld to their desire. As soone as they that lay before CAIRE (almost drowned in the waters) vnderstood of this dissention at DAMIATA about the deliuerie of the towne, they sent them word, That if they would not yeeld the towne vnto the Sultan, they would forthwith send to PROLEMAIS, which would not faile to do what should be commanded, to haue it in steed of DAMIATA surrendered vnto the Egyptians. So was DAMIATA againe yeelded vnto the infidels, and so great labours of the Christians taken at the siege and winning thereof, all lost. That which made the indignitie thereof more tollerable, was that Melicham the Sultan, hauing without bloodshed gained so great a victorie, did neither by word or deed any thing in despite or reproch of the Christians, but vfed the with all courtisie, relieuing them also with victuals & such other things as they wanted, & by faithfull guides conducting them in safetie out of the countrey.

Inlike manner also, Corradin his brother, Sultan of DAMASCO, made truce with the Latins for eight yeares. Whereupon the king of HIERUSALEM went ouer into ITALIE, and there by the persuation of Honorius the Pope, his wife being now dead, gaue his daughter Toland (now crowned queene of HIERUSALEM in the right of her mother) in marriage to Fredericke king of SICILIA and emperor of the Latines, the rather thereby to stirre him vp for the taking in hand of the sacred waite. Euer since which time, hee and the kings of SICILIA his successours haue beene called kings of HIERUSALEM, albeit that they haue euill prosecuted that their pretended right and title, as still busied in more prophane wars against other Christian princes. King John afterwards departing from ROME for FRANCE, was by the way honourably entertained at PISA: but arriuing at the French court, he found Philip the French king desperately sicke, who by his last will and testament gaue vnto the knights Hospitallers and Templars, sixtie thousand crownes for the maintenance of their warres against the infidels; which money was to their yse, afterward paid vnto king John. Who shortly after to discharge himselfe of a vow he had made, to visit the pilgrimage at COMPOSTELLA, going into SPAIN, by the way married Berengaria, the king of CASTILE his daughter: and there staying a great while, returned againe into FRANCE, where he lay long expecting the setting forward of the emperor Frederick his sonne in law, for the recouerie of his wiues right vnto the kingdome of HIERUSALEM; which although he solemnly vowed at such time as he with all princely magnificence married the said ladie at ROME, yet otherwise letted with troubles neerer home, performed not the same, vntill almost seuen yeares after: all which time the Christians in SYRIA enjoying the fruit of the late concluded peace for eight yeeres, liued in great rest and quietnesse; where, so leauing them; vntill the arising of new troubles, let vs in the meane time againe retorne vnto the troubled affaires of the Turkes, Greekes, and Latines, at CONSTANTINOPLE, and in the lesser ASIA.

The death of Henry emperor of Constantinople.

Peter emperor.

Henry the second emperor of the Latins at CONSTANTINOPLE, after he had (as is afore said) with much adoe repressed the furie of the Bulgarians and Scythies, his barbarous enemies, and so giuen peace vnto the miserable countrey of THRACIA, died, hauing reigned a most troublesome raigne, about the space of cleuen yeares. After whom succeeded Peter, countie of AUSSEBBE, his sonne in law, third emperor of the Latines in CONSTANTINOPLE: who in the beginning of his empire willing to gratifie the Venetians, and to reuenge himselfe of Theodorus Angelus, a great prince of EPHRUS, competitor of his empire, besieged him in DIRRACHIUM; which strong citie, the said Theodorus had but a little before surprised, belonging to the Venetian seignorie. At which siege Peter the emperor lying, was so cunningly by the wile Greeke vsed, that a peace was vpon most honourable conditiions betwixt them concluded, and a familiar kind of friendship joynd. Insomuch, that the emperor at his request, not well aduised, came vnto him as his guest: who now of his enemy become his hoste, entertained him with all the formalities that fained friendship could deuise. But hauing him now in his power, and fearing no harme, regarding neither the lawes of fidelitie or hospitalitie, he most traiterously slew him, as he was yet in the midst of his banquet. Of whose end, some others yet otherwise report, as that he should by the same Theodorus haue been intercepted about the pleasant woods of TEMBE in THESSALIA, as he was traueilling from ROME to CONSTANTINOPLE, and so afterwards to haue been by him cruelly put to death. Of whose misfortune, Tepulus gouernour of CONSTANTINOPLE vnderstanding, for the more safetie of the state in that vacancie of the Greeke empire, made peace with Theodorus for fivē yeares, and the Turkes for two. Shortly after came Robert (the sonne of the afore said vnfortunate emperor Peter) with his mother to CONSTANTINOPLE, and there in his fathers stead was solemnly saluted emperor; but not with much better lucke than was his father before him: for shortly after his comming he tooke to wife a faire young ladie, the daughter of a great rich and noble matrone of the citie, but before betrothed vnto a gallant gentleman, a Burgundion borne; with whom the old ladie broke her promise, and more carefull of her daughters preferment, than fidelitie, gaue her in marriage vnto the new emperor. The joy of which so great an honour was in short time conuerted not into a deadly heauinesse, but euen into death it selfe: For the young Burgundion, more enraged with the wrong done him, than discouraged with the greatnesse and power of the emperor, consorted himselfe with a companie of lustie tall souldiours, acquainted with his purpose, and awaiting his time when the emperor was absent, by night entred the court with his desperat followers, and first meeting with the beautifull young empress, cut off her nose and her eares, and afterward threw her old

A mother into the sea: and so fled out of the citie into the woods and mountaines, with those desperat cut-throates, the ministers of his barbarous crueltie. The emperor pierced to the heart with this so great a disgrace, shortly after went to ROME, to what purpose was not certainly knowne; but in returning backe againe through ACHAIA, he there died, leauing behind him his yoong sonne Baldwin, yet but a child, begotten by his first wife, to succeed him in the empire: who by the name of Baldwin the second was crowned the first and last emperor of the Latines in CONSTANTINOPLE. And for because he was as yet but yoong and vnfit for the gouernment, he was by the consent of the nobilitie affianced, and afterward married vnto Martha the yoonger daughter of John Brenne king of HIERUSALEM, a woorthie old captain (but as then gouernour of RAVENNA; which citie, he being certaine yeares before sent for out of FRANCE for that purpose, by Honorius the Pope, he notably defended against the emperor Frederick his sonne in law, but that affinitie was before broken off by the death of the said emperor's wife) who now sent for out of ITALIE vnto CONSTANTINOPLE, had committed to his charge and protection both the person and empire of the yoong emperor Baldwin, now his sonne in law. Which great and heauie charge he for certaine yeares after worthely and faithfully discharged, vntill such time as that Baldwin was himselfe grown able to take vpon him the gouernment. Now although the imperiall citie of CONSTANTINOPLE, with the countie of THRACIA, THESSALIA, MACEDONIA, ACHAIA, PELOPONNESUS, and the rest of the prouinces of GREECE, were all or for the most part vnder the gouernment of Baldwin the emperor, the Venetians, or other the inferiour Latine princes: yet were the oppressed Greekes, the naturall inhabitants thereof, in heart not theirs, as abhorring nothing more than that their forraigne gouernment; but wholly deuoted to their owne naturall princes, Theodorus Lascaris, & Alexius Comnenus, the one reigning at NICE in BITHYNIA, and the other at TRAPEZOND in PONTUS, both called by the Greekes, emperours, and so of them generally reputed. Lascaris of the two the better beloued, and by far of greatest power, had during the time of his raigne fought many an hard battell (as is in part before declared) and strongly fortified his cheefe cities against the inuasion of his enemies, as well the Turkes as the Latines: and so hauing as it were erected a new empire in ASIA, and there reigned eightene yeares, died, leauing behind him one John Ducas Batazes, that had married the faire ladie Irene his daughter and heire, to succeed him in the Greeke empire in ASIA. This John was a man of a great wit and spirit, and of more grauitie, for his yeares, than was Theodorus his father in law; neuer vndertaking any thing before he had thereof well considered; and once resolved, not omitting or neglecting any thing for the performance thereof. So that it was not vnwisely said of the Greekes, The planting of this new empire to haue required the celeritie of Lascaris, but the stay thereof to haue been the grauitie of Ducas. He in the beginning of his raigne, in very short time hauing set all things in good order, greatly augmented his legions, and thooing at a fairer marke than the empire he yet held, euen the imperiall citie it selfe, and the recouerie of all THRACIA and GREECE out of the hands of the Latines, which could not be done without a fleet at sea, built a great number of gallies in the ports of the lesser ASIA. And so hauing rigged vp and manned a strong fleet, and scouring the seas, in one Summer tooke in most of the Islands of the ÆGEUM, namely, LESBOS, CHIOS, SAMOS, ICARIA, COOS, with the famous Island of the RHODES, and many others also. And not so contented to haue encreased his empire, the next spring crosing the HELLESPONT and landing his forces, first inuaded CHERSONESUS; and afterward to terrifie the Latines, foraged the countrey far and neere, euen to the gates of CONSTANTINOPLE, no man daring to oppose himselfe against him. At which time also he took many cities & strong towns along the sea coast, as CALTIOPOLIS, SESTUS, & CARDIA, with diuers others therabout, some by force, some by composition, the Greekes almost in euery place yeelding themselves, where they were not so oppressed by the Latines as that they could not helpe him. Now by these proceedings of the Greek emperor in EUROPE, was plainly to be seen again the ruin of the Latin empire in the East, all things prospering in his hand according to his hearts desire, Assan the Bulgarian king, no small terror both vnto the Latins & the Greekes, moued with the same hereof, by his ambassadors sent of purpose vnto John the Greek emperor, offered his daughter Helena in marriage vnto yoong Theodore his son: of which offer the emperor gladly accepted. For being busied in his greater affaires, he was loth to haue so great a king as was Assan, his enemy, able at his pleasure to cal in the Scythians, who with their multitude, as a great flood breaking ouer the bankes, had oftentimes caried away whole countries before them. Wherefore the match agreed vpon, the two great princes by appointment met together about CHERSONESUS, where Helena, king Affans daughter, being then about ten yeares old, was with great joy and triumph solemnly married vnto yong Theodor the emperours sonne, much of the same age. Not long after embassadours were also sent vnto the emperour from the Sultan of ICONIUM, to confirme and prolong the league betwixt them; for the Tartars not contented to haue driuen the Turkes out of PERSTIA and the faire Easterne countries, began now also to cut them short in their prouinces in the lesser ASIA: wherefore the Sultan of ICONIUM, fearing least whiles he had his hands full of those his most dreadfull enemies, of themselves too strong for him, he should behind be set vpon by the Greeke emperour, and so thrust out of all, sent these embassadours vnto him for peace; which he for many causes easily graunted. First, for that he foresaw what an hard matter it would be for him to maintaine warre at once both in ASIA against the Turks, and in EUROPE against the Latines: then by this warlike nation, as by a most sure bulwarke, to keepe his owne countries safe from the inuasion of the barbarous Tartars, vnto whose furie he should himselfe lie open, if the Turks were once taken out of their way. Both sufficient reasons for the emperour to yeeld vnto the Sultan, which he did: so was the peace concluded, and the embassadors dispatched. This peace exceedingly comforted and afterward enriched the emperours countries: for now the people generally deliuered of the feare and miserie of continuall warre, began on all hands to fall to their fruitfull labours of peace. Yea the emperour himselfe to the stirring vp of others to the like good husbandrie, caused so much land to be plowed vp for corne, & so many vineyards to be planted, as might plentifully suffice his owne house, and such poore as he daily relieued; with a great ouerplus, which he caused to be carefully laid vp in store. He kept also great herds of cattell, flockes of sheepe, and fowles of all sorts without number. The like he caused his kinsmen & other of the nobilitie to doe, to the intent that euery great man hauing sufficient for his own spending at home, should not take any thing from the poore countreyman, that so euery man contenting himselfe with his owne, might liue in peace without the grievance of others. By which means in a few yeares euery barne and garnarie was full of corne, euery cellar full of wines, euery stable full of cattell, euery storehouse full of victuals: the fields were couered with corne and cattell, and in euery mans yeard were to be seene all kinds of tame fowles, without number. At which time also there flourished a great familie among the Turkes: in so much, as that they were enforced to fetch their greatest reliefe from out of the Christian countries. Then might you haue seene euery way full of Turks, men, women and children, travelling to and fro into the emperours prouinces for victuals: their gold, their siluer, their other rich commodities, they gaue vnto the Christians for food; a little corne was woorth a good commodity, euery bird, sheepe, and kid, was sold at a great rate: by which means the countrey mens houses were full of the Turkes wealth, and the emperours cofers stored with their treasure. The greatnesse of the profit arising of this plentie of the Christians, and penurie of the Turks, may hereby easily be gathered, for that of egges daily sold, so much money was in short time gathered, as made the emperesse an imperiall crowne of gold, richly set with most orient pearle and pretious stones of great price; which the emperour called Onita, for that it was bought with egge money. Thus flourished the Greeke empire in the lesser ASIA, vnder the good emperour Iohn Ducas. The Turks at the same time declining as fast, daily pilled in one corner or another by the Tartars, and consumed with famine at home.

Fredericke the Germane emperour, had of long time vowed to take vpon him an expedition into the Holy land: for performance whereof, he was hardly called vpon, first by Honorius quartus the Pope; and afterward for his long delay, excommunicated by Gregorie the ninth: not so much for the zeale they had vnto the sacred warre, as to busie the emperour a farre off in warres abroad, whilest they in the meane time, to increase their owne power, drew from him some one part or other of his empire: which he not without cause fearing, from day to day, and yeare to yeare, delayed the performance of his vow, so much virged by the Pope; by his presence and power, still disappointing all the lye designs of the Popes, conceiued or put in practise against him. But now at length moued, or more truly to say, enforced with the thundering and lightning of Pope Gregorie, he resolved to set forward in the yeare 1227. About which time Iolenta or Toland his wife, the king of HIERUSALEM his daughter, died in childbed, being before deliuered of a faire sonne. Now were met together at BRUNDISIUM an exceeding great number of courageous

A gious and deuout souldiours out of all parts of Christendome, especially out of GERMANIE, vnder the leading of Lodowicke Landgraue of THURINGE, & Sigefride bishop of ANAGUSTA; all stirred vp with the fame of so notable an expedition. But whilest they there staid somewhat long, the plague arde among the Germanes, whereof in short time after, both the Landgraue and the bishop died, with many of the other best souldiours. The emperour himselfe was vpon his way as farre as MALEA, vpon the farther side of PELOPONNESUS, where falling desperately sick of a burning feauer, and put backe with contrarie winds, he returned againe to BRUNDISIUM, and there staid a great while after. Then began the Pope againe to fret and fume, and to cast out his excommunications against the emperour, as if it had bene thunder and lightening, accusing him of perjurie, infidelitie, and many other grieuous crimes; of all which the emperour was ready to haue cleared himselfe in an open assemblie of the princes of GERMANIE, to haue bene holden at RAVENNA, had it not bene by the Pope and the troubles of LOMBARDIE disturbed. Neuerthelesse, he by open protestations and writings fully answered all the Popes vnjust accusations wherewith he had been so hardly charged: And yet desirous to performe the expedition by him taken in hand, hauing seen all things in good order, and put himselfe againe in readinesse, he set forward from BRUNDISIUM in August in the yeare 1228, leauing the charge of his territories in ITALIE, vnto the care of Reynolds duke of SPOLETO. The Pope displeased, for that the emperour at his departure had neither reconciled himselfe, nor taken his leaue of him; and deeming therein his excommunications and fulminations to be contemned & set at naught, fell into such a rage and choller, that he forbad all the Christian forces that were in SYRIA to follow him, or to yeeld to him their obedience; and writ letters also vnto the Sultan, not to come to any agreement with the emperour, or to yeeld vnto him any part of the Holy land: which very letters the Sultan afterwards sent vnto the emperour. Neither yet so contented, immediately after his departure ran vpon his kingdom of NAPLES, and so filled all ITALIE with troubles. Neuerthelesse the emperour happily arriuing at PTOLEMAIS, was there honourably receiued of the Christian forces, notwithstanding the Popes threats and cuffsings. Of whose arriual, Sultan Meledin hauing intelligence, and loath to draw so mightie an enemy as was the emperour, vpon him, by his embassadours offered him most honourable conditions of peace: VVhich before he would accept of, he by conuenient messengers sent vnto the Pope, to haue his consent & approbation. But such was his rage, as that he would not suffer the messengers to come into his presence, or vouchsafe to read the emperours letters, being brought vnto him; but like a mad man presently rent them in peeces. All which indignities the emperour neuerthelesse tooke in good part, and concluded a peace with the Turks for ten years, vpon these conditions: first, That he should be annointed and accounted king of HIERUSALEM: then, That the holy citie, with all the land of PALESTINE, should be deliuered vnto him: thirdly, That he might at his pleasure fortifie the cities of NAZARETH and IOPPE: fourthly, That all such places as were sometime in the power of Baldwin the fourth king of HIERUSALEM, and taken from him by Sultan Saladin, should be restored; and last of all, That all prisoners on both sides should be set at libertie without ranfome. So the peace concluded, the emperour with his armie came to the desolate citie of HIERUSALEM, and there vpon Easter day was with great solemnitie crowned king thereof in the yeare 1229. And so hauing repaired the wals of the citie, with certaine churches, fortified NAZARETH and IOPPE, and furnished them with strong garrisons, and appointed Raynold duke of BAVARIA his lieutenant in SYRIA, he with two gallies only returned into ITALIE: Ever since which time the kings of SICILIA haue bene also called kings of HIERUSALEM, and haue oftentimes borne the armies of both kingdomes.

expedition of the king of NAUARR into the Holy land.

The next yeare Pope Gregorie in despite of the emperour Frederick, more than for any zeale vnto the Christian religion, did by the Dominicans & Franciscans (two orders of friers but then lately erected) as by his trumpeters, stir vp a wonderfull number of zealous and deuout Christians, almost in euery part of Christendome, to take vpon them the crosse (as they termed it) the cognizance of such, as had by vow bound themselves to take vp armes against the Turks & Saracins, for the recouerie or defence of the Holy land. These deuout men met together in great number, vnder the leading of Theobald king of NAVAR, Americus countie of MONTFORT, Henrie countie of CHAMPAIGNE, and others too long to rehearse (of purpose stirred vp to trouble the ten yeares peace before concluded betwixt the emperour and the Turks in SYRIA) set forward, and after long trauell passing the strait of BOSPHORUS, not far from CONSTANTINOPLE

NOBLE

NOBLE into BYTHINIA, came to the riuer of SANGARIUS, and there staid a while to refresh themselves. Afterwards passing through GALATIA, and so from countrey to countrey through the lesser ASIA, they came at length vnto the straits of the mountaine AMANUS (a part of the mountaine TAURUS) which they found before taken by the Turks; and the Sultan of ICONIUM himselfe not far off encamped with a strong armie. Neuertheless the valiant countie MONTFORT, which had the leading of the vanguard, courageously marching forward, by plaine force opened the passage of the mountaine, hauing slaine or put to flight the Turks appointed for the keeping thereof: the king of NAVAR in the meane time (though in vaine) assailing the Sultan in his campe; who fearing the great power of the Christians; kept himselfe within his own strength and would not stir. Wherefore the king seeing it to no purpose there longer to stay, diuiding his armie into three parts; left the Sultan; and followed after the Countie, placing his baggage in the midst, & the best of his souldiers in the reuerward. But whilst they thus march vp the great mountaine, the Turks better acquainted with those passages, were still at hand, assailing them sometime behind, sometime on the one side, sometime on the other, as they saw occasion: and at length taking them at an aduantage in a great plaine, set vpon them (now before almost spent with hunger and trauell) and there slew of them an exceeding great number. But by the comming on of the night, the battell was broken off; and the Christians repairing vnto their ensignes, passed the straits, and so at length arriued at ANTI OCH, hauing lost by the way the greatest part of the armie, with all their wealth, their victuals, & most part of their horses: the remnant yet left, hauing a little refreshed themselves, were by sea transported to PTOLEMAIS; from whence they were after ward by the Templars conducted to GAZA; where they lay, & of the spoile of the countrey greatly enriched themselves. As for any other great matters they were not able of themselves to take in hand; and help of such forces as the emperor had before left at HIERUSALEM, and other places, they could haue none; hauing expresse charge from the emperor himselfe, not to do any thing against the enemye, tending to the breach of the ten yeares league: which the Turks well perceiuing, add that they had to do but with these new come guests, and some few others their partakers; hauing gathered together their forces, lay in ambush for them in euery corner to cut them off. Neither was it long, but that these of GAZA going far into the countrey, and returning laded with spoile, were set vpon by the Turks; whom they (casting away the spoile they had before taken) notably repulsed and put to flight, the day now drawing to an end. But early the next morning appeared a far greater number of Turks than before; which now comming on, charged the Christians, who all that night had stood watching in their armour, and so joyned with them a most cruell battell: wherein the Christians shewed so much valour as was possible for men to do; but wearied with long fight, and oppressed with the multitude of their enemies, they were overcome and slaine almost euery moethers sonne. Among the rest, the two counties Americus and Henrie, fell: the king of NAVAR himselfe hardly escaped by the exceeding swiftnesse of his horse, & by vncertaine waies wandring vp and downe the countrey, not knowing well which way to take, after two daies came by good fortune to IOPPE: some few others escaped by flight to PTOLEMAIS, the heauie messengers of the misfortune of their fellows. The king afterwards visiting the Holy places at HIERUSALEM, returned home into his countrey, with some few of his followers, hauing performed nothing of that the world expected.

About foure yeares after, Raynold duke of BAVARIA, whom Frederick the emperor had left his lieutenant in HIERUSALEM, died: hauing by the space of five yeares peaceably gouerned that bruised kingdome. After whose death, the Templars (who, he yet liuing, would oftentimes haue broken the league, but that they were by his authoritie and wisdom restrained) now tooke occasion to stir vp the people to take vp armes against the Turks, without respect vnto the league yet in force, or of the dangers like thereof to ensue. Whereof the Egyptian Sultan hearing, raised a great armie, sending also for the Chorasines, a warlike nation then lying neere vnto BABELON, to come vnto his aid: Thus become verie strong, he first laid siege to GAZA, but a little before repaired and fortified by the king of NAVAR and the Templars, which he at length tooke by force, and put to sword all that were therein, as well the citizens as the garrison souldiers. In like manner he dealt also with them of ASCALON, and other places as he went. To repress this his furie, the Templars and Hospitalers had assembled the whole strength of that weake kingdome, and neere vnto TYBERIAS came to haue giuen him battell. Who vpon

The Christians
by possession of the Temple had cast their

Turks

A their approach hastily retired, as if he had for feare shunned battell. But whilst the Christians as victors the night following lay negligently encamped along the riuer side, he returning backe again with his armie, came vpon them before they were well aware, halfe sleeping halfe waking, but altogether vnarmed, with a most horrible outcrie. The Christians now altogether awaked, and not a little troubled with the suddenesse of the matter, hastily and disorderly (as must needs in so great a confusion) tooke vp their weapons, such as came first to hand, and so courageously opposed themselves against their enemies. There was fought a most terrible and doubtfull battell, and that also for a long space; the Christians still encouraging one another to do their last deuoir. But the Turks still keeping their order, against the disordered Christians, and far more also than they in number, prevailed, and there ouerthrew them with a great slaughter, but not without the losse of many thousands also of their owne men, which there lay dead vpon the ground. Most part of the best commanders both of the Templars and Hospitalers were there slaine, such as escaped fled to TYBERIAS.

The Sultan encouraged with so great a victorie, marched forthwith to HIERUSALEM, which he tooke without resistance; and there put to sword all that he found therein, men, women and children, without respect of sex or age: and afterwards hauing rifled the same, rased it downe to the ground, burning the buildings, and ouerthrowing the walls, not long before repaired by the emperor Frederick, and much beautified by his lieutenant Raynold. And carried with an infernall furie, defaced, and most shamefully polluted the sepulchre of our blessed Sauour, neuer before then violated or defiled, but of all nations vtouched & reuerenced; which for all that, may seeme to haue been done, not so much for the hatred vnto the Christian religion; as for that it was the place of all others most desired of the Christians; and for the gaining whereof they had vnder taken so many hard adventures, and so much troubled the Saracens and Turks.

Thus by the vnfaithfull breaking of the league, the most ancient and famous citie of HIERUSALEM, sometime the terrestriall seat of the most Highest, and glorie of the world, fell againe into the power of the Turks and infidels, in the yeare 1234, in whose hands it hath euer since remained euen vntill this day: now a poore ruinous citie, gouerned by one of the Turks Sanzacks, and for nothing now more famous than for the sepulchre of our blessed Sauour; againe repaired and much visited by the deuout Christians, and not vnreuerenced by the Turks themselves.

The losse of this so famous a citie, together with the dangerous state of the Christians in SYRIA, much grieved the other Christian princes of the West; especially Frederick the emperor, by whom it had bene but a few yeares before gained. Howbeit he could not now remedie the matter according to his desire, being himselfe grievously entangled with the endlesse troubles which Pope Gregorie had (as it were by tradition) left vnto the other Popes his successors, for the troubling of his state, vntill at length they had deprived him of his empire, and not long after of his life also. Among other the great princes, carefull for the poor Christians in SYRIA, was Lewis the French king the ninth of that name, a prince of great power, but of all others of that time most famous for his zeale vnto the Christian religion, and for his deuout manner of life: who abounding in wealth and all things else of a great prince to be desired; and withall oftentimes considering the notable expeditions many Christian princes had (to their immortall glorie) made, some into SYRIA, some into EGYPT, against the enemies of Christ, and for the reliefe of the oppressed Christians; was many times about to haue taken vpon himselfe the like. But in these his deuout motions, before he could resolve vpon so great an enterprise, he fell dangerously sicke, in so much that for certaine daies he lay speechlesse deuoid of sense and motion, without any signe of life, but that hee did a little faintly breath: when comming a little vnto himselfe (whether moued with deuotion, or troubled with his former conceits then running in his weake braine, is vncertaine) the first thing he asked for, was the crosse (the cognifiance of such as vowed themselves vnto the sacred warre) which he solemnely receiued at the hands of the bishop of PARIS. At which time also his three brethren, Alphonse countie of POITIERS, Charles countie of ANIOU, and Robert countie of ARTHOIS, with Hugh duke of BURGUNDIE, William earle of FLANDERS, Hugh countie of S. PAUL, and afterwards most of the nobilitie of FRANCE, to accompanie the king, tooke vpon them the same charge. Neuertheless, it was not by and by taken in hand, but some few yeares let passe in the consultation and preparation for so great an enterprise: many in the meane time discharging their vow, by dying before at home in peace in their owne countries. At length the deuout king still resolute in his former determination, hauing taken order with Blanch his mother for his affaires at home, and put all things in readinesse for his journey, came to LYONS to take his leaue of Pope Innocentius the fourth (who for feare of the emperor Frederick then lay there for his more safetie) and from thence to MARCEILLES, where embarking himselfe with his armie the five and twentieth day of August in the yeare 1248, he the twentieth day of September following, arrived in safetie in the island of CYPRUS, and was there royally entertained by Guy Lusignan then king of that country.

Now was the French king desirous to haue gone directly for ÆGYP, without longer stay in CYPRUS, had he not bene otherwise perswaded, both for that his whole fleet was not yet come, and the time of the yeare began to grow vnseasonable, and the weather tempestuous. But whilest he there staid, pasing the winter, the plague (one of the readie attendants of great armies) began to arise in the campe, which dayly encreasing, had in short time taken away a great number of men, and those not of the meane sort. Amongst whom were Robert bishop of BEAUVAIS, John countie MONT-FORT, the counties of VENDÔME and DREUX, Archambaut lord of BURBON, with diuers other knights and gentlemen, to the number of 240: so that by force of the infectious contagion, the king was constrained to diuide his armie into diuers places of the island, attending vntill the infection should cease. In the meane time the Templars hauing in suspect both the French and the Turks: the Turks, for feare they should ouerturn all; and the French, least hauing gotten the victorie, they should take all into their own hands, and so diminish their power and authoritie, wherewith they tyrannized ouer the other poore Christians; sent ambassadours secretly vnto Meledin Sultan of ÆGYP, to perswade him betimes to come to some good agreement for peace, so to auert the power of the French king from doing him further harme, or proceeding further in that war. Of which motion the Sultan well liking, sent one of his noble men to intreat with the master of the Templars concerning a peace, so that it might be by consent of the French. The Templars glad of so honorable a message, writ vnto the French king out of SYRIA, how the matter stood; perswading him to accept of the peace offered, setting out in great words the Sultans great preparations and power. And so indeed had abused the king, had not the king of CYPRUS acquainted with his doings, perswaded him that it was but a finess of the Great master, and that he had first sent vnto the Sultan, and procured that noble man to be sent: which the king vpon farther consideration perceiuing to be true, let the Turks embassadour with hope of peace, but writ vnto the master of the Templars vpon the price of his head from thenceforth not to receiue any embassage from the enemy, or to haue any further intelligence with him.

Winter now past, and the plague well ceased, diuers noble gentlemen and great commanders which following the king, and setting forth somewhat late, or for feare of the plague had staid by the way, and wintred some in one place, some in another, began to repaire vnto CYPRUS: as Robert duke of BURGUNDIE, who hauing wintred in ACHAIA, came now in the beginning of the Spring vnto the king, with a number of good horsemen; and with him William prince of ACHAIA, with a great fleet out of PELOPONNESUS, which country, with most part of GRECIA, was then vnder the command of the Latines; amongst others came also William, surnamed Long-espée, earle of SARISBURY, with a band of lustie tall souldiors. So the armie being met together, and all things againe in a readinesse, king Lewis departing from CYPRUS, and toiled at sea with contrary winds, about five daies after fell with the coast of ÆGYP, & there with all his fleet came before the strong towne of DAMIATA, being (as we haue said) the key of that kingdom. The Sultan long before vnderstanding of the French kings purpose for the inuasion of his country, had strongly fortified his frontier townes, and put into them strong garrisons, beside the great power he kept with himselfe in readinesse at all affaires, as occasion should require. Vpon the approach of the Christians, the gouernour of DAMIATA was ready vpon the shore, with a number of braue souldiors to keepe them from landing; who neuertheless resolutely before set downe for the performing of that they came for, manning forth their long boats with their archers and crossebowes to beat the enemy from the shore, ran a ground with their other small boats made of purpose for the landing of men; and so without longer stay came to handle blowes, where for a while was fought a most sharpe and cruell battell, the Christians striving to land, and the Turkes to keepe them off, many falling on both sides. But what

A should an handfull doe against so many? The Turkes oppressed with the multitude still landing more and more, and hauing done what was possible for them to doe, fled into the towne, leauing behind them their gouernour, with five hundred of their best souldiors dead vpon the shore.

This citie of DAMIATA was exceeding rich and populous, and had in the former warres not been taken but by more than a yeares siege, (as is before declared) and that not so much by the valour of the Christians as by the extremitie of the plague and famine: since which time it had been strongly fortified by the Turks, with deepe ditches, high wals, and strong bulwarkes, and was at that time well stored with victuals also, and all things else for the enduring of a long siege. Neuertheless, the souldiors that were left, and the citizens (discouraged with the losse of

B their gouernour, and remembrance of the miseries before endured in the former siege, and seeing the Christians now readie againe to besiege the same) the night following, a little before the breake of day, set fire euery man vpon his owne house, and so by a bridge which they had made of boats, fled ouer the great riuer, breaking the bridge when they were ouer, for feare their enemies should thereby haue followed after them. The Christians perceiuing their flight, without resistance entred the citie, and being strangers, did what they could to quench the fire and to saue that which the inhabitants themselves would faine haue with fire destroyed; and so afterwards found great abundance of riches, with plentiful store of all manner of victuals, wherewith the souldiors both enriched and refreshed themselves. This so happie & vnexpected a victorie happened vnto the Christians about the beginning of October, in the yeare 1249. Sultan Meledin C himselfe, discouraged with the losse of so strong a citie, offered vnto the French king for the redeeming thereof, and to haue peace at his hands, more territorie in SYRIA and the land of PALESTINE, than the Christians had of long time before: which large offer was by the French, especially by the earle of ARTHOIS the kings brother, proudly rejected, and ALEXANDRIA the most famous port and metropolitall citie of ÆGYP, further demanded: to the great discontentment of the Turkes and Sarasins. In these troubles died Meledin the old Sultan, a man not much beloued of his people: in whose stead Melechala (or Melexala, as some call him) a valiant and couragious prince, well beloued of his subjects, and but euen then returned out of SYRIA and ARABIA, where he had been to craue aid of the other Mahometane princes, was chosen Sultan. Which princes, especially the Sultan of DAMASCO, although they had not of long been at any good accord among themselves, or with the Ægyptian; yet in this common danger of their superstition, which by the losse of ÆGYP was like to be greatly weakened, they joyned hands together, and so sent him great aid.

The new Sultan thus strengthened, drew neerer vnto the Christians, which then lay encamped not farre from DAMIATA, and had with them a hot skirmish, wherein hee was put to the worse, and so with some losse glad to retire. But the Christians the next day, in hope of like successe falling out againe, were ouerthrowne, with ten times more losse than was he the day before, and so faine to flie vnto the campe. By which victorie the Sultan encouraged, began now to conceiue better hope of the successe of his wars; and by stopping the passages both by water and land, to provide, that no victuals could without great perill bee brought either vnto the citie or the campe, inso much that at length victuals began to grow scarce in both: whereof the Sultan was not ignorant, as being thereof throughly informed by such fugitiues, as for want, or other causes, oftentimes fled out of the French campe into his.

Winter thus passing, and wants still increasing, it fortuned that the gouernour of the great citie of CAIRE (vpon the fortune whereof depended the state of the whole kingdom) a man not euill affected vnto the Christian religion, and in his heart highly offended with the Sultan, for the death of his brother by him wrongfully executed: by secret messengers perswaded the French king to come on with his armie to the citie, the regall seat of the Sultan, promising him to deliuer it into his power, with full instructions what he had in all points to do for the gaining thereof. Whereupon the king who had before of himselfe purposed the same exploit, but now filled with a greater hope, assembled together the greatest forces he was able to make. At which time also he sent for the earle of SARISBURY, with the rest of the English men, who for many proud indignities offered them by the French (especially by the earle of ARTHOIS the kings brother) whereof they could haue no redresse, were gone to POTOLMAIS, without purpose to haue any more serued in those warres: But now being sent for by the king, with promise of better vsage and honourable recompence for the wrongs past, returned againe into ÆGYP, there there to doe their last endeour. With whose comming the king strengthened, but more by the new supplies brought vnto him by his brother Alphonfus out of FRANCE, leauing the duke of BURGUNDIE with a conuenient garison, with the queene his wife, Qdo the Popes Legat, and diuers other great ladies in DAMIATA, he himselfe set forward with his armie towards CAIRE. Of whose comming the Sultan hearing, and loath vpon the fortune of one battell to adventure his whole estate, offered by his embassadours to restore vnto him all the land of PALESTINE, with a great summe of money for the defaying of the charges of those wars, and all the prisoners he had taken, so that he would redeliuer vnto him the cite of DAMIATA, and joine with him in league and amitie. Which faire offer for all that, the French king, by the persuation of the Legat and others, refused. So the king marching still on, was to passe an arme of the great ruer NILUS (the Sultan on the other side still readie with his armie to stay his passage) which he had thought to haue made by a bridge of boats, prepared for the same purpose: but better conducted by a fugitiue Sarasin vnto a foord, before to him yeknowne, sent his brother Robert, earle of ARTOIS, with the third part of the armie before him, accompanied with the master of the Templars and the earle of SALISBURY, with their followers. Who passing the ruer at the aforesaid foord, suddainly assailed the Turks in their tents (the Sultan being then absent in solemnising one of their prophane feasts) & put them to flight. With which victorie the French earle aboute measure encouraged, would needs on forwards; as if he would himselfe alone haue carried away the glorie of the whole conquest. Whome for all that certaine of the auncient Templars; better acquainted with the manners of that deceitfull nation than he, and better considering also of their owne abilitie and strength, persued him to content himselfe with the honour he had already got, and not to proceed any further in prosecuting of the enemy, vntill the comming of the rest of the armie, especially in that desperat estate of the enemy, wherein he was to win or lose all. Vnto whom the proud earle in great despight replied, That he would prosecute his victorie, and follow his good fortune; calling them dastards and cowards, opprobriously objecting vnto them the common fame, whereby it was commonly reported, That the Holy land might long since haue bene againe vniued vnto the bodie of the Christian commonweale, but for the foule collusion of the false Templars and Hospitallers with the Turks and Infidels. With which reprochfull speech, the master of the Templars not without cause moued, answered for himselfe and his fellows, That he should, when he would, and where he durst, display his ensignes, and he should find them as readie to follow as hee was to goe before them. The earle of SALISBURY also willing to stint this strife, persued earle Robert not to bee so wedded to his owne opinion, but to listen vnto the graue and wholesome counsell of the Templars, being men of great experience: and so turning vnto the master of the Templars, began likewise with gentle words to pacifie him also. But whilest hee was yet speaking, the earle interrupting him with many opprobrious words, called him dastard and coward, and wished that the armie were rid of him, and the fearefull cowards his countreymen. Whereunto the earle of SALISBURY answered: Well Generall, on in Gods name, and wherefoeuer you dare set your foot, mine shall be as farre as yours; and I beleeue wee goe this day, where you shall not dare to come nigh my horses taile: as afterward indeed it proued. Howbeit, the earle so said, for that earle Robert and the Frenchmen had many times in reproch and disdain, after their manner, called him and his followers English traites.

The proud earle constant in his former purpose, and not to be otherwise persued, set forward: and first assaulted a little towne or castle, not farre off called MANSOR, whereunto hee inconsiderately approaching, was notably repulled; and hauing lost a number of his men, was as a man discouraged, about to haue retired. When suddainly the Sultan, neerer at hand than the earle had thought, stirred vp with the noise of the alarum, came on with his whole power; and finding the armie of the Christians now deuicd (as he had long wished) with the multitude of his people enclosed them round, and had with them a great and mortall fight: wherein though the Christians right woorthely behaved themselves, for the small number they were, yet oppressed with the multitude, and on euery side beset, they were slaine downe right. Then, but all too late, it repented the earle of his foolish rashnesse, and that he had not hearkened vnto better counsell; and seeing the earle of SALISBURY valiantly fighting, cried out vnto him to flie; seeing God (as he said) fought against them. Whereunto the noble earle answered no more, but God forbid that my fathers soules should run away from the face of a Sarasin. The French earle thinking

A king by the swiftnesse of his horse to haue saued his life, flying out of the battell, and taking the ruer of THARNES, ouerladed with his armour, was there drowned. The earle of SALISBURY Earle Robert is flying, drowned. courageously enduring the enemies charge, with his owne hand manfully slew many a Turk and Sarasin that day, vntill that at length hauing his horse slaine vnder him, and himselfe so wounded in the legs as that he was not able longer to stand, yet vpon his knees laying about him like a desperat man, and selling his life as deere as he could, was there slaine, but not vanquished. With him perished the whole armie, or enclosed by the Sultan, that scarce any one escaped aliae, more than two Templars, one Hospitaller, and one common souldiour, the messengers of this heauie newes.

B About the same time also sicknesse daily increasing in the French campe, the king purposing to march forward to CAIRE, sent a great number of sicke and weake people downe the ruer of NILUS to DAMIATA: of whose going the Sultan vnderstanding, caused a great number of small boats to be caried in carts by land vnto the ruiers side, which well manned, and meeting them by the way, set vpon them, and burnt or drowned them: cuery mothers sonne, sauing one only Englishman, called Alexander Giffard, who wounded in fūe places of his bodie, escaped yet into the French campe, reporting there what had happened vnto the rest.

C Now had the Sultan also got intelligence of the compact betwixt the gouernour of CAIRE The gouernour of Caire, apprehended. and the king; for the betraying of the cite: and thereupon had caused him to be suddainly apprehended and put in safe keeping, vntill hee were at better leisure to vnderstand farther of the matter: which no lesse troubled the French king, than did the former misfortune; all his hope for the yeelding vp of the cite, being thereby cut off. Thus his hopes, together with his strength, daily decreasing, he would haue gladly accepted of the conditions which he before refused, which the Sultan now growne very strong, would by no meanes heare of; but in stead thereof, by way of derision, sent to know of him, What was become of all his mattocks, forks, rakes, sythes, plowes, and harrowes, which he had brought ouer with him; and why he set them not to work, but suffered them like an euill husband to rot and rust beside him? All which, with much more, the good king was glad to put vp. For now his forces greatly diminished, as well by sicknesse, as by the former losses, finding himselfe farre too weake, he would faine haue retired backe againe to DAMIATA: which the Sultan foreseeing, got so betwixt him and home, that now there was no remedie, but either to fight it out, or yeeld. The king himselfe had been often before intreated by his nobilitie, whilest the ruer was yet vnpossessed by the enemy, to haue conueyed himselfe by water to DAMIATA, for that in the safetie of his person consisted (as they said) the safetie of his kingdome, whatsoeuer became of them: whereunto hee could neuer bee persued, saying, That he would neuer forsake his people, because he would not be forsaken of them, but was resolved to endure with them whatsoeuer it should please God to lay vpon him. So passing the ruer by the same foord whereby his brother had not long before vnfortunatly passed, and coming to the place where the battell was fought, hee might see the dead bodies of the Christians pitifully mangled, with their heads and hands cut off: For the Sultan the more to encourage his soldiours, had before the battell proclaimed, That whosoever should bring him the head or hand of a Christian, should haue a great reward for his labour; in hope whereof, they had so dismembered them. But long he had not there stayed, but that the Sultan began suddainly to appeare, with a most huge great armie, as if he would euen with the sight thereof haue discouraged the Christians: against whom for all that, the Frenchmen in good order opposed themselves, & for the space of three houres made great resistance: but what could one doe against ten, and he also fainting for sicknesse and food? the hard plight wherein the greatest part of the French armie then was. In conclusion, oppressed with the multitude of their enemies, and no way left to flie, they were all ouerthrowne and slaine, except some few, saued in hope of great ranfome. The king himselfe, with his two brethren Alphonfus and Charles, and some few others, were taken prisoners, & brought vnto the Sultan: who demanding of him, What had moued him so to make war against him? was answered by the king, That it was for religion, & the defence of the name of his God. In this vnfortunat battell, fought the fift of Aprill, in the yeare 1250, besides the common souldiours, were slaine most of the nobilitie of FRANCE, and all their tents taken.

The Sultan presently vpon this ouerthrow, sent of his owne souldiours the like number that the French were of, with French ensignes, and disguised in the attire of the slaine Frenchmen, to DAMIATA, where the duke of BURGUNDIE, the French queene, and the Popes Legat lay; in hope hope to haue been so let in for Frenchmen: but they were not so well masked, but that they were by them of the citie discovered for enemies, and so kept out and deceived of their purpose.

The Christians thus ouerthrowne, and the French king taken prisoner, Melech-sala the Sultan taking compassion vpon him, and yet minding of his life to make his owne gaine; cheering him vp with comfortable speeches, began to talke with him of his deliuerance, and of a good agreement to be made betwixt them. The conditions whereof propounded by the Sultan were, That the king should forthwith deliuer againe vnto him the citie of DAMIATA, and moreover pay vnto him for the ranfome of himselfe and his, and for the charges of the war, eight thousand pound of gold; That all prisoners should on both sides be frankly set at libertie, and for a peace to be taken for ten yeares. For the more assurance whereof, the Sultan offered to sweare, That if he failed in the performance thereof, to renounce what he had promised, to denie his Christ to be God: Which prophane oath the king detesting, and wishing rather to die than to giue the same; the Sultan wondring at his constancie, tooke his word without any oath at all, and so published the league. But whilest they were comming together to DAMIATA, Melech-sala now in the pride of this victorie, fearing nothing lesse than the sudden change of fortune, or the mischiefe hanging ouer his head, was in the presence of a number of his noble men suddenly slaine by two desperat Mamalukes; and one Turqueminus a sturdie slaue of their owne order and vocation (by whose procurement it was supposed to haue bene done) by the consent of the whole armie created Sultan in his stead: who reuoking the league before concluded by Melech-sala, made another in his owne name with the king, much vpon the same conditions that the other was; which after he had receiued DAMIATA, he caused to be openly proclaimed. Neuertheless after that king Lewis had paid his ranfome, and was with the remnant of his armie by the Genouaies transported from DAMIATA to PTOLEMAIS, the false miscreant performed not the halfe of that he had promised, of twelue thousand Christian captiues that should haue been set free, scarce enlarging foure thousand; and killing all the sicke souldiers whom by his promise he ought to haue reliued; neither suffering any Christian to carrie any of his goods with him out of EGYPT, which by the league he ought to haue done also.

The French king comming to PTOLEMAIS, and purposing to haue returned home, was intreated by the master of the Templars and Hospitalars, and other the nobilitie of the Christians, to stay, which he did almost by the space of foure yeares: in which time he repaired the cities of CESARBA and TOPPE, and fortified many strong places for the defence of the Christians against the infidels: And so commending the protection thereof vnto the knights of the sacred war, and sending his brethren away before him, followed after himselfe, greatly lamented for by all the Christians in SYRIA, and so arriued in FRANCE the sixt yeare from the time of his departing thence. This was the end of this long and vnfortunat expedition of Lewis the French king, wherein as some write, were eightie thousand Christians lost: howbeit the French Chronicles extenuating their losse, report, of two and thirtie thousand French, six thousand to haue returned againe into FRANCE. The citie of DAMIATA in the space of a few yeares twice woon, and twice lost by the Christians, was shortly after the deliuering vp thereof, by the Sultan rased downe to the ground, because it should no more serue the Christians for an entrance into his kingdom.

The late Egyptian Sultans thus oftentimes inuaded by the Christian princes, and reposing no great assurance in the prowess of the effeminate Egyptians, a people fitter for marchandize and other base occupations than for chiuallie and war, had for the strengthening of their kingdom, bought an infinit number of slaues, especially of the poore and hardie Circassians, called in ancient time Gete and Zinchi, neere vnto COLCHIS and the EUXINE sea, brought vnto ALEXANDRIA and other ports of EGYPT out of those bare cold countries, by marchants, and from thence transported to CAIRE and other cities of EGYPT: of which poore slaues, the late Egyptian Sultans taking their choice, and culling out from the rest such as were like to be of great spirit and abilitie of bodie, deliuered them vnto most skilfull and expert teachers; by whom they were carefully taught to run, to leape, to vault, to shoot, to ride, with all other feats of actiuitie, and withall cunningly to handle all manner of weapons, as well on horsebacke as on foot: and so instructed, and become cunning, were taken out of their schooles into pay, and enrolled together as the Sultans choice horsemen, were commonly called by the name of Mamalukes.

In whose good seruice the late Sultans finding great vse, spared for no cost, both for their maintenance and encreasing of their number; dayly erecting new nurseries stored with yong fire, which growing vp and readie, was still joynted to the other. It is wonderfull to tell vnto what a strength and glorie this order of the Mamalukes was in short time grown, by the care of the Egyptian kings: By them they mainaged their greatest affaires, especially in time of wars; and by their valour, not onely defended their country, but gained many a faire victorie against their enemies, as they did now against the French. But as too much power in such mens hands, seldom or neuer wanteth danger, so fell it out now betwixt the late Sultan Melech-sala, and those masterfull Mamaluke slaues: who proud of their preferment, and forgetfull of their dutie, and seeing the greatest strength of the kingdom in their hands, traiterously slew Melech-sala, their chiefe founder, setting vp in his place (as aforesaid) one Turqueminus, a base slaue, one of their owne order and seruile vocation, but indeed otherwise a man of a great spirit and valour. This Melech-sala murdered by the Mamalukes, was the last of the free borne kings of EGYPT; in whom the Turkes kingdom in EGYPT, erected by Sarracon and the great Sultan Saladin (as is before said) and in his stocke and family euer since continued, tooke end, as did also all the power of the Turkes in that great and rich kingdom. For the proud Mamalukes hauing now got the soueraintie into their hands, and exalted a Sultan out of themselves, imperiously commanded as great lords ouer the rest of the people, not suffering them to haue the vse either of horse or armour, or to beare any sway in the common weale: but keeping them vnder with most heauie impositions, and still preferring their owne slaues (wherewith the country of EGYPT now swarmed) made the naturall countrey people, of all others most miserable, not daring to meddle with any thing more than merchandize, their husbandrie, or other their base mechanicall occupations: whereof the greatest profit still came vnto the Mamalukes, who as lords of all, with great insolencie, at their pleasure tooke it from them as their owne. As for the great Sultan, they still chose him from among themselves, not suffering any the Sultans children to succede their fathers in the kingdom; for feare least they in proceesse of time, proud of their ancestors and parentage, should reckon of them as of his slaues (as indeed they were) and so at length bring in another more free kind of government.

Against which they provided also, not onely by this restraint of their Sultans children, but of their owne also: taking order and establishting it as an immutable law, That though the sonnes of the Mamalukes might enjoy their fathers lands & wealth after their death, yet that it should not be lawfull for them in any case to take vpon them the name or honour of a Mamaluke: so embarrasing them from all government in the common wealth, to the intent it might still rest with the Mamalukes. Neither was it lawfull for any borne of Mahometan parents (which could not be slaues) or of the race of the Iewes, to be admitted into that Order; but onely such as being borne Christians and become slaues, had from the time of their captiuitie bene entrusted in the Mahometan superstition; or else being men grown, and comming thither, had abjured the Christian religion (as many reprobates did in hope of preferment.) Right strange it is to consider, vnto what honour and glorie this slauish empire in short time grew: many of those poore slaues by rare fortune or secret diuine power, exalted out of the dust vnto the highest degree of honour, proouing most excellent and renowned princes, of such strength and power, as was dreadfull euen vnto the greatest princes of the world. In which great glorie, this seruile empire (to the worlds woonder) flourished from this time amongst the greatest by the space of 267 yeares, vntill that hauing run the appointed race, it was with a great destruction, by Selymus the victorious emperor of the Turkes, ouerthrowne in the yeare 1517, and the kingdom of EGYPT with all SYRIA and the land of PALESTINE, brought into the forme of Prouinces, vntied vnto the Turkes empire, as they are at this day, and as in the course of this historie shall in due time and place (God willing) at large appeare.

But leauing the kingdom of the Turkes thus ouerthrowne in EGYPT, and the Mamalukes there triumphing; the French king returned into FRANCE; and the Christians in peace in SYRIA: let vs againe returne into the lesser ASIA, and vnto the imperiall citie of CONSTANTINOPLE, whether the affaires both of the Turkes and of the Christians now call vs. All this while the Greeke empire (for so the Greeks will haue it called) flourished both in peace and plentie in the lesser ASIA, vnder their emperor John Batazes: the power of the Latines in the meane time declining as fast at CONSTANTINOPLE, vnder the rule of the Latin emperor

Baldwin the second. As for the Turks whom we left grievously troubled both with famine and the often incursions of the Tartars, they had all this while, and yet also, enough and more than enough to do to withstand the same enemy. At length it fortuned that John Ducas the Greeke emperor died, being at the time of his death about threescore yeares old, wherof he had happily reigned three & thirtie: by whose good & discreet gouernment, the Greeke empire before brought low and almost to naught by the Latines, began againe to gather strength and to flourish both in ASIA and some little part of EUROPE also. Of him are reported many notable matters, which as impertinent to our purpose I could willingly passe ouer, were I not by the woorthie remembrance of one of them staied a while by the way.

This noble and famous emperor hauing long lamented the death of the faire emperesse Irene his first wife, at last married another yong ladie, the sister of Manfred king of SICILIE, called Anne, with whom amongst other honourable and beautifull dames, sent by the king her brother for the accompanying of her to CONSTANTINOPLE, was one Marcesina, a rare paragon, of such a feature as if nature had in her meant to bestow her greatest skill. From whose mouth alwaies flowed a fountaine of most sugred words, and out of her eies issued (as it were) nets to entangle the amorous in: vpon this so faire an object, the emperor not fearing further harme, tooke pleasure oftentimes to feed his eies, vntill that at length caught with her lookes, he had lost his libertie, and was of a great emperor become her thrall, in such sort, as that in comparison of her he seemed little or nothing to regard the yong emperesse his wife; but so far doated vpon her, that he suffered her to be attired and honoured with the same attire and honour that the emperesse was her selfe; whom she now so farre exceeded both in grace and fauour with the emperor, and honour of the people, as that shee almost alone enjoyed the same, without regard of her vnto whom it was of more right due. Whilist thus alone triumpheth, at length it fortuned that shee in all her glorie, attended vpon with most of the gallants of the court, and some of the emperours guard, would needs goe (whether for deuotion or for her recreation, I know not) to visite the monasterie and faire church, which Blemmydes (a noble man of great renoune, both for his integritie of life, and learning) had of his owne cost and charges but lately built in the countrey where he together with his monkes, as men wearie of the world, liued a deuout and solitarie contemplatiue life, after the manner of that time, with the great good opinion of the people in generall. This Blemmydes was afterward for his vpright life and profound learning, chosen Patriarch of CONSTANTINOPLE: which great honour, next vnto the emperor himselfe, he refused, contenting himselfe with his cell. Marcesina comming thither in great pompe, and thinking to haue entred the church, had the doores shut against her by the monkes, before commaunded so to doe by Blemmydes their founder: and so was to her great disgrace kept out. For that deuout man deemed it a great impietie, to suffer that so wicked and shamelesse a woman, against whom he had most sharply both spoken and written, with her prophane and wicked feet to tread vpon the sacred pavement of his church. She enraged with this indignitie, hardly by so proud a woman to be with patience digested, and prickt forward by her flattering followers also; returning to the court, grievously complained thereof vnto the emperor, stirring him vp by all meanes she could to reuenge: the same, perswading him to haue been therein himselfe disgraced. Whereunto were joynd also the hard speeches of her pickthanke fauourits, who to currie fauells, spared not to put oyle as it were vnto the fire, for the stirring vp of the emperor vnto reuenge. Who with so great a complaint nothing moued vnto wrath, but stricke as it were to the heart with a remorse of conscience, and oppressed with heauinesse, with teares running downe his cheekes, and fetching a deepe sigh, said: Why prouoke you me to punish so deuout and just a man? where is if I would my selfe haue liued without reproch and infamie, I should haue kept my imperiall maiestie unpolluted or stained. But now sith I my selfe haue beene the cause both of mine owne disgrace, and of the empires: I may thanke mine owne defects, if of such euill seed as I haue sowne, I now reape also an euill harvest.

After the death of this good emperor, Theodorus his sonne, borne the first yeare of his fathers raigne, being then about three and thirtie yeares old, was by the generall consent of the people saluted emperor in his stead: who in the beginning of his empire renewed the league which his father had made with Iathatus the Turkish Sultan. And so hauing provided for the securitie of his affaires in ASIA; he with a puissant armie passed ouer the strait of HELLESPONTUS into EUROPE, to appeale the troubles there raised in MACEDONIA and THRACIA, by the king of BULGARIA his brother in law, and Michael Angelus Despot of THESSALIA; who vpon the death of the old emperor began to spoile those countries, not without hope at length to haue joynd them vnto their owne: by whose comming they were for all that disappointed, of their purpose, and glad to sue to him for peace. But whilest he was there busied, he was aduertised by letters from NICE, that Michael Paleologus, whom he had left there gouernour in his absence, was secretly fled vnto the Turks: with which newes he was not a little troubled. The cause of whose flight, as Paleologus himselfe gaue it out, was, for that he perceiued himselfe diuers waies by many his enemies brought into disgrace, and the emperours eares so filled with their odious complaints, so cunningly framed against him, as that they were not easily, or in short time to be refelled: and therefore fearing in the emperours heauie displeasure to be suddenly taken away, to haue willingly gone into exile, if so happily he might saue his life from the mallice of them that sought after it.

At his comming to ICONIUM, he found Iathatus the Sultan making great preparation against the Tartars; who hauing driuen the Turks out of PERSIA and the other faire Easterne countries (as is before declared) and running still on, did with their continuall incursions spoile a great part of their territories in the lesser ASIA also; and now lay at AXARAA, a towne not far off from ICONIUM: against whom the Sultan now making the greatest preparation hee could, gladly welcommed Paleologus, whom he knew to be a right valiant and worthie captaine, commending to his charge the leading of certaine bands of Greekes, whom he had retained to serue him in those warres, as he had others also of the Latines, vnder the conduct of Boniface Mobme, a nobleman of VENICE: and so hauing put all things in readinesse, and strengthened with these forraigne supplies of the Greekes and Latines, set forward against his enemies the Tartars: who at the first sight of the strange ensignes and souldiours, were much dismayed, fearing some greater force had beene come to the aid of the Turkes. Neuerthelesse, joyning with them in battell, had with them at the first a most terrible and bloodie conflict, wherein that part of the armie that stood against Paleologus and his Greekes, was put to the worse; to the great discomfiture of the Tartars, being euen vpon the point to haue fled, had not one of the greatest commanders in the Turks armie, and a nigh kinsman of the Sultans, for an old grudge that he bare vnto the Sultan, with all his regiment in the heat of the battell reuolted vnto the Tartars: whereby the turning of the battell was in a moment as it were quite altered, they which but now were about to haue fled, fighting like lions; and they that were victors, now glad to turne their backs and flie: in which flight a great number of the Turkes fell, the fierce Tartars most eagerly pursuing them. Paleologus with the generall of the Turks hardly chased by the Tartars, and glad euery houre to make a stand, and to fight for their liues, with much adoe after many daies flight recovered a castle of the Generals, neere vnto CASTAMONA, and so saued themselves. The Tartars after this so great a victorie (wherein they had broken the whole strength of the Turkes, and brought in hazard the whole state of their kingdome) without resistance foraged all the countries and provinces subject vnto the Turkish Sultan, making spoile of whatsoever they light vpon: inso much, that the Sultan discouraged, and hauing now no strength left to oppose against them, fled vnto the Greeke emperor Theodorus for aid; who most honourably entertained him with all his traine, and comforted him with such small aid as he thought good then to spare him: Vvhich for his more safetie he sent home with him, vnder the leading of Isaacus Ducas, surnamed Murtzuzla, a man in great credit with him. In recompence of which kindeesse, the Sultan gaue vnto the emperor the cite of LAODICEA, wherinto he presently put a strong garrison: neuerthelesse, it was not long before it fell againe into the hands of the Turkes, being a place not to be holden by the Greekes. Yet for all this, the Sultan finding himselfe still too weake to withstand the continuall inuasions of the Tartars, and wearie of the harmes he dayly sustained; by the aduise of his cheefe counsellors made a league with them, yeelding to pay them a certain yearly tribute, thereby to redeeme his peace. From which time the Tartars accounted of the Turks as of their tributaries and vassales.

Not long after this, Michael Paleologus was by the emperours kind and gracious letters called home; with his faithfull promise also before given for his securitie: who before his return bound himselfe also by solemne oath, to be vnto the emperor and his sonne alwayes loyall, and from thenceforth neuer to seeke after the empire, or giue cause of new suspect for such matters as he had been before charged with: but for euer to yeeld vnto the emperor, his sonne, or other his successors in the empire, his dutifull obedience and fidelitie. Vpon which conditions he was againe made Great Constable, and so receiued into the emperours fauour, and liued the rest of his raigne in great honour and credit with him.

The death of Theodorus the Grecke emperor.

Now Theodorus the emperor hauing raigned three yeares, fell sicke and died, leauing behind him his sonne Iohn, then but a child of six yeares old, to succede him in the empire: whom hee vpon his death bed, together with the empire, commended to Arsenius the Patriarch, and one George Muzalo his faithfull counsellor, as to his trustie tutors, to see him safely brought vp, & the empire well and peaceably gouerned. This Muzalo was a man of meane parentage, but for his familiar acquaintance and ciuile behauior, of a child brought vp in the court with the emperor as his play fellow: with whom he growing vp, so framed himselfe vnto his manners and disposition, that he alone was vnto him in stead of all, still at hand, readie to say or doe whatsoeuer might be vnto the emperor gracious or pleasing. And the elder they grew, so increased this their mutuall affection and loue also: in such sort, that with him now emperor, he was of all others in greatest fauour and authoritie; a warie obseruer of his delights, a readie minister of his affaires, and faithfull partaker of his secrets: for which he was in short time promoted vnto the greatest honors of the court, and honourably married vnto one of the emperours nigh kinswomen; and now at his death, by his last will, with the reuerend Patriarch appointed tutor to the yong emperor and his two yong sisters. And for the more assurance thereof, a solemne oath of obedience vnto the yong prince as emperor, and vnto them as his tutors, was exacted of all sort of men both high & low, of what vocation soeuer; and that not once, but first a little before the emperours death, and againe after he was now dead, for many of the nobilitie honourably descended, seeing the suddain change of Muzalo his fortune, among themselves murmured thereat, as grieued with his preferment, seeing there were many among them, vnto whom both the tuition of the yong emperor and administration of the empire, of better right appertained; in so much as they were both nearer of kin vnto the emperor, and fitter (as they thought) for so great a charge than was Muzalo; whom (as they said) they had many causes both to contemne and hate: For beside that hee was not honourably borne, and had serued the late emperor Theodore, as the minister of his wrath against some of the nobilitie, causes sufficient of the peoples hatred; if hee should now also in so great authoritie affect the empire, it was by his malicious enemies vainly doubted, that he would not spare to commit any manner of villanie, for the effecting of his inordinat desire. Of all which Muzalo was not ignorant, a man at all other times of a most quicke apprehension for such matters, but as then especially, his wits being awaked with these so great motiues & dangers. Wherefore speedely calling together all the nobilitie into the court, he welcommed them one by one, and courteously discoursing with them, offered to discharge himselfe both of the administration of the empire, and tuition of the yong emperor, and willingly to yeeld the same vnto any one of them, whom the rest should thinke fittest for so great a charge: which though they all with one consent as it were refused, saying, That he was of all others to be preferred, vnto whom the emperor, lord both of the empire and the child, had committed the same: yet Muzalo earnestly requested them to the contrarie, and stiffely withstood their desire, wishing indeed rather to haue led a quiet priuat life in securitie, than to haue been so ouercharged; not so much for doubt of the enuie then arising, as for feare of some great danger thereof to ensue. But would he, would he not, remedie there was none, but that as the late emperor had appointed, so he must take the charge vpon him. And now was every one, as well of the nobilitie, as of the inferiour sort, againe with greater solemnitie than before the third time sworne, to the vttermost of their power to defend the yong emperor in his empire, and Muzalo in the tuition of him and administration of the affaires of the state, and faithfully to yeeld vnto them both all due honour and obedience: which if they should faile religiously to performe, they wished vnto themselves every man, & to all theirs, a shamefull end and destruction. Yet notwithstanding all this solemne swearing, mixt most times with much forswearing, there were not fully nine daies past, but that certaine of the chiefe nobilitie forgetfull or else carelesse of their oath, and full of enuie, seldome satisfied but with blood, conspired the vnworthie death of Muzalo the protectour both of the emperor and the empire.

Enuie in Court.

The ninth day appointed for the funerall of the emperor, was now come, at which time were met together at SOSANDRA (an abbey by himselfe built in the honour of the virgine Marie at MAGNESTA) many great ladies and graue matrons, to mourne as the manner was; all the great princes of the nobilitie, and among them the conspirators also: thither repaired also a number of soldi-souldiours, prepared for the slaughter, with an infinit multitude of the common people, as at such solemnities is vsuall. But what needs many words, whilst the hymns were yet in singing, and the obsequies in performing, the soldiours as they were before instructed, suddainly breaking into the church, with their drawne swords in their hands, slew Muzalo (then fled vnto the altar for refuge) with his two brethren Andronicus and Theodorus, both men of great account, and diuers others appointed to the massacre. So the matrones & the rest of the multitude breaking off their mourning, and for feare thronging out one in anothers necke, fled as fast as they could, some one way, some another, as they thought for their most safetie: but the priests and monkes thinking to haue done the like, were by the imperious soldiours, whether they would or not, againe inforced into the church; where tumbling one ouer another, as thronging in with great force & violence, and scarce able to stand, by reason of the slipperinesse of the blood there shed vpon the pavement, they in great feare made an end of those bloodie obsequies. This outrage appeased, Arsenius the Patriarch, and only tutor of the yong emperor now left, was therewith yet much troubled, as with a thing dangerous both to the person of the yong prince, and quietnesse of the state; but what good course to take therein, he could not tell: for as he was a man for his learning and integrity of life, not inferiour to the best, so in matters of state he was as far to seeke; as it commonly happeneth the contemplative man, buried in his meditations, to be vnfit for temporall gouernment; whereas he that should performe both, must vnto his rare vertues and great learning ioine a ciuile conuersation, with great experience in worldly affaires, not to be learned but by great and long practise. This reuerend father (of no great reach, yet wishing all well) calling together the nobilitie, consulted with them what were best to be done for the gouernment both of the yong emperor and the empire, now that Muzalo was dead; not considering in the mean time who they were with whom he consulted, or that counsell grounded vpon no wise foresight or approoued experience, was more dangerous vnto him whom he would haue provided for, than all the enemies murdering swords, as shortly after appeared.

Muzalo traitorously murdered in the church.

Amongst others of the nobilitie called to counsell, was Michael Paleologus (of whom we haue before spoken) much superiour to the rest, as descended of the imperiall house of the Comneni, a man of a cheerefull countenance, gracious, and courteous, and withall exceeding bountifull and liberall, whereby he easily wooon the hearts of all men in generall, but especially of the colonels, captaines, and other martiall men, commaunders in the armie; of whose aspiring to the empire, many prefaces and common rumors (not alwaies vaine) had in former time passed also to the mouing of many: yea the Patriarch himselfe not considering his haucie and aspiring nature, made no lesse account of him than did the rest, but vpon an especiall fauour, committed to his only trust the keyes of the common treasure, at such time as money was to bee deliuered out for payment of the armies or other like great occasions of the state; the most effectuall meanes for the furtherance of his secret practises, & the readiest way for the effecting of that he had so long before plotted: for hauing in his fingring such a masse of treasure, as he might well haue wished but neuer reasonably hoped for, he poured it out as it were by bushels amongst the nobilitie and martiall men, & such others as he thought were able to do most with the people, amongst whom were many of the cleargie also: of which his fauourits were made many meetings, and by them was the Patriarch continually sollicitied, but yet in generall tearmes, without delay (according to the necessitie of the time) to take order for the good gouernment of the state, which now as a great ship in the midst of the sea without a master, was (as they said) in danger to perish; and being once lost, was not to be againe recouered. At which time also, the name of Paleologus was in euery mans mouth, as the only man for his wisdom and experience, fit to take vpon him the charge and gouernment of the empire, vntill the yong emperor were come to age. Vnto which comon good liking, the Patriarch also (seeing no more, or peraduenture not so much as the rest) gaue his consent. And so without longer stay, to the great contentment both of the nobilitie and people in generall, made him gouernour of the empire, and tutor to the yong emperor, wanting now nothing of an emperor himselfe, more than the title and imperiall ornaments. This was the first step whereby this aspiring man (twice before in disgrace with the two late emperours, Iohn Ducus, and his sonne Theodorus) mounted at last vnto the empire.

Michael Paleologus aspires.

It was not many dayes after, but that his fauourits held another counsell, wherein it was alleged, That it was not seemely for him that was tutor vnto the emperor, gouernour of the state and empire, and to giue audience vnto the embassadours of forraigne nations, to want the honour

next vnto the emperour, as well for the magnificence of the state, as for the credit of his place: whereupon hee was both by the Patriarch and the yooing emperour honoured with the title of the Despot, another step vnto the empire. But what contentment find the ambitious euen in the greatest honours, so long as there is one about them? Little sure, or none at all, more than that it serueth them to step at next, vp to the highest: as did this new made Despot, who shortly after was by certaine of the nobilitie, his great fauourits, neere vnto MAGNESIA, with the great applause of the people hoysed vp and saluted emperour. Whereof Arsenius the Patriarch hearing, was therewith much troubled, as fearing what would become of the yong child, the right heire of the empire. And first he was about to haue excommunicated, as well him that was made emperour, as them that had so made him: but afterward changing his purpose, for feare of greater troubles, he thought it better by solenne oath to bind both him and the rest, That they should not seeke after the life of the child, or by any force or colour goe about to depriue him of the empire; which was so done. Yet it was not full a moneth after, but that euen hee that had so great a care of the yooing child and so prouided for his safetie (persuaded by them of the nobilitie and the cleargie) with his owne hands, and all the accustomed ceremonies, set the imperiall crowne vpon this vsurpers head; yet not as vpon him that should still enjoy the empire, but as vpon a man according to the present necessitie of the time and state thought fittest for so great a charge, vntill the yooing child came to age; vnto whom then he was to giue place, and to resigne to him the empire. All which being by more solenne oath than before confirmed, good newes (as the certaine signes of his fortunat gouernment) were brought vnto him of a great victorie obtained by his capitaines, against Michaelle Angelus Despot of ÆTOLIA and EPHROSUS: Who hauing married the late emperours daughter, and hearing of his death, with the great troubles in ASIA; aided by the king of SICILIA and the prince of PELOPONNESUS and ACHAIA, his sonnes in law, had thought in that hurle and perturbation of the state to haue taken vnto himselfe the greatest part of the emperours territories in MACEDONIA and THRACIA: and for the same purpose was with a great armie entred into them, burning and spoiling the countrey before him; whereof Michaelle Paleologus (then but newly made Despot) hauing intelligence, sent his brother John, and some other his best capitaines, with a great armie against him: by whom he with his complices were put to the worke, and not without great losse enforced to retire: the joyfull newes whereof he receiued, euen as he was crowned. Which was shortly after confirmed by the coming of the great commanders themselues, bringing with them the prince of PELOPONNESUS and ACHAIA, by them taken prisoner. Who for his ranfome was afterward glad to giue vnto the emperour Paleologus, MONEMBASTIA, MAINE, and SPARTA, three of the best cities of PELOPONNESUS: whereinto he put strong garrisons, vnder the command of Constantinus his brother by the mothers side, a right valiant capitaine. By whose good seruice, and the commodious situation of the places, he gained diuers other townes and cities, and at length the greatest part of PELOPONNESUS, out of the hands of the Latines: for the vtter rooting out of whom, hee shortly after with a great armie passed ouer into THRACIA, with purpose (as was thought) to haue besieged CONSTANTINOPLE: but finding it to be a matter of more difficultie than was before supposed, he left that, and laied siege to the castle of PERRA, oueragainst it on the other side of the haue, in hope by winning of that castle to haue become master also of the towne: where he was notably repulsed, and enforced with losse to retire. So rising with his armie, hee fortified diuers castles and strong holds in the countrey about CONSTANTINOPLE, and put into them strong garrisons, charging them, with continuall incursions to trouble the Constantinopolitans, and to cut them so short, if it were possible, as that they should not dare to looke out at the gates of the citie. Which they so well performed, that in short time the Latines in the citie were driuen to such extremitie, that for want of wood they were faine to burne many of the fairest houses in the citie in stead of fewell; which done, hee returned againe to NICE, the cheefe seat of the Greeke emperours, euer since that CONSTANTINOPLE was taken by the Latines.

Now reigned in CONSTANTINOPLE the Latine emperour Baldwin the second (as is before declared) a man of small courage, and lesse power, and therefore not much regarded either of the Greeces or Latines: who for the maintenance of his state was glad to sell away the publick ornaments of the citie, and to pawne his sonne vnto the Bruges marchants for money; by whom hee

A was left at VENICE to be brought vp: which gaue occasion for some writers to report, That he was pawned vnto the Venetians.

About this time Mango, the great Chan of TARTARIE, stirred vp by Aiton the Armenian king, by whose persuation he had also receiued the Christian religion, sent his brother Haalon with an exceeding great armie against the Turkes and Sarraffins in SYRIA and the land of PALESTINE. This Haalon conuerted also vnto the Christian faith by his wife, setting forward with a world of people following him, in the space of six moneths ouertran all PALESTINE, with the countreies adioyning, excepting one strong place in the mountains (which some say was SAMARCHAND, afterward the royall seat of the great terror of the world, the mightie Tamerlaine) which besieged by ten thousand horsemen, by him there left for that purpose, and so continued by the space of seuen and twentie yeares after, was then at length (as Aiton himselfe writeth) yeelded by the defendants, onely for want of clothes to couer their nakednesse. Haalon in whose armie those ten thousand (left behind) were not missed, marching on, and as a violent tempest bearing all downe before him, entered at length into ASSYRIA, and there laied siege vnto the great citie of BABYLON, then the seat of the great Caliph; whom all the Mahometane princes honoured about all others, as the true successour of their great prophet Mahomet, and receiued from his mouth the interpretation of their law, as most diuine oracles. Which great citie Haalon woon, and putting to sword all he found therein, men, women, and children, with the spoile thereof and the rich treasures of the Caliph, enriched his souldiours. The Caliph himselfe (reserued for that purpose) he commaunded to be set in the midst of the infinite treasure which hee and his predeceffours had most couetously heaped vp together, and that he should of that gold siluer and precious stones take what it pleased him to eat, saying (by way of derision) That so gainefull a quest should by good reason be fed with nothing but things of greatest price, whereof hee willed him to make no spare: In which order the couetous wretch kept for certaine daies, miserably died for hunger, in the midst of those things whereof he thought hee should neuer haue had ynough; which though they were in valour great, and with great care laied together, yet serued they him not now to suffice nature, best contented with a little. BABYLON thus sacked, and almost rased, the Tartar marching on through MESOPOTAMIA, by the way took the citie of ROHAI, where Aiton the Armenian king and author of this the Tartars expedition, came vnto him with twelue thousand horsemen, and fortie thousand foot, as reporteth Aiton the Armenian kings nephew, then there present. So entering into SYRIA, in a few daies tooke ALEPPO, which hee sacked and rased in the yeare of our Lord 1260, with diuers other strong townes sometime belonging vnto the kingdome of ANTIOCH. Then was one Malacnesar Sultan of DAMASCO, commaunding ouer all SYRIA and the land of PALESTINE: who terrified with the losse of his cities, and the feare of farther danger, with his wife and children came and humbled himselfe before the Tartar prince, in hope so to haue saued vnto himselfe some good part of his kingdome. Wherein he was much deceiued, being (as some say) carried away a faire off into exile, because hee should not hinder the Tartars proceedings: or as others report (and happely with more probabilitie) being by him detained as his prisoner, and afterwards to the terror of his sonne, cut in peeces in his sight vnder the wals of DAMASCO, after that it had in vaine bene twice assaulted by the Tartars: which strong citie for all that he afterwards tooke by strong hand, and sacked it, and by the persuation of his wife ouerthrew all the Mahometane temples, as he had before in euery place where he came. But purposing to haue gone on forward to IERUSALEM, and to haue conquered the whole land of PALESTINE, newes was brought him of the death of his brother Mango, the great Chan: whereupon he staid his journey and returned backe againe, in hope of that great empire, hauing in this expedition spent almost six yeares.

Thus by the Tartars was the kingdome of the Turkes at DAMASCO ouerthrowne. At which time, the broken affaires of the Christians in SYRIA and the land of PALESTINE, might easily haue bene repaired, and those two goodly Kingdomes againe restored to the Christian commonweale, had the Christian princes of the West then in time put to their helping hands on the one side, as did the Tartars on the other: But they then at fall discord among themselves, and busied with their wares at home, let slip that so faire an opportunitie, the like whereof they seldome or neuer had since. Haalon the Tartar prince, in token of his good will toward the Christians and their affaires, at his departure from DAMASCO, left his sonne Abaga there with twentie thousand thousand horsemen to aid them in their warres, if they should come (as was expected) for the recouerie of the Holy land: who hauing there stayed some while, and hearing of his fathers troubles at home, followed himselfe after him, but yet left behind him Guirboca, a valiant captain, with ten thousand of his horsemen, to like purpose that his father had him: who by the inslencie of certaine Christian souldiours in garrison about Sidon, was of a friend together with his Tartars made a foe. These garrison souldiours hauing by chance set in some boote out of the Tartars territorie, not onely refused to restore the same againe, but also foulely intreated such as the Tartar had sent for the demanding thereof. Whereupon further quarrels arising, it fortuned a nephew of Guirboca, a valiant yooing gentleman, to be slaine: in reuenge whereof hee besieged Sidon, and hauing taken it, sacked it, and burnt it downe to the ground. After which time, he and his Tartars became vtter enemies vnto the Christians, doing them all the harme they could deuise.

The Egyptian
Sultan, invaded Syrin.

This discord betwixt the Tartars and the Christians, gaue occasion vnto Melech the Egyptian Sultan, now jealous of the Tartars neerenesse, with a great armie of his Mamalukes & others to enter into Syrin, and to spoile the countrey about Damasco; against whom Guirboca with his Tartars, although both in strength and number far inferiour, went out. But joyning battell with him at too much oddes, and the victorie inclining vnto that side where most strength was, he there valiantly fighting was slaine, with most part of his Tartars: such as escaped fled into Armenia vnto the friendly king. By this victorie all Syrin, with the land of Palestine, excepting some few places yet holden by the Christians, fell againe into the hands of the Egyptian Sultans; as did some of them shortly after also: for Banlocader succeeding Melech in the Mamaluke kingdome, comming into Syrin with a great armie, took Antioch from the Christians, & with it most of the other places before by them defended. The citie he burnt, & rased the castle down to the ground, and afterward entring into Armenia, did there great harme also.

from the Christians.

Whilest the Turks kingdome thus goeth to wracke in Syrin, ruined by the Tartars, but possessed by the Mamalukes; their affairs in the lesser Asia, now the whole hope of that nation, went not at that time much better: for Iathines the Turkes Sultan, there also invaded by the Tartars, and hauing lost Iconium his regall citie, fled with his brother Melech to the Greeke emperour Michael Paleologus, in hope to be of him relieved, for the kinnesse hee had not long before shewed him in like case, when as he fled from the late emperour Theodore; whereof now putting him in remembrance, he requested him either with some conuenient force to aid him, or els to assigne vnto him some corner in his large empire where hee might in safetie rest with his wife and children, and other followers, whom with much wealth hee had brought with him in great number. The emperour on euery side himselfe incombred with warres, thought it not good in so great newnesse of his empire, to diminish his owne forces: and to assigne vnto him any place to inhabit, seemed no lesse dangerous; for that he hauing been a great prince, and commanding ouer many great countries, and brought vp in all princely royaltie, was not like to content himselfe with a litle: beside that, his nobilitie, then dispersed by the Tartars, were like ynough in great numbers to resort vnto him, as vnto their head, so soone as they should once heare that he were seated in any place: and yet vnkindly to cast him off that had so honourably vsed him in like extremitie, the emperour was loath. And therefore feeding him vp with faire words, and foording him on from time to time with delaies, he held him a great while as a man in suspense, betwixt hope and despaire. At length in the absence of the emperour (though happily not without his priuie) he was commaunded with all his traine, in number about twelue hundred, to get him to Enusa, a citie of Thracia, standing vpon the sea coast: where he much discontented, liued like an honourable prisoner at large, but with the watchfull eyes of so many vpon him, as that he could by no meanes (as he desired) escape. In which case we will for a while leaue him, to feed vpon his owne melancholy thoughts.

Now had Michael Paleologus the emperour reigned at Nica two yeares, when new troubles began againe to arise in the West part of his empire on Europe side, by the trecherie of Michael Angelus, Despot of Epirus. For the speedie repressing whereof, he sent one Alexius Strategopulus, a worthie captain and a man of great nobilitie (whom for his good seruice against the said Despot, he had in the beginning of his raigne made Cesar) with little about 800 Bythinian souldiours, and commission for the taking vp of so many mo as he should for thar seruice need, in Macedonia and Thracia: commaunding him when he had passed the strait, with those those souldiers to take his way through the suburbs of Constantinople, to terrifie the Latines, whom he was loth to suffer too long to liue in rest and quiet: or to stir too far out of the gates, but to keepe them as prisoners coupt vp within the wals of the citie. This warlike captain with this handfull of men, passing ouer Propontis encamped at Rogium, not far from Constantinople; where by chance lighting vpon certaine poore labouring men Greekes borne in the citie, and there dwelling, he diligently inquired of them the state thereof, and of what strength the Latines were, with many other things, such as he was desirous to know: who not onely told him that the strength of the Latines was but small, but also that the greatest part thereof was gone to the siege of Daphnusia, a towne not farre off vpon the side of the Evxine sea: and withall (as Greekes euill affected to the gouernment of the Latines, and desirous of the libertie of their countrey) offered of themselves to shew him a meanes how to giue him entrance into the citie. These poore men dwelt within the citie, close by one of the gates, neere whereunto by an old ruinous mine almost swarued vp, was a secret vn suspected way into the citie, not knowne to any but to themselves: By this blind hole they promised him by night to receiue in fiftie of his best souldiers; which suddenly setting vpon the watch fast by, and dispatching them out of the way, might presently breake open the gate and so let in the rest of the armie: whereunto they promised themselves with their friends to put to their helping hands, assuring him of the good successe thereof. This plot for the betraying of the citie thus laied and agreed vpon, Alexius the Cesar, well rewarding the men, and filling them with greater promises, sent them away: who as if they had bene about their countrey worke, were after their wonted manner receiued into the citie, without suspicion at all. And within a few daies after according to their promise, at an appointed houre receiued in by night the aforesaid fiftie souldiours; who aided by them, presently slew the watch, and brake open the gate: whereby Alexius entring a litle before day, in conuenient place put his men in order of battell; and afterward to the greater terrour of the Latines, caused the citie to be set on fire in foure places, which increased with the wind, burnt in most terrible manner, and was in short time come almost to the emperours pallace. Who scarce well awaked, and seeing the citie all on a fire about his eares, and the enemy comming on; was about at the first with those few Latines that hee had (for Greekes he had none) to haue made head against them. But better aduised, and perceiving it to be now to no purpose, he (the last of the Latine Emperours that euer reigned in Constantinople) with Iustinian the Latine Patriarch, and some other of his friends, fled by sea into Evoca, and so from thence afterwards vnto Venice, and afterwards to Lewis the French king, in hope to haue bene by him and the Venetians relieved. After whom fled also all the rest of the Latines. Thus the imperiall citie of Constantinople by great fortune fell againe into the hands of the Greekes, in the yeare 1261, after it had bene in possession of the Latines, about 58 yeares.

The joyfull newes of the recouerie of the imperiall citie, was in short time carried vnto Michael Paleologus the Greeke emperour at Nica; who at the first beleued it not, as thinking it scarce possible so strong a citie to haue bene by so weake a power surprised, where as hee himselfe not long before was not able with a right puissant armie, and much other warlike provision, to win the litle castle of Galata ouer against it. But afterwards assured of the truth thereof, with his hands and eies cast vp towards heauen, gaue most heartie thankes to God therefore; causing hymnes and psalmes of thanksgiving to bee solemnly sung in euerie church, with all the other signes of joy and triumph that could be deuised. So setting all other things apart, he wholly busied himselfe in making preparation for his going to Constantinople, now once againe the seat of the Greeke empire: wherein, and in traueilling hauing spent many daies; he at length with the emperesse his wife and Andronicus his sonne, then but two yeares old, as if it had been in solemne procession on foot entred into the citie, by the gate called the Golden Gate; and so after praiers and thankes giuen, went to the pallace prepared for him neere vnto the cityard: for the other imperiall pallaces of greater beaultie (sometime the stately dwellings of the greatest emperours of the Greekes) had now of long during the raigne of the Latines, lien ruinous, or altogether defaced. And shortly after, because vertue and true desert should not want their due honour, he caused Alexius Cesar (by whose meanes the citie was recouered) in solemne triumph in his robes of honour, with a crowne vpon his head, not much inferiour vnto the imperiall crowne, with great pompe to bee carried through all the citie.

cite: and farther commaunded, That his name for one yeare next following, in all solemne hymnes and praiers of thanksgiving, should be joynd with the name of the emperor himselfe. And yet not thinking to haue done him honour enough, caused his liuely image afterward to be most curiously made, and as a trophie to be set vpon a faire marble pillar, before the great church of the holy Apostles, in perpetuall remembrance of him, and that he had done for the deliuerie of his country; which shortly after ouerthrowne by an earthquake; was by his sonne againe restored. Now was this great and famous cite, sometime the beautie of the world, by these strange and fatall mutations, woonderfully defaced and brought to great desolation: in euery place was to be seene great heapes, or rather (to say the truth) great hills of rubbidge, the eternall witneses of the ruine thereof; the houses stood some quite fallen downe, some readie to follow after, and some other great and stately buildings now the small reliques of great fires: for the great beautie thereof was before, at such time as the Latines tooke it, most defaced by fire; who all the time that they had it, ceased not night and day to destroy some part or other of it, as if they had knowne they should not long keepe it; neither did this last fire raised by the Greekes themselves to terrifie the Latines, a little deforme it: for which cause the emperours chiefe care now was to cleanse the cite, and in best sort he could to reforme so great a confusion of things not to be all at once amended; first beginning with the churches, which ruinous or readie to fall, he repaired; and next to that filled the empty houses with new inhabitants. And albeit that the chiefe of the Latines were together with the emperor fled and gone, yet was the most part of the artificers and tradesmen of the cite, Venetians, and of them of PISA, mingled together; vnto whom also to joyne the Genowais, and so to fill the cite with Latines, he thought it not altogether safe, although that by them he reaped great profit: wherefore he assigned vnto them the cite of GALATA now called PERA, on the other side of the hauen, for them to inhabit, granting them great priuiledges, and euery of those companies to be gouerned by a Confull or Potestate of their owne. As for the imperiall cite it selfe, he stored it (so neere as he could) with naturall Grecks borne.

Now although all things went as Paleologus the emperor could himselfe haue wished; yet could he not rest so contented, for feare least those which now did eat their owne heards and with great griefe smouldred their anger, should at length as the rightfull heires of the empire by him vsurped, breake out into open force, and so breed him great troubles, yea and perhaps worke his confusion. For such is the tormenting state of vsurping tyrants, neuer to thinke themselves safe so long as any one liueth, whom they may suspect. Wherefore at once to rid himselfe of this feare, he thought it best so to dispose of the children of the late emperor Theodorus Lascaris, as that he should not need of them to stand in doubt: to take them out of the way, besides that it was a thing odious, he saw it like to be vnto him also dangerous; Marie and Theodora (two of the eldest daughters) being before by their father married vnto two great princes (one, the Despot of EPIRVS, & the other prince of BVLGARIA) with whom he had much before to do, and of them yet stood in some doubt; but these were safe enough out of his reach. Other two younger sisters there were in his custodie, Theodora & Irene, with their brother Iohn, the onely heire of the empire: Theodora he married vnto one Belicurt, a gentleman of PEROPONEVS; and Irene to one Vigintimilio of GENVA; both Latines; men of no great birth or power, such as he needed not to stand in doubt of. These two ladies, the daughters of so great an emperor as was Theodorus, thus basely biltowed; remained onely their brother Iohn, the onely heire of the empire, then but ten yeares old, whom Paleologus long before euen in the beginning of his raigne, had sent vnto MAGNÉSIA, there to be safely kept farre off from the court, for feare least in his right and quarrell some discontented persons desirous of innovation, should begin some new itims dangerous to his estate. Which indignitie done vnto the young prince, Arsenius the Patriarch (put in truit by his father for the bringing of him vp) tooke in so cuill part, that he forooke the court with all his ecclesiasticall dignities, and as a man wearie of the world, retired himselfe vnto a little monasterie of Paschas in the countrey, there to spend the rest of his daies. From whence for all that hee was after the taking of CONSTANTINOPLE from the Latines, almost against his will drawne thither by Paleologus the emperor, and made Patriarch thereof, there together with so great an honour to find his greater discontent. For Paleologus the vsurper, altogether vnmindfull of his faith so solemnly before giuen, for the safetie of the young prince, and the restoring vnto him of his empire; and now fully resolu'd to establish vnto him and his posteritie the soueraignie of so great an empire, how focuer it was got, caused the young prince eies to be most cruelly put out: the vsuall practise of the tyrants of the East, vpon such as they are loath or feare to kill, and yet would make them vsit for gouernment. Of which barbarous crueltie, his sister Theodora (married to Constantinus prince of BVLGARIA) hearing, ceased not with teares and praiers and all other womanly persuasions, to stir vp her husband in reuenge thereof: whereunto also Iathatines the Turkes Sultan, gaue no small furtherance; who wearie of exiles; and to bee so into a corner confined, as into a prison from whence hee might not start, by secret messengers entreated the Bulgarian prince to make war vpon the vsurping emperor: promising him a great summe of money, if by his helpe hee might recouer his former libertie. Wherewith hee the rather moued, with a great power of his owne and aboue twentie thousand Tartars which then lay by the riuer ISTER, suddenly brake into the emperours territories, and in shorter time than was to haue beene thought, ouerrun all the countrey of THRACIA euen vnto the sea side, leauing neither man nor beast in all the countrey as he went: in good hope also to haue by the way surprized the emperor himselfe; euen then returning from his wars against the Despot in THESSALIE: who hearing of his speedie coming, being got vnto the sea side, and (hauing no way left to haue escaped by land) shipped himselfe into a galley of the Latines, which with another her consort bound for CONSTANTINOPLE, by good hap put in there for to water, and so in two daies arrived in safetie at the imperiall cite. Thus disappointed of the emperor, all his care was for the deliuerie of the Turkes Sultan. Wherefore marching in hast to ENVM, he so terrified the citizens with his coming, that they without farther delay deliuered him into his hands, so to redeeme their owne peace. In his returne you might haue seene the souldiours, especially the Tartars, driuing before them infinit numbers both of men and cattell, in such sort, as that in the open countrey of THRACIA for a space, was hardly to be seene either countreyman or beast, it was so cleane swept both of inhabitants and like-wile of cattell.

Iathatines the Sultan by the Tartars carried ouer ISTER, and so by them set at libertie, shortly after died. In whose kingdome succeeded not his sonne Melicke (as some write) but two others (as the Turkes themselves report) the one called Mesoot, the sonne of Kei-Cubades, and the other Kei-Cubades, the sonne of Feramicine, borne also of the Selzuccian family, as were all the other Turkes Sultans, but how neere of blood vnto the late Sultan Iathatines they say not. Betwixt which two, as his vassales, Gazan the great Tartar Chan (by whom they were so preferred) for the payment of a yearely tribute, diuided the Turkes kingdome: apportioning vnto Mesoot the cities of AMIDA in ancient time called AMISVS, and AMISVS in GALATIA, MELATIA otherwise called MELETINE in the lesser ARMENIA, SIVASTE, in ancient time SEBASTIA, and HARBERIE, before SATABREA, both in CAPPADOCIA, with all the countrey about them. And vnto Kei-Cubades, ICONIUM, the auncient seat of the Turkish Sultans, with all RUMILIA ASIATICA, or the countries of the lesser ASIA alongst the sea coast; which these two princes held as the Tartars tributaries, as had the late Sultan Iathatines before them, vntill such time as he was by the same Tartars againe expelled. So that the Turkes kingdome, which had of long time flourished in the Selzuccian familie in PERsia, in SYRIA, PALESTINE, and EGYPT, there quite ouerthrowne by the Mamalukes and Tartars (as is before declared) & now brought vnderfoot in the lesser ASIA also, where only rested all the hope of that nation, was now at a low ebbe, deuided betwixt two weake princes, raigning but at the deuotion of the Tartar. In which confusion of the Turkish empire, so rent, not onely diuers men of greater power and authoritie amongst them, shared vnto themselves, some one corner of the declining kingdome, and some another: but many of the obscure and basest people also, bearing with them nothing but their bowes and arrowes, tooke the strait passages of the mountaines, and from thence with their dayly incursions did much harme in the countries of the Christians joyning vpon them: which was no great matter for them to doe, the garrisons which were wont to defend the same, being for want of pay quite disbanded, and the castles vpon the frontiers by them abandoned; which at the first, as a thing of small importance neglected, was at length vnto the Greekes a great cause of the ruine and decay of the greatest part of their state in ASIA. These mischeefes vnregarded, grew dayly more and more, the Turkes still gaining vpon the Greekes what they lost vnto the Tartars. Whole inuations (the glorie of their kingdome onely excepted) was not so hurtfull vnto them, as the cause of their much greater felicitie afterwards. At length it fortuned, that a great power of these aduenturous Turkes meeting together in PAPHLAGONIA, were about to haue intaded the territories of the Christians: against whom Michael Paleologus the emperour sent out a strong and puissant armie to stay their further coming on, lest breaking in that way they should without resistance at their pleasure forrage the countrey before them: Which armie conducted by vnskillfull captaines, encountering with the Turkes, was by them in a great battell ouerthrowne and utterly defeated, few or none of all that great multitude escaping: for whilest the Greeks vnadvisedly pursued the Turkes, retiring of purpose before them, they were by them drawne into the danger of a greater power lying in ambush for them; and so entraped, were slaine with an exceeding great slaughter. After which so great a victorie (the beginning of the miserie of the Christians in the lesser ASIA) the Turkes without let or stay ouerran all the countrey, vnto the riuer SANGARIUS: vpon the banks whereof the Greeke emperour was glad to fortifie diuers townes and forts to keepe them out of BITHINIA: Neuerthelesse, they in short time after subdued all the countreys from PONTVS and GALATIA, vnto the LYCIAN and CARIAN sea, and the riuer EVRIMEDON, which they diuided amongst them into diuers Toparchies: little or nothing acknowledging the soueraigntie either of Mesopot, or Kei-Cubades.

Whilest the Turkes in the lesser ASIA thus win from the Christians on the one side, and loose to the Tartars on the other; many an hard conflict in the meane time passed betwixt the Egyptian Sultans with their Mamalukes, and the Tartars, for the soueraigntie of SYRIA. The poore remainder of the Christians all that while there, in doubt both of the one and of the other: From whom and from the Armenians (then also much infested by the Mamalukes) diuers embassadours were sent vnto the Pope & the Christian princes of the West, to craue their aid and helpe in that their hard estate: whose praers little preuailling with the rest, yet so moued Lewis the French king, and Henry the third, then reigning in ENGLAND, that they both promised them aid. VV hereupon Lewis a man of great deuotion, and alwaies forward in that seruice against the infidels, tooke vpon him the crosse, the cognisance of the sacred war; causing his three sonnes, Philip that succeeded him in the kingdome, surnamed the Faire, Peter countie of ALANCON, and John countie of NEVERS (surnamed Tristan, for that his mother was in her greatest heauinesse for the taking of her husband, deliuered of him in ÆGYPT) and most of the nobilitie of FRANCE to do the like: vnto whom also Theobald king of NAVAR his sonne in law, Alphonse his brother, and Guydo earle of FLANDERS, joyned themselves. And so hauing put all things in readinesse, tooke his way to MARSEILLES, and from thence embarking himselfe with his armie in the Genouaies ships, hired for that purpose, set forward the first of March in the year 1270. But being at sea, he was by force of weather constrained to land in SARDINIA, and there to stay a while: departing thence, he at length arriued at CARTHAGE, the place by him desired, where in the entrance of the haven he surprised certain of the enemies ships; but landing his men, and assaulting the town, he was there notably repulsed. This is not that ancient great and famous cite which sometime mightily stroue with the proud mistresse of the world for soueraigntie, but another built long after in the ruines, or at least not far from the ruines of the same. In the besieging whereof, the Frenchmen found such resistance, as well put them in remembrance of the ancient glorie of the Carthaginians. One day it fortuned as the king thus lay at the siege, that the defendants made a great and fierce sallie out vpon the Frenchmen, who before commaunded so to do, by little and little retired, to draw their enemies farther on: betwixt whom and the cite, the Constable with a great power coming in and charging them behind, and they which before retired now standing close vnto them, they were on both sides hardly beset; who for all that, as became valiant men, worthily defended themselves, and made there a great fight, though not without extreme perill: which they in the cite beholding, gaue out a most hideous and pitous cry, a certaine signe of their hard estate within; as saying with the suddenness thereof, both their friends & their enemies. But whilest they of the towne betwixt hope and dispaire stood thus beholding the fight at land, the Frenchmen by sea approaching a bulwarke on that side of the town, tooke it without resistance: which so dismayed them without, that they began forthwith to flie, of whom the greatest part casting away their weapons, were by the kings commandement taken to mercie; and they likewise of the towne vpon promise of their liues, yeelded the same.

A same vnto the king. CARTHAGE thus woon, the king layd siege vnto TVNES, the chiefe citie of that kingdome, being not farre off: where by the way he was encountered by the king of the countrey, who hauing there lost ten thousand of his Moores, betooke himselfe to flight with the rest. Who thus ouerthrowne, resolved no more to tempt fortune, but to keepe himselfe safe within the wals of his citie, if happily so he might (as it oftentimes falleth out) more weaken his enemies by lying still and protracting the time, than by open force and valour. Which their purpose king Lewis perceiuing, resolved not to stirre from thence vntill that he were become master of the citie; which as it seemed could not hold out for want of victuals, considering the multitude of people that were got into it. Neuerthelesse thus besieged both by sea and land, and so straightly hemmed in on euerie side, as that no reliefe could possibly bee brought vnto it; yet held it out by the space of six moneths. After which time wants dayly more and more increasing among the besieged, embassadours were sent out to the king, to entreat with him of peace: But whilest these embassadours go too and fro, and reason vpon the capitulations of the desired peace, behold a great and furious plague arose in the French campe, which began to cut them downe by heapes: there died John Tristan countie of NEVERS, the kings yongest sonne, borne in the first expedition that the said king his father made into the Holy land, euen at such time as hee was taken prisoner; which Tristan died the five and twentieth day of August in the yeare of our Lord 1270. The good king hauing yet scarcely performed the obsequies of his sonne, fell sicke of the bloodie flux, whereof he there shortly after died also. About which time arriued there Charles king of SICILIE, the French kings brother, with a great number of fresh souldiours: whose coming lightened somewhat the Frenchmens hearts (heauie for the death of their king) and daunted the Moores, before brag of the same. Shortly after whom arriued there also prince Edward, king Henrie the third his eldest sonne, who traueilling through FRANCE, and taking shipping at AQUESMORT, not far from MARSEILLES, was now in ten daies with a braue companie of Englishmen come to TVNES; and there of the other Christian princes, namely of Philip the French king (his father Lewis being now dead) of Charles king of SICILIE, and of the two kings of NAVAR and ARAGON, joyfully receiued. But these princes had a little before his arriual concluded a peace with the Moores king, and the infidels, vpon condition that he should pay a yearely tribute of forie thousand crownes vnto the king of SICILIA; and to suffer the Christian religion to be freely preached in his dominions, by such deuout persons as should be there left for that purpose; and that vnto such persons as should by their preaching bee conuerted vnto the faith in Christ Iesus, it should be lawfull for them to be baptized, and to professe the Christian religion: Of which peace, prince Edward vnderstanding, did what hee might to haue dissuaded them from the same, saying, That the war was by them all taken in hand against the infidels, as enemies vnto the crosse of Christ, with whom they were not to haue peace: and for the recouerie of the Holy citie. But say what he would, and what he could, the peace (to his great discontentment) was now concluded, which they might not (as they said) againe breake: and thereupon with the first faire wind hoisted saile, and returned towards SICILIA, with purpose the next Spring to haue gone into SYRIA; which their determination was shortly after by the hand of God disappointed. For being come vpon the coast of the island not far from DREPANVM, most of the great princes and other nobilitie, in their long boats went on land, the rest of the fleet lying at anker about a league off; for that being for the most part ships of great burthen, they were not able to put into the harbour: But as they so lay, by force of a sudden and violent tempest then arising some were eaten vp with the wrought sea; some falling foule one of another, there perished together; others driuen vpon the maine, were there beaten in peeces: so that of that great fleet before the storme ceased, perished about an hundred and twentie saile, with all the people, as well mariners as souldiours left in them, and great store both of armour and munition: In such sort that most of the common souldiours and mariners which had escaped the plague at TVNES, there vpon the coast of SICILIA perished by shipwracke. Onely prince Edward's fleet, being in number but thirteene ships, escaped free without losse either of ship or man. Neither were they that were got to land at DREPANVM in much better case, the plague still following them; whereof died Theobald king of NAVAR, and Isabel his wife, king Lewis his daughter, Elizabeth the French queene, with a woonderfull number of noble gentlemen, and other common souldiours; in such sort that Philip the French king discoudiscouraged with the greatnesse of the mortalitie, and the miserable losse at sea, resolved thier to make an end of the intended warre, and so returned into FRANCE, as did the rest that were left, every man into his owne country. Onely prince Edward having passed that Winter in Sicily, with the first of the next Spring set forward againe on his voyage, and in fifteene dayes after arrived with his fleet at PTOLEMAIS: where after he had by the space of a moneth rested himselfe and his souldiors after their long traueill, and fully inquired of the state of the country, hee with six or seven thousand souldiors marching from PTOLEMAIS about twentie miles into the land, tooke NAZARETH, and put to sword all them he found therein, and so againe returned. After whom the enemies following, in hope to haue taken him at some aduantage, he vnderstanding thereof, turned backe vpon them, and killing a great number of them, put the rest to flight. And after that about Midsummer, vnderstanding that the Saracins were againe making head at a place called CAKHOW, about fortie miles off, he set forwards towards them; and coming vpon them early in the morning, before they were awate, slew about a thousand of them, and dispersed the rest. Aided also by the nobilitie of CYPRUS, he with like successe as before, made a third expedition against the Infidels: inso much, that his fame began to grow great amongst them, and they to stand of him in no little dread. But whilest he thus preuailed, he was by foule trecherie almost taken out of the way. The Admirall of IOPPA faigning himselfe desirous to become a Christian, and willing to further the princes proceedings, had by a secret messenger and letters fundrie times intelligence with him, as well concerning his owne good intertainment, as the effecting of that which he had promised. This messenger by the Admirall thus employed, was (though to the prince vnknowne) one of the Assasins, a companie of most desperat and dangerous men among the Mahometanes, who strongly deluded with the blind zeale of their superstition, and accounting it meritorious, by any meanes to kill any great enemy of their religion; for the performance thereof, as men prodigall of their liues, desperately aduenture themselues vnto all kind of dangers. So now this messenger, before resolved to die, comming the fift time vnto the prince, and being searched for hauing any weapon about him, as the manner was; had access vnto him, then lying in his chamber vpon his bed, in his jerkin, bare headed, because of the heat of the weather: where after due reuerence done, hee pulled out certaine letters from his lord vnto the prince, which he read with great delight, as penned of purpose for to please. But as hee was farther questioning with him of many matters, and all the companie voided, the desperat messenger making as though he would haue pulled out some other secret letters, suddainly pluckt out an enuenuomed knife, which he had secretly hidden about him, thinking to haue stricke him into the bellie as he lay: For the auoiding of which stroke, the prince lifting vp his arme, was therein greuously wounded. But as the villaine was about to haue doubled the stroke, the prince with his foot gaue him such a blow, that he felled him to the ground, and with that starting vp, caught him by the hand, where in strugling with him for the knife, in wrestling it out of his hand, hee hurt himselfe therewith in the forehead: but getting it from him, presently thrust it into the murderers bellie, and so slew him. The princes seruants being not farre off, and hearing the busteling, came running in; where finding the messenger dead on the floore, one of them with a stooke beat out his braines: whereat the prince tooke some displeasure, for so striking a dead man. This danger of the princes, much troubled and grieved all the Christians in SYRIA, and the more, for that the wound in his arme, after it had bene certaine dayes well dressed by the skilfull surgeons and physicians, began to mortefie and grow blacke, inso much, that they and others about him began, to mutter among themselves, and to looke heauily vpon the matter, as not without danger. Which he perceiving, said vnto them: Why whisper you thus among your selues? what see you in me? can I not be healed; tell me the truth, and feare not: whereunto one of them answered: And like our highnesse, we doubt not of your healing, but that it will be painefull for you to suffer. If so be (said he) may againe restore my health, I commit my selfe vnto you, worke on me your skill, and spare not. So the next day they cut out all the dead and poysoned flesh out of his arme, and in fifteene dayes after perfectly cured his wound, to the great reioycing of all his people. The great Sultan to cleere himselfe of this so dishonourable a trecherie, sent three of his noblemen vnto the prince, calling to witnesse his false prophet, that the same was done neither by him nor his consent. Which embassadours the prince honourably vsed, but suffered them them not to come nigh him. So hauing taried eighteene moneths at PTOLEMAIS, and no aid comming from the other Christian princes as was expected, he tooke shipping; and returning homeward, landed first in SICILIA, and from thence crossing ouer into APULIA and so traueilling to ROMA, was there honourably entertained by Gregorie the tenth, then Pope; and from thence by the way of FRANCE arrived in ENGLAND, where he was shortly after crowned king in the yeare 1272, his father the old king, Henrie the third, being a little before his returne dead.

The yeare following, Gregorie the tenth, not ignorant of the hard estate of the Christians in SYRIA (as hauing there ben of late himselfe with prince Edward, at which time he was in his absence elected pope) and now desirous to procure them some reliefe, ratified the election of Rodolphus of HAPSPURGE vnto the empire, vpon condition, That he should promise to take vpon himselfe the crosse, and to giue them reliefe: for the performance whereof, he offered vnto the emperor two hundred thousand crownes, with the tenths both of the cleargie and temporaltie for sixe yeares: and many goodly blessings were in his name also, by the preachers of that time, promised vnto all such as should with him take vpon them that sacred warre. Whereupon the emperor with all his familie tooke vpon them the crosse, the signe of the sacred expedition intended; as did also the duke of LORRAINE shortly after, with some others: Neuertheless, the emperor otherwaies busied in warres against the Bohemians and Bauarians, and delaying still the time, as not greatly willing to take vpon him so long and dangerous a journey, and the Pope still threatening his high sentence of excommunication, the time passed, the Pope died, and nothing was as yet done. Vntill that at length the emperor hauing happily finished his warres in BOHEMIA, and finding himselfe at some good leisure in some part to discharge his vow, and to satisfie the expectation the world had of long conceiued of him, sent Henrie prince of MEGAPOLIS, or as the Germanes call it, MECKELBURG, with a strong power into SYRIA, to performe what himselfe had promised. Who comming to PTOLEMAIS made many notable incursions into the country about DAMASCO, with fire and sword destroying all before him as he went, and carrying thence many great and rich booties; vntill that at length he was by the Mamalukes circumuented and taken prisoner, and so carried vnto the Sultan at CAIRE, where he remained in strait prison fixe and twentie yeares after; vntill that by chance one of the Mamalukes (a renegate Germane) being chosen Sultan, caused him to be brought before him, and at his comming demanded of him, If it would not doe him good to celebrate the remembrance of the natiuitie of his Christ with his friends in GERMANIE? (for now that time of the yeare was at hand) And I know (said the Sultan) that thou art so addicted vnto thy superstition, that thou respectest the same more than thy libertie. Truih (said Henrie) mightie prince: for libertie would auaile me nothing, if Christ by his most milde incarnation had not taken away our captiuitie: and therefore how much all men owe vnto the reuerend remembrance thereof, I would to God thou, O king, diddest also vnderstand, which as I most heartely wish, so I would I could thereof persuade thee. God forbid (said the Sultan) for I remember, that at such time as I was cheefe engineer vnto thy father at KNESE-FENCKE in LITVONIA, and there did him good seruice, I was altogether of the Christian persuasion; but now hauing left that common error, haue therewith also changed my priuat fortune. But as for thy religion, I haue nothing to say, my talke is only concerning thy libertie: Wouldst thou therefore gladly be free, and so returne home to thy friends? That nature craueth (said Henrie) although my fortune gaine saith, which yet dependeth of your pleasure: I desire indeed to returne home, which if you shall denie me, I must as I haue done, take it in good part; assuring my selfe, that my wife Anastasia, with my beloued sonnes Henrie, Leo, and John, haue long since celebrated my funerals, and ended their mourning. Thou art deceived (said the Sultan) for I am sure that they know that thou yet liuest, and pray most heartely for thy returne. Truly I owe much vnto the remembrance of thy father, and therefore this day giue thee thy libertie. And hauing so said, furnished him with all things necessarie, and gaue him leaue to depart with one Martin his seruant, who taken with him, had borne him companie all the long time of his captiuitie. So taking his leaue of the Sultan, he came to PTOLEMAIS: but shipping himselfe for CYPRUS, he was by the way by certaine pyrats taken at sea, and as a fugitiue captiue brought backe againe vnto the Sultan: Who pitying his hard fortune, set him againe at libertie, and by a ship set out for that purpose, transported him into CYPRUS: where he was by the queene of that Island his aunt (as some say) honourably entertained; and so furnished of all things fit for his estate. Departing thence, he came to MARSILLES, where after he had some few daies refreshed himselfe, he from thence trauelled by land home into his owne country: where at the first he was not knowne of his own children and friends, as being growne old in prison, and by them long before accounted among the dead; but now at last found againe, and by them knowne, he was of his children joyfully received as their father, and of his subjects as their prince. Howbeit he shortly after died, and was honourably buried in the monasterie of DOBRAN.

Thus in the whole course of this historie it appeareth by that which is already written, what notable expeditions euen the greatest Christian princes of the West, to their immortall glorie from time to time vndertooke against the enemies of Christ and his most sacred word, and for the reliefe of the poore distressed Christians in SYRIA and in the land of PALESTINE: where of as diuers of them had right glorious successe, vnto the great profit of the Christian common weale; so some of them answered not with like euent, as vndertaken with too small strength, or otherwise ouerthrowne by the discord or mallice of the Christians themselves, rather than by the enemies force. Which neuerthelesse how vnfortunatly fouer they fell out in the hands of such woorthie men as vndertooke them, yet haue they this glorie, commendation, and comfort, That they were taken in hand for the honor of the sonne of God, Christ Iesus, and the defence of his veritie, against the false Prophet Mahomet, and his most blasphemous doctrine; so honourable and just a quarrell, as might well become the greatnesse of the greatest prince, yea of all the princes of Christendome. Yet could not the woorthinesse thereof, euen in those more zealous times, or the dangerous estate of that part of the Christian commonweale, euen then like to perish, (as some others bee now) or the lamentable complaints of the poore oppressed Christians, crying out vnto their Christian brethren for aid, any whit moue the Christian princes of that time, with their combined forces to reach vnto them their helping hands, or to yeeld vnto them any succour or reliefe: for they little feeling those harmes so farr off, and more regarding their owne hereditarie quarrels, employed those forces one against another, vnto the effusion of so much Christian blood, as might haue sufficed not for reliefe of the distressed Christians in SYRIA onely, but to haue regained whatsoever had bene before from them taken by the Turks or Sarafins. The Germane princes were still at a jarre about the choice of their emperours: the French agreed not with the English, or them of the Low countries: neither the English with the Scots: the Arragonians were at oddes with the French: and in Italie were almost as many deadly factions as prouinces. Of which discord of the Christians (the greatest occasion of their ruine and decay) Melechares the Egyptian Sultan vnderstanding by his espials, raised a great armie of the Mamalukes, and others, with a full purpose to haue utterly rooted out all the remainders of the Christians in SYRIA and the land of PALESTINE, and so to haue entirely joyned those two great countries vnto his owne kingdom. But what he had so mischieuously deuised, he liued not to bring to passe, being in the midst of those his great designes taken away by suddaine death. After whom Alphis (or, as some call him, Elpis) succeeding him in the kingdom, and with a puissant armie entring into SYRIA laid siege to TRIPOLIS, which he at length tooke by vndermining of it, and put to sword all the Christians therein, except such as by speedie flight had in time got themselves out of the danger, and raised the citie downe to the ground: Which calamitie beided vnto the Christians the ninth of Aprill, in the yeare 1289. Presently after he had the strong castle of NALESINE yeelded vnto him, wherinto hee put a strong garrison, to hinder the Christians from building againe the late destroyed citie. In like manner also hee tooke the cities of SIDON and BERYTHUS, which hee sacked, and laied them flat with the ground. And after that hee remooued to TYRE, which after three moneths straight siege, was by the citizens (now out of all hope of releefe) yeelded vnto him, vpon condition, That they might with bag and baggage in safetie depart. With like good fortune hee in short time, and as it were without resistance, tooke all the rest of the strong townes and castles which the Christians yet held in SYRIA and the land of PALESTINE, excepting onely the citie of PROLEMAIS; wherunto all the poore Christians fled, as vnto a Sanctuarie, to bee there defended by the honourable knights Templars and Hospitalers. Nothing now left vnto them more than that strong citie, the Sultan of his owne accord made a peace with them for the space of five yeares, fearing (as was supposed) to haue drawne vpon him all the Christian princes princes of the West, if he should at once haue then utterly rooted out all the Christians in those countries together.

The Christian affaires thus brought to the last cast in SYRIA, and yet faintly as it were breathing, by the benefit of the late obtained peace: Peter Beluse, master of the Templars, with the Grand Master of the knights Hospitalers, suddenly passed ouer (as embassadours from the rest) into EUROPE, vnto Nicholauus Quartus then Pope, crauing his fatherly aid: who moued with so great miseries of the poore afflicted Christians, solicited the other Christian princes to haue sent them reliefe; especially Rodolph the Germanie emperor, who then busied with the affaires of the empire, and his troubles neerer home (as were the other Christian princes also) gaue good words, but no helpe at all. Yet some of them vnder the colour thereof, got from their subjects great summes of money, which they employed to their other worse vses: onely the Pope sent fiftene hundred men at armes, whom with deuout perswasion, and much earnest preaching, hee had induced to take vpon them that sacred expedition, and entertained them of his owne charge: vnto whom also many others out of diuers countries, vpon a religious zeale, joyned themselves, as voluntarie men; who meeting together at BRUNDISIUM, and there embarked, with the two grand masters of the Templars and Hospitalers, in safetie at length arrived at PROLEMAIS. There was then in the citie a great number of people of all sorts; of able men there was about fiftie thousand, and about fortie thousand of the weaker sort: amongst whom, diuers murders, felonies, rapes, and such other shamefull outrages (all haasting the dreadfull judgements of God) were daily committed, and let passe vnraged, more than of them that were so injured. For all the cheefe commaunders were then at variance among themselves, euery one of them laying claime (not woorth a rush) vnto the vaine title of the kingdom of HIERUSALEM. Henry king of CYPRUS comming thither with a great fleet, charged the Templars to deliuer vnto him the crowne of that kingdom, which they had (as he said) wrongfully taken from Americus and Guy, his ancestors. And Charles king of SICILIA, by his embassadours laid claime vnto the title of that kingdom, as due vnto the kings of that Island: and vnderstanding it to be given vnto Henry, king of CYPRUS, caused all the reuenues of the Templars within his dominion to be brought into his treasuries, and their lands and houses to bee spoyled. Hugh also prince of ANTIQCH, laboured with tooth and naile to defend the ouerborne right that his father and grandfather had vnto that lost kingdom. And the countie of TRIPOLIS laied in for himselfe, that hee was descended from Raymond of THOLOUS; and that beside himselfe remained no prince of the auntient nobilitie, which had woon that kingdom out of the hands of the Sarafins, and that therefore that regall dignitie did not of better right appertaine vnto any other than vnto himselfe. Neither did these foure princes more strue for the title of the lost kingdom, than for the present government of the citie, straight way about to perish. The Popes Legate pretended thereunto a right also: for that king John Brenne had before subiected it vnto the See of ROME. As for the claime vnto the citie of PROLEMAIS, the Patriarch of HIERUSALEM challenged vnto himselfe the preheminence: for that the metropolitane citie of TYRE, vnder which the citie of PROLEMAIS was the third episcopall seat, was vnder his iurisdiction, euen by the decree of the West church. The Templars also, and the knights Hospitalers, whose power in the citie was at that time faire the greatest, pretended the government thereof of best right to belong vnto them, as the just reward of their blood already, and afterward to be spent in the defence thereof: promising great matters if it might be wholly referred vnto them. Neither spared the French king or the king of ENGLAND by their messengers to claime the soueraignetie of the citie, by their predecessours sometimes woon. And they of PISA hauing still a Consull therein, and by often marriages with the naturall inhabitants growne into great affinity with them, did what they might to get the gouernment into their hands. The Venetians also by their authoritie and great wealth laboured to gaine the good will of the people, sparing therein no cost. And they of GENOA no lesse cunning than the rest, supplanted the strongest factions, by giuing aid both apertly and couertly vnto the weaker; that so hauing weakened the faction they most doubted and hated, they might by the joint fauour of the weaker aspire vnto the government of the stronger, and so consequently of the citie it selfe. The Florentines also by their continuall traffique thither, were not out of hope by one fineness or other amongst so many competitors.

to find a meane to step vp aboue the rest. But the greatest part of the people for all that were most inclined vnto the Armenians and Tartars, as both for their neerenesse and power most like of all other to stand them in stead. All these ayimed at one marke, which was the gouernment and commaund of the citie: and most of them had in the same their owne proper lawes and courts, to decide their causes and controuersies in. Whereby it came to passe, that euery man might without checke or controulement almost doe what he list, the offenders from one court to another remoouing their sutes, as best serued their turnes. Thus were murders (as is before said) daily committed in the streets, men abused, houses robbed, shops broken vp, and many other outrages done, to the halting of the wrath of God, and greefe of all good men.

Diuision and dissention (the ruine of all commonweales) thus raigning in the citie (the souldiours of late sent thither, or in zeale come of themselves, for the defence thereof) gaue occasion for the speedie destruction of the same: Such is the power of the Almighty, in his wrath and judgements for sinne, euen by those things wherein wee most trust and joy to worke our viter ruine and destruction. These souldiours, for want of such pay as was promised them, were enforced to seeke abroad, and therefore contrarie to the league before made with the Egyptian Sultan, oftentimes went out in great parties into the frontiers of his territories, taking the spoile of such things as they light vpon: Whereof the Sultan vnderstanding, demanded by his embassadours, That restitution might be made; and the offenders deliuered vnto him to bee punished, according vnto the league. But in that so sicke a state of a dying commonweale, neither was restitution made, as reason would, or yet the embassadours courteously heard. With which insolencie the Sultan prouoked, sent Emilech Araphus, a notable captaine (and as some say, his sonne) with an hundred and fiftie thousand men, to besiege the citie: who comming thither, and hauing made his approaches, had by a mine in short time ouerthrowne a peece of the wall; but in seeking to haue entered by the breach, he found such strong resistance, that hee was glad with losse to retire. Whilest Araphus thus lay at the siege of PTOLEMAIS, Alphir the Sultan died at DAMASCO, in whose stead the Mamelukes made choice of this Araphus for their Sultan, who more desirous of nothing than of the glorie of the viter rooting vp of the Christians in SYRIA, was so farre from raising of his siege (either for the death of the Sultan, or the newes of his kingdome) that hee more straitly beset the citie than he had in the three moneths space that he had there lien before. Now had they in the citie chosen Peter the master of the Templars, their gouernour, a man of great experience and valour: vnto whom and the rest of the nobilitie, the Sultan offered great rewards, and vnto the souldiours their pay, with free libertie to depart, so that they would without more adoe yeeld vnto him the citie, which they could not long hold: Which his offer the master rejected, and flatly told him, That hee had not learned of his auncestours, to sell for money vnto the Infidels a citie bought with so much Christian blood; either did so much regard his vaine threats, as therefore to forget his seruice due vnto his Sauour Christ and the Christian commonweale. With which answer the tyrant enraged, the next day with all his forces assaulted the citie, and that in such desperat and furious manner, as if hee would euen then haue carried it; hauing before filled the ditches, and promised the spoile vnto his souldiours, the more to encourage them. Yet hauing done what he could, and lost a number of his men, slaine both in the assault, and in a fallie which the Christians made out at the same time, he was enforced to retire backe againe into his trenches. In this so terrible an assault, not repulsed without some losse also of the Christians, the Grand master and gouernour of the citie was wounded with a poysoned dart, wherof hee in three dayes after died: with whom the courage of the defendants fainted also, no man being left like vnto him to vnderake so great a charge, although many there were, that ouerweening of themselves, desired the same. In the beginning of this siege, the Christians had sent away all their aged and weake people, vnfit for seruice, into CYPRUS, where they in safetie arrived. But now many of the better sort, both captaines and others, discouraged, one after another conuaghted themselves away out of the citie: of whom a great number in passing thence to CYPRUS, were vpon the coast of the Island, together with the Patriarch drowned. In the citie remained only twelue thousand, which were thought sufficient for the defence thereof: who afterwards (as some report) fled also by sea after their fellows, and so left the citie emptie vnto the barbarous enemy: some others reporting of them more honourably, as that they should right valiantly defend the citie against the assault of their enemies, vntill such time as that most of them being slaine or wounded, and the rest by force driuen from the wals into the market place, and there for a while notably defending themselves in flying thence vnto the ships, were by the way all cut in sundry, or else drowned. But howsoever it was, the Sultan entering the citie (by the Christians abandoned, or by force taken) gaue the spoile thereof vnto his souldiours; who after they had rifled euery corner thereof, by his commaundement set it on fire and burnt it downe to the ground: and digging vp the very foundations of the wals, churches, and other publicke and priuat buildings, which the fire had not burnt, left there no signe of any citie at all; but purging the place euen of the very heapes of the stones and rubbidge left of the rased citie, made it a fit place for husbandmen to plough and sowe corne in; which he did both there at SYDON, BERITUS, and other townes alongst the sea coast, because they should neuer more serue for a refuge vnto the Christians, or giue them footing againe into those countries. Thus together with PTOLEMAIS was the name of the Christians vterly rooted out of SYRIA and the land of PALESTINE, in the year 1291, about 192 yeares after the winning of HIERUSALEM by Godfrey of BULLION and the other Christian princes his confederats.

This losse, as tending to the great disgrace of the Christians in generall, moued not a little euen the greatest of the Christian princes; wronged all or most part of them in the persons of the Templars or knights Hospitallers, their subjects, so shamefully now quite cast out of SYRIA and the land of promise: howbeit, troubled with their owne turbulent affaires at home, or with their neighbour princes not fare off, none of them once stirred for the redresse or reuenge thereof. Onely Cassanes the great Tartar prince, hauing of late subdued the Persians, and married the daughter of the Armenian king (a ladie of great perfection, and of a Mahometane become a Christian) at the request of his wife and his father in law tooke the matter in hand. And for that purpose hauing raised a most puissant armie of two hundred thousand fighting men, and aided by the Armenians and Georgians, passing ouer the mountaine AMANUS into SYRIA, not farre from the citie HAMA met with Melencaser, the Egyptian Sultans lieutenant, with a mightie armie, whom hee ouerthrew in a great and mortall battell, wherein fortie thousand of the Egyptians are reported to haue beene slaine, and so draue him quite out of SYRIA: sending Molais, one of his captaines, with part of his armie to pursue him, who neuer left him vntill hee had chased him ouer the desert sands into EGYPT. The victorious Tartar after this battell tooke the citie of HAMA, where lighting vpon the great treasures of the Sultan, hee bountifully deuided it, together with the spoile, amongst his souldiours; reseruing nothing thereof vnto himselfe, more than a sword and a casket full of secret letters. The Egyptian thus put to flight, he without resistance tooke in most of the cities of SYRIA, with the citie of HIERUSALEM also; which in many places by the Turkes and Egyptians defaced, he againe repaired: and together with the temple of our Sauour gaue it to the Armenians, Georgians, and other Christians, repairing thither out of CYPRUS, CRETE, and other places, to inhabite. And hauing himselfe honoured the holy places with great gifts, returned with his armie to DAMASCO, which was forthwith deliuered vnto him. But lying there, with purpose in Autumne following to haue gone into EGYPT and to haue vtterly destroyed that kingdome, hee was certified of new troubles arising in PERSIA, and some other parts of his empire: for repressing whereof, hee with the greatest part of his armie returned himselfe into PERSIA, leaving one Capeapus gouernour of DAMASCO; who after the ouerthrow of the Sultans armie had reuolted vnto him; and Molais (of whom wee haue before spoken) gouernour of HIERUSALEM: commaunding them at his departure to rededifie the citie of TYRE, and to send embassadours vnto the Christian princes of the West, to ioine in league with them, for the more sure holding of those new gained countries. And so TYRE was indeed repaired as he had commaunded, and deliuered to the Christians, with a convenient garrison for the keeping thereof: but the embassadours comming to the proud bishop Boniface the eight, then Pope, whom of all others it befecmed to haue furthered their business, they could of him obtaine nothing, but returned as they came. For he at the same time fallen out with Philip the French king, thundering out his excommunications, discharging his subjects of their loyaltie, and so much as in him was, depriving him of his kingdome, had giuen the same vnto Albertus duke of AUSTRIA, whom he had declared emperor: whereof arise great troubles. Besides that, he being of the Guelphes faction, was not in any thing more carefull, than of the vtter extinguishing of the contrarie faction of the Gibellines, especially of the moit honourable family of the Columnij, of whom some hee had slaine, some he had depriued of their honours, some he had imprisoned, and driuen other some into exile; so that thus wickedly busied for the maintenance of his owne proud estate, he had no leifure to further the good of the Christian common weale: which his intollerable pride, and forgetfulness of dutie, long escaped not the reuenging hand of God; being when he thought least suddenly taken prisoner at his fathers house in the citie of ANAGNIA (where he was borne) by Sara Columnius his mortall enemy; whom but lately before redeemed out of a pirates gally, the French king had sent for that purpose, with one Longaret, or as some call him Nogaret, a French knight: By whom the proud prelate brought to ROME, in the castle S. ANGELO within fise and thirte daies after moit miserably died, in his madnesse (as some report) renting himselfe with his teeth and deuouring his owne fingers. This worthie Tartar prince Cassanes, by whom the Christian common weale might haue againe risen in SYRIA and the land of PALESTINE, had not the pride of the great bishop, and the dissention of the Christian princes hindered the same; was as Silvius writeth (who was present in this warre, following his vnckle the Armenian king) a man of a verie short stature, and exceeding hard fauour; but with valour, bountie, and other vertues of the mind plentifully recompensing what wanted in the feature of his bodie. After whose departure into PERSIA, Capeapus gouernour of DAMASCO, considering that the power of the Tartars therelst was not great, and that no aid was to be expected from the other Christian princes of the West, to recompense his former treason of reuolting from the Sultan, with a new reuolt from the Tartar; rise vp into open rebellion, drawing after him not onely the citie of DAMASCO, but the greatest part of SYRIA also: whereof Molais gouernour of HIERUSALEM vnderstanding, was about to haue gone against him with his Tartars; but aduertised by his espials, that Capeapus in this his conspiracie had compacted with the Egyptian Sultan also, perceiuing himselfe too weake to withstand so great a power, he retired with his Tartars into MESOPOTAMIA, there expecting new supplies both from Cassanes and the king of ARMENIA. Of whose departure out of SYRIA, the Egyptian Sultan vnderstanding, came directly with his armie to HIERUSALEM, which he tooke, being forsaken of the inhabitants; and profaned the temple, sparing onely the sepulchre of our Sauour at the humble site of the religious, making there a greater shew of deuotion than of crueltie. After that he woon all the other lesser townes, which the Tartars had either kept for themselves, or giuen to the other Christians, and vtterly rased all the castles and forts of the Hospitallers and Templars: which valiant men without other helpe, for the space of almost a yeare held out against the Tyrant, in which time most of them were honourably slaine: the rest that were left aliue, being taken by the enemy, had neuertheless leaue giuen them with bag and baggage in safetie to depart, hauing before by solemne oath for euer abjured the countrey of SYRIA: and so these woorthie men, the great ornaments of the Christian common weale, the Hospitallers and Templars, which to the vttermost of their power had by the space of 300 yeares right woorthily defended both the Christians & the Christian religion against the infidels in SYRIA & the Holy land, were now for euer driuen out thence, about the yeare of our Lord 1300, to the great dishonour of all Christendom.

Wherefore with them now taking our leaue of SYRIA and the Holy land, leauing the same in the possession of the Aegyptian Sultan and the Mamalukes, although it were shortly after like enough to haue beene againe recovered from them by the Tartars, had not the death of the great Tartar prince Cassanes, and their domestical troubles letted: we will againe retorne vnto the troubled affaires of the Turkes in the lesser ASIA, whither the course of time had somewhat before called vs, with the occurrences thereof, more proper vnto our purpose and the argument we haue in hand, but that all cannot be at once told: And for the better vnderstanding of the desirous Reader, I thought it not good abruptly to breake off the course of the aforesaid historie drawing so neere vnto an end, but to make him partaker of the heauinesse thereof.

Now had the Turkes no kingdome left in the lesser ASIA, and that also at the pleasure of Gazan the great Tartar Chan diuided betwixt Mesoot and Cei-Cubades, as his vassals, bound vnto him by a yearly tribut (as is aforesaid:) who both kept in awe by the greatnesse of the Tartar, did nothing woorth the remembrance, but as they liued so also died, almost buried in obscuritie. Of these two, Mesoot died without issue; but Cei-Cubades departing, left behind him his sonne

Aladin,

Aladin, who by the name of Aladin the second succeeding in the kingdome, vniued againe the same before diuided, yet paying still tribut vnto the Tartar his soueraigne, as had his father with the other late Sultans of the Turkes before him. Much it was not that this Aladin did, albeit that the power of the Tartars in his time began to decline, & not to lie so heauie vpon the Turkes as before. He was a man of a quiet spirit, & therefore much delighted in peace: a great freind vnto Othoman the first founder of the glorious and mightie Othoman empire, as in his life shall appeare. But this Aladin, the last of the Turkes Sultans of the Seluccian family, dying without issue; one Sahib his Vesir-Azemes or chiefe counsellor, and then a man of greatest authoritie, aspired vnto the kingdome, which he had for most part himselfe swaied all the raigne of the late Sultan his master: which vsurped soueraintie, no way vnto him due, he could neither himselfe long hold, or deliuer to his posteritie: for that many others of the nobilitie, men of great power, and borne of greater families than he, enuying at his honour and disdaining to be gouerned by him, or any other no greater than themselves; laid hold some vpon one countrey or prouince, some vpon another, where they were able to do most, erecting vnto themselves greater or lesser Satrapies, according to the measure of their owne strength and power, without respect of any superioritie one should haue ouer another; but euery one of them absolutely commanding ouer so much as he was able by strong hand to hold. So that as it had oftentimes before chanced, That great Monarchies destitute of their lawfull heires, had in part, or all, become rich preis vnto such as could first lay strong hand vpon them: euen so fell it now out in the great kingdome of the Turkes; euery one of their great princes, measuring the greatnesse of his territorie not by the measure of his right, but by the strength of his owne power. Wherein they shared so well for themselves, that Sahib at first in possession of all, was in short time thrust quite out of all: and so the great kingdome of the Turkes in the lesser ASIA, brought vnto a meere Anarchie; no king now left among them, the whole kingdome being now diuided into diuers Satrapies, or other lesser Toparchies. The greatest of these princes that thus shared the Turkes kingdome amongst them, was one Caraman Alusirius; who as strongest, tooke vnto himselfe the citie of ICONIUM, the regall seat of the Turkish Sultans, with all the great countrey of CILICIA, and some part of the frontiers of the countreys of LYCAONIA, PAMPHILIA, CARIA, and the greater PHRIGIA, as far as PHILADELPHIA, and the citie of ANTIOCH vpon the riuer MANDER: All which large territorie, was of him afterward called CARAMANIA, and by the same name is commonly at this day knowne, and by our late Geographers described. Of this Caraman also dissended the Caramanian kings, who of long time after vnfortunatly stroue with the Othoman Sultans for the soueraintie of their empires; vntill that at length they with their kingdome, and all the rest of these Turkish Satrapies, were in the fatal greauesse of the Othoman empire, swallowed vp and deuoured, as in the processe of this historie shall (if God so will) in due time and place be declared. Next neighbour vnto him was Saruchan, of the Greekes called Saruchanili, of whom the countrey of IONIA-MARITIMA was and yet is called SARUCHANILI, and SARUCHANIA, that is to say, Saruchans countrey. The greatest part of LYDIA, with some part of the greater MISIA, TROAS, and PHRIGIA, fell to Calamus and his sonne Carassius, of whom it is called CARASTIA, or CARASTILI (or as ye might say) Carassius his countrey. The greatest part of the ancient MISIA, with some part of LYDIA, was possessed by Aidin, and was of him called AIDINIA or AIDINILI, as his countrey. Some part of the great countrey of PONTUS, with the cities of HERACLEA-PONTICA, CASTAMONA, SYNOPE, and others neere vnto the EUXINE, and the countrey of PAPHLAGONIA, fell into the hands of the sonnes of Omer, or as the Greekes call him Amur: of whom that countrey tooke not name, as did the others, of such princes as possessed them, but is commonly called BOLLI, of a citie in that countrey by the Turkes so named. As was also MENDESIA, or as some call it MENTBSIA, a countrey in the lesser ASIA, so by the Turkes called MENDOS or MENDUS, a citie in CARIA. There were beside these, diuers other places and Toparchies in the lesser ASIA, which in the renting of this great kingdome, from the Turkes received names, before vnto the world vnknowne; all which to prosecute were tedious: Sufficeth it vs, for the manifesting of the Turkes Anarchie, and the ruine of their kingdome in the lesser ASIA, as in part also for the more euidence of the heauie historie following, to haue remembered these as the chiefe; especially such as tooke their names of such great princes or captaines as in that so great a confusion of the Turkes kingdome, by strong hand first ceazed vpon them, and so left them to their their posteritie, of whom much is to be said hereafter. These princes one and all that thus shared the late Aladinian kingdome, were dissended of the better sort of the Turkes which with the Selzuccian and Aladinian Sultans driven out of PERSIA by the Tartars, had vnder them seated themselves in the lesser ASIA, as is before at large declared. Now amongst these great men thus divided the Turkes kingdome, most of them that write of the Turkes affaires, both Greeks and Latins, reckon vp Othoman (the raiser of his house and familie) for one; who indeed in the later time of the late Sultan Aladin began to flourish, and was of him for his valour extraordinarily fauoured (as in his historie shall appeare,) but of his kingdome held no more than one poore lordship, called SIGOUTA in BYTHINIA not far from the mountaine OLIMBUS (long before giuen vnto his father Ertoghrull for his good seruice) with such other small holds therabout as he had himselfe gained from the weake Christians his neighbours. For although he were a Turke borne, yet was he not of the Selzuccian family, as were the rest, but of another house and tribe, and therefore not of them fauoured or thought to haue so good right vnto any of the late Sultans prouinces or territories, as had they who being of his house and holpen with the prescription of time, enuied at the sudden rising of this Oguzian Turke, being vnto them as it were a meere stranger: whose fortune for all that (I know not by what secret foreknowledge) they seemed to feare, as in time to grow dangerous vnto them and their posteritie; wherein they were no whit deceiued. But of him and his proceedings much more is to be said hereafter: leaue we him now therefore with the rest vnto their fortunes in this the Turkes Anarchie, and so conclude this part of our Generall Historie: Glad when I looke backe to haue waded thus far, yet fearing to be drowned before I get ouer; such a sea of matter and world of troubles yet remaining, nor without much labour and toyle, and that in long time to be passed through.

With endlesse wars the Asian state farre spent and ouerworne:
By Saracens and Tartars force, is all in peeces torne.
The Christians draw their bloodie swords, wherewith themselves to wound:
And GREECE with ciuile discord seekes it selfe for to confound.

THE RISING OF THE GREAT AND MIGHTIE EM- PIRE OF THE TURKES VNDER OTHO- MAN FIRST FOVNDER THEREOF, VVITH HIS LIFE AND DOINGS.

HAT small assurance there is in mens affaires, and how subject vnto change euen those things are wherein we for the most part repose our greatest felicitie and blisse, (beside that the whole course of mans fraile life, by many notable examples well declareth) nothing doth more plainly manifest the same, than the heauie euent and wofull destructions of the greatest kingdomes and empires: which founded vpon great fortunes, encreased with perpetuall successe, exalted by exceeding power, established with most puissant armies, wholesome lawes, and deepe counsels; haue yet growne old, and in time come to naught: So that euen as men, all things else belonging vnto man, are subject vnto the ineuitable course of desti-nie, or more truly to say, vnto the fatall doome of the most highest, prefining vnto euery thing that in time begun, a time also wherein to take end, being himselfe without time the great commander thereof, and of all things else done therein. The same of the first Assyrian Monarchie, is verie antient, and was no doubt both great and long, yet hath it neuerthelessse found an end; and the more to put vs in remembrance of our infirmitie, was neuer with so much glorie and valour by Nimus erected, as it was with shame and cowardise by Sardaniapalus subuerted. VVith like necessitie fell the great empire of the Medes and Persians, the time thereof being come. And after them, the Macedonians also. Neither hath the great Romane empire, or the proud ciue of ROME it selfe (sometime the mistresse of the world) herein found any exemption, but runne the same course with the rest: which growne great with continuall triumphs, and so strong as that it was not with foreine power to be shaken; conuerted the forces of it selfe vpon it selfe, to the ouerthrow of the antient libertie thereof, together with the vter subuersion of the state. After which time that mightie monarchie (of all that euer yet were, the greatest) vnder the Romane emperours felt many an hard and perillous storme, and by little and little still declining (though sometime like a sicke aged bodie, by the valour or vertue of some one or other her woorthie emperours a little relieved, and by and by againe cast downe by the folly or negligence of some others succeeding) it became at length a prey vnto a foolish rude and barbarous nation, which it had before oftentimes ouercome; and ouer which many the Romane captaines had triumphed, and thereof taken their glorious surnames: which now again without compassion, burning and sacking it, caused it to stoope, and to yeeld vnto the seruile yoke which it had in former time proudly imposed vpon the necks of others: wherein if any thing be to be blamed, it is not the fortune or folly of this or that man, then sitting at the helme (although that may also much helpe

the matter as a meane) but the instabilitie of worldly things neuer permanent, but alwaies changeable, and the sooner for their heigh; and that so forcibly as that no man knoweth how to remedie the same, either if he did were he able to performe it; the greatest meane that men could possibly deuise for the stay thereof, being oftentimes by a greater power from above, conuerted vnto the more speedie effecting of that, against the which they were by mans wisdom provided. The like might be said of the Athenians, the Lacedaemonians, the Thebanes, and of whom not? What maruell then, if the ancient kingdomes of the Turks likewise in PERSIA, and the lesser ASIA, in SYRIA, PALESTINA, and EGYPT, hauing run their appointed times, mightily impugned by the Christians, oppressed on the one side by the Tartars, and on the other by the Mamalukes, and at length by themselves rent in sunder (their destinie so requiring) lost at last their wonted majestie, and so fell into a meece Anarchie, as is in the former part of this Historie at large declared: Yet in this farre more than any other people fortunate, That after the ruine of their former kingdomes, straight way out of themselves arise another, namely this Othoman monarchie, the cheife object of this Historie: which at the first scarce of the world perceived, or of themselves regarded, in short time so prospered, as that the power and glorie thereof obscured not their former kingdomes onely (nothing, in comparison of this) but euen the greatest monarchies of the world; ouer a great part of which, it now so proudly triumpheth, as if it should neuer haue end: at the beautie whereof the world woondereth, and at the power thereof quaketh: within the greatnesse whereof are contained no small portions of ASIA, EVROPE, and AFRICKE, but euen the most famous and fruitfull kingdomes thereof: no part of the world left vntouched but AMERICA onely; not more fortunate with her rich mines, than in that she is so farre from so great and dangerous an enemy. The foundation of this so great a kingdom (and now so mightie an empire, as holdeth the world in awe) was first laid by the valiant Othoman, or as the Turkes call him Osman; not descended of the Selzuccian familie; as were all the former Turkes Sultans) but of the Oguzian tribe and kindred: in whose line this glorious empire hath euer since, by the space of three hundred yeares and thre, to the astonishment of the world, woonderfully flourished; and so yet doth at this day vnder the gouernment of Mahomet the third, which now reigneth thirteenth in dissent from him, knowing none in this world greater than himselfe. But for as much as both his greatnesse, and the greatnesse of the rest of the Othoman kings and emperours his progenitors, tooke their beginning from this woorthy and warlike Othoman, with whose life and doings we purpose to begin this part of our Historie, it shall not be amisse both for the continuation of that we haue in hand, which that we haue already written, and for the more manifesting of that which hereafter followeth, a little farther to set his race and descent alio: Not meaning with a long and faigned pedigree to set him out of Noah his arke, (which continuall succession of princes, no nation of the world, be it neuer so ancient, the Iewes onely excepted, and they also by writings and histories as much as was possible eternized, could truly and iustly challenge) but onely so far as shall be pertinent vnto our purpose, and by the authoritie of good histories to be auerred.

At such time as the Turkes kingdom founded by Tangrolipix in PERSIA, flourished in the Selzuccian princes his successours, there was also another kingdom of theirs at the cite of MACHAN, as is before declared, but nothing comparable to the other either in glorie and power. In this cite, and ouer this small kingdom, reigned one Solyman, by his subjects honoured also with the name of a Sultan or king; at the same time that the Tartars vnder the leading of old Zingis their great captaine, leauing their owne countrey, and bearing downe the world before them, hauing conquered the farthest parts of the East, and there seated their kingdom, turned their forces into PERSIA, and there ouerthrew the Turkes kingdom at BALCH in CORASAN, and draue the Turkes with Cussumes their last king, out of the countrey: after that they had there from the time of Tangrolipix reigned about an hundred and seauente two yeares.

This Solyman of whom we speake, then reigning at MACHAN, was not of the Selzuccian familie (as were all the other Turkes Sultans, the successours of Tangrolipix) but of the Oguzian tribe, a family famous also amongst the Turkes: Who seeing the Selzuccian Sultan Cussumes (or as some call him Cussumes) his countreyman, beaten out of his kingdom by the Tartar, and his countrey ouerrun, and the great Caliph of BABYLON also ouerthrown; thought it not good longer to stay in that countrey which he could not hold, but by speedy flight betimes to provide for the safetie of himselfe and of such his subjects as would follow him. And hearing that Aladin

the sonne of Kei-Hnfren, or as the Greeks call him Cai-Cosroe (a great man of the Selzuccian familie, and neere of kin vnto the late Sultan Cussumes) who for feare of the Tartars, but lately come into ROMANIA ASIATICA, had there by force of armes most honourably learned himselfe and the Turkes his followers, amongst the Christians: in hope of like good fortune, and for the zeale towards his superstition (accounting all well gotten that was gained from the Christians) tooke his way after him, with such of his kinsmen and subjects as would accompanie him in his new aduentures. And coming to ARTERVM, a cite in the borders of ARMANIA and CAPPADOCIA, thereabout in the countrey according to the season of the yeare, leaured himselfe with his followers, being in number many; who with their wiues and children after the manner of the Tartar Nomades: their ancestours, in poore tents and carts covered with a course kind of cloth, had followed him; being indeed nothing else but a verie rude and rough kind of sturdie heardsmen, not wedded to any place, but still remoouing with their tents and carts vp and downe, as best serued for their purpose and the feeding of their cattell, as doe the Turcoman nation, the true dissent of the Turkes, in many parts of ASIA at this day: and were thereof not onely called Nomades, that is to say heardsmen, (by which name the proud Italianes will oftentimes in contempt call euen the greatest of the naturall Turkes) but Hamaxophoretie, and Hamaxobij, that is to say, people carried or liuing in carts: Solyman hauing staied a while about ERZERVM, remoouing thence came to AMASIA; and there spoiling the countrey then inhabited by the Christians, did them much harme, oftentimes encountering them in the plaine field, and sometimes ccazing vpon their townes and cities, vntill he had subdued vnto himselfe a right large territorie: yet at length hauing in so many battels by him fought, and cities by him besieged, lost a great number of his people, and so wearied the rest, as that they were not willing farther to follow him; and feareing also with such small power as he had left, to be able to defend and keepe the countrey by him already gotten, in the midt of so many enemies; thought it best to depart thence, and to seeke his better fortune elsewhere. At the same time it was titely reported, that the affaires of PERSIA after so long trouble (for all this was not a while in doing) began to grow againe to some good quiet; the furie of the Tartars being now well abated; and that storme ouerblowne: wherefore Solyman resolved now to returne home againe, and to visit his natie countrey, of him and his people about all others desired. So passing through SYRIA (for that was now his way) neere vnto ALLEPO, he ceased vpon a castle called ZIABER-CALA, and there staied a space for the refreshing of his people. Afterward setting forward againe, he came at length to the great and famous riuer EUPHRATES, ouer which he must needs passe: But finding there neither bridge nor foord, or other means to get ouer, he stood still as a man dismayed, not knowing what to do. Stay there he would not, &c go further he could not: his desire bid him goe, but the great riuer said, nor so. In this perplexitie Solyman himselfe with his horse oftentimes taking the riuer, in hope to haue found some passage; but finding none, aduenturing too far, was with the force of the streame carried away, and so together with his horse drowned. His bodie after long seeking, being at length found, was with the great lamentation of his people buried neere vnto the castle ZIABER, not long before by him taken: whereof they say the place is at this day in their tongue called Mesart-Zuruc, that is to say, the Turkes Graue. Some of these Oguzian Turkes, after the death of their Sultan, wearie of their long trauell, seated themselves in the countrey therabouts, vnto whom the Turkes that now hold that castle do refer their beginning. The rest of that great tribe and familie diuersly diuided, went vnto diuers places as their fortunes led them; some of them into the wast ground and deserts of ARABIA and SYRIA, and are at this day called the Damascene Turcomians: other some returned backe againe into ROMANIA, the same way that they came, of whom are descended the Turcomians of ICONIUM and ANATOLIA: who yet with their wiues and children, as heardsmen, in great companies wander vp and downe the countrey, after the manner of their ancestours.

Solyman thus lost, left foure sonnes, Sencur-Teken, Iundogdis, Ertogrud, of some called Orthobules (the father of this Othoman founder of the Turkes empire that now is) and Dunder. With these foure brethren, most part of these Oguzian Turkes that were left, returning into ROMANIA (as is aforesaid) after they had there rested themselves a while, marching vp a long the riuer EUPHRATES came to a place called PASTIN-OVASI, about ten miles about ARTERVM, where Ertogrud and his brother Dunder, with foure hundred families, not willing to go any further staied with their tents and carts, their best dwellings. Sencur and Iundogdis their other two brethren, in the meane time passing the river, returned with the rest into PERSIA: whom we there leaue vnto their vnknowne fortunes. In this place Ertogrul with his brother and his three sonnes stayed a while, and had diuers conflicts with the country people thereabout, vntill that at length he thought it best to returne againe into ROMANIA. So setting forward, he came to ANCYRA, and from thence vnto the blacke Mountaines, and so to a plaine, called of the Turks Sultan-Vni about 75 miles Eastward from the cite of NICA in BYTHINIA, where he had many skirmishes with the Christians.

Now a good while before this, Aladin the elder (of whom we haue before spoken in the former part of this historie) fled out of PERSIA, had subdued diuers great prouinces and countie in ROMANIA ASIATICA or the lesser ASIA (for so it is more truly called) so that he was of all the people thereabouts accounted for a great prince, and of the Turks themselves honoured with the name of their Vlu Padischach, that is to say, their great king or emperour. Having placed his regall seat first at SEBASTIA, and afterward at ICONIUM; which two cities before ruinous, he repaired, and therein reigned, as did some few of his posteritie after him, as is before declared. Neither was Ertogrul ignorant of the honour, glorie, and power of this great Sultan: But hauing three sonnes, namely, Iundus, Sarugatin, and Othoman, sent Sarugatin his second son (a bold well spoken man) vnto him to request him in that his so large a kingdom, and as yet not well peopled by the Turks, to graunt vnto them his poore exiled countrymen of long time oppressed with diuers fortunes, some small corner for them with their families and cattell to rest in. Which his request, the Sultan not forgetfull of his owne distresse sometime in like case, graciously heard, & with great courtesie vsed the messenger. Now for the furtherance of his suite, it fortuned, that this Sultan before driuen out of PERSIA by the Tartars, and by them also much troubled in these his new gotten countries in the lesser ASIA, had with them diuers hot skirmishes, and sharpe conflicts; in one of which it fortuned the Sultan himselfe, with all the power he then had, to be hardly beset by his enemies, and in danger to haue lost the day: when as Ertogrul but newly come into the country, and willing to doe the Sultan seruice, and awaiting all opportunities for the commending of himselfe and his followers; vpon the suddaine vnllooked for, with foure hundred men came vpon the backs of the Tartars, then almost in possession of a great victorie, and so forcibly charged them, that vnable to indure the charge and to maintaine the fight against the Sultan (whose men encouraged by this v unexpected aid, as by succour sent from heauen, began now to fight with greater courage) being both before and behind hardly beset, they as men in despair of the victorie they had before assured themselves of, turned their backs and fled. After which good seruice, the Sultan honourably welcommed this new come Turke, giuing him his hand to kisse, as the manner of the nation is; and highly commending his valour, commaunded a rich cloke to be cast vpon him (amongst those Easterne nations a great honour) and all his souldiours to be bountifully rewarded: and presently after gaue vnto Ertogrul and his Turks a country village called SUGUTA, betwixt the castle of BILEZUGA and the mountaine TMOUS in the greater PHRYGIA: in which village they might liue in, in Winter; and vpon the foresaid mountaine, and the mountaine ORMENIUS, betwixt the rivers SANGARIUS and LICUS, feed their cattell in Summer. And yet not so contented thus to haue honoured him, in whom he saw such approoued valour, committed to his protection that side of the country wherein he dwelt, being in the very frontiers of his kingdom: which his charge he so well looked vnto, that all the country thereabout, before much infested with the often incursions of the enemy, was by his vigilant care and prowesse well secured.

Thus is Ertogrul the Oguzian Turke, with his homely hearthsmen, become a pettie lord of a country village, and in good fauour with the Sultan: whose followers, as sturdie hearthsmen with their families, liued in Winter with him in SUGUTA; but in Summer in tents with their cattell vpon the mountaines. Hauing thus liued certaine yeares, and brought great peace vnto his neighbours, as well the Christians as the Turks, before much troubled with the inuasions of the Tartars: it fortuned, that the Christians of CARA-CHISAR, a castle thereby (called by the ancient Greekes Melanopyrgon, and of later time Maurocastion, that is to say, the blacke tower or castle) wearie of their owne case, and of the peace they had by his means enjoyed, fell out with him, and euill intreated both him and his people. Which their ingratitude he taking in euill part, thereof, and of the wrongs by them done vnto the Turks, so grievously complained vnto the Sultan; that he therewith moued, raised a great armie, and so himselfe in person came and besieged besieged the castle. But lying there, at the siege, newes was brought him, That the Tartars with a great armie, vnder the leading of one Bamzar, were entred into CARA, and there spoiling the country, had taken HERACLEA. For the repelling of whom, the Sultan was glad to rise: with his armie; yet leauing a sufficient strength behind him for the continuing of the siege, vnder the charge of Ertogrul Beg, for so the Turks now called him. The Sultan afterwards encountering with the Tartars at BAGA, ouerthrew them in a great battell: where Ertogrul in the meane space hardly besieged CARA-CHISAR, wherein fortune so much fauoured him, that at length he tooke the castle, the spoile whereof he gaue vnto the souldiours, reseruing onely the fift part thereof, as due vnto the Sultan, which he sent him for a present, together with the captaine of the castle, whom he had taken aliue: which captaine the Sultan afterward enlarged, and restored again to him his castle, for the payment of a yearly tribute, which he truly paid during the life of the Sultan; but he dying about two yeares after, he refused any more to pay it, and so revolted from the Turks.

Sultan Aladin, founder of the Aladinian kingdom, (for so the Turks call it) being dead at ICONIUM, after him succeeded Adatines his eldest sonne; and after him Sathatines his yoonger brother, who slaine by Theodorus Lascaris the Greeke emperour (as is before declared) after him succeeded in that kingdom another Sathatines, the sonne of Adatines, who was by the Tartars expelled, and his kingdom subdued (as in the former part of this historie it appeareth.) After which time the Selauccian familie, there also by the Tartars in the lesser ASIA depressed, retained scarce the name and shadow of their former majestie and glorie. In which troublesome times, and confusion of the state, Ertogrul well beaten and wearied in the world, kept himselfe close in his house at SUGUTA, as well contented therewith as with a kingdom; seeking by all means to keepe peace on euery side with his neighbours, as well Christians as others. In which quiet kind of life he sweetly passed ouer the troublesome times of Mesoot the sonne of Kei-Cubades, and of Kei-Cubades the sonne of Feramusin, both Sultans, but the great Tartars tributarie, and reigning but at their pleasure, vntill the time of the second Aladin, the sole & last heire of the Iconian kingdom, before by the Tartars deuied, which was no few yeares. All which time Ertogrul liued quietly at SUGUTA, as one amongst many other of the Iconian Sultans subjects, wisely considering the fall of the Selauccian Sultans, both in PERSIA and at ICONIUM; as also the ruine of his own house and familie, both from royall state brought almost vnto nothing: and therefore with patience taking the world as it came, and making a vertue of necessity, contenting himselfe with a little, bare himselfe kindly towards all men. In which contented kind of life, he grew to great yeares, with his three sonnes, greatly beloved and honoured of their neighbours, as well Christians as Turks; and no lesse fauoured by the second Aladin, then Sultan, than he had been of all the Sultans before him; whom the yoong men his sonnes, after the manner of their nation (forbidding them with emptie hands to salute their princes) oftentimes visited with one present or other. In all which his sonnes were many good parts to be scene, yet so, as that in Othoman was easily to be perceived a greater courage and spirit than in the other two his brethren: which was the cause that he was the more of all them of his tribe regarded, but especially of the youthfull and warlike sort, which commonly resorted vnto him when he went to hawke or hunt, or to other delights of the field (the counterfeits of warre) and was of them commonly called Osman Gazi, that is to say, Osman the warlike.

In this frontier country neere vnto SUGUTA, the dwelling place of old Ertogrul, had Sultan Aladin diuers lieutenants and captaines, gouernors of his castles and strong holds vpon those frontiers, with whom Othoman was well acquainted, and vnto whom he for friendship sake oftentimes resorted: but especially vnto the captaine of IN-YNOI, for that he knew himselfe to be of him well beloved, and therefore vnto him very welcome. So it fortuned vpon a time, that as Othoman being yet but yoong, was going to make merry with the gouernor of ES-KI-CHISAR (a castle about foure and twentie miles off, called of the Greekes Paleocastron) by the way as he went, at a place called ITURNE (a towne in PHRYGIA) chaunced there to see, and afterwards to fall in liking of a faire maiden called Malhatun: vnto whom his affection daily increasing, he without his fathers knowledge sent a secret friend of his to intreat with her of marriage. Vnto whom after long discourse to her made concerning Othoman's affection and request, gaue him answer, That betwixt Othoman and her was great inequality, a thing especially to be regarded & eschued of such as wished to liue an happie life in wedlocke bands; she was (as she said) but meanly borne, and therefore was not to expect so great a match: whereas he could not want choice of other maidens of more worth, and in all respects more answerable vnto himselfe. But amongst other causes why she gaue him this answer, one was, for that some that wished her well, had put into her head, that Othoman meant not indeed to marry her, but vnder that colour to obtaine of her some few dayes pleasure, and so hauing dishonoured her, afterward againe to cast her off: which was indeed far from his thought; for he the more enamoured with her modest deniall, the more desired her for his wife. In the meane time, Othoman going againe vnto the gouernour of ESKI-CHISAR, and courteously by him entertained, chanced (as it oftentimes doth amongst familiar friends in their merriments) to fall in speech of his lotte, with greater affection than discretion, commending her beautie, her feature, and gracious perfections; not dissembling also, to her greater praise, the repulse by him receiued at her hands. Which the gouernour hearing, seemed greatly to like of his choice, saying, That she was by the diuine providence (for so the Turks religiously vse to speake) appointed only for him to haue. But in the meane time secretly inflamed with the immoderat commendations of Othoman, without respect of friendship, he began to grow amorous of her himselfe, whom he had neuer seene; so light is that foolish affection: and that so far, as that being otherwise a man of good discretion, he was not able to conceale or couer these new conceited flames, but that Othoman by certaine conjectures and tokens perceiued the same. And yet dissembling the matter, as if he had suspected nothing, being risen from the banquet, calling vnto him one of his trustie seruants, secretly sent him away vnto certaine of the maidens friends, willing them in his name, as they tendred her honour, without delay to send her away vnto some safe place farther off, for feare she were not ere long taken from them by a great man, more amorous of her person than respectful of her honour. And by and by after, taking his leaue of his vnfaithfull friend and bidding him farewell, tooke his way vnto the capitaine of IN-VNGI, whom he knew to be his deare friend. But whilst he there stayed certaine dayes, passing the time in hawking, hunting, and other youthfull disports, with the capitaine his friend; the gouernour of ESKI-CHISAR, who commaunded all the countrey thereabout (called Sultan-Vngi) sent one of his trustie seruants to IURNE, to see faire Mulhatun, and how all things there went: VVho comming thither, and vnderstanding of her secret departure; and that by the advertisement from Othoman she was conueyed to certaine of her friends a farre off; at his returne from point to point certified his master thereof. VVho exceedingly grieued with the report, and fretting about measure to see himselfe so deluded by Othoman, presently sent vnto the capitaine of IN-VNGI (being within his iurisdiction) to commaund him without delay to deliuer Othoman vnto him. But he louing of him well, as a faithfull man vnto his friend, could with no threats or intreatie be perswaded so to doe. VVherefore the gouernour in a great rage presently raising the greatest power he was able to make, came to the castle of IN-VNGI, requiring to haue Othoman forthwith deliuered vnto him. VVhere amongst the souldiours there in garrison with the captain, began to arise diuers opinions; some wishing, for the auerting of the present danger for which they were now vnprovided, to haue him deliuered; and other some abhorring so trecherous a fact, willing rather to indure all extremities. In the end after much consultation, honestie prevailed: & it was generally resolved, That he should be defended, who could not without their great infamie be deliuered. But Othoman terrified with that diuersitie of opinions, which had euen at the first shewed it selfe; and thinking it not for his safetie, to commit himselfe vnto the trust of such wavering men, entered into a deepe conceit of a matter of great aduenture, which was, by a suddaine fallie to make himselfe way through the midst of his enemies. VVherewith hauing made his brother Jundus and those few his followers there present acquainted, and thereupon resolved; he fiercely sallied out, and by plaine force brake through the thickest of them; & so tooke his way towards SUGUTA, still notably repulsing them that were sent to pursue him: But being come into the frontiers of his fathers territorie, and the report of his danger knowne, and that being but weakly accompanied he was by a great number of his enemies pursued; presently all the lustie youths and such as loued him well, tooke horse to come vnto his rescue: who meeting with the gouernours souldiours, that had Othoman in chase, in a sharpe conflict slew diuers of them, and put the rest to flight. Of whom some were also taken prisoners, and amongst the rest one Michael Coffer a Christian, capitaine of a little castle in that countrey called HARMEN-CAIA, or the rocke of Ormeni: of whom Othoman taking compassion, freely pardoned him that offence. him, and did him great seruice in his wars: whose posteritie hath euer since euen vntill this our age continued, next vnto the Othoman familie, most honourable and famous amongst the Turks, by the name of the Michael Oglies, that is to say, The sounnes or posteritie of Michael.

Ertogrul now spent with age, shortly after died, in the yeare of our Lord 1289, hauing liued 93 yeares, and thereof gouerned the Oguzian familie after the death of his father Solyman, 52. His death was of all his tribe and kindred greatly lamented, and his bodie after the Turkish manner honourably buried at SUGUTA, where he had of long time liued.

After whose death, these plaine Oguzian Turks, in a generall assemblie consulting whom they might chuse for their lord and gouernour in stead of old Ertogrul; casting their eyes especially vpon two, stood in doubt of which of them to make choice. For although most men were of opinion, That Othoman for the rare gifts and vertues as well of bodie as of mind, was to be preferred before the rest of his brethren, the sounnes of Ertogrul: yet were there some, and they also men of great grauitie and experience, who had in suspect the young mans age, as of it selfe slipperie, and for most part prone to vice, especially in the libertie of great power: and therefore thought it better to make choice of Dunder (Ertogruls brother, and Othomans vnckle) a man of far greater grauitie, judgement, and experience. But Dunder himselfe, being indeed a wise man and far from all ambition, perswaded them in that choice not to haue any regard at all vnto his honour or preferment; but to consider what were best for their state and welfare in generall. For he proudly foresaw in what danger the Oguzian state stood, exposed on the one side to the mortall hatred and trecheries of the Greekes, grieued to see themselves spoiled by the Turks, and naturally hating them for the Mahometane religion: and on the other side not surely backt with the Sultans of ICONTUM, brought in thraldome to the Tartars, and daily growne weaker and weaker: Vnto which inconueniences and dangers (he said) an old weak and ouerworne bodie (as was his) could giue no helpe or remedie at all; but required the helpe of a wise, politicke, vigilant, stirring, and valiant man, such as they all well knew was Othoman his brothers son. Thus before he came vnto the election, he in priuat declared his mind vnto the chiefe of the Oguzian familie: and afterward at their request comming vnto the generall assemblie, all mens minds and eyes now fixed vpon Othoman, he first of all (by his example to encourage the rest) for the good of the Oguzian tribe, his antient house and familie, saluted him their great lord and gouernour, promising vnto him all loyalty, with the vttermost of his seruice: whereunto by and by ensued the great applause of the rest of the people, as vnto a gouernour sent vnto them by God: Vnto whom they joyfully wished all happie successe, with long life, & a most prosperous government. Thus with all mens good liking was Othoman made the great gouernour of the Oguzian Turks, and so become amongst them a great commander, and honoured with the name of Osman-Beg, or The lord Osman. Yet was this his honour included in a small circuit, plaine and homely, without any great pompe or shew, as commaunding amongst rough and rude heardsmen and shepherds, not acquainted with the courttesie of other more ciuile nations: for as yet they were the same homely Scythian Nomades that they were before, and could not as yet be perswaded to forsake their wonted rude and vnciuile manners, by long tradition receiued from their auncestors, and so best agreeing with their nature and calling. Amongst which rude heardsmen, this new gouernour (himselfe not too far exceeding the rest in ciuilitie) commaunded much like vnto another Romulus, of whom also the Turks report many such things as do the Romans of their founder, which for breuitie I thought good to passe ouer.

Now it fortuneth that Othoman euen in the beginning of his gouernment, fell first at odds with on Hagionicholans, or S. Nicolas (captaine of ENEGIOL, a castle there by) for that he had oftentimes of purpose troubled and molested these Oguzian heardsmen, in passing too and fro with their cattell by his castle. For which cause Othoman was enforced to request the capitaine of BILZUGA (another castle thereby, also his neighbour and friend) that his people in passing that way to the mountaines, might with their goods and cattell as occasion should require, take the refuge of his castle; which the courtious capitaine (well acquainted with old Ertogrul, Othomans father) easily granted, yet with this prouiso, That none should with such goods or cattell haue access into his castle, but the Turks women only: which his courttesie Othoman refused not. So was the castle of BILZUGA from that time forward a refuge vnto the Turks women, who passing that way and there shrowded with their goods & cattell, vsually preferred the captain with some one homely countrey present or other, which afterwards was the losse of the castle.

Yet was not Othoman vnderstanding of the wrong done vnto his people, by his euill neighbour the capitaine of EINEGIOL: but purposing to be therof reuenged, made choice of feuerie of his best and most able men, whom he appointed secretly to passe the mountaine ORMENIUS, and so if it were possible, to surpris or set on fire his enemies castle. Of which his designment, the warie capitaine hauing intelligence by one of his espials, in place conuenient vpon the mountaine laied a strong ambush for the cutting off of such as were by Othoman sent to haue surpris'd his castle: whereof Othoman (no lesse warie than he) before warned by his scouts, and augmenting the number of his men, marched directly vnto the place where the enemy lay. Where betwixt them (for so small a number) was fought a right cruell and bloodie battell, and many slaine on both sides; amongst whom Hozza, Othomans nephew was one. The victorie neuerthelesse fell vnto Othoman: after which time his people in much more safetie fed their cattell in the summer time on the mountaines as their manner was, and so in quiet passed to and fro.

The Christians came out of the castle, and were slain by Othoman.

Shortly after, Othoman by night surpris'd the little castle of CHALCE, not far from EINEGIOL: and there without mercie put to the sword all the Christians he found therein, and so afterwards burnt the castle; which outrage was the beginning and occasion of great troubles therof ensuing. For the Christians of the countries adjoyning, much grieved therewith, and assembling themselves together, complained vnto the capitaine of CARA-CHISAR, the greatest commander thereabout, That these Turks, which not many yeares before were of mercie pitie receiued as poore heartsmen into that countrey, began now in warlike manner to lay violent hands vpon the ancient lands and possessions of the Christians; which insolencie (as they said) if it were longer winked at and suffered by him, and other such men of account and authoritie as were to reforme the same, they would no doubt in short time driue both them, and all the rest of the Christians out of their native countries: wherefore it were now high time and more than necessarie for him, and all the rest to awake (as it were) out of the dead sleepe wherein they had long time drowsily slept; and joyning their forces together, to expulse those vnthankfull enchroaching & mercielesse strangers out of their countries: The mischief they said being now spread far, therefore needed speedie remedie; and that repentance would come too late when it was past cure. The capitaine moued with the indignitie of the late fact, and just complaint of the poore countrey people, sent with all speed a strong company of souldiours, vnder the leading of Calanus his brother, with commendement that they should march vnto the castle of EINEGIOL, and there to joyne with the rest of the Christian forces.

Othoman vnderstanding of this preparation made against him, gathering his souldiers together, marched to a place called OPSIUM, neere vnto mount TOMOLVS in PHRIGIA, where betwene him and the Christians was fought a sharpe battell, wherein he lost his brother Saragatin (whom the Turks account for a saint or martyr at this day) with many other of his souldiours. In this battell was also Calanus slaine, whose belly Othoman caused to be ripped, and his intestines to be pulled out, naming the place where he was buried Mefari-Repec, that is to say, the Dog-Graue, by which name the place is at this day knowne. The bodie of his brother Saragatin he carried to SVGVTA, and there honourably buried it neere to the bodie of his father Ertugrul. Sultan of ICONTVM vnderstanding of this conflict, was verie forie for the losse hapned vnto Othoman, being a Mahometane of his owne religion: wherefore in token of his good will and fauour, he gaue vnto him the citie of PALEAPOLIS with all the territorie thereunto belonging, giuing vnto him also leaue to besiege, take, or spoile, the signiorie and castle of CARA-CHISAR: for accomplishment whereof, he sent vnto him both souldiers and munition. Othoman encouraged with this great bountie of the Sultans, straightly besieged the castle of CARA-CHISAR; which at last he wan, and slew all the Christians therein: the capitaine he tooke alive, whom he cruelly executed: the spoile of the castle he gaue vnto his souldiers, reseruing only the fift part thereof, which he sent for a present to the Sultan. All this happened in the yeare of our Lord 1290. This castle of CARA-CHISAR, with the rest, as EINEGIOL, BILEZVGA, CHALCE, and others before and hereafter in the life of Othoman to be mentioned, were all situate in the borders of the greater PHRIGIA, or else neere therunto in the confines of BETHYNIA and MYRIA: In which pleasant countries (but lately part of the Constantinopolitane empire) the Christians the ancient inhabitants thereof yet dwelt, intermingled with the Turks, at the rising of the Othoman empire; with whom they liued at continuall jars, vntill that at length they were by them altogether oppressed and extinguished.

Othoman

Othoman encouraged with this good successe, and supported by the great Sultan of ICONTVM, began now after his ambitious nature to conceiue greater matters, for the further increase of his honor and territorie: yet not trusting altogether to his owne deuise, he entred into consultation with his brother Iundus, which way was best to take to distresse and bring in subjection his neighbours the Christians. In which case, Iundus a man of greater courage than discretion, advised him with all celeritie to venge his good fortune, and presently to inuade the Christians already discouraged with the losse of CARA-CHISAR. But this counsell altogether pleased not Othoman for (said he) the castles & fortes by vs gained, must be kept with strong garrisons, otherwise they will againe be recovered by the enemy; which garrisons cannot be maintained and kept, if we spoile or dispeople the countries adjoyning vpon vs, for in so doing we shal (as it were) with our owne hands cut our owne throats: wherefore I thinke it better, that we enter into a league of amitie and friendship with the Christians round about vs, which league we will keepe with some, or breake with others, as shal serue best for our purpose. And according to this resolution, he made peace indeed with all the Christians, but especially with Michael Cossi, capitaine of HIRMEN-CATA castle, of whom we haue before spoken, who afterward serued him to great vse in the managing of his wars, and became also a renegade of the Mahometane religion. All this Othoman did the rather, because he was the at great variance with one German-Ogli (a great man among the Turks, but one of the Selzucian familie) who enuying at the rising of Othoman, sought by all means possible to hinder his greatnesse, as did also the others, his quietnes: which discord the Christians liked well, as a meane for them to liue in more rest by.

In the meane time, Othoman deuised with all carefulnesse to beautifie and strengthen his new commonweale: and for the greater concourse of people, built a faire temple in CARA-CHISAR for the exercise of the Mahometane religion; appointed markets to be kept in all peaceable manner in his great townes, granting great priuiledges vnto such as resorted thither, as well Christians as Turks; vsing therein such justice, that all sorts of people without feare in hope of gaine resorting thither, furnished his countrey and townes with all things necessarie: yet this care of ciuile policie and gouernment, could not so withdraw him, but that according to his aspiring mind, he had alwaies a greater desire and care to enlarge his possessions and territorie. Wherefore intending to make a road into BETHYNIA, he requested Michael Cossi, the Christian capitaine before mentioned, to deliuer his opinion what was best to be done: who so politickely directed him in that exploit, that he returned victorious, enriched with great spoile and more honor. This road so terrified most of the Christians thereabouts, that they were loth to giue Othoman any cause of offence, for feare least they should by him be spoiled.

It fortuned about this time, that the capitaines of BILEZVGA & CVPRI-CHISAR falling at odds; he of CVPRI-CHISAR first taking vp armes, fiercely inuaded the capitaine of BILEZVGA: who thereupon sent vnto Othoman, to pray his ayd, which hee caselie granted, and so without further delay presently came vnto him with certaine companies of lustie tall souldiours. By whose coming; the capitaine of BILEZVGA not a little encouraged and strengthened, set vpon his enemy: where betwixt them was made a sharpe conflict, and diuers on both sides slaine: but the victorie by the helpe of Othoman the Turke, at length enclining vnto the BILEZVGA, the other vanquished capitaine in all hast fled vnto his owne castle. After whome Othoman following, laid seige vnto the castle, which at length he tooke together with the capitaine, whom he caused to bee presently slaine. It is strange to tell, how proud the lord of BILEZVGA was, to haue so reuenged himselfe of his enemy, and to haue gayned the victorie; although it were indeed gotten, not so much by his valour as by the prowesse of the Turke: for whom and his followers, in token of his thankfulness, he caused a great feast to be provided in the countrie thereby, where he honourably entertained them; & in the end of the feast, caused garments of great price (according to the manner of the Easterne nations) to be giuen vnto Othoman, in token of his fauour; and his souldiours to be also bountifullly rewarded: but this was done with such a presumptuous state and grace, as if he had been some great prince, offering vnto the common souldiours of the Turks, in passing by them, his hand to kisse, as a great fauour. With which exceeding insolencie, Othoman was so much offended, that he had much adoe to hold his hands from him: yet repressing his anger, he in secret imparted his discontentment vnto his cousin Dunder, his vnde Dunders sonne: greiuously complaining of the intollerable pride of the Christian capitaine, and of the disgrace by him done vnto the Turks, in offering them his hand to kisse; kisse; requiring his opinion how he were for the same to be corrected: who but a little before, being by the said captain made his lieutenant, frankly told his kinsman, That as then nothing was to be attempted against him; first, for that on the one side they had Germean-ogli (a great man amongst the Selzuccian Turkes) their enemy, and round about them besides they were inuironed with the Christians, whom he should haue all in his neck at once if he should offer the Bilezvgian captain any wrong. By which answer, Othoman perceiuing his cosins great affection towards the Christian captain, and doubting to haue the mischief he had imagined against him, by him reuealed, or at leastwise hindered; without more adoe suddenly taking vp his bow in his hand, with an arrow shot him quite thorow, and so slew him.

Michael Cossi
murdereth Othoman to the ma-riage of his daughter.

Not long after Michael Cossi the captain of Hirmen-Caya, Othomans great friend, hauing concluded a marriage betwene a gentleman of that countrey and his daughter, inuited all the Christian captaines of the castles thereabouts, requesting them to come to the marriage; and the rather that so they might grow into acquaintance with Othoman, whose power began now to grow dreadfull vnto them: hoping that such meanes might be found at that merrie meeting, that all being made friends, euery man might in more securitie possesse his owne without feare of being spoiled by him. Vnto this marriage came all these bidden guests, bringing with them such presents as they thought good to bestow vpon the new married folks, according to the manner of the countrey: but Othomans gifts farre exceeded all the rest, who besides many other rich things, gaue vnto them whole flocks and droues of sheepe and cattell: which thing drew all the Christian captaines into no little admiration of his bountie; inso much that they began to say amongst themselves, that Othomans wealth and good fortune did portend some greater matter, to their vtter ruine and fall: which to preuent, they thought it best by secret meanes to compass his death. The execution of which deuise they referred to the capaine of Bilezvgia, as vnto one with him best acquainted. This captain was of great wealth, credit, and authoritie amongst the Christian rulers thereabouts, but verie full of craft and dissimulation: which his euill disposition Othoman of long time well perceiued; yet hauing occasion to vse him, in subtil manner gaue him (in outward shew) all the honour he could, magnifying him in words, and debasing himselfe as plaine and poore in comparifon of him. But to giue a beginning to this treacherous deuise, the captain meeting with Othoman, in friendly manner told him, how that he intended shortly to marie the daughter of the capaine of Iarchisab, earnestly requesting him to honour that his marriage with his presence, of the time whereof he said he would giue him further knowledge afterwards: and all was but a colour, to bring Othoman within his danger, not fearing any such treason. Othoman vnderstanding that the time of the marriage drew nigh, sent thither a present of certaine fat oxen and sheepe, in the name of his brother Iudas, for the captaines prouision against the marriage; certifying him, That Othoman himselfe, with his simple retinue, would be present at the marriage, and then present him, not with such presents as were agreeable with his honour, yet such as his poore abilitie could afford. This message with the presents, were woonderfull welcome to the captain, hoping assuredly that his deuiled treacherie would take such effect as he wished. And therefore calling vnto him Michael Cossi, in whom he had reposed an especiall trust, declared vnto him his whole deuise (whereof he was not before altogether ignorant,) requesting him to take the paines to go vnto Othoman to bring him to the marriage, the time being now certainly appointed and at hand; which hee knew Cossi might easily do, being of his familiar acquaintance. And in token of great friendship, he sent vnto Othoman by the same messenger, a present of gilt plate. Cossi tooke vpon him this message: which when he had deliuered vnto Othoman, he found him verie willing to go, as a man not doubting any harme. But Cossi inwardly grieuing to see so braue a man, and his kind friend, by such treacherous manner to be brought to his end; moued with compassion, discouered vnto him the whole conspiracie of the captain against him, and of the plot laied for his destruction, willing him to take heed vnto himselfe: for which ouerture, Othoman gaue Cossi great thanks, as to his friend, for sauing his life; and withall richly rewarded him, promising him greater matters if he would continue that his faithfull friendship. Now concerning the capaine of Bilezvgia (saith he) at your returne recommend me vnto him, and tell him, That I thinke my selfe much bound vnto him for many courtesies, but especially for that he hath heretofore diuers times in most friendly manner protected my goods and cattell, within the safegard of his castle: which his friendship I most humbly request him to continue for one yeare more, enforced thereunto by reason of the dangerous wars betwixt me and the prince Germean-ogli as he well knoweth: wherefore if it might so stand with his good pleasure, I would presently send vnto his castle such things as I make most reckning of, requesting him once more to be the faithfull keeper thereof, as he hath bene before: and tell him further, that my mother in law, with her daughter my wife, desire nothing more than to find opportunitie to be acquainted with the honourable ladie his mother; for which cause (if it please him) I will bring them both with me to the marriage. This Othoman request, when the captain of Bilezvgia vnderstood by Michael Cossi, he sent the same Cossi backe againe to hasten his coming, willing him to bring with him what gesse he pleased; appointing certaine time and place when and where the marriage should be solemnized. And because the castle of Bilezvgia was thought to be too little conueniently to receiue the multitude of people which were expected at the marriage, there was another open place of greater receipt appointed in the countrey for that purpose, about three miles distant from the castle. The marriage day drew nigh, whereunto Othoman must repaire for his promise sake: and therefore prepared with all diligence to set forward, and to put in execution what he had deuised for the safetie of himselfe, and destruction of his enemy. Othoman had of long accustomed in dangerous times, to send by carriage the best of his things, made vp in packes, to be kept in safetie in the castle of Bilezvgia: vnder the colour whereof, he now made great packes in forme as he was wont; but in stead of his rich household stuffe, and such other things of price, he thrust in armed men, couering those packes with homely couerings, sending them by carriages to the castle of Bilezvgia, giuing charge that they should not come thither before twilight. After that, he appareled certaine of his best souldiours in womens apparell, as if it had bene his wife and mother in law, with their women: so casting his journey, that he with these disguised souldiours, and the other sent in packes, might at one instant meet at the castle aforesaid. The captain being now in the countrey, and vnderstanding that Othoman was coming in the euening with a great traine of gentlewomen; thought the cause of his late coming to be, for that the Turkish women vse to shun the sight of Christian men by all meanes they can. Othoman being now come to the place in the countrey where the marriage was next day to be solemnized, hauing done his humble reuerence to the captain, requested him to do him the honour, That his gentlewomen which were nigh at hand, might by his appointment bee sent to his castle, there to haue some conuenient lodging where they might alight and bestow themselves a part from others, according to the homely fashion of their nation; least peraduenture the presence of so honourable a companie of noble men and gallants, might put them out of countenance: which the captain graunted, and hauing saluted them a far off after the Turkish manner, commanded them to be conueyed to his castle, making reckoning of them all as of a rich prey. At the same time that these disguised souldiours arrived at the castle, came thither also the other souldiours couered in packes in the carriages: which so soone as they were within the castle, suddenly leapt out of the packs, and drawing their short swords, with the helpe of their disguised fellows slew the warders of the castle, and without more adoe possessed the same: the greatest part of the captaines people being before gon out of the castle to the place of the marriage. Othoman hauing taried so long with the captain, as hee supposed the castle by that time by his men surprised; so soone as the captain had taken his chamber, suddenly tooke horse, with all his followers, accompanied also with Cossi, taking his way directly to the castle of Bilezvgia: of whose sudden departure, the captain vnderstanding, presently tooke horse and pursued him with all his traine, which were for the most part drunke; and ouertaking him before he came to the castle, set vpon him: in which conflict, he was by Othoman slaine, and the rest put to flight.

The captaine of Bilezvgia slacherously seeking the death of Othoman, is by him, himselfe slaine.

The same night Othoman vsing great celeritie, early in the morning surprised the castle of Iarchisab also, where he tooke prisoners the captain thereof, with his faire daughter Zulifer, (which should haue bene married to the captain of Bilezvgia the next day) with all her friends, as they were readie to haue gone to the marriage: which faire ladie he shortly after married vnto his eldest sonne Orchanes; who had by her Amurath, third king of the Turkes, and Solyman Bassa.

Othoman omitting no opportunitie, presently sent one of his captaines called Durgut-Apet, a man of great esteeme and valour, to besiege the castle of Etnogiot: wherein he vsed such celeritie, that preuenting the same of that was done at Bilezvgia, he suddenly inuironed the castle, in such sort that none could passe in or out, vntill such time, as that Othoman hauing brought his his prisoners and prey to the castle of BELIZGA, and there having set all things in good order, came with the rest of his men of war to ENEGIOI; which he presently by force took, promising the spoile thereof vnto his souldiours. The capitaine called Hagio-Nicholame his ancient enemy, he caused to be cut in small peeces, and all the men to be slaine: which crueltie he vied, because they a little before had vsed the like tyrannie against his Turks.

When Othoman had thus got into his subjection a great part of the strong castles and fortresses of the greater PHRIGIA, with the territorie to them belonging, he began with all carefull diligence to make good lawes, and to execute justice to all his subjects; as well Christians as Turkes: with great indifferencie studying by all meanes to keepe his countrey in peace and quietnesse, and to protect his subjects from the spoile of others, as well Christians as Turkes: whereby it came to passe, that the old inhabitants which for the most part had forsaken the countrey by reason of the great troubles therein, repaired now againe to their ancient dwellings; and not onely they, but many other strangers also, supplying the places of them whom the late warres had consumed. So that by his good government, that wasted countrey in short time grew to be againe verie populous.

The ciuile government of his countrey well established, hee besieged the citie of ISNICK, in ancient time called NICE, a citie of BITHYNIA, famous for the generall Counsell there holden against Arim in the time of Constantine the Great. This citie hee brought into great distresse, by placing his men of war in forts new built vpon euery passage and way leading vnto the same, so that nothing could be brought out of the countrey for the reliefe of the poore citizens. They in this extremitie, by a secret messenger certified the emperour of CONSTANTINOPLE (vnder whose obedience they were) in what distresse the citie stood; and that except he sent them present reliefe, they must of necessitie either perish with famine, or yeeld themselves into the hands of their enemies the Turks. The emperour moued with the pittifull complaint of this messenger, with all expedition embarked certaine companies of souldiours from CONSTANTINOPLE to relieue his besieged citie. But Othoman vnderstanding by his espials where these souldiours were appointed to land, in secret manner withdrawing most of his forces from the siege, lay in ambush neere vnto the same place where the emperours souldiours (casting no perill) landed: who before they could put themselves in order of battell, were by Othoman and his Turks, in such sort charged, that most part of them were there slaine, and the rest driuen into the sea, where they miserably perished. Othoman hauing thus politickly ouerthrowne the Constantinopolitan souldiours, returning to his siege, continued the same in straighter manner than before. The besieged citizens driuen into great penurie, and now despairing of all helpe, yeelded themselves with the great and rich citie of NICA into the hands of Othoman, with the spoile whereof he greatly enriched his men of war.

Aladin the great Sultan of ICONIUM, glad to heare of this good successe of Othoman against the Christians, in token of his fauour and loue, sent vnto him a faire ensigne, with certaine drums, and trumpets, a sword, and princely robe, with large charters, That whatsoever he tooke from the Christians should be all his owne; and also that publike praiers should be said in all the Turkes temples, in the name of Othoman, for his health and prosperous estate: which two things properly belonged to the dignitie of the Sultan. These extraordinary fauours gaue occasion for many to thinke, That Sultan Aladin (hauing no children) intended to make Othoman his adoptiue sonne and successor in his kingdome.

The presents and charters sent him, Othoman humbly accepted, sending vnto Aladin the fifth part of the spoile of NICA, taken from the Christians; but the princely honors due vnto the Sultan onely, he vsed not during the life of Aladin: intending not long after to haue gone himselfe in person to visit the Sultan, and so to haue grown into his further fauour. But hauing prepared all things for so honourable a journey, at what time as he was about to set forward, he was certainly informed of the death of Aladin; and that Sahib (one of his great counsellors) had taken vpon him the dignitie of the Sultan (as is before declared): which newes much discontented the aspiring mind of this Oguzian Turke, in good hope to haue succeeded him in the kingdome, or at least wise to haue shared the greatest part thereof vnto himselfe, whereof he was now altogether disappointed. Yet immediatly after the death of Aladin, he thought it now fit time to take vpon him the princely honors before graunted vnto him by the Sultan in his life time, which he for modestie sake had forborne, Aladin yet liuing; wherefore he made one Dursun named named Fakiche (that is to say, a man learned in the Turkish law) bishop and iudge of CARACHISAR, commanding the publicke prayers which were wont to be made for the health and prosperous raigne of the great Sultan, to be now made in his owne name; which was first openly done by the said bishop in the pulpit of CARACHISAR. At the same time he began also to coine money in his owne name, and to take vpon him all other honours belonging vnto a Sultan or king: which was about ten yeares after the death of his father Ertogrul, and in the yeare of our Lord 1300, vnto which time the beginning of the great empire of the Turkes is vnder the fortune of this Othoman, to be of right referred, as then by him thus begun.

When Othoman had thus taken vpon him the maiestie of a king, he made his sonne Orchanes prince and gouernour of CARACHISAR; promoting his principall followers, to be gouernours of other strong castles and forts, diuers of which places retain the name of those captains at this day. He himselfe made choice of the citie NEAPOLIS, about twentie miles from NICA, to seat his regall pallace in, where also diuers of his nobilitie built them houses, and changed the name of the citie, calling it DESPOTOPOEIS; as who should say, The citie of the lord or prince. For all this, Othoman ceased not to deuise by all meanes hee could, to augment his kingdome: and for that cause being accompanied with his sonne Orchanes, made many rodes into the countries adioyning vpon him, surprizing such places as might best serue his purpose, for the enlargement of his kingdome, all which in particular to rehearse were tedious.

The Christian princes, rulers of the countries bordering vpon this new kingdome, fearing lest the greatnesse of Othoman might in short time be their vtter confusion, agreed to ioine all their forces together, and so to commit to the fortune of one great battell their owne estates with his. According to which resolution, the Christian confederat princes, which were for the most part of MYRIA and BYTHYNIA, leuying the greatest forces they were able to make, with fire and sword inuaded Othoman's kingdome. Who hauing knowledge beforehand of this great preparation made against him, had in a readinesse all his captains and men of war: and hearing that his enemies had entred his dominion, in warlike manner marched directly towards them; and meeting with them in the confines of PHRIGIA and BYTHYNIA, fought with them a great and mortall battaille, wherein many were slaine on both sides, as well Turkes as Christians: and after a long fight, obtained of them a right bloodie victorie. In this battaille Cafelenus, one of the greatest Christian captaines was slaine: another called Tekensis of the country which he gouerned in PHRIGIA, chased by Othoman vnto the castle of VLUBAD, not far distant from the place where the battaille was fought, was for feare deliuered vnto him by the captaine of the same castle, and was afterward by Othomans commaundement most cruelly cut in peeces, within the view of his cheefe castle: which Othoman afterward subdued, with all the countrey therabouts. The other Christian princes and captaines saued themselves by flying into stronger holds farther off. The prince of BYTHYNIA, the cheefe author of this war, fled into the strong citie of PRUSA, which the Turkes now call BURUSA, whether Othoman not long after led his armie, in good hope to haue woon the same: but finding it not possible to be taken by force, began presently at one time to build two great and strong castles vpon the cheefe passages leading to the citie, which castles he with great industrie finished in one yeare: and in the one placed as captaine Atemur his nephew, in the other one Balaban Yuck, both men of great courage, and skilfull in feats of war: & in this sort hauing blocked vp the citie of PRUSA, so that little or nothing could without great danger be brought into it, he subdued the most part of BYTHYNIA; and so returned home, leauing the two castles well manned with strong garrisons, vnder the charge of the captaines before named.

Othoman returning home to NEAPOLIS, honorably rewarded his souldiours, according to their deserts, establishing such a quiet and pleasing government in his kingdome, that people in great number resorted from far into his dominions, thence to seat themselves: whereby his kingdome became in few yeares exceeding populous, and he for his politicke government most famous. And so liuing in great quietnesse certaine yeares, being now become aged and much troubled with the gout; his old souldiours accustomed to liue by the wars, abhorring peace, came vnto him, requesting him as it were with one voice, to take some honourable war in hand for the enlarging of his kingdome, with great chearfulnesse offering to spend their liues in his seruice rather than to grow old in idleness: which forwardnesse of his men of war greatly pleased him, and so giuing them thanks, for that time dismissed them, promising that he would not be long vnmind-full of their request. But yet thinking it good to make all things safe at home before hee took any great wars in hand abroad, thought it expedient to call vnto him Michael Cossi, the only Christian captaine whom for his great desert he had at all times suffered to liue in quiet with his possessions, as it were in the heart of his kingdome; and by faire means (if it might be) to persuade him to forsake the Christian religion and to become a follower of Mahomets, so to take away all occasion of mistrust: which if he should refuse to doe, then forgetting all former friendship, to make war vpon him as his viter enemy. Whereupon Cossi was sent for, being persuaded by the messenger, that Othoman had sent for him because he had occasion to vse his woonted faithful counsell and seruice in a great exploit which he had intended, as he had oftentimes before. Cossi thinking of nothing lesse than of that which ensued, came accompanied with such souldiours as he thought to vse in that seruice: But comming vnto Othoman, and vnderstanding the very cause why he was sent for, and seeing danger imminent on euery side, kissing Othomans hand, after the manner of the Turks, requested him in courteous manner to enter him in the principles of the Mahometane religion, which he promised euer after to embrace: And so saying certaine words after Othoman, he turned Turke, to the great displeasure of God, and the contentment of Othoman and his nobilitie. For which his reuolting, Othoman presently gaue him an ensigne and a rich robe, tokens whereby the Mahometane Sultans assure their vassales of their fauour and the vndoubted possession of such land and liuing as they then hold.

Michael Cossi turneth Turke.

Oftentimes after this, Othoman for the contenting of his souldiours invaded the countries bordering vpon him, tooke many strong castles and forts, subdued the most part of PHRYGIA, MISIA, and BYTHINIA, and other great regions, vnto the Euxine sea: and being now very aged, and diseased as is aforesaid with the gout, and thereby vnable to goe into the field in person himselfe, oftentimes sent his sonne Orchanes against his enemies; who to the imitation of his father achieved many great enterprises, Othoman his father yet liuing.

Now happily might the considerat reader (and not without just cause) merraille, what dead sleepe had ouerwhelmed the Greeke emperours of those times; first Michael Paleologus, and afterward his sonne Andronicus, both men of great valour, and still resistant at CONSTANTINOPLE, thus to suffer the Turks (not Othoman, for he as yet bare no sway, but others the tharers of Sultan Aladins kingdome) to take their cities, spoile their countries, kill their subjects, and dayly to inroach vpon them in the lesser ASIA, and especially in BYTHINIA, so neere vnto them, and as it were euen vnder their noses: But let him, with me, here as in a most conuenient place but breath a litle, and consider the troubled estate of that declining empire, now halting to an end; and he shall plainly see the causes of the decay thereof, and how like an old diseased bodie quite ouerthrowne and sicke to death, it became at length a prey vnto the aspiring Turks. Michael Paleologus hauing by great trecherie obtained the Greeke empire, and by rare fortune recovered also the citie of CONSTANTINOPLE from Baldwin the emperor (as is in the former part of this Historie declared,) fearing the power of the princes of the West, but especially of Charles king of SICILIA, then a prince of great fame and power, whom he knew Baldwin (the late emperor) ceased not to sollicite for the restitution of him againe into his empire, and to haue also joyned with him a neere bond of affinitie, by marrying his daughter vnto Charles his sonne: to auert this danger, and to intangle Charles with troubles neere home, he by his embassadours offered vnto Gregorie the tenth, then bishop of ROME, to write and conformance the Greeke church vnto the Latine, and to acknowledge the bishops supremacie, in such sort, as that it should be lawfull for any man to appeale vnto the court of ROME, as vnto the higher and more excellent court: of which his offer the Pope gladly accepted, promising to performe what he had before requested, for the keeping of Charles otherwise busied. But when it came to the point, that this reformation and alteration of religion in the Greeke church should be made, Ioseph the Patriarch, to begin withall, gaue vp his place, and shortly after forsaking the citie, retired himselfe into a monastrie neer vnto the strait of Bosphorus, where he at quiet deuoutly spent the remainder of his life. The rest of the cleargie also discontented with this innovation, in their sermons openly inuighed against it, persuading the people not to receiue it, crying out, That now was come the time of their trial, the time of their martyrdom, and the time wherein they were to receiue the glorious crowne of their painefull suffrings: insomuch, that great tumults were thereupon raised, and all the citie and the country in an vprore: for it was not the cleargie onely, and the vulgar people by them moued, which disliked and abhorred these the emperours' proceedings, things, and made these stirs, but many of the better sort, yea of the cheefe magistrates themselves also. So that Michael Paleologus the emperor leauing all other forraigne businesse, was inforced to conuert all his power and studie vnto the appeasing of these domesticall troubles, as deeming them of greater danger than his wars abroad. And first to persuade his discontented subjects, he told them, That this alteration was made, not for any good liking he had therunto, but in respect of the dangerousnesse of the time: and that it was a point of wisdom, to foresee dangers hanging ouer our heads, and not to delay, if any thing were to be altered, for the auerting thereof: for if the enemies as he said should come, the citie yet in many places rent, or but lately repaired, and as it were but newly raised from death to life; the present mischiefes would be far greater than those forepassed, and that then their enemies would become lords, not of their religion and ceremonies onely, but of all at once, their wiues, their children, and whatsoever else they had: where their liberty changed into bondage, they should be constrained to conforme themselves not with their bodily seruice onely, but euen with their minds also, vnto the wils of the Latines their enemies. And that so it would come to passe, that no man should bee able to keepe the old customes and mannets of his ancestors, but should see euen their most sacred rites and ceremonies chaiged and quite ouerthrowne: Which he carefully foreseeing, had not (as he said) refused to yeeld vnto necessitie; and as wisdom would, neglected a litle harme in respect of a greater benefit; and in the lesse, to haue yeelded vnto his enemies, to enjoy the benefit of the greater. With which the emperours persuasion, some were moued, and so held themselves contented: and some others not; against whom he was inforced to vse other more seuerer remedies, as against his rebellious subjects: of whom, some he imprisoned, some he banished, some he tortured, some he dismembred, some he deprived of their fight, or confiscated their goods, vsing (in breefe) all the meanes whereby the minds of the resolute or the weake were to be moued. All which things, they whose zeale was grounded vpon knowledge (in number the fewest) with patience endured: but the greater part void of judgement, and the refuse of the people in simple attire, ran roguing abroad, some into PELOPONNVS, some into THESSALIA, some into ACHAIA, and some as far as COLCHOS, as men persecuted for their conscience, not regarding greatly whether, so it were out of the emperours iurisdiction, and something fitting their owne humors; neither conforming themselves vnto the religion then commonly by the emperor established, neither yet agreeing among themselves, but taking vnto them diuers names, some as the disciples of Aseninus, some of Ioseph, and some of others; some of them, themselves deceived, and deceiuing others also. Thus for the auoiding of forraigne danger out of the West, was the empire at home no litle indangered, and the state thereof shaken. Wherewith the emperor was so encombred, as that he had no leisure to prouide for the tempest arising by the Turks out of the East, but was inforced wholly to employ himselfe and all his indeuours vnto the keeping of his people & subjects in their due obedience at home. All whose deepe deuises, first in aspiring vnto the empire, (no way vnto him due) and great trauels afterwards for the assuring of the same vnto himselfe and his posteritie, against all right, euen with the alteration of the religion of his fathers, yeilded him in the winding vp of all, not so much as the credit of an honourable sepulture. But dying in these troubles not far from LISIMACHIA, as he was making preparation against the prince of THESSALIE, was there by his sonne Andronicus his commandement (for whose aduancement he had stained both his faith and honour) obscurely buried in the field, a good way from his campe; as unworthie of a better sepulture, for reuolting from the antient religion of his ancestors, although his obsequies were for fashion sake afterwards with some solemnitie celebrated. This was the end of the great emperor Michael Paleologus, in whose time the Turks, the successors of Aladin, greatly inroached vpon him in the lesser ASIA, as is in part before declared: a man greatly adorned with the good gifts both of the bodie and the mind, had he not for the aduancement of himselfe and his posteritie, stained the same with soule trecherie and apostasie: for which (as some say) he euer after liued in conscience troubled, and dying, was euen by his owne sonne not thought worthie of an honourable funerall. A notable example vnto all such as with greedinesse seeke after vaine glorie, and foolishly expose themselves vnto such adventures, as oftentimes ouerwhelme their deepest deuises, hauing in themselves no certainetie: preferring their inordinat desires (either for themselves or their posteritie) before that which is good and vertuous: Twice wretched in so doing: first in their folly, and then in their indeuours. Who beside that they find God himselfe against their designs and purposes they by and by also euidently meet with other things than what they had forecasted, contrarie vnto them; and so themselves oftentimes, contrarie to their expectation, cast headlong into extreme miserie: for loe, euen he of whom we now speake, otherwise a man of great wisdom, and happie in his doings, overcome with his affection towards his children, in desiring to leaue vnto them the empire, when as he ought to haue cast all the care both of himselfe and of them, especially vpon the prouidence of God; he like a blind man following his own deepe conceits, not grounded vpon the fear of God but mans wisdom only, cast himselfe before he was aware into miserable troubles, and became odious vnto his subiects, & them also for whom he had so forgot himselfe. For when God had euen from his childhood allotted vnto him the empire (as was by many euident signes & tokens to haue bin gathered) if he could haue moderated his vntimely desires kept his tongue from periuie, and his hands from blood, and not turned out of the way after strange doctrine; he had by many degrees excelled euen the best emperours his predecessors: where as now he lieth obscurely buried, shrouded in the sheet of defame, the report of his foule & faithlesse dealings far exceeding all his other worthy vertues.

Andronicus Paleologus succeeding his father in the empire, and thinking by restoring again the gouernment of the church, together with the rites and customes of the Greeks, to haue appeased all such troubles as were before by his father raised, by bringing in those of the Latines, found himselfe therein much deceived, and his troubles no lesse than his fathers: they which had before receiued the Latine customes, and well liking of them, with great obstinacie defending the same: and the other of the contrarie faction now countenanced by the emperor, without modestie or measure insulting vpon them: whereof arose, exceeding great stirs and troubles, especially in the beginning of his raigne: to the great benefit of the encroaching Turks, who in the meane time ceased not by all meanes to increase their territories in ASIA; and not only there, but in the islands of the Mediterranean sea also. For Andronicus, by the death of Charles king of SICILIE; deliuered of the greatest feare, for which both he and his father before him had to their great cost and charge both built and maintained a strong fleet of gallies; now persuaded by some, whose actions and speeches were after the manner of the court, all framed vnto the princes appetite; (as the readiest way to thine, without respect of the common good) to spare that needlesse charge (as they termed it) which yearly cost him more than any other thing else: had discharged all his mariners and sea men, and commanded all the gallies to be laied vp, some in one creeke, some in another; where neglected & not looked vnto, they in time for most part rotted and perished. As for the mariners, they went some one way; some another, as their fortunes lead them, to seeke for their liuings in forreine countries, euen with the emperours enemies; and some gaue themselves to husbandrie, thinking it better by doing something to liue, than by sitting still to perish: which good husbandrie at the first seemed to be verie profitable vnto the emperor, but especially vnto such as being neere vnto him, and couetously giuen, made small reckoning of all other the most necessarie defences of the empire, in comparison of hoarding vp of money, vntill that it was afterwards too late by experience found hereof to haue sprung many great mischiefs, vnto the great weakening of the Greeke empire. For besides that the Turks without lette, did great harme on the sea; the pirates now out of feare of the emperours gallies, at their pleasure tooke the spoile of the rich Islands in the Mediterranean; and robbed the townes all along the sea coast, to the vspeakable griefe of the poore countrie people. And yet not so contented, came with their gallies sometime two, sometime three, and sometime more, as it were in contempt, euen close vnto the imperiall citie. Yea the Venetians were so bold as vpon a right small displeasure to rifle and afterward to set fire vpon the suburbs thereof, which they would hardly haue aduentured, had the emperours fleet bene preferred and maintained in the wonted strength.

At the same time also, Andronicus the emperor (to the great hinderance of the affaires of the empire, and aduantage of the forreine enemy) was not a little troubled with a jealous suspicion of his brother Constantine (commonly called Porphyrogenitus) as if he had sought to haue aspired vnto the empire; seeking by all meanes to win vnto himselfe the loue and fauour of all men, but especially of the nobilitie both at home and abroad, and so by that meanes to mount vnto the height of his desires: All which (as most men thought) were but meere slanders, maliciously deuised by such as enuying at his honour, and taking occasion by the emperours suspicion, ceased not to increase the same, vntill they had wrought his vnworthie destruction. The first ground of this false suspicion in the emperours head, was for that this Constantine was euen from his childhood, for many causes, better beloued of the old emperor his father than Andronicus, Andronicus, as better furnished with those gifts of nature which beautifie a prince, and of a more courteous behauior than was his brother: insomuch, that had he not been the yonger brother, his father could willingly haue left him his successour in the empire. This was one and the chiefest cause of the emperours grudge, and the ground of his suspicion. Yet was there another alio, and that not much lesse than this: for that his father in his life time had of long thought to haue separated from the empire a great part of THESSALIA and MACEDONIA, and to haue made him absolute prince thereof; and had hee not been by death prevented: which thing also much grieved Andronicus, and the more incensed him against his brother. Which his secret hatred he for all that according to his wisdom, cunningly dissembled, not vntil during the time that his father liued, but three yeares after his death also, making shew of the greatest loue and kinnesse towards him, that was possible. Constantine in the meane time, of such great reuenues as were by his father assigned vnto him, reaping great profit, most bountifully bestowed the same vpon his followers and fauorites, and others that made fute vnto him, as well the meane sort as the greater, and with his sweet behauior wooed vnto him the hearts of all men: for affabilitie & courtesie in high degree easily allureth mens minds, as doe faire flowers in the spring the passengers eyes. This was that precept of the wise Indians, That the higher a prince was in dignitie, and the more courteous he shewed himselfe vnto his inferiours, the better he should be of them beloued. He therefore that should for the two first causes blame Constantine should doe him wrong; as both proceeding not of himselfe, but of his fathers too much loue: but in the third hee was not altogether blamelesse; for if for want of experience hee prodigally gaue such gifts, as for the most part might haue becomed the emperor himselfe, he ignorantly erred; yet did he no little offend: but if he knew, that for his too profuse bountie he could not be vn suspected of his brother, and yet without regard held on that course, hee was greatly to bee blamed therein. For if nothing els might haue moued him, yet he should haue considered, to what end the like doings of others in former times had sorted, and how many it had brought to vntimely end. So although perhaps that Constantine meant no harme vnto his brother, or any way to supplant him, yet did these things not a little increase and aggrauate the former suspicions; and open the eares of the emperor his brother vnto such calumination as commonly attendeth vpon immoderat bountie. But to returne vnto our purpose. This honourable Constantine then liued in LYDIA, but lately married, and in good hope long to liue, being not past thirtie yeares old: but pleasantly spending the time with his wife at NYMPHEA in LYDIA, at such time as he was thus secretly accused vnto his brother, the emperor thought it good, as vpon other occasions of businesse, to passe ouer into ASIA himselfe; but indeed with a secret resolution, vpon the sudden to oppresse his brother vnawares; as by prooffe it fell out. For at his coming ouer, Constantine feeling nothing lesse, was forthwith apprehended, with all his greatest fauorites, of whom one Michael Strategopulus (sometime a man in great authoritie with the emperor his father, and of all other for wealth, honour, and noble acts most famous) was cheefe: who together with Constantine were fast clapt in prison, where we will leaue them euery houre looking to die, their lands and goods being before confiscated. But these woorthie men, especially Constantine and Strategopulus, thus laid fast; who many times in great batailles discomfited the Turks, and notably defended the frontiers of the empire along the East side of the riuer MEANDER; they now finding none to withstand them, foraged not only all the rich countrey beyond the riuer, but with an infinit multitude passing the same, did there great harme also: so that there was no remedie, but that the emperor must of necessitie make choice of some other woorthie captain for the defence of those his cities and countries, by the incursion of the Turks then in danger in that part of ASIA.

There was then in the emperours court one Alexius Philanthropenus, a right valiant and renowned captain; and then in the flower of his youth; of him the emperor thought good to make choice for the defence of those frontiers of his empire in ASIA (against the Turks) which were before the charge of his brother Constantine and Strategopulus; joyning vnto him one Li-badrius, an old famous captain, and a man of great experience also: appointing vnto him the gouernment of the cities of LONIA; and vnto the other, the frontiers along the winding bankes of MEANDER. Where Alexius hauing now gotten a charge woorthie his valour, and in many great conflicts with the Turks still carrying away the victorie, became in short time of great fame: besides that, he was exceeding bountifull and courteous vnto all men; a costly, but a readie way vnto dangerous credit and renoune. Thus at the first all things prospered in his hand according to his hearts desire: yea the Turkes themselves, bordering vpon him, hardly beset on the one side by the Tartars, and on the other by himselfe; and yet not so much feared with their enemies behind them, as moued with his countesse, came ouer vnto him with their wiues and children, and serued themselves (many of them) in his campe: but as they say, That in Iupiters court no man might drinke of the tun of blisse, but that he must tast also of the tun of woe: so fell it out with this great captaine; who hauing but tasted of the better tun, had the worse all poured full vpon his head. For Libadarius seeing all so prosper with him, and somewhat enuying thereat, began to feare and suspect, least he proud of his good fortune, and now growne very strong, casting off his allegiance should aspire vnto the empire, and so first begin with him, as the neereft vnto him: which thing many of the nobilitie secretly surmised also, but how truly many doubt. But this enuious plot was not yet ripe, but lay as fire raked vp in the ashes. Now there was with Alexius Philanthropenus, certaine companies of Cretensians, whom for their good seruice and fidelitie both honoured and trusted aboue others, vsing them all for the guard of his owne person. These men proud of their credit, hearing of the surmised aspiring of their Generall, and in hope by his aduancement to raise their owne fortunes also, ceased not continually to suggest vnto him high conceits of himselfe, and to persuaide him with all speed to take the matter vpon him; the verie conceit whereof (as they said) would bee vnto him no lesse danger, than if hee should enter into the action it selfe, as he might well see by the wooll examples of the noble Constantine and Strategopulus, both in extreame perill, but for the jealous conceit surmised against them. Which quicke suggestions wrought in his great mind diuers, and those most contrary motions; so that he scarce knew himselfe what he would or would not. For they which are vnto themselves in conscience guilty of any greivous crime, if any mischeefe hang ouer their heads therefore, it happeneth vnto them, as foreknowing and expecting the same euen from the time that they offended: vnto whom, if nothing els, yet that same very foreknowledge easeth not a little the greefe and miserie: whereas contrariwise, they which are with suddaine mischeefes and vlooked for, ouerwhelmed, not knowing any iust cause why, must needs stand as men dismayed, and almost beside themselves. But at length after diuers great conflicts with himselfe, the euill persuaaders of rebellion, prevailed with him. Yet did hee at the first forbid any mention to bee made of him in the armie as emperour, which caused the Cretensians, the cheefe authors of his rebellion, almost to force him forthwith to take vpon him the imperiall ornaments, thereby to confirme the minds of his followers and fauourers: for that such resolutions were (as they said) to be forthwith put into execution; neither that any thing required so joint celeritie and dexteritie both of the mind and the hand; and for that longer delay would but fill his souldiours heads with doubts, and discourage them with the feare of the vncertainetie of the euent: all which for all that moued him not so to doe; but whether for feare of the greatnesse of the danger, or for that he secretly thought how first to circumuent Libadarius, of whom he stood most in doubt, is vncertaine. The report of all which his doings and designs were in short time caried first vnto Libadarius, as the neereft, and so in post vnto the emperour: who were therewith not a little both disquieted. And had Alexius (as some persuaided him) at the first set vpon Libadarius, then vnprovided, no doubt but hee had done much: but God by whom all princes raigne, and whose power confoundeth the deuises of the proud, turned him from Libadarius, by whom he was to be oppressed, to follow after Theodorus the emperours brother, of whom hee was to haue feared no harme. This Theodorus, the first man that Alexius shot at, warned by his brother Constantine his harmes, then liued a pleasant priuat life in LYDIA, far from the ambition of the court, and therefore so much the more beloued of the emperour: but Alexius fearing least in that hurle many should resort vnto him, as vnto the emperours brother, and so hinder his proceedings; thought best first to make him sure, and afterward to oppress Libadarius, not aware, that in stead of the bodie he followed but after the shadow. But Libadarius, as a man of great experience, taking the benefit of this his ouersight, and knowing money to be the sinewes of warre, gathered together all the coine hee possibly could, both of his owne and his friends, sending also for the emperours treasures to PHILADELPHIA; and with all speed raised the greatest power hee possibly could out of IONIA, which he furnished with all things necessarie, promising vnto his souldiours great matters, and filling them with greater hopes, and that within ten daies he would with a great armie meet the rebell in the heart of LYDIA, and there dare him battell. But withall considering, that the Cretensians, men but of a mercenarie faith, had alwaies the guard of Alexius his person, he thought good to make proofe if they might with gold be wooen to betray him: and so well wrought the matter by great summes of money presently giuen, and promises of greater preferments with the emperour: that they (somewhat before discontented with Alexius his slackenesse, and now doubting also his success) yeelded vnto his desire, promising in the beginning of the battell to deliuer him into his hands; which they shortly after in the very joyning of the battell, accordingly performed, deliuering him fast bound vnto Libadarius his enemy. Who not a little proud thereof, vsed him with great insolencie, and within three daies after put out his eyes, for feare the emperour according to his courteous nature should haue giuen him his pardon; and so kept him in prison, vntill the emperours pleasure were farther knowne. Thus through false suspect and ambition were the greatest champions of the Greeke empire brought to confusion.

Now after this rebellion of Philanthropenus, Andronicus became so jealous of his owne people, as that he wist not whom to trust, reposing greater confidence in strangers than in his own subjects, to the great hurt of his estate. At the same time it fortuned that the Massagets (commonly called Alani) which then dwelt beyond ISRAEL, being Christians, but oppressed by the European Tartars, wearie of their slavery, sent secretly vnto the Greeke emperour Andronicus; offering that if he would assigne vnto them a conuenient place for them to dwell in, they would come ouer vnto him with ten thousand of their families, and faithfully serue him in his warres against the Turkes (who then grievously wasted his countries in ASIA, destitute of good capitaines and commaunders) which their offer he gladly accepted, as standing then in need of aid and not greatly trusting his owne people. But when these Massagets in number aboue ten thousand, comming ouer with their wiues and children, were to be furnished with all things, and especially the men with horses, armour, and pay, all which the emperour could not of himselfe do; the subjects were therewith hardly charged, and commission sent out into euerie countrey and prouince for the taking vp of horses and armour: euerie citie, euerie countrey towne and village, euerie gentlemans house and poore mans cottage was searched and ransacked, and all things taken from them that was there found fit for seruice, to their great discontentment: euery man murmuring and grudging to haue his armes taken from him, and giuen to strangers. But when they were also to be contributors vnto their pay, they then openly cursed and banned them, euen vnto their faces. Yet at length (though with much adoe) these strangers well furnished with all things necessarie, were with some other forces also shipped ouer into ASIA, vnder the leading of Michael Paleologus the emperours eldest sonne, and then his companion in the empire. Who marching alongst the countrey, came and encamped about MAGNESIA: where the Turkes at the first, after their wonted manner, retired themselves into the high mountaines and thick woods, that from thence they might more safely learne what strength their new come enemies were of, and what discipline of war they kept: for they knew that vpon the comming of great armies, many false reports did run, and that things were made far greater than indeed they were; as did of these also, as of a people inuincible: and therefore they thought it best so to prouast the time, vntill they might see in what sort best to deale with them. But so hauing ouer their heads, and perceiving them oftentimes without order to roame abroad into the countrey seeking after prey, (for why, they after the manner of mercenarie men spoiled their friends no lesse than if they had bene their enemies) they came downe in good order from the mountaines, from whence at the first they aduentured but a little: but afterward they came on further and with greater confidence, in such sort, as that it seemed they would eare long assault the yong emperour in his campe. Wherewith he with the rest discouraged, without any stroke giuen, retired; the Turkes still following him at the heeles. For neither he, neither the rest, any thing considered the small number of their enemies: but as drunken men whose heads filled with grosse vapours, are deceived in the greatnesse of the object that they see, and oftentimes thinke one thing to be two; so were they also in like manner with their owne feare blinded. Beside that, most commonly it falleth out, that the armie which insolencie and iniurie foretunneth, is appointed to destruction, and by the fearfulness of it selfe ouerthrowne before the enemy set vpon it, they themselves becoming enemies vnto themselves; and God his iust vengeance appointing vnto them such an end as their deeds haue deserued: neither was it like that they should do any great good, that at their first setting forth, in stead of prouision carried out with them the bitter curses and execrations of their friends. Michael the emperour seeing the Massagets flie, and not daring with those few he had left, to oppose himselfe against his enemies, retired himselfe into the strong castle of MAGNÉSIA, there to expect what would become of these mischiefs. But the Massagets spoiling the countries of the poore Christians as they went, marched directly vnto the strait of HEBESPONTVS, and there againe passed ouer into EVROPE, as if they had bene therefore onely sent for ouer the riuier ISTRA, to shew the Turkes the sooner the way vnto the sea in ASIA. For it was not many daies after, but that Michael the emperor being returned to CONSTANTINOPLE, the Turkes comming downe with a great power, subdued all the countries, euen vnto the coast of LESBOS, to the great weakning of the Greeke empire.

It was not long after, these great sturs made by the Massagets, but that one Ronzerius (some time a notable pirate, but as then a most famous captaine) hearing of the great intertainment that the Greeke emperor gaue vnto strangers; by messengers sent for that purpose, offered vnto him his seruice in his wars against the Turkes, as had before the Massagets. This Ronzerius of whom we speake, had out of CATALONIA a prouince of SPAIN, and out of that part of FRANCE which is called NARBONENSIS, and some other places also, gathered together a great number of bafe needie naked men, yet lustie able bodies and fit for seruice either by sea or land; with whom he manned foure tall gallies, and so as a notable pirate long time robbed, not onely the marchants trading too and fro in the Mediteranean, but landing his men oftentimes in the rich islands, caried away thence much rich spoile also; vntill at length by the mischiefe he did being become famous, and great wars then arising betwixt Charles king of NAPLES and Theodorus king of SICILIA, he was by Theodorus sent for and requested of aid: which hee (liuing of the spoile) easily graunted, and so came vnto him with a thousand horse, and as many foot, all old expert souldiours, whose good seruice stood the king in those wars in great steed. But as the end of war is peace, so at length vpon the euill successe of Charles, a peace being concluded betwixt the two kings, and confirmed by a marriage betwixt their children, Ronzerius liuing altogether by his fortunes was to seeke for new intertainment, both for himselfe and his men, as hauing neither house nor certaine dwelling place to repaire vnto; but being as needie men met together, some out of one place, some out of another, in hope of bootie as their fortune led them: In which case Ronzerius their generall thought it best to offer his seruice vnto the Greeke emperor in his warres against the Turkes, whereof hee gladly accepted, and so sent for him: vnto whom hee shortly after came with two thousand good souldiours, called (after the proud Spanish manner) by the name of CATALONIANS, for that they were for the most part Spaniards of the countrey of CATALONIA. Of whose comming the emperor reioycing more than hee had cause (as afterward by prooffe it fell out) in token of his greater fauour, honoured him with the name of the Great Captaine; and afterwards gaue him his neece Marie in marriage. But within a while after, when as one Tenza, another Catalanian captaine sent for by Ronzerius, was come thither also with more aid; the emperor to gratifie them both, gaue vnto Ronzerius the name of Cesar, and vnto the other the name of the Great Captaine. But when these new come captaines with their followers, were to be transported into ASIA, it is not to be spoken what harme they did by the way vnto the countrey people, and in the villages alongst the sea coast; abusing the men and women as their slaues, and spending their substance at their pleasure; for which they had many a bitter curse: and this was their first yeares entertainment. The next Spring they set forward to relieue the great cite of PHILADELPHIA, being as then long besieged by the Turkes, and hardly bestead without with the enemy; and within, with extreame penurie and famine: which good seruice, they most valiantly performed and raised the siege: For the Turkes beholding the good order of these Latine souldiours, their bright armour, and courageous comming on, rise presently and departed, not onely from the cite, but quite out of the emperours territorie. Besides that, in this armie were joyned vnto these Catalanians great numbers of the best souldiours of the Greeks, and all the power of the Massagets: so that had not the emperor expressly before commaunded, not to pursue them too far, it was by many thought all those cities and countries might then againe haue bene in short time recouered from the Turkes, which they had before taken from him. But in kingdomes appointed vnto rime, faire occasions helpe not for the stay thereof: yea the greatest helpes provided by the worldly wise, by a secret commaunding power aboue, being oftentimes conuerted to the destruction of that they were provided for the safegard of; as it now fell out with the emperor and these these Spanish souldiours: for this seruice done, the Greekes returned home, as did the Massagets also. But these Catalanians with Ronzerius their generall, roaming vp and downe the emperours territories in ASIA, did there great harme, turning their forces (as enemies) vpon them whom they were sent for to relieue: alleadging that they had not their pay according to the emperours promise, and that therefore they must liue vpon them that had sent for them and deceived them. So were the poore people in euerie place spoiled, their wites and daughters rauished, their priests and aged fathers tortured to confesse such secret store as they had: all was subiect vnto these dissolute souldiours rage and lust; yea many of them that had nothing to redeeme themselves, vpon the greedie souldiours imagination, hauing their hands or feet, or some other part of their bodies cut off, lay by the high waies side begging an halfe penie or a peece of bread, hauing nothing left to comfort themselves with, more than their miserable voice and fountaines of teares: with which their wrongs and miseries, woorse than those they had sustained by the Turkes, the emperor much grieved; and well the more, for that they were done by him whom he had entertained to relieue them: but what remedie, his coffers were so bare as that he was not able to do any thing for the redresse thereof. Ronzerius hauing thus spoiled the emperours countrey in ASIA, and left nothing that pleased either him or his, with all his power passed ouer into EUROPE: and leauing all the rest of his armie at CALIPOLIS, with two hundred of his men went vnto the yong emperor Michael (then lying with a small power at ORESTIAS in THRACIA) to demanda of him his pay, or if need were to extort it from him with threats: with whose insolencie at his comming, the emperor more offended than before, his souldiours there present perceiuing the same, with their drawn swords compassing him in, salt by the court, slew him, with certaine of his followers; the rest in all hast fled to CALIPOLIS to certifie their fellowes what had happened.

Thus by the death of Ronzerius, the yong emperor had thought to haue discouraged the Catalanians and abated their pride, as like ynough it was to haue done: yet in prooffe it fell not out so, but was the cause of far greater euils. So when God prospereth not mens actions, the best salueth out vnto the worst, and their wisest deuices turne vnto meere follies: for the Catalanians at CALIPOLIS hearing of the death of Ronzerius their Generall, first slew all the citizens in the cite, and notably fortifying the same, tooke that as their refuge. Then deuiding their souldiours into two parts, with the one part of them manned out eight gallies, which vnder the leading of the Great captaine Tenza, robbed and spoiled all the marchants ships, passing the straits of HEBESPONTUS, to or from CONSTANTINOPLE: the other part left in the cite, in the meane time foraging the countrey all about them. But Tenza shortly after encountering with a fleet of the Genowaites, well provided for him, was by them ouerthrowne, and most of his gallies sunke, and himselfe taken; but yet afterwards redeemed by his fellowes, and so againe enlarged. Now the Catalanians at CALIPOLIS somewhat discouraged with the losse of their fleet and so many of their men, for certaine daies kept themselves quiet within their wals, as not well knowing what course to take; for they feared both the Massagets and Thracians; them, for that they had vpon light causes abused them, and slaine diuers of them in the late Asian warre; and these, for that they had but euen the other day burnt their houses and spoiled their labours in the countrey thereby: for which and other their outrages, they vterly despaired of the emperours fauour whom they had so highly offended. But that which most of all terrified them, was, for that they looked euery day when Michael the yong emperor, who as then lay not farr off, should with a great power come to assault them: for feare of whom they cast a deepe ditch about the cite, with a strong countercarffe; so preparing themselves, as if they should haue bene euen presently besieged. But the time so passing, and the emperor delaying his comming, they began to thinke of other matters: For being brought to that strait, that they could not well tell which way to turne them, but that they were on euery side beset with danger; they vpon a malicious resolution, and vnto the Greekes most fatal, by messengers sent of purpose, craued aid of the Turkes that dwelt on the other side of the strait oueragainst them, in ASIA: who presently sent them fiftie hundred good souldiours, after whom followed also many other fugitiues and loose companions, in hope of spoile: with whom the Catalanians for the present strengthened, and being themselves three thousand strong, issued out of the cite, and foraged the countrey thereabouts, bringing in with them great herds and flockes of sheepe and other cattell, together with their keepers: wherewith both the emperours and their subiects incensed, prepared themselves for reuenge. This was the first first calling in of the Turks into EUROPE (that I read of) and the beginning of those endless miseries wherewith the Christian commonweale hath beene euer since most greuously afflicted, and a great part thereof ouerwhelmed; few or none greuing thereat, but such as themselves fee the heauinesse thereof, whom God in his mercie comfort.

The Turcopuli.

The vnsurmountable battell of Michael the emperor against the Catalonians and Turks.

The Catalonians and Turks now lying about CYPSELLA and APRIL in THRACE, Michael the emperor with his Macedonian and Thracian souldiours, the Massagets and the Turcopuli, encamped at APRIL. These Turcopuli were Turks, also in number about a thousand, who (as in the former part of this historie declared) beeing fled with their Sultan Iathatinus vnto the Greeke emperor, and left behind him at such time as he was by the European Tartars deliuered, had forsaken their Mahometane superstition, and so being become Christians, were enrolled amongst the Greeke souldiours. Shortly after the emperor (aduertised by his scouts of the approach of his enemies) commaunded euery man to be in a readinesse, and his captains to put his armie in order of battell: who seeing the enemies battell deuided into three parts, put theirs also in like order, placing the Turcopuli & Massagets in the left wing, the Macedonian and Thracian choise horsemen in the right wing, and the rest with the footmen in the maine battell. At which time the emperor himselfe riding from place to place, with comfortable speeches encouraged his men to fight valiantly against their enemies. The Sunne rising, the enemies battell began to come on, in number much inferior vnto the emperours, yet in like order; the Turks being placed in both wings, and the Catalonians well armed in the middest. But the signall of battell being given on both sides, the Massagets, whether it were by agreement so before made with the enemy, or upon a suddaine conceived treason, presently withdrew themselves aloofe off, and so stood as idle beholders, giuing aid neither to the one nor to the other, as did also the Turcopuli their companions; which greatly dismaied the Grecians, and encouraged their enemies: for the Greekes dismayed with that suddaine defection of their fellowes, were euen in the joyning of the battell discouraged. Which the emperor perceiuing, with great instance intreated the captains and commanders of his armie, calling them oftentimes by name, not to be so suddainly discouraged: but they in so great a danger little regarding his words, and still shrinking from him; when as the greatest part of his footmen were troden vnderfoot, and slaine, turning himselfe vnto them that were left, which were but few, he said: Now woorthie men is the time wherein death is better than life, and life more bitter than death. And hauing so said, valiantly charged the enemy: in which charge his horse was slaine vnder him, and he in danger to haue beene taken, had not one of his faithfull followers remounted him vpon his owne horse, and so saued his life with the losse of his owne. The emperor flying to DYIMOTICHUM, where Andronicus his father then lay, was of him joyfully receiued, but sharply reproofed for aduenturing his person so far. The enemies pursuing the chase, slew some, tooke others, vntill that by the coming on of the night, and wearie with the long fight, they retired: and the next day deuiding the spoile, afterwards at their pleasures forraged the country. The renegade Turks, called Turcopuli, within a few daies after reuolting vnto the Catalonians, were of them joyfully entertained, and enrolled into the regiment of Chalel, the Turks Generall.

Shortly after this victorie, the Catalonians began to mutinie among themselves, the Great capitaine Tenka, and Pharenka his companion, disdaining to bee commaunded by Recafors their Generall: in which tumult, the matter comming to blowes, Tenka was slaine, and Pharenka for safegard of his life glad to flie vnto the emperor Andronicus; of whom he was, contrarie to his expectation, right honourably entertained. About this time also, the Massagets hauing done the Greekes more harme, than the Turks against whom they were entertained, and enriched themselves with the spoile of their friends both in ASIA and EUROPE, were about with their wiues and children, and wealth, to returne againe vnto their old dwellings beyond ISTER. Which the Turcopuli, with the Catalonians vnderstanding; and bearing vnto them a secret grudge, for that they (as the weaker) had by them oftentimes been wronged in the deuision of the spoile of the Greekes, lay now secretly in wait for them as they should passe the straits of the great mountaine Hemus, which bounded the Greeke empire from the Bulgarians: where setting vpon them, fearing no such danger, they slew them almost all; & with the spoile of them, recompenced themselves for all the wrongs they had from them before receiued.

The Catalonians proud of their victorie at APRIL, and well strengthened by the reuolt of the Turcopuli, with continuall rodes spoiled not onely all alongst the sea coast of THRACIA, but

but all the inland countrey also, as far as MARONEA, RHODOPH, and BIZIA, laying all wast before them. And hauing forraged most part of THRACIA, brake into MACEDONIA, and there wintred about CASSANDRIA, sometime a famous citie, but as then all desolate and ruinous. But the Spring being come, they remooued thence, with purpose to haue spoiled the cities of MACEDONIA, and especially the rich citie of THESSALONICA, where the emperesse Irene then lay: wherein they were by the emperours good foresight and care preuented, who doubting such a matter, had fortified his cities in that countrey, and furnished them with strong garrisons and all other things needfull for their defence: which they quickly perceiuing, and finding the countrey all desolate and forsaken by the inhabitants, were about to haue againe returned into THRACIA. But as they were thereupon resolving, they were informed by one that was with them captiue, how that the emperor by a mightie strong wall built at a place called CHRISTOPOLIS, from the sea side euen vnto the top of the mountaines, had so shut vp the passage, as that it was not possible for them that way to enter. With which vnexpected newes they were at the first exceedingly troubled, as foreseeing, That if they should there long stay in that spoiled countrey, they should in short time be driuen vnto exceeding wants (for they were now in number about eight thousand fighting men) and afraid also by a generall conspiracie of the people about them, to be oppressed. Thus beset, and not well knowing what to do, or which way to turn themselves, they desperately resolved, no longer there to stay, but forthwith to set forward, and to breake into THESSALIE, with the plentifulnesse thereof to relieue their wants, or into some other countrey farther off towards PELOPONNESUS, and there to seat themselves, and to end their long trauailes: or at leastwise, if they could not so doe, to enter into league with some that dwelt vpon the sea coast, and so returne againe into their owne countrey. Wherefore leauing THESSALONICA, and deliuering the emperor of a great feare, they in three daies came to the Thessalian mountaines, OLYMPUS, OSSA, and PELIUS, where thy at the foot of them found such plentie of all things necessarie for their releefe, that they there wintred. But Winter past, and the Spring being come, they passed ouer those high mountaines and the pleasant vallies called TEMPE, and so at last came downe into the fruitfull plaines of THESSALIE; where they spent that yeare at their pleasure, without resistance, deuouring the labours of the poore country people, and making hauocke of whatsoeuer thing came in their way: for as then the state of that countrey was but weak, the prince thereof being but yoong, and withall very sicke and like to die, and the succession to ending in him, as that it was feared, who after his death should lay hand thereon; and euery man therefore more carefull of his owne priuat than of the common good. Yet to auert these forraign enemies, who like a consuming fire deuoured the country before them, the nobilitie thought it good, with great gifts to ouercome their captains and commanders, and then to offer them guides to conduct them into ACHAIA and BEOTIA, countries more pleasant and fruitfull than was theirs, and more commodious for them to dwell in: promising also to giue them aid for the seating of them there, if they should so need. Of which their offers the Catalonians accepted, as thinking it better with their hands full of gold so easily gotten, to goe seeke their better fortunes, with their power yet whole and strong, and helpe also if need were, than to hazard all vpon the successe of a doubtfull victorie, and so foolishly to preferre an vncertaine hope before a most certaine benefit. So making peace with the Thessalians, and the Spring being come, receiuing of them their promised rewards, & guides to conduct them; passing ouer the mountaines beyond THESSALIE, and the straits of THERMOPILE, they encamped neere vnto LOCRI and the riuer CEPHISUS: which rising out of the mountaine PERNASSUS, and running toward the East, hath on the North side of them LOCRI and OPUS; and on the South the inland country of ACHAIA and BEOTIA: and being a great riuer vntill it come to LEBADIA and HALIARTES, is there deuided into two riuers, the one called AESOPUS, and the other ISMENUS; whereof the former runneth through the countrey of ATTICA, vntill it come into the sea, and the other neere vnto AULIS (where the noble Grecians, as they say, being about to goe vnto TROY, met and there staid) falleth into the Euboean sea. But the duke of THEBES and ATHENS and of all that countrey, hearing of their coming, and (as hee thought) well provided also for them (as hauing all the Winter and Spring time before put his forces in readinesse) with great pride and contempt denied them passage through his countrey, at such time as they asked the same; making no more reckning of them, than as of a sort of loofe wandering rogues that could find no place to rest or thrine in: wherewith they enraged, resolved among among themselves, either there to seat themselves in his countrey, or to die therefore. And so passing the river into B E O T I A, not far from the same encamped themselves, being in number about 2500 horse, and 4000 foot. But so lying and expecting the coming of their enemies, they caused all the plaine ground about where they lay and meant to fight, to be plowed vp, which they with certaine small cuts out of the river so watered, as that it differed but a little from a deepe marsh or bog. Hether about the middle of the Spring commeth the prince of the countrey, with a gallant armie raised out of A T H E N S, T H E B E S, P L A T E A, L O C R I S, P H O C I S, and M E G A R A, in number about 6400 horse and 4000 foot, an armie too strong hee thought for so contemptible an enemy. But the weakest enemy not feared, doth oftentimes the greatest harme, as here by prooffe was to be seene: for the prince comming vnto the foresaid plaine, now grown green with grasse, and casting no perill, encouraging his men, came brauely on with all his horsemen to haue charged his enemies: who stood fast vpon the firme ground, a little without their trenches, as ready to encounter him. But before he was come to the middle of the plaine, his horses sinking deepe into the rotten and new ploughed ground, and there intangled as in a marsh, lay for the most part tumbling in the mire, together with their riders; or els plunging in the deepe; and hauing cast them, ran vp and downe the plaine, as fortune led them; othersome sticking fast, stood with their riders vpon their backs, as if they had been very images, not able for to moue. Which the Catalonians beholding, and therewith encouraged, ouerwhelmed them with all manner of shot, and slew them at their pleasure, vntill they had almost made an end of them: and with their horsemen so speedily pursued the rest in chace, euen vnto the cities of T H E B E S and A T H E N S, that they without more adoe euen at that instant surprised them both, with all that was in them. So the Catalonians hauing as it were at a cast at dice woon a most goodly countrey, garnished with faire townes and cities, which they neuer built; and stored with all manner of wealth, which they neuer sweat for; there ended their long trauailes, and seated themselves: Not ceasing (as saith Nicephorus Gregorius, the reporter of this historie, speaking of the time wherein these things were done, and wherein hee himselfe liued in C O N S T A N T I N O P L E) vnto this present day, by little and little to extend the bounds of their territorie. Where leauing them with whom we happely haue too long straid from our purpose, let vs againe returne vnto the Turks and Turcopuli their companions.

In the armie of the Catalonians, at such time as they were about to haue besieged T H E S S A L O N I C A, were three thousand Turkes, of whom eleven hundred were of them (as we said) which remained with Melech at A E N V M, after the flight of Iathatus there Sultan vnto the Tartars, and renouncing their superstition, became Christians; and so being baptized, and hauing wiues and children, were enrolled among the emperours souldiours; but at the battell of A P R I revolted vnto the Catalonians, and were commonly known by the name of Turcopuli: the other being the greater part, were such Turkes as with Chalel their captaine came out of A S I A, being sent for by the Catalonians. Now all these Turkes, as well the one as the other, at such time as the Catalonians were about to invade T H E S S A L I A, and to seeke their new fortunes in the countries more W estward, and so farther off from A S I A: partly distrusting the societie of them, as dangerous vnto them; and loth also further to follow their vncertaine fortunes into countries further off, among people to them vnknowne; began to arise in mutinie; and to refuse to go. Whereupon their captaines Melech and Chalel requested of the Generall of the Catalonians to giue them leaue with quietnesse to return: which their request he easily graunted (as now not greatly needing their helpe, after that he was departing out of the emperours dominion) and so they gladly departed; proportionally diuiding all the captiues and spoiles they had taken in that long war, according to the number of both parts.

These Turkes after their departure from the Catalonians, diuided themselves into two parts, the Turcopuli or renegat Turkes following Melech, and the rest Chalel their generall. But Melech being before become a Christian, as were his followers also; and after that hauing received most honorable entertainment at the emperours hands, and yet againe most shamefully breaking his faith before giuen, and violating his religion, had revolted vnto his enemies; dispaireing of the emperours further friendship, which he had so euill deserued, made choise rather to goe vnto Crales prince of S E R V I A, by whom he was sent for, than to come againe into the fight of Andronicus the Greeke emperour. And so going vnto him with a thousand horse, and five hundred foot, was there of him well entertained himselfe: but his souldiours all commanded to deliuer vnto the prince both their horses and armour, and to fall to other trades and not to beare armes but at such time, and so many of them as should seeme good vnto the prince, that had receiued them into his countrey.

But Chalel with the Turkes his followers, in number about 1300 horse and eight hundred foot, staying at M A C E D O N I A, offered vnto the Greeke emperour quietly to depart his countrey, so that he would giue him passage by the straits of C H R I S T O P O L I S by him fortified; and in safetie transport him and his souldiours with all their substance, ouer the strait of H E L E S P O N T V S into A S I A: vnto which his request, the emperour considering the great harme done in his prouinces; and desirous also to be discharged of so great a burthen, easily graunted; and so sent Senacherib, one of his most valiant captaines, to conduct them out of M A C E D O N I A into T H R A C I A, vnto the straits of H E L E S P O N T V S. Where the Greeke captaines and souldiours seeing the great multitude of horses, and abundance of money and other spoiles; which they hauing taken from the Turkes were now about to carie away with them into A S I A; they thought it a great indignitie to suffer them so to do: and allured also with the hope of so rich a prey, as had bene of long in gathering; they entred into a deuise far different from that which was vnto the Turkes before promised; neither prouiding them of shipping, neither carefull of their safetie; but purposing vpon the sudden by night to destroy them. Whereof the Turkes hauing got vnderstanding, suddenly rising, surprised a castle in the countrey thereby, which they notably fortified for the defence of themselves, to the great astonishment of them that had purposed their destruction; who not how able to force them, were glad to get them farther off; and to certifie the emperour what had happened: who (after I wot not what receiued custome of the Greeke emperours his predecessors) slowly dispatching things requiring greatest hast, carelessly delayed the time, to the great trouble of his state and aduantage of his enemies. For they wisely considering the danger and distresse they were in, by speedie messengers sent ouer the strait, craued aid of the Turkes their countrey men in A S I A, which they presently sent them: wherewith they not a little both encouraged and strengthened, with their often and sudden incursions grievously wasted the countrey round about them, to the great discontentment of the Greeke captaines, not able without greater helpe to remedie the same. Who thereof certified the yoong emperour Michael Paleologus, requesting him with all the power he could make, to come and besiege the castle, and to suppress these so dangerous enemies. For the performance whereof, not onely the captaines with their souldiours, but the countrey people in generall with their spades and mattocks came flocking vnto the emperour; not as if they would haue besieged the castle, but haue digged it downe and ouerthrown it together with the Turkes their enemies.

Now the emperour with his captaines and souldiours, and a multitude of these countrey people, being come thither; who all gladly followed him, most part of them foolishly thinking of nothing, but of the spoile of their enemies; not considering with what danger the same was to be gained: so that the more the enemies provided for the necessarie defence of themselves, as in number but few, and shut vp in their enemies countrey; the more carelessly and negligently, and without all order, the Greeks proceeded in their siege, for that they were in number far more, and better provided of all things than their enemies: not reputing with themselves, Nothing in this world to be firme and sure; and all worldly things (as saith the diuine Philosopher) to bee but the mockerie of God, and to be hastily turned vpside downe, and with most vncertaine course this and that way to wander. But their enemies, who before feared euen the verie fame of their coming, accounting themselves rather among the dead than the liuing, seeing their confused and disordered rashnesse; therewith much more then before encouraged, bestowed all their wealth, their women, and other things vnnecessary for battel, in good safetie within their trenches: but themselves, with eight hundred chosen horsemen onely, and they verie well armed, sallied out, euen vnto the place where the imperiall ensigne stood; being neither of any great safetie, neither guarded with any such strength or carefulnesse as befecmed: with which sudden and desperat eruption of the enemies, the Gracians terrified; especially that rusticall and vplandish companie, began to flie; after whom by little and little others followed, vntill at length all the rest without farther resistance, fled also: which the emperour seeing, did what he might to haue staied their flight: but in so generall a confusion and feare, when euery man was to shift for one, who regarded him? Wherefore wearied and seeing no other remedie, hee was glad to take the same course and to flie with the rest. Yet many of the more expert captaines, ashamed of so foule a flight;

a flight, made diuers stands: and so staid the barbarous enimie from further pursuit of the emperor and the other flying Greeks. In which doing, many of them inclosed by the Turks, were of them taken prisoners: vnto whom all the emperours treasure became a prey also, and what of them honourable ensignes of the empire else that were found in the emperours tent; yea the imperiall crowne it selfe, richly set with pearle and precious stones, was there taken also, which (they say) Chalel putting vpon his head, pleasantly scoffed at the Greeke emperour that but late before wore it.

*Thracia spoiled
by the Turks.*

After this victorie, the Turks with great pride spoiled almost all Thracia, in such sort as that the people for two yeares together durst scarcely goe out of their strong walled townes to the plough and sow their land; which exceedingly grieued both the emperours, the father and the sonne: for in their owne power they had no great confidence, God hauing (as it were) taken from their people both their hearts & courage; so that all their hope was to entertaine forreinaid (the miserable shift of the great distressed ones) wherein also they found many difficulties and lets, whilst they considered the greatnesse of the charge, their coffers being then (if euer) empty, by reason their territories were so long and grieuouly by their enemies wasted: yet need admitting no law, Andronicus the old emperour was glad to send to Crales prince of Servia his sonne in law, to pray his aid. But in the meane time he making no hast (as men in relieuing others commonly do) and the miserie more and more increasing, it pleased God to stir vp the heart of one Philes Paleologus the emperours neere kinsman, to vndertake the protection and deliuerance of his prince and country; and was afterward for his great valour by the emperor woorthily made lord great Martiall of the empire. This Philes of whom we now speake, had all his life time beene brought vp in the court, and was for his vpriight dealing and integritie of life beloued of all men, but especially of the old emperour his kinsman, whom he with like affection honoured; but was a man altogether vnskillfull of the wars, as being by nature of a weak constitution of bodie, and so verie sickly; and withall more giuen to deuotion and the seruice of God than the affaires of the world, oftentimes spending most part of the day at his prayers in the church. He now grieued to see the perplexed emperour, and the miserie of his country, requested of him that he might with some small power, and some few captaines of his owne choice, go out against these proud Turks: hoping (as he said) by the grace of God to reuenge the wrong by them done, and to returne vnto him againe with victorie. Vnto which his request, the emperour easily yeelded, saying, That God was just, which delighted not in any mans legs, either in the greatnesse of any mans strength, but in a contrite heart and humble mind; not so giuing his helpe vnto Michael the emperour, his sonne, for the offences of his parents: as happily he might vnto this so vpriight and deuout a man, regarding more his integritie of life, than his skill in armes: For turning me about, I haue seen in this world (said he) I haue seene, the swift not to gaine the prize; neither the valiant the victorie; wise men to want bread; and men of vnderstanding, wealth; the simple to gaine fauour; and the subtil to fall into disgrace: such alteration worldly things in time find. So the emperour (as is aforesaid) yeelding to his request, furnished him with money, horses, and armour, and such a conuenient power as he himselfe desired. Which he hauing receiued, first of all encouraged his captaines and souldiours with all manner of courtesie and kindnesse, giuing vnto them money, horses, armour, jewels, yea sometime he gaue vnto one his purse, vnto another his cloake, his rapier, or some other such thing as he had about him, to encourage them in their forwardnesse: after that he perswaded them to an honest temperate course of life, and valiantly to play the men, promising according to their deserts to reward euery one of them, the war once happily ended: and before his setting forth, vnderstanding by his espials, that Chalel with a thousand foot and two hundred horse was foraging the country about Bziza, he hastid his departure, that so he might by the way encounter them, laded with the spoile of the country: and so setting forward, came the third day vnto a little riuer, which the inhabitants call Xerogisum, and there in a great plaine neere vnto the same, encamped. VV here after he had set all things in order fit for battell, he with cheerefull speeches, as a great commander, encouraged his captaines and souldiours; leaving nothing vnfaid or vndone, that might serue for the animating of them to fight. But hee had not so lien two daies, but that his scouts about midnight coming in, brought him tidings, That the enimie laded with spoile, was euen fast by at hand: who by the rising of the Sunne were come within sight, and had themselves a far off also discovered the Christian armie, all glittering in bright armour. VV herfore staying a while to prepare them-themselves for battell: and first of all, compassing themselves round with their waggons and other carriages, they bestowed in them all their captiues fast bound together, with the bootie they had taken: and afterwards as their manner was, casting dust vpon their heads, and their hands vp towards heauen, they came on. And now the Christian armie came on forward also, Philes still encouraging both the horsemen and footmen, and right well conducting them, as the time and place required. So it fortuned, that he that had the leading of the right wing of the armie, gaue the first charge vpon a squadron of the enemies, and at the first onser vnhorfed one of the enemies, and by and by after him, another. But hauing his horse sore wounded vnder him, he hastily retired out of the battell, which somewhat troubled the Christians, and encouraged the Turks, who now with a barbarous outcrie began most fiercely to presse vpon the retiring Christians. Philes in the meane time with many cheerefull words and comfortable perswasions still encouraging them to play the men; and with his eyes oftentimes cast vp to heauen, with teares running downe his face, most heartely besought God, the giuer of all victorie, no longer to suffer those his enemies, and the ministers of his wrath, to triumph ouer his people: as did also the poore captiues that lay bound, doubtfully betwixt feare and hope, expecting the euent of the battell. The Christian footmen at the same time encountering hand to hand with the Barbarians, assailed them, and were assailed; slew of them, and were themselves of them slaine; so that there was a cruell fight made on both sides. But Philes with the multitude of his men hauing almost compassed in the Barbarian horsemen, with a companie of his most valiant souldiours broke in vpon the side of the enemies battell, and so made way through the midst of it: and so troubled the Turkes, as that they well knew not how to stay or what to doe. So being on euery side circumvented and hardly charged, most of them there fell, excepting some few horsemen, whom the Greeke horsemen pursued vnto the entrance of Chersonesus, with purpose there to shut them vp. Philes coming thither also, there vpon those straits encamped: at which time the emperour presently sent out five gallies to keepe the straits of Hellespontus, so that no ayd might be brought vnto these Turkes out of Asia. Whilst things thus went, two thousand choice horsemen came to the aid of Philes out of Servia, and the potestate of Pera came by sea also with eight gallies moe into Hellespontus to the aid of the other Christians: wherefore when the Grecians and the Seruians had thus on the one side shut them vp by land, and they that were in the gallies on the other by sea; Philes with all his power came and encamped about the towne and the trenches wherein the Turkes lay, planting his batterie against the castle, wherewith he greatly shooke the same, and made great slaughter of the Turks, and of their horses, and that not onely by day, but by night also. But the Turkes seeing death now present before their eyes, and no way left for them to escape: for that they were so on euery side both by sea and land enclosed, thought good thus to aduenure their liues, resolving by night to set vpon the Grecians rather than vpon the Seruians, whom they had hether to accustomed to overcome, and whom they had with often slaughters terrified; that so the rest by them also happily discouraged, they might so delay the assault: but in attempting the same, they perceiued themselves much deceiued, finding them euen at their first falling out, ready in armes to receiue them: wherefore hauing in vaine giuen the attempt (as against a strong fortresse) they were shamefully enforced to retire. Yet were they not therewith so discouraged, but that the straight siege still continuing, they gaue the like attempt vpon the Seruians; but being also by them in like manner with losse repulged, they began now vterly to despaire. VV herfore the next day, about midnight casting away their armes, they with their bosomes and pockets full of coine ran downe vnto the sea side, towards the gallies, with purpose to yeeld themselves vnto the Genowaiques that were therein; as fearing of them lesse harme, as of men whom they had neuer hurt: But the night being darke and mistie, and the Moone giuing no light, many of them vnawares came vnto the Greeke gallies, and there, flying the smoke fell into the fire: for being lightened of their moniey, they were by them forthwith without any pitie slaine also. But the Genowaiques slew not all their prisoners, but onely such as had brought with them the greatest store of coine; least afterwards bewtaying the same, it should haue beene sought after by the Greekes: the rest they cast into bonds, of whom, some they sent vnto the emperour, other some they kept to themselves as their owne prisoners. Thus, by the valour and good conduct of this worthe deuout capitaine, the Turkes were for that time againe chased out of Europa, and the country of Thracia deliuered of a great feare.

Now

Othoman first king of the Turks.

Now by that we haue already written, is easily to be scene, the chief causes of the decay and ruine of the Greeke empire, to haue been, First, the innouation and change of their ancient Religion and ceremonies by Michael Paleologus, whereof ensued a world of woes; then by Countessesse, coloured with the name of good husbandrie, the utter destruction of the chief strength of the empire; next vnto that, by Enuie, the ruine of the great; False suspect, the looser of friends; Ambition, honours ouerthrow; Distrust, the great minds torment; and Forreine aid, the emperours vnfaithfull porter, opening the gate euen vnto the enemie himselfe: wherunto foule Discord joyned (as shall be forthwith declared) what wanted that the barbarous enemie could desire, for the helping of them in the supplanting of so great an empire? But againe to our purpose: Michael, companion with his father Andronicus in the empire, had by his wife Marie two sonnes, Andronicus who was afterward emperor, and Mannuel surnamed the Despot; and two daughters, Anne married vnto Thomas prince of Epirus, and Theodora married to the prince of Bulgaria: of all these, the old emperor Andronicus their grandfather, so entirely loued Andronicus his nephew, as that in comparison of him he little seemed to regard either his owne children, or the rest of his nephews, wishing them all rather to perish than him: which many supposed him to do, as purposing by him the better to establish the succession of the empire in his house; as also for his excellencie of wit, and comelinesse of person; the likenesse of name also happily furthering his kind affection. For which reasons, he caused him to be alwaies honourably brought vp in his court, as not willing to spare him out of his sight either day or night. But when he was out of his childhood, and growne to be a lustie youth (at which time mens hot desires are commonly most vehement) he began to contemne all chastisement and gouernment; especially in so high a calling, and in the prime of his youth. Besides that, his companions became vnto him the ministers and persuers of all those vaine delights which vnstaied youth most desireth: and at the first began to lead him forth to walke the streets, to haunke, to hunt, and to haunt plaies, and afterwards to night walks also, not well becomming his state: which riotous course of life, when as it required great expence, and his aged grandfather gaue him but a certaine spare allowance for his conuenient maintenance; he acquainted himselfe with the rich marchants of Genovay, which dwelt at Pera. Hereof rose hard taking vp of money, great debt, fine deuises how to come by coyne, with secret consultations and purposes of flight. For when hee saw his grandfather old Andronicus long to liue, and his father Michael like to succede him, he had no hope of aspiring to the empire; whereupon his ambitious thoughts, and impotent desires, long time tormenting his haughtie heart, suggested vnto him such purposes. For when as hee would not obey his grandfather as his tutor, nor follow other mens counsels, as a child, hee sought after the imperiall libertie, and abundance of wealths that he might haue that was sufficient for himselfe, and wherewith to reward others, as the followers of an emperor. Which seeing he could not doe, his grandfather yet liuing, and his father reigning; he sought after the soueraignie of other principalities and countries: one while after Armenia, as belonging vnto him in the right of his mother, the king of Armenia his daughter; another while after Peloponessus, and sometime hee dreamed of Lesbos and Lemnus, and other the fruitfull Islands of the Aegean sea: which when it was secretly told sometime to his father, and sometime to his grandfather, he was now crossed and reprooued of the one, and afterwards of the other. And to passe ouer many other his youthfull pranks, hee vsed in his night walks secretly to repaire vnto a certaine gentlewomans house, more honourably borne, than honestly qualified: which woman, a certaine gallant and another Adonis, no lesse affected than himselfe; wherewith he highly offended, as with his riuall, appointed certaine ruffians and fencers to watch her house. But vpon a certaine time about midnight, Mannuel the Despot (his younger brother) seeking after him, chanced to passe that way where these watchmen lay: who seeing him hasten by, and not knowing him in the darke, and supposing him to haue been the man they looked for, the gentlewomans best beloued, set vpon him, and so wounded him that he fell downe for dead from his horse: but being by and by after known by others coming in, he was taken vp, and so halfe dead carried vnto the court. Which outrage in the morning being knowne vnto the emperor, cast him into a great heauinesse, as beholding not the time present onely, but wisely considering what was like to ensue in the time to come also. But Mannuel the Despot being dead of the wounds there receiued, and the report thereof brought vnto Michael the younge emperor his father, then lying at Thessalonica, strooke him to the heart with so great a griefe, that falling sicke with the conceit thereof, hee shortly after died.

Andronicus the vnstaied youth neuerthelesse holding on his wonted course, with a secret purpose to haue fled, became thereby still more and more suspicious vnto his aged grandfather, not a little careful vnto what end those his violent passions would at length tend. And therefore appointed one Syrgianus (a man of great credit and authorie in the court, in whom as in a reconciled enemie he had most vnadvisedly reposed too much trust) to insinuat himselfe into the youthfull princes acquaintance and fauour; that so sounding him, and his secret designs, he should not possibly be able without his knowledge to step aside; which of all things the old emperor feared most, as the beginning of greater troubles. This Syrgianus being a man of great place, and of a subtil wit, was sometime himselfe suspected of aspiring; and therefore as vpon the misprision of treason, was by the old emperor imprisoned: but afterwards by him againe enlarged and receiued into fauour, was now put in trust warily to obserue the doings of the younge prince. But he not vnmindfull of the wrong before done vnto him, and in hope by troubling the state, either to aspire vnto the empire himselfe, or at leastwise to some good part thereof; thought now a fit occasion to be ministred vnto him for him to worke vpon, both for the one and the other, by setting the old emperor, and his ambitious nephew together by the eares: which opportunity he not minding to let slip, taking the younge prince one day aside, discovered vnto him all his grandfathers deuise in brieft, as followeth:

Your grandfather noble prince (said he) hath set me as a watch over your actions, or more truly to say, as a blood-hound, to seeke after not your doings onely, but if it were possible euen after your most secret thoughts also: and so whilest he maliciously prepareth for you snares and fetters, you not aware thereof, foolishly follow your shallow and childish conceits. For what shall it auail you secretly to stie away? whereas (if the best chance) yet must you (as the common saying is) put your feet vnder another mans table, and line of his charge; if it fall not out worse, that you be slaine or made away by them you stie vnto for reliefe, or else fall into the snares by your grandfather laid for you. But if so be that casting behind you these your fond deuises you will hearken vnto my counsell, I will shew you a readie way how you shall in short time and without any danger, aspire vnto the imperiall seat and dignitie; the onely way wherunto is this, if you leauing the citie of Constantinople shall stie out into the cities and provinces of Thracia. For seeing men are most commonly by nature desirous of change, and the miserable Thracians are with often exactions grievously vexed; if you shall but once proclaime a redresse of their grieuances, with immunitie for euer, they will all with one accord follow you whether soeuer you will, your grandfathers long and heauie yoke being cast off, as if it were Sisiphus his euill stone, which they had long rolled and neuer the neere. If you like of this aduise, I will be vnto you both the author and the leader of this exploit, and will easily bring to good effect the whole matter: so that you againe on the other side promise vnto me vpon your faith, to reward this my trauell according to my desert therein. But what rewards shall these be? Honourable preferments, large possessions, great reuenues, the first place in your fauour, and that no great matter be done or concluded without my consent and knowledge. For you see how willingly I make my selfe partaker of your calamitie and companion of your dangers, no necessitie enforcing me thereunto; forgetting euen my verie faith in comparison of the loue and zeale I beare towards you, wherein if any mishap shall by the mutabilitie of fortune betide me, I haue set downe my selfe with patience to indure it. All which considered, you need not to grudge to yeeld vnto my requests, if you tender your owne safetie. And for as much as the shortnesse of the time will suffer no long consultations, and that delay bringeth extreame danger: let vs without longer stay impart the matter vnto such others, as for the hatred of the emperor are like to keepe our counsell, and may yet much further our designs.

The younge prince moued with this speech, as if it had beene with a charme, easily graunted to his desire, confirming the same by his oath conceiued in writing: at which time were present such as were especially to be acquainted with the plot of the conspiracie, namely Iohn Catachene, and Theodorus Synadenus (both men of great honour, and the old emperours ancient supposed friends, and of him beloued, much of like age vnto himselfe) and Alexius Apocancus the third (not of like honour with the other, yet a man of great place, and of a most subtil and deepe wit:) who all vnderstanding the matter, shewed themselves not as ministers, but as king-leaders and captaines of the intended rebellion. This conspiracie with most solemn oaths and promises on euery part confirmed, they began right cunningly to attempt the matter : and to begin withall, Syrgiannes and Catacuzenus, by corrupting diuers of the great and most gracious courtiers, procured to themselves the gouernment of such cities and prouinces in THRACIA, as they thought fittest for them to begin their rebellion in. Syrgiannes hauing the gouernment of the sea coast, and the inland countrey euen from the sea side vnto the top of mount RHODOPES; and Catacuzenus the gouernment of the countrey about ORESTIAS. In all which places they mustred fouldiors, provided armour, entertaining also strangers, and other vagrant and matterlesse men, as for some great war: besides that, in the cities for the gouernment thereof, they placed their most trustie friends, remoouing such others as they had in suspect. All which they coloured by rumours falsly raised, one while of the comming of the European Tartars from DANUBIUS; and another while by the comming of the Turks out of ASIA: against whose inuasions these preparations were giuen out to be made, for auoiding of suspicion; and the traitours for their prouident care highly commended euen by the emperor himselfe, against whom they were intended. All which things Syrgiannes notably dissembled, oftentimes withall certifying the yong prince what he had done, and what was likewise of him to be performed.

But the old emperor, seeing his youthfull nephew not to hearken to his graue aduise, but still to proceed in his dissolute kind of life; was about solemnly to haue reprobued him before the Patriarch and some others of the chiefe nobilitie: if happily such open reproofe might haue wrought in him some change of manners; if not, then to haue committed him to prison: and like enough he was to haue so done, had he not bene otherwise perswaded by Theodorus Metochita (who of all others was able to do most with him) by reason of the libertie of the time; for then it was vpon the point of Shrouetide, when as the people distempered with excess of meate and drinke, were of all other times most fit, vpon any light occasion, to be drawne into a tumult or vprore: for feare whereof, he was contented for that time to let him alone. But Shrouetide past, and a good part of Lent also, the old emperor seeing no amendment in his nephew, calling vnto him Gerasimus the patriarch, & the rest of the reuerend bishops the present in the cite, sent for his nephew, openly before them all to chide him, and to schoole him for his disordered life; but especially for his purposed flight; that ashamed of such open reproofe before such reuerend fathers, he might either amend his life, or at leastwise of all men be thought iustly punished for the same, if he should still proceed therein. So the yong prince being sent for, came accompanied with a number of his fauourits and followers, most of them being secretly armed, and himselfe not altogether vnprovided: for it was agreed amongst them, that if the emperor should vse gentle and fatherly admonition towards him, that then they should keepe themselves quiet, without any shew of insolencie or discontentment; but if he should in anger reprove him, or threaten to punish him, then vpon a signe giuen, forcibly with their swords drawne, to breake in vpon him and to kill him in the imperiall seat, and without more ado to place yong Andronicus his nephew in his stead. But comming in, and (as his manner was) taking his place next vnto his aged grandfather, his desperat followers attending without, he was indeed of him grieuouly blamed and reprobued for his former follies and euill course of life; yet with such moderation and grauitie, as that all seemed (as it did) to come of a most fatherly care and regard: so that at that time no such outrage was committed, as was by diuers his followers wished, but the assemble quietly dismissed, and a solemn oath taken on both sides: of the grandfather, That he should not appoint any other to succeed him in the empire but his nephew; and of the yong prince, That he should neuer go about or attempt any thing, to the shortening or hurt of his grandfathers life or empire. But the conspirators thronging about him at his comming out, fretted & fumed at him, as if he had broken his faith and oath before giuen them, saying, What greater wrong couldst thou do vs, than being by vs made strong and become dreadfull vnto thine enemies, to dispose of thine affaires at thy pleasure to thine owne safetie, and to leaue vs thy most faithfull friends and seruants in the diuels mouth to be deuoured? For now they both doubted, and feared, lest their conspiracie was discovered. With which speeches he both discouraged, and ashamed, sent for Theodorus Metochita his grandfathers chiefe counsellor, requesting him to deale with his grandfather, for the pardoning of all his followers, as he had done for himselfe: of which motion he disliking, told him, That he was to giue God thanks that he had himselfe escaped so great a danger, and to him also, as a meane for the safeguard of his life; although he entreated not for such traitorous traitorous persons, with whom, if he were well aduised, he would haue nothing to do, either think that they would euer be faithfull vnto him, that respecting neither God nor man, had so foully broken their faith before giuen vnto the emperor his grandfather. With which vnexpected answer of so great and graue a counsellor, the prince not a little troubled and withall discontented, stood a while as in a muse all silent, reasoning as it were with his owne passions: but afterwards commanding him without further reply to depart, and the old companions of his follies resorting vnto him, he by their perswasion entertained againe his former disloyall thoughts and designements: which his grandfather vehemently suspecting, and therewith not a little grieued, would, as if it had bene by inspiration, oftentimes in his heauinesse say vnto them that were about him, In our time is lost the maiestie of our empire, and the deuotion of the Church. Yet to prevent the worst, he thought it good betime to lay hands vpon his suspected nephew, and so to detain him in safe keeping: acquainting none therewith but Gerasimus the Patriarch and his ghostly father, who straightway acquainted the prince therewith, and was the cause that he hastened his flight, flying himselfe before. For he now certainly vnderstanding the danger he was in, the night before he should haue bene apprehended, with all the rest of the conspirators his complices, in the dead time of the night fled out of the cite, by the gate called GYROLIMNIA; which gate (all the rest being shut) was still at his command, for that he commonly vsed thereby at his pleasure very early to go out on hunting, as he now pretended to do; but the next day after came to Syrgiannes and Catacuzenus camp, who then both lay with a great power at HADRIANOPOLE, expecting his comming. The old emperor, before the rising of the sunne, aduertised of the flight of his nephew, the same day commanded him to be proclaimed traitor, & proscribed, with all his conspirators, & whoseoeuer els should take his part. And for the more firetie, euery man in the cite was sworn to be loyall and faithfull vnto the old emperor, and enemies vnto his nephew and his adherents. But he on the other side, proclaiming libertie and immunitie abroad in all the cities and villages in THRACIA, so woon the hearts of the countrey people in general, that they resorted vnto him from all places in great numbers, ready armed to doe whatsoeuer he should command them. And to begin withall, they first laid hands vpon the collectors of the emperours monie, then abroad in the countrey, whom they foully intreated, taking from them their money. After that, and yet seuen daies not expired, almost an incredible number of horfmen, footmen, archers, and others, departed from HADRIANOPOLE towards CONSTANTINOPOLE, vnder the leading of Syrgiannes, in good hope at their first comming to take the cite, being at discord in it selfe; and most part of the meaner sort, in hope of gaine, fauouring their rebellious proceedings, such as the seditious find in such rebellious tumults. So hauing marched foure daies, they came and encamped at SELYBRIA: but as they were about to haue gone on farther, the old emperor doubting least the citizens, seeing so great an arme before the cite, should therein raise some tumult or stirre, to the endangering thereof; thought good before to send embassadours vnto his nephew, to proue if happily these so dangerous troubles, might by their means in some good sort be appeased. The chiefe of these embassadours was one Theoleptus bishop of PHILADELPHIA, a man no lesse famous for his vertue than his wisdom, and yet for both of all men honored; and with them also was sent Syrgiannes his mother, as of all others most fit to appease her sonne, & to perswade him not to approach the cite, for that thereof might ensue much bloodshed, and the destruction of the cite, or at leastwise the vtter vndoing of manie; whereof if he should be the authour, how could he euer after liue in conscience quiet, but that the torment thereof would follow him euen into his graue; and therefore to request him to retire a little, and so to come to talke, and to demaund what he pleased. Syrgiannes moued as well with the presence of the reuered bishop, as with the prayers of his mother, retired to the yong prince, which then lay about ORESTIAS; whither the emperours embassadours came also: with whom (after long debating) it was agreed, That the yong prince should in all royall manner, hold all THRACIA, from CHRISTOPOLIS vnto RHAGYVM and the suburbs of CONSTANTINOPOLE; and withall, That such lands as the yong prince had already giuen vnto his followers in MACEDONIA should still remaine vnto them (which were such as yearly yielded vnto them a right great reuenue). And that the old emperor should hold vnto himselfe the imperiall cite, with all the cities and prouinces of MACEDONIA beyond CHRISTOPOLIS; and that he alone should haue the honour to heare the embassadours sent from forraigne princes, and to giue them their dispatch; for that the yong prince tooke no pleasure in those

Articles of agreement betwixt the old emperor and his nephew.

The Greeke empire in Europe deuied.

Whilist the Greekes are at discord among themselves, Othoman layeth the foundation of the Turke empire, and the other Turkes encroach vpon them also.

The Island of the Rhodes was by the knights Hospitallers recovered from the Turkes in the year 1308.

waightie affaires; as by nature more delighted in hauking, hunting, and his other youthfull pleasures. Vpon which conditions a peace was concluded, better liked of the yong prince, than of the old emperour; who although he was desirous otherwise to haue redressed so great wrongs, yet wanting power, was glad to yeeld to whatsoeuer his nephew would request. Thus was the Greeke empire in EUROPE (as then all or the most part inclosed within the bounds of MACEDONIA and THRACIA) now deuied betwixt the grandfather and his nephew: ASIA in the meane time (wherin the Greeke emperours their predecessors sometime held great kingdomes) being left for a prey to the greedy Turkes. Othoman on the one side euen in the heat of these troubles laying the foundation of his empire in PHRYGIA and BYTHINIA: and the other the Turkes princes, the succcessors of Sultan Aladin, encroching as fast vpon the emperours territories and countries on this side the riuer MEANDER. And not so contented, at the same time, also built great store of gallies, wherewith they robbed the Christian marchants trading to CONSTANTINOPLE, and spoiled the coasts of MACEDONIA and THRACIA, and the Islands of the Ege Sea; and amongst others tooke the famous Island of the RHODES: which they held not long, before they were againe driuen out of the same by the knights Hospitallers, vnder the conduct of William Willaret, aided by the Genowais, and the king of SICILIA, which they from that time held (to the great honour and benefit of the Christian commonweale) by the space of 214 years, knowne by the name of The knights of the RHODES: vntill that in the memorie of our fathers it was (I say no more, but grieue therefore) shamefully lost vnto the Turke, for want of reliefe, neuer place being more honourably defended, as in the processe of this historie shall appeare: euer since which time, those honourable men (the flower of chualitie) haue seated themselves in the Isle of MALTA; which they to their immortall glorie, and the comfort of all good Christians, haue most notably defended against the mightie Sultan Solyman, and all the furie of the Turkes: shall be also in due place declared.

But to returne againe vnto the troubled estate of the Greeke empire. Syrgiannes the great captain, and author of all the aforefaid stirs betwixt the old emperour and his nephew, had euen from the beginning thought, as a companion to the yong prince, to haue ruled all with him in his pleasure, and that nothing either great or little should haue been done without him: but seeing it now to fall out far otherwife than he had before expected, and the prince to be wholly ruled by Catagrenus, and himselfe of all others least regarded, and not so much as called to any counsell; inwardly tormented with greefe and enuie, he began secretly with himselfe, to deuise how he might be reuenged of the vngratefull prince, which vnmindfull of his former promises; had so vnthankfully cast him off. Wherefore he resolved againe to reuolt vnto the old emperour; not doubting but so in short time to ouerthrow all the counsels and deuices of the yong prince, together with his state also, by himselfe before, raised. For hee as a worldly wise man, excluding God from his counsels, had such an opinion of himselfe, that which way soeuer he went, thither must all things follow also. Wherefore by one of his most trustie friends, he secretly made the old emperour acquainted with his purposed reuolt, and how all things stood: for the greater credit thereof, alleading, That he could not abide the sight of him, that sought to corrupt his wife, meaning the yong prince. This newes from Syrgiannes was vnto the old emperour most welcome: for it grieved him, as an old man of a great spirit, to see himselfe so contemned and deluded by his nephew, his empire rent, and his old seruitours, of all sorts, by him spoiled of their lands and possessions in MACEDONIA and THRACIA. So a solemne oath in secret passed from the one to the other, Syrgiannes without longer stay secretly fled to CONSTANTINOPLE: which there bruited abroad, rejoyced many, now well hoping the whole government should againe come vnto the old emperour, and that so they should againe recouer their possessions wrongfully taken from them by his nephew. But God not seeing it so good, all this hope was but vaine, as ere long it appeared: For the yong prince, who of long knew how much he was beloved of the Constantinopolitans, and by them secretly sent for, taking occasion vpon the flight of Syrgiannes, with all the power he could make, marched towards the citie: & being come within sight thereof, encamped, laying ambushes vpon euery way & passage thereabout, for to haue intercepted Syrgiannes; who was then at PERINTHUS, and the third night after, with three hundred select souldiers, deceiuing them that lay in wait for him, as if they had beene all asleepe, before the rising of the Sunne came to CONSTANTINOPLE: and if the old emperour would haue giuen him leaue, had suddainly charged them that lay in wait for him, before they were aware of his his coming. But as soone as it was day, the prince hearing of the escape of Syrgiannes, and no such tumult in the citie as he had expected, presently without more ado, retired with his armie the same way he came, backe againe into THRACIA.

By and by after, Constantine the Despot was by the old emperour his brother, sent by sea to THESSALONICA, to take vpon him the government of MACEDONIA, and by the way to apprehend Xene the emperesse, the yong princes mother; & after with all the power he could make to invade the yong prince in THRACIA: that so setting vpon him on the one side, and MACEDONIA, and Syrgiannes with the Turkes (for the emperour in this civil discord was glad to see their helpe also) and the Bythinian souldiers on the other, they might so shut him vp betwixt them and take him. According to which resolution, the Despot comming to THESSALONICA there tooke the emperesse, whom with all her familie he thrust into a gallee, and so sent her to CONSTANTINOPLE, where she was in the palace kept close, as too much fauouring the proceedings of the prince: And afterward raising all the power he could in MACEDONIA, invaded the prince in THRACIA, breaking by force through the wall of CHRISTOPOLIS.

The yong prince seeing himselfe by this meanes, now like to be driuen to a great strait, sent Synadenus with his Thracian armie, to defend the frontiers of his empire towards CONSTANTINOPLE, against Syrgiannes with his Turkes and Bythinians: in hope himselfe by many subtile deuises and flights, to be able to encounter his vnckle the Despot. And first he caused diuers edicts and proscriptions to be writt in halt, wherein great rewards and preferments were with great solemnitie of words promised to whomsoeuer could bring vnto him the Despot either quick or dead: which were of purpose giuen vnto the country people passing too and fro, to be dispersed abroad in the high waies, and about in the country neere vnto the Despots campe. And after that, he caused the death of the emperour his grandfather to be eutie where proclaimed; and how that he was by the Constantinopolitans in a tumult slaine: which the deuises thereof, in euery place reported. As some there were, that swore they were themselves present at his wofull death, and saw it with their eyes: others some, more certainly to perswade the matter, shewed long white goats haire, or such like gathered out of white wooll, as if they had beene by the furious people plucked from the old emperours head or beard, at such time as hee was slaine. Which things being commonly reported in euery towne and village, but especially in the Despots campe, wonderfully filled mens heads with diuers strange and doubtful thoughts: then diuers also of the dispersed edicts being found and brought vnto the Despot, stricke him (and not without cause) into a great feare; insomuch that by the perswasion of his best friends, he without longer stay retired in halt to THESSALONICA. Whither shortly after came a gallee from CONSTANTINOPLE, with secret letters from the emperour to the Despot, for the apprehension of five and twentie of the cheefe citizens, vehemently suspected for the stirring vp of the people to rebellion; and so to haue deliuered the citie vnto the prince: all whom the Despot should haue sent bound in that gallee to CONSTANTINOPLE: but they in good time perceiving the danger they were in, secretly stirring up the people; and by and by after ringing out the bells (the signall appointed for the beginning of the rebellion) had in a very short time raised a wonderful tumult in the citie; insomuch, that all the citizens were with their armes, who running headlong vnto the house of the Despot, found not him (for he forewarned of their coming, was fled into the castle) but slew all they met of his, or els robbing them, cast them in prison. As for the Despot, hee tooke what they found there in, and afterwards pulled it downe to the ground: Then comming to the castle, they fired the galleys, which the Despot seeing, and not able to defend the place, tooke horse and fled vnto a monastery not far off, where being taken by them that pursued him, hee fell sore against his will, for the safeguard of his life, tooke vpon him the habit of a monk: neuertheless, he was so thence carried prisoner, that the yong prince his nephew, who slewed himselfe much more courteous vnto him, than all the rest of his nobilitie & waiters: for they as if they would haue eaten him vp, were euen forthwith readie to haue torne him in peeces, had not the prince embracing him in his armes, saved his life. Yet the next day after, by the perswasion of his counsell he sent him to DOLMOLICHUS, where hee was cast into a most loathsome prison, being verie deepe and straight, in manner of a well, no bodie to attend vpon him, but one boy, where he lay in miserable darkenes and stinke; they which drew vp his ordure from him, and the boy, whether by chance or of purpose, pouring it oftentimes vpon his head: Where as after he had ben a great while in this miserable misery, waiting to die and could not; he was at length length by the princes commandement (entreated therewith by certaine religious men) removed into a more easie prison, where we will for euer leaue him.

Things falling out crosse with the old emperor, and although they were neuer so well deuised, still sorting out vnto the worst, he became verie pensifue and doubtfull what to do. So it fortuned, that one day in his melancholy mood hauing a Plaster in his hand, to resolute his doubtfull mind, he opened the same (as if it were) of that heauenly Oracle to aske counsell: where in the first verse that he light vpon was, Dum caelestis dissociat reges, nunc conspergentur in Selmon: VVhen the Almighty scattered kings (for their sakes) then were they as white as snow in Selmon. VVhich he applying to himselfe, as if all those troubles, and whatsoeuer else had happened in them, proceeded from the will of God, although for causes to him vnknowne: hee by and by sought to reconcile himselfe vnto his nephew; contrarie to the mind of Syrriannes; desiring nothing but trouble. For (as we haue before said) the yoong prince although he was desirous of the power and libertie of an emperor, yet he left the ornaments and care thereof vnto his grandfather: & had he not oftentimes and earnestly been egged forward by his companions to affect the whole empire, happily could and would haue contented himselfe with the former pacification: for being now sent for, he came first to RHOM, and there visited his mother (now late at libertie, and sent thither for the furtherance of the desired pacification) where he with her and by her counsell did whatsoeuer was there done. So within a few daies the matter was brought into so good terms, that an attennement was made, and he himselfe went and met the emperor his grandfather before the gates of the citie: the old emperor sitting then vpon his horse, and the prince lighting from his, a good fur long before he came at him: and although his grandfather was verie vnwilling and forbad him so to doe, yet he came to him on foot, and kissed his hand and foot as he sat on horsebacke; and afterward taking horse, embraced him, and there kissed one another, to the great contentment of the beholders: and so hauing talked some few words, departed the old man into the citie, and the yoong man into his campe, which then lay neere vnto PBOA: where staying certaine daies, he came diuers times into CONSTANTINOPLE, and so went out againe; for as then his mother, partly for her health, partly for the loue of her sonne, lay at PBOA.

But Syrriannes nothing glad of the agreement made betwixt the emperor and his nephew, walked vp and downe sicke in mind, with a heauie countenance, especially for that in time of peace his busie head stood the commonweale in no stead. VV herefore in all meetings & assemblies, he willingly conuersed with them which most disliked of the present state, and spake hardly as well of the emperor as of his nephew, wronged as he thought by them both; whereas in the time of their greatest distresse hee had (as hee said) stood them in good stead. But seeing one Asanes Andronicus walking melancholic vp and downe, as a man with heauinesse oppressed; who hauing done good seruice for the yoong prince, and not of him regarded, had fled vnto the old emperor, and there found no such thing as he expected for the ease of his griefe, although he were a man honourably borne, and otherwaies indued with many good parts: with him Syrriannes acquainted himselfe, as grieved with the like griefe that he himselfe was: with whom as with his friend, without any dissimulation he plainly discoursed of all such things as his griefe desired. But Asanes handling him with great wisdom, did himselfe with like words speake hardly both of the emperor and his nephew; but yet curiously noted whatsoeuer Syrriannes said, for he had before hated him for his ambition, and as then tooke it in displeasure, that he was enemy vnto Catzenzenus, his sonne in law, who was all in all with the yoong prince, and did oftentimes comfort him. But the long being throughly set, Asanes came secretly vnto the old emperor, and told him the whole matter; and in fine, that except hee betime laid hold vpon Syrriannes, affecting the empire, he should in short time be by him brought to his end. VV hereupon Syrriannes was forthwith clapped fast in prison: whose house, with all his wealth, the common people tooke the spoile of; and not contented to haue raised it downe to the ground, consumed the site thereof, together with the pleasant vineyards adjoining vnto the same, into a place to feed goats and sheepe in: a worthie reward for his manifold trecheries. The yoong prince shortly after going to CONSTANTINOPLE, was there crowned emperor, as fellow in the empire with his grandfather: vnto which sollemnitie in the great temple of Sophia; both the emperors riding, it fortuned the old emperor by the stumbling of his horse to be ouerthrowne, and foulely be raised in the myre, the streets being then very foule by reason of the great raine but a little before fallen: which many tooke as ominous, and portending the euill fortune which shortly after befall him. During the time of this peace, it fortuned that as the yoong prince was a hunting in CHERSONESUS, seueritie Turkes, aduenturers, were by force of weather driuen on shore: who before they would yeeld themselves prisoners, made a great fight with the emperours men, and slew diuers of them; in which conflict the yoong emperor himselfe was wounded in the foot, wherewith he was a great while after exceedingly tormented.

Andronicus the late prince, and now fellow in the empire with his aged grandfather, held not himselfe long so contented, but after the manner of ambitious men (and continually prickt forward by his aspiring fauorites) longed to haue the whole gouernment vnto himselfe, which hardly brooketh any partener: and therefore wearie to see his grandfather liue so long, resolved no longer to expect his naturall death, (although it could not by course of nature be fatte off) but by one deuice or other to thrust him from the gouernment; or if that might not bee wrought, at once to dispatch him both of life and state together. And the surer to lay the plot whereon so foule and horrible a treason was to be built, he by the counsell of his mother & others, by whom he was most directed, sent for Michael the prince of BULGARIA, his brother in law (though before to him vnknowne, as was his wife his sister also) to make with him a firme league, to the intent by him to prouide, That if the prince of SERVIA (who had but lately married the old emperours nigh kinswoman, and so to him much deuoted) should take part with him, he should by the Bulgarian his neighbour bee intangled. VVho so sent for, with his wife, the old emperours daughter, came to DIDYMOTICHUM, where they were many dayes most honourably entertained both by the yoong emperor and his mother: for why, this meeting plotted vpon great treason, was finely coloured, with the desire the yoong emperor had to see his sister and her husband, as before vnto him vnknowne, and the emperesse, her daughter, whom she had not seene in three and twentie yeares before. But the secret conclusion betwixt them was; That the Bulgarian prince should to the vttermost of his power aid the yoong emperor against his grandfather, and he likewise him against the Seruian, as he should haue need: and further, That if his grandfather, being deposed, he should recouer the whole empire, then to giue him a great sum of mony, with certaine speciall cities and prouinces confining vpon him, as in dowrie vnto his kind brother in law, and companion in his labours. So Michael the Bulgarian prince honourably entertained by the yoong emperor and the old emperesse his mother in law, loaded with rewards, and promises of greater returned home into his country.

This matter thus dispatched, the yoong emperor therewith encouraged, and knowing also the Constantinopolitans, besides the other cities of THRACIA, exceedingly to fauour him and his proceedings; by whom also he was secretly invited to hasten his coming thither (as wearie of the long life and lazinesse, as he reamed it, of his grandfather) thought it best cunningly to go about the matter; that so his grandfather being with as little stir as might be deposed, he himselfe might alone enjoy the empire. But needing money for the effecting of so great matters, he by force tooke all the money from the collectors, whom the old emperor had sent into THRACIA for the taking vp of money there; telling them, that he was an emperor also, and in need of money, and that the common charge was likewise by the common pulse to be discharged. After that he tooke his way towards CONSTANTINOPLE, pretending that vpon speciall causes hee had occasion to send embassadours vnto the Sultan of EGYPT: for the transporting of whom he was there to take order for the setting forth of a great ship, and other things necessarie for the journey. Neither went he slenderly appointed, but with a great power; and the cities of THRACIA before well assured vnto him, such as he suspected being thrust out of office, and others more assured vnto him placed in their steads. But whilst he thus besturreth himselfe, one of those that were most inuward with him, detesting so foule a treason, secretly fled from him vnto his grandfather, from point to point discouering vnto him all the intended treacheries; and withall, how that his nephew had determined to depose him from his empire, or otherwise to bereaue him of his life if he should stand vpon his guard: but if in the attempt hee should find easie successe, then to spare his life; and depriuing him of the imperiall dignitie, to thrust him as a monke into a monasterie: and therefore aduised him to beware how he suffered him after his wonted manner to come into the citie, for feare of a generall reuolt, but rather by force to keepe him out. VVhich the emperor hearing, and comparing with other things which he had heard of others, yet founding in his cares, deeming it to be true, stood vp, and in the anguish of his soule thus complained vnto God : Reuenge my quarrell, o God, vpon them that doe me wrong, & let them be asham'd that rise up against me: and preserve thou vnto me the imperial power, which by thee giuen vnto me, he commeth to take from me, whom I my selfe begot and aduanced. After, he began to consider what course to take for the assurance of himselfe and his state in so great danger. And first he sent vnto his nephew (come halfe way) to forbid him from entering the citie, and to tell him, That it was a great folly for him, being so manifest a traitour, both vnto his grandfather and the state, to thinke his traitorous purposes to bee vnknowne vnto the world: and beside, in way of reproofe to reheatse vnto him, how many occasions he had giuen for the breaking of the league with his grandfather: first, in taking away the money from the collectors, whereof the state neuer stood in more need, by reason of the diuision of the empire, which required double charge; then, in that hee had in the citie euerie where displaced such gouernours and magistrats as his grandfather had sent thither, and placed others at his pleasure; with many other like facts, declaring his treacherous aspiring mind, for which he was not without cause by his grandfather forbidden to enter the citie. After that, the old emperor by secret letters craved aid of Crales prince of SERVIA, and Demetrius the Despot his sonne, who was then gouernour of THESSALONICA and the countie adioyning; commaunding him, with Andronius and Michael his nephews (gouernours of MACEDONIA) with all the forces they were able to raise, and such aid as should be sent vnto them out of SERVIA, with all speed to joyne together and to go against the yong emperor. But these letters thus written vnto the prince of SERVIA, the Despot, and others, (as is before said) were for the most part intercepted, by such as the yong emperor had for that purpose placed vpon the straits of CHRISTOPOLIS, and the other passages; especially such as were written in paper, yet some others in fine white linnen cloth, and secretly sowed in the garments of such as carried them, escaped for all their strait search, and so were deliuered. And in truth nothing was done, or about to be done in CONSTANTINOPLE, but that the yong emperor was by one or other aduertised thereof: whereas the old emperor on the other side, vnderstood nothing what his nephew did abroad, or intended. For all men of their owne accord enclined vnto him, some openly both bodie and soule (as they say) and such as could not be with him in person, yet in mind and good will were euery present with him; and that not onely the common sort of the citizens of CONSTANTINOPLE, but the chiefe Senators, the great courtiers, yea and many other of the emperours neerest kindred also: who curiously obseruing whatsoeuer was done in the citie, forthwith certified him thereof. Amongst whom was also Theodorus the marques, one of the old emperours owne sons: who many years before by the emperesse his mother sent into ITALY, and there honorably married, was by his prodigall course of life there, growne far in debt; so that leauing his wife and children behind him, he was glad after the deccasse of his mother, to flie vnto his father at CONSTANTINOPLE, and there now liued; who beside that he most honourably maintained him in the court, and bestowed many great things vpon him, paid also all his debts, which were verie great. All which fatherly kindnesse he forgetting, went about most Iudas like to haue betrayed his aged father. For he also dreaming after the empire, and for many causes (but especially for that hee was in mind, religion, manners, and habit, become a Latine) by him rejected, thought he could not do him a greater dispite than by reuolting vnto the yong emperor: so that the nearer he was in blood, the more he was his fathers vnaturall enemy. Shortly after, Demetrius the Despot hauing receiued the emperours letters at THESSALONICA, called vnto him Andronius and Michael his nephews, the gouernours of MACEDONIA; with whom joyning all his forces, and dayly expecting more aid out of SERVIA, he first spoiled the yong emperours friends and fauourits in MACEDONIA, giuing the spoile of them in all the cities and townes of MACEDONIA vnto their fouldiours, who made hauocke of whatsoeuer they light vpon: and whosoever seemed any way to withstand them or dislike of their proceedings, their goods and lands they confiscated, and draue the men themselues into exile. Neither was the yong emperor Andronius in the meane time idle, but secretly sent out his edicts into all parts of the empire, yea into the verie cities of CONSTANTINOPLE and THESSALONICA, and ouer all MACEDONIA: whereby he proclaimed vnto the people in generally, a releasement of them from all tributs, impositions, and payments; and frankly promised vnto the souldiours and men of war, the augmenting of their pensions and pay: which were no sooner bruited, but that most men were therewith moued, both in word and deed to fauour his proceedings, doing what they

they could to further the same, and by secret letters inuiting him to hasten his coming into the citie: who thereupon comming to RHEGIVM, by his embassadours sent from thence, requested the old emperor, Either to giue him leaue according to the league betwixt them, to come into the citie, or else to send him certaine of the chiefe of the nobilitie and cleargie; with some of the better and more vnderstanding sort of the Burgers and citizens also, vnto whom he might frankly speake his mind: for them faithfully to deliuer the same againe vnto the emperor his grandfather, and the people. Which requests the old emperor perceiuing to be full of deceit and trecherie, for a good space answered thereunto nothing at all, but stood all silent, as doubting which to graunt: for, to suffer his nephew to come into the citie, he saw was dangerous, the citizens (as he well knew) being for the most part enclined to reuolt vnto him so soon as they should once see him within the gates; and to send any forth vnto him, as he desired, might be (as he feared) an occasion of some tumult to be after raised in the citie: for he knew that his nephewes drift therein was, openly by faire words, and secretly with great gifts and large promises, first to gaine them, and by them the rest of the citizens. Both which things being dangerous, he made choice of the easier, and sent forth vnto him two of the most noble Senators, two of the most reuerend bishops, two other graue prelates, and foure of the chiefe burgeses of the citie: vnto whom, at their comming vnto him, hee in the open hearing of all men deliuered this premeditated and craftie speech:

*It is not vnknowne vnto the world, you my subjects to me alwaies been vnto me more deare than I have been vnto my selfe: and how that I haue not vpon any ambitious conceit, or desire of the sole gouernment, against my grandfathers good will, gone out. For you see how that I neither spare mine owne life, or attend my pleasure, for the care I haue of you: I come not vnto you compassed about with a guard of armed men, as is the manner not of kings only, for the enuie of their high place; but of others also of farre meaner calling, whom disaster fortune, banished from their parents and kindred, hath enforced to wander here and there, with death alwaies before their eyes. Let any man tell me how I came by these wounds which I yet beare in my bodie, but in fight with the enemies of my country which passe ouer out of ASIA into THRACIA; or els dwelling neere vnto ISTER, doe with their incursions from thence miserably wast that side of THRACIA which is next vnto them? For I (to tell you the very truth) seeing the old emperor by reason of his great yeares to become stothfull and blockish, and not possibly to be awaked out of his drowsie sleepe, neither any whit to greene, when as the poore Christians his subjects were both by day and night, some as sacrifices slaine by the barbarous enemies, some carried away into most miserable captiuitie, and the rest poore and naked to be drinen out of their houses and cities; not to speake in the meane time of the greater mischeefes in ASIA, and how many cities haue beene there lost through the old emperours sloth and negligence: when I saw these things (I say) stricken with a piercing greefe, which my heart could not indure, I went out for two causes. Either by some kind of honourable death to end my greefe together with my life, or els to the uttermost of my power to stand my countrey in some stead. For by no meanes it can come to passe, but that a man, and he that hath of long time reigned, must at length become loathsome vnto his subjects, and incurre their deadly hatred. For why, God hath made nothing in this life immutable and firme: whereby it commeth to passe, as we see, that all worldly things joy and delight in change. But if a man will as it were force fortune to his desire, and strue to bind things vnto a certaine firme and constant course, he shall but lose his labour, and in vaine strine against nature. But whatsoeuer is contrary vnto nature, or exceedeth the iust bounds thereof, hath in it neither comfort nor delight. This was it that caused the wise men to say, and to leaue vnto vs as rules: Not to dwell too long vpon any thing; and a measure to be the fairest vertue. For you see how that my grandfather being grown to great yeares; and hauing reigned so long (I may almost say) as neuer did any but he, is become hatefull vnto all his people; and yet regardeth not either how to discharge himselfe of so great a burthen, or how to releue the declining state of the empire, or so much as greeneth to see the successors of the empire to lie before him: for my father is dead without any fruit of the empire, except the bare title only; and others also neere to him of blood, and farre yonger than he, are dead likewise: and happily I my selfe may die also before I shall receiue any profit thereof: For what can more easily happen, especially vnto a man that shunneth no danger, and regardeth not his life? But some perhaps will suspect me of ambition, for departing from the emperor my grandfather, and for refusing to bee ruled by him. Which thing I neither flatly denie, nor altogether confesse: for might I see the empire encrease, and the bounds* bounds thereof enlarged, I could willingly content my selfe, and at my ease take my rest; cheering my selfe up with such hope as doe they that beare with their cookes, making them to stay long for their dinner, in hope thereby to fare the better. But seeing the state of the empire daily to decline from euill to worse, and the miserable people carried away captiues, or slaine by their enemies euen at the gates and vnder the wals of the imperiall citie: what deeme you mee then to thinke? For most men ease their present greefe, with the hope of future good, although the same be but vaine: but vnto mee is not life euen such vaine hope vnto my false comfort. And can you meruaile at the impotent affection of the Great Alexander of MACEDON, greued and displeased to see his father to heape victorie vpon victorie, and to cut off all the hope of his sonnes glorie, by leauing him so few occasions of war; and not thinke me (to whom you see the quite contrarie is chanced, and from whom not only the hope of the empire is cut off, for the wasting thereof, but euen the course of a quiet life) to fret and greene therat? Mooued herewith, and not able longer to endure it, at length I rise up, and requested of the emperor my grandfather, but a thousand men at armes, promising him by the power of God with them to persuer the cities in BYTHINA, and to driue his enemies farther off; before that hauing them, they should passe ouer the strait and besiege the imperiall citie of CONSTANTINOPLE: which so small a request he not onely denied me, but hath euer since taken me for his mortall enemy. But this and many other things els let passe: I haue now another request vnto him by you, which is, That he would giue me eight thousand duckats to content my souldiors withall, who now of long haue from place to place romed up and downe with mee, following mine vncertaine fortune: which graunted, I will no more bee vnto my grandfather troublesome, but dismissing my forces, hold my selfe right well contented.

Hauing thus said, he rise out of his seat, and taking them apart one after another, courteously discoursed with them, & so filling them with great hopes, sent them away: who departing from him & comming into the citie, became as it were the open proclaimers of his praises, enflaming the people with a greater desire of him than before. VVhich the old emperor hearing, and perceiving almost all his friends in the citie to be in heart reuolted from him; and withall fearing to be of them in some suddaine concourse slaine, was therewith exceedingly vexed. Yet he thought it best before any such thing should happen, to proue their minds, and to heare the counsell of the Patriarch, and Afanes, and the other bishops also: vnto whom being by one of the Senators called together, he declared his mind as followeth:

Where I assured, that hauing deposed my selfe of the imperiall dignitie, I should my selfe live in safetie, and see my people well gouerned; I would I should neuer be of the company of the faithfull, if I did not much prefer a pleasant quiet contented life before an empire. For if a man would seek for the pleasure of the mind, what can be more pleasant, than to be disburdened of all cares, and free from such dangers as attend high estates? But if for my sinne and the sins of my people, as also for the sinne of mine ancestors, the vengeance of God in manner of a violent tempest raging against vs, subuerteth our empire: and yet but a youth, by the helpe of God reformed and quieted the state of the empire; greuously troubled with discord in the Church, and the often inuasion of the enemy; and taught by long experience, know not now in so great a hurle and tempest which way to turne my selfe: how can I with safetie commit vnto my nephew so great a charge, who as yet is both an vnstayed youth; and so careless of his owne good as that he knoweth not how well to gouerne his owne priuat affaires? For giuing out his power vnto young unskilfull men, and hauing slung away his imperiall possessions amongst them, hee himselfe lieth in penurie and want; neither regardeth anything more than his dogs and kittes, of whom hee keepeth few lesse than a thousand curres, and as many hawkes; and not much fewer men to looke vnto them. Wherefore vnto such a man, how may I safely commit either my life, or the administration of mine empire, by God committed vnto me? But I will neuer witting and willingly cast away either my subjects or my selfe. For my nephew I haue loued, not onely more than my wife and children, but (to say the truth) more than my selfe also; as you all know how tenderly I haue brought him up, how carefully I haue instructed and aduised him, as purposing to haue left him the heire and successor both of my wisdom and mine empire, that so hee might be the better please both God and man. But he, contemning my good counsell, hath spent whole nights in banquetting, and riot, and brothelhouses; wherein hee hath also slaine his owne brother: and to be breefe, he hath risen and lifted up his hand against me his grandfather; and a grandfather that had of him so well deserved, attempting such a villanie as the Sunne neuer saw. Wherefore you ought also to hate and detest his wickednesse, and to rise up to restraine his impudent disloyaltie, and by your ecclesiasticall censure to denounce him unworthie of the empire and the communion of the faithfull, as one seperated from God, that so ashamed and corrected, he may louingly thither retorne from whence he is shamefully departed, and againe be made heire both of mine empire and staiednesse. For there is no man alieue whom I had rather haue promoted vnto the empire, so that he would heare my precepts, and obey my counsell. As for the conclusion he used in his former speech, it was altogether fained, craftie, and malicious: for you haue heard how many reproches he hath giuen me in all that speech, wherewith his conclusion agreeth not: but the more to stir up the hearers thereof against me, did of purpose so conclude his speech.

Vpon this, most of the foresaid graue and learned bishops agreed that the young empétour should no more be named in the praiers of the Church, vntill he had better conformed himselfe: Howbeit the patriarch and some others secretly fauouring both him and his proceedings, liked not thereof, and therefore saying nothing thereunto, returned home vnto their owne houses. But meeting once or twice afterwards in the patriarch his house, they there conspired together against the old emperor; with whom also diuers of the nobilitie consented: and thereupon an oath was conceiued in writing, whereby they bound themselves, to continue constant in that their wicked resolution. Whereupon, about three dayes after, the patriarch causing the bells to be rung; and a great number of the vulgar people flocking together, pronounced the sentence of excommunication against all such as should in their publike praiers omit the name of the young emperor, or refuse to doe him all honour due vnto an emperor. VVhich thing not a little grieued the old emperor, as appeared by his speech, in saying, If the doctor of peace be so mad against vs, in hope of reward promised by my nephew, that casting off all shame and grauntie, he doubteth not to be the author of sedition; who shall repress the rash attempts of the vulgar people against vs, if we respect but mans helpe? For the Patriarch so much as in him lieth is, I see, the murderer of vs. So the bishops of the contrarie faction, moued with the notable impudencie of the patriarch, excommunicated him likewise, as he had done them, with his mad followers, as the authors of sedition and faction, and incited with bribes to the troubling of the state: for which cause also he was by the Emperours commandement committed vnto safe keeping in the monastery called MANGANUM. But about two daies after, the young Emperor came to the wals of CONSTANTINOPLE, to know how his grandfather had accepted the messengers sent vnto him; earnestlie requesting that it might be lawfull for him alone to enter into the citie, to do his dutie to his grandfather. But neither he, neither his words were at all regarded, but was by such as stood vpon the wals himselfe with stones driuent away; who could not abide to heare him speake, but shamefully railed at him, saying all his talke to bee nothing els but deceit and fraud: and so for that time he retired a little from the wals. But night being come, certaine busie heads amongst the common people (& they not few) secretly meeting together, gaue him knowledge, That about midnight when as all the citizens were asleepe, and the watchmen in securitie, he should come vnto the wals, where they would be readie with ropes to draw him vp vnto the top of the bulwarkes, which done, the matter (as they said) were as good as dispatched: for that they were perswaded, that the citizens so soone as they should once see him in the midst of the citie amongst them, would forthwith all reuolt vnto him. So he according vnto this appointment, about midnight approaching the wals, found there no such matter as he had well hoped, for the receiuing of him into the citie; but contrariwise, the watchmen carefully watching all alonght the wall, and calling one vnto another. VVherefore finding there no hope, he with Catacuzenus and Synadenus, his cheefe counsellors, leauing the South side of the citie, in a little boat rowed softly all along the wall that is towards the sea, if happely they might there find their friends, and so be receiued in: but there the watchmen also descrying them from the wals, and calling vnto them, but receiuing no answer, began to cast stones at them, and to make a noise: so that deceiued of their purpose, and out of hope, they were glad to get them farther off, and to depart as they came.

But the euill successe of this exploit was shortly after with his better fortune recompenced: Thessalonica for by and by after, secret letters were sent vnto him from THESSALONICA, requesting him to come thither, assuring him in the name of the bishop with diuers of the nobilitie, with al speed to come thither, assuring him in the name of the bishop with diuers of the nobilitie, and

Thessalonica needed vnto the young emperor.

and the good liking of the people in generall, at his comming to open the gates of the citie vnto him: whereupon he leauing a great part of his armie with Synadenus, to keepe short the Constantinopolitans, he himselfe with the rest of his power set forward towards Thessalonica, where he in the habit of a plaine countrey man entred the citie vn suspected: but being got within the gate, and there casting off that simple attire wherewith he had couered his rich and royal garments, and presently knowne to be the yong emperor, the people came flocking about him, and with many joyfull acclamations receiued him as their dread lord and soveraigne: yet some few, more fauouring the old emperor, fled into the castle, and there stood vpon their guard; which after they had for a space notably defended, was at length taken from them.

Thessalonica thus yeilded, Demetrius, Andronicus, and Asan Michael, the old emperours chiefe captaines, then lying with his armie not farre off, and not well trusting one another, fled: most of whose souldiours presently went ouer vnto the yong emperor: who departing from Thessalonica, came to Serre, which by composition was deliuered vnto him also, but not the castle: for that was by Basilicus Nicephorus (the captaine thereof) still holden for the old emperor. This Basilicus was a man honourably descended; but of no great capacite or wit, as the finer sort supposed, and therefore not of them much regarded or thought fit for the taking in hand of any great matter: whom yet the old emperor for his plaine sinceritie, more than for any thing els, had made captaine of that castle and gouernour of the countrey thereabouts, which he yet still held, and in these most trouble some times shewed himselfe wiser than them all: that he had so thought of him: of whom some died in despaire, some fled, some were taken prisoners, and so suffered a thousand euils, the rest with the losse of their honour traiterously revoluing from the old emperor to the yong: whereas he alone, looking but euen forward vpon his allegiance, with his trust in God, so long as the old emperor liued, opposed himselfe against these troubles, and stood fast for him, and was not to be moued with any faire promises or cruell threats of the yong aspiring emperor, whereof he lacked none. But hauing strongly fortified the castle committed to his charge, there kept himselfe, vntill that hearing of the death of the old emperor, he then reconciling himselfe vnto the yong, as vnto his right soveraigne, deliuered vp vnto him the castle: who in reward of his fidelitie, gaue it him againe to hold for him, in as ample manner as he had before held it from his grandfather: for wise men honour vertue euen in their enemies, as did king Philip in Demosthenes, when as he said, If any Athenian liuing in Athens, doth say that he preferreth me before his countrey, him verely would I buy with much money, but not thinke him worthe my friendship. But if any for his countreys sake shall hate me, him will I impugne as a castle, a strong wall, or a bulwarke; and yet admire his vertue, and reckon the citie happy in hauing such a man. And so in few words to conclude a long discourse, the yong emperor in short time hauing romed through all Macedonia, and without resistance taken all the strong townes and cities therein, he there tooke also Demetrius the Despots wife and children, with all his treasure, as also the wives of Andronicus and Asanes, and of all the Senators that followed them: after whom the great commanders their husbands were also for the most part taken and cast in prison, some at Thessalonica, some at Didimotichum, some of the rest afterwards most miserably perishing in exile. Wherewith the old emperor discouraged, was about to haue sent his embassadours vnto his nephew for peace, whilest he was yet thus busied in Macedonia: and had indeed so done, had not another hope arising in the meane time, quite altered that his better purpose. It fortuned at the same time, whilest the old emperor was thus thinking of peace, That Michael the Bulgarian prince, in hope of great profite thereof to arise, secretly offered his aid vnto him against the yong emperor his nephew: of which his offer, the old emperor gladly accepted, and embassadours were sent too and fro about the full conclusion of the matter, no man being acquainted therewith more than two or three of the emperor his most secret friends and trustie counsellors. Yet in the meane time, disdayning to be so couet vp as he was by Synadenus, one of his nephews captaines, euen in the imperiall citie: sent out one Constantinus Asan, with the greatest part of his strength against him: who encountering him at the riuer Mavrus, was there by him in plaine battell ouerthrowne and taken prisoner, the rest of his discomfited armie flying headlong backe againe to Constantinople. All things thus prosperously proceeding with the yong emperor, and the countreys of Macedonia and Thracia now almost all at his commaund, he returned in hast with all his power to Constantinople to preuent the comming of the Bulgarians thither: as fearing least least that they finding the citie weakly manned, should treacherously kill the old emperor with such as were about him, and so seize vpon the citie themselves: or at leastwise giue him such aid as might keepe him out, and so cut off all his hope for obtayning of the same. At which time also there was great want of victuall in the citie, he with his armie hauing shut it vp on the one side by land, and the Venetians with their galleies on the other side by sea: who then at odds with the Genowais dwelling at Pera, kept all that strait sea betwixt Evropa and Asia: in such sort, as that neither victuals nor marchandise could be brought that way, either to Constantinople or Pera. The yong emperor comming to Constantinople, attempted at his first comming to haue entred the citie, in hope without any great resistance to haue beene receiued; but repulled by the defendants, was glad to get him further off. About this time came also vnto the citie three thousand horsemen, the promised aid of the Bulgarian prince vnto the old emperor: who although he wanted men, and was right glad of their comming, yet remembering the harmes he had before receiued by forrein aid, and not now daring to trust them too far, suffered not them to come into the citie, more than their Generall and some few others of their commanders with him. Now the yong emperor vpon the comming of this aid, least some great harme might betide either the old emperor, or himselfe, to the viter subuersion of their state: secretly sent vnto his grandfather, requesting him to be well aduised how he trusted those forrein people too far: offering himselfe to do whatsoeuer he should commaund, rather than so great a harme should happen vnto either of them, as was from them to be feared. But the trust the old emperor had conceiued of this Bulgarian aid, had so confirmed his mind, as that hee little listened vnto his nephews request: besides that, how could hee well trust him that had so oftentimes deceiued him? Wherewith the yong emperor much grieved, and now againe almost dispaire of his farther successe, dislodged and drew neere vnto the place where these Bulgarian horsemen lay encamped: from whence hee sent certaine embassadours with great gifts and presents vnto the Generall, and the rest of the chiefe commanders, promising them farre greater, if they would without further troubling themselves returne home againe: wherunto they willingly granted, and so were of him honourably feasted, and the next day after conducted vpon their way homewards.

It fortuned, that the yong emperor returning backe againe from the Bulgarians, and encamped in the same place where he before lay; two of the watchmen of the citie, the one called Camaris, and the other Castellanus, both smiths, fled secretly vnto him: who admitted to his presence and all others commaunded to depart, excepting Catacuzenus, offered to betray the citie vnto him, so that he would vnder his hand writing, assure them of such a summe of money, and such possessions as they required: which he easily granting, and the houre and manner of performing of the same, being by them declared, and agreed vpon; they by and by without longer stay, for feare of suspicion, returned againe into the citie. But the emperor staying foure daies in the same place, caused certaine ladders to be made of great ropes, such as they vse in great ships: But the appointed night being come, the two traitours hauing before prouided great store of good wine, liberally gaue the same by way of cutesie vnto the watchmen their companions neere vnto them; who drunke so plentifully thereof, that not able any longer to hold vp their heads, they fell into so sound a sleepe, as that but for breathing, they differed not much from dead men. About midnight came certaine souldiours of the yong emperours, with the aforesaid ladders; which the traitours by and by drawing vnto them by a rope cast downe, and making them fast vnto the top of the wall, receiued by the same eighreene armed men: who being got into the citie, without more ado brake open the Romane gate, whereby the yong emperor with his armie presently entred, no man letting him. But it is woorth the marking, how things appointed to befall vs, are by no means to be auoided, although we bee thereof before neuer so plainly forewarned: For the same night the citie was surprized, immediatly after the setting of the Sunne, the gates being shut, a certaine countrey man came running in all hast from out of a village there by, and knocking hard at the gate called Girolimna, required to speake with some of the souldiours; who being come, he told them how that a little before hee had seene a great number of the yong emperours men marching toward the citie, by the way that leadeth vnto the Romane gate: which being told vnto the old emperor, did not a little trouble him. And therefore thought it good to send out certaine scouts, to see if all were cleere along the wals toward the land, from sea to sea: which his purpose Metochita his great counsellor letted, saying,

ing, it not to be seem a couragious mind to be vpon so light an occasion so much moued; for that either the rumour was false, or the indeiour of so few vaine, the wals and gates of the cite being so filled with armed men: which happily he said not so much vpon ignorance of martiall faires, as blinded by a certaine commaunding power, that the supernall decree giuen by God himselfe against the old emperour, might at length take place. And againe, the third part of that night yet scant past, diuers other countrey men came running vnto the said gate Cyroline, and told the watchmen vpon the wals, that a great number of men were met together at the Romaine gate: wherof the emperour hearing was therewith much more troubled than before. In so much that sharply rebuking Metochita, he said vnto him, Thou seemest to be strangely metamorphosed into a man of iron, which art become so secure, as not to haue any feeling of the danger wherewith we are enclosed: Seest thou not that the matter requirith not that we should thus sit still and take our rest, for the noise of my nephew foundeth in mine eares as the found of a great drum, and disquieteth my mind? I fee a sea of calamitie broken out against me, which ouerwhelmeth and drowneth my heart and courage. Neuerthelesse he, firme in his former opinion, made no reckoning of those reports: and therefore rose to go to bed, to shew indeed that he accounted nothing of them, but as false alarms. But the emperour left alone and no bodie with him vnto whom he might breake his griefe, laied him downe vpon a pallet, not putting off his clothes; but as if he had together with them put on extreame desperation, lay tumbling too and fro as a man in mind troubled with many and diuers heauie thoughts. In the meane time he heard a great noise at the court gate, and the report of the entring of the young emperour his nephew, with a great clattering of armour; for there were aboue eight hundred souldiours entered with him, and withall they of the cite on euerie side saluted him with most joyfull acclamations. But the old emperour hearing the great tumult and outcrie, rose from his pallet, exceedingly troubled; and destitute of all the helpe of his captaines and souldiours (for why his palace was altogether desolate, except of such as were his ordinarie waiters) betooke himselfe vnto his prayers. Beseeching God not to forsake him in so great a danger, but in his mercie to defend him from the furie of those wicked men. Who presently heard him, and sent him present reliefe. For whilest he was thus praying in the palace, the young emperour without calling together all his captaines and lieutenants, straightly charged them vpon paine of death, neither by word nor deed to violate the maiestie of the old emperour his grandfather, nor any other about him: for this victorie (said he) God hath giuen vs, & not we our selues; his will ordereth all things, wherunto all things obey, the stars, the aire, the sea, the earth, men, flouds, tempests, plagues, earthquakes, shoures, dearth, and such like, sometimes to our blisse, and sometime to our correction and destruction: wherfore vsing vs as the instruments of his chastisement, he hath giuen vnto vs this present victorie, which peraduenture to morrow he will giue to others to vse against vs, and then as wee haue beene vnto them wee haue overcome, such will they also shew themselves vnto vs againe: wherfore, if neither nighnesse of blood, neither that we be all of one countrey may moue vs, yet in respect of our selues let vs vse mercie, that we feele not the hand of God vpon vs in like case. In the meane time a courtier opened a wicket vnto the young emperour, with this message from his grandfather:

The pittifull supplication of the old emperour vnto his nephew.

For as much as God this day (my sonne) hath giuen vnto thee the imperiall scepter, taken from me, I request of thee this one good turne; For many which I haue euen from thy birth bestowed vpon thee (for in this my hard estate I let passe, that I next vnto God haue been the author of thy matinitie and encrease) giue me my life, spare thy fathers head, and with violent weapon spill not that blood from which thou thy selfe hast taken the fountaine of life. Man truly beholdeth heauen and earth, and heauen and earth behold mens actions: wherfore make not the heauens and the earth beholders of so wicked an outrage as neuer man euer committed. If brothers blood long agoe cried out vnto the Lord against Cain, how much louder shall the fathers blood crie vnto the Lord, and declare so great a wickednesse vnto the earth, the sunne, and stars, and make it abhorred of all the princes of the world? Regard my miserable old age, which of it selfe promiseth vnto me shortly death, but vnto thee a rest after long cares. Reuerence the hands which haue oftentimes most lovingly embraced thee, yet crying in thy swathing clouts: Reuerence those lips which haue oftentimes most lovingly kissed thee, and called thee my other soule: Haue pittie vpon a brused reed, cast downe by fortune, and doe not thou againe tread vpon it. And seeing thou art thy selfe a man, be not too proud of thy present fortune, but consider the un-

certaintie and varietie of worldly things, taking by me example: see in me the end of long life, and maruell, how one might hauing receiued me an emperour of many yeares, leaue me now subject vnto another mans power for ever.

The young emperour Andronicus moued with this speech, and taking great care of his grandfathers safetie, scarce abstaining from teares, entred the pallace, and comming to his grandfather, humbly saluted him, embraced him, and with cheerefull words comforted him. Straight way after, he went vnto the monasterie MAN GANTIVM, where (as is afore said) the Patriarch Eusebius was by the old emperours commandement, kept in safe keeping, whom the young emperour now tooke from thence, and carrying him away in one of the emperours richest chariots, restored him againe vnto his Patriarchall dignitie; wherein he afterwards spared not to reuenge himselfe to the full, and most cruelly to persecute the old emperours friends. That day from morning vnto night, a man might haue seene all the riches and wealth of such noble men as had taken part with the old emperour, carried away, and their goodly houses ouerthrowne and made the scoine of the base common people: but especially the house and wealth of Theodorus Metochita, a man but the day before in greatest fauour with his prince, and of all others next vnto the emperour himselfe, of greatest authoritie and credit, whose whole wealth (not that only, which was found in his house, but that also which he had laid vp in trust with his friends, discovered by notes found in his studie) became most part a prey vnto the common people, and the rest confiscated vnto the prince. Thus he which earst of all others next vnto the emperour, was accounted most fortunate, was now vpon the sudden, with his wife and children, brought vnto extreame beggerie, and after many yeares felicitie, in one day cast into the bottom of dispaire and miserie, where a man might haue heard many complaining, say, All that wealth and treasure to haue beene the blood and teares of the poore oppressed subjects, brought vnto him by them whom hee had made rulers and gouernours of the prouinces and cities of the empire; to the intent that when they had delt truely with the people, as with their slaues, he might stop them, for comming to complaine of their griefes vnto the emperour; and that the eie of the Reuenger had not alwaies slept, but was now at length awaked, & had of him yet scarcely take sufficient punishment: which euery where to heare, increased not a little his griefe. As for himselfe, he was confined vnto DIDYMOTICHVM, as the place of his exile and banishment; where after he had a certaine time poorly liued, he was sent for backe againe to CONSTANTINOPLE: where hauing nothing left to relieue himselfe (for his house at the comming of the young emperour, was in the furie of the people pluckt downe to the ground, and the verie pauement thereof digged vp) he went vnto the monasterie of CHORA thereby, which long before built by the emperour Iustinian and become ruinous, he in the time of his prosperitie had with great charge repaired, & therein now (hauing made shipwracke of all that he had) quickly shrouded himselfe, to the great comfort both of his bodie and afflicted mind, where he not long after died.

But to returne againe vnto the old emperour, as yet in doubt what should become of himselfe: it fortune that the same day that the cite was taken, the young emperour at night returning to the pallace, by the way met with Niphon sometime Patriarch, who asked him how they meant to deale with his grandfather. Wherunto the young emperour answering, That he would deale with him honourably and emperour like; he was by him therefore blamed and reprooued. For this Niphon being of a craftie subtil wit and malicious nature, besides that he secretly hated all them vpon whom fortune greatly either fauned or frowned, bare an especiall grudge against the old emperour: first, for that at such time as he was right woorthly for his shamefull couetousnesse and extortion, by the rest of the bishops and cleargie thrust out of his Patriarchship, he was not by him as he looked for defended: and secondly, for that dreaming againe after the Patriarchall dignitie, he thought it one good step thereunto to haue him (as his greatest enemy) taken out of the way. Wherfore he said now vnto the young emperour, If thou desire to raigne without feare, giue not thine honour vnto another; but taking all the ornaments of the empire from the old man, cast haire cloath vpon him, and so clap him fast in prison, or thrust him out into exile. This mischieuous counsell, this wicked man gaue against the poore old distressed emperour: not remembering how ynworthly he had by him beene before preferred vnto the highest degrees both of honour and wealth, if he could there haue kept himselfe: vnto which vngratiuous counsell, diuers others of the nobilitie also consenting, so wrought the matter amongst them, that although they could not quite draw the young emperor's mind from his grandfather, yet they much changed the same: so that he could no longer endure to take him for his companion in the empire. Whereupon after many meetings & consultations had, it was decreed, That the old man should still retain the name and ornaments of an emperor, as before, but not to meddle in any matters, nor to come abroad, but to sit still quietly in his chamber, with the yearly allowance of ten thousand ducats, for the maintenance of himselfe and such as attended vpon him; to be raised of the sitting before the cite of CONSTANTINOPLE: a poore pension for the maintenance of so great an emperor. Of which so shamefull a decree, Eseias the Patriarch was also a furtherer: who seeing an emperor that had reigned so long, cast downe, and shut vp as it were in prison, was so far from grieving thereat, that foolishly rejoycing, he intaken thereof as strictly wrested this text of Scripture, saying in his merriment, Lætabitur iustus, cum viderit ultionem. The just shall rejoyce, when he seeth the reuenge: calling himselfe just, and the emperor casting downe reuenge. But the old emperor thus shut vp in his chamber (differing nothing but in name, from a prison) not long after, the state of his bodie ouerthrowne with griefe and corrupt humors distilling out of his head, first lost one of his eyes, and shortly after the other also: and so oppressed with eternall darkenesse, mingled (as faith the Scripture) his drinke with teares, and as the bread of sorrow, being oftentimes (to his great griefe) most bitterly mocked and derided, not of them onely which were by his enemies set to guard him, but of his owne seruants also. Not long after, the yong emperor falling sicke, in such sort as that it was thought he would not recover, Cataguzenus and the rest of his greatest fauorites and followers carefull of their own estate, and yet doubtfull of the old blind emperor, deuised many things against him, but all tending to one purpose for the shortening of his daies. But in the end all other deuises set apart, they put him to the choice, either to put on the habit of a religious, and so for euer to bid the world farewell, or to take what should otherwise ensue; the best whereof was either death, exile, or perpetuall imprisonment in the lothsome castle of forgetfulness. For the putting whereof in execution, Synadenus (of all others to him most hateful) was appointed. At which hard choice, the old emperor as with a world of woes sodainly oppressed, lay a great while vpon his bed as a man speechlesse: for what could he do els, except he had an heart of Steele or adamant? being then compassed about with many barbarous and mercilesse soldiots; and his domestical seruants kept from him, and no man left, that would vouchsafe to direct him (being blind) whether to go or where to stand. But to make the matter short, would he, would he not, they made choice for him theselues, polling and shauing him, and casting a monke's habit vpon him, changed his name, after the manner of the religious, and called him by the name of Anthonie the monke. Glad was Eseias the false Patriarch of this the hard estate of the old emperor: for that now that he was professed a religious, there was left no hope for him to recover againe the empire, either cause for himselfe to feare. Yet he thought it good to be aduised, in what sort remembrance should be made of him in the church prayers, if any were at all from thenceforth to be made. Whereof to be by the old emperor himselfe resolved, he (seeming to be very sorie for that which was done, but purposing indeed therein to deride him) sent vnto him two bishops, to know what his pleasure was to haue done therein. Vnto which their demand, he oppressed with heavinesse, and fetching a great sigh cuen from the bottom of his heart answered:

becometh blind.

Anthonicus the old emperor, against his will made a Monke, and called Anthonia.

The notable answer of the old emperor to the causing question of the proud Patriarch.

As in poore Lazarus appeared a double miracle, That being dead, he rise; and being bound, walked: euen so was it to be done in me, though in quite contrarie manner: for loe, being alive, I am dead, as overwhelmed with the waues of calamitie and woe; and being loose, am bound, not my hands and feet onely, but my tongue also; wherewith vnable to doe any thing els, I might yet at least bewaile my woes and wrongs vnto the aire, and such as by chance should heare me, and vnto this most wofull darkenesse whereto I must for euer sit. But shame hath closed my mouth, my brethren abhorre me, and my mother sonnes account me for a stranger vnto them, and the very light of mine eyes is not with me, my friends and neighbours stood up against me, and all that saw me laughed me to scorne: my feet had almost slipped, and my footsteps were almost ouerthrowne: for I fretted against the wicked, when I saw the pen of the vngodly. The emperours long agoe gave great priuiledges vnto the Church, euen those which it at this day enjoyeth: and the Church gave to them againe power, to chuse whom they would to be Patriarchs. Now concerning him that sent you, I not onely nominated him vnto the Patriarchship, but myselfe made choice of him, and preferred him before many other right worthy and most famous men, being himselfe a man growne old in a poore priuat life, neuer before preferred, or for any other thing famous: I will not say how often I haue holpen him and done him goods. But now when he should againe haue relieved me in my calamitie, he joyneth hands with mine enemies against me, more cruell vpon me than any other bloodie handed executioner, nor asham'd to aske me how I would be remembered in the church: faigning himselfe to be ignorant and sorrie for mine estate, much like vnto the Egyptian crocodile of NILE, which hauing killed some living beast, lieth vpon the dead bodie and washerb the head thereof with her warme teares, which she afterwards deuoureth together with the bodie. But what to answer him vnto this his catching question, I know not: for if I shall say, As an emperor, I shall forthwith be slaine by them which for that purpose haue me in hold: but if I say, As Anthonicus the monke, it shall be taken as the franke confession of mine estate, by them which haue craftely contrived mine overthrow, as if I had not by compulsion, but euen of mine owne free will put on this monasticall habit, which God knoweth was neuer in my thought.

Hauiing thus said, he sent them away without any other answer vnto their demand: but sitting downe vpon his bed side, said, My soule returne again into thy rest for the Lord hath dealt well with thee: neither spoke any one word more in declaration of his griefe: his tongue there staid by his singular wisdom, or els with the greatnesse of his griefe: and so against his will, in silence passing ouer his sorrow, his mind with the greatnesse of his woes overcome, and as it were astonished, before the humors gathered into the braine could be dissolued into teares: For as the Sunne sending forth his moderat beames, draweth vnto it many exhalations and vapours, but casting the same forth more plentifully, doth with his immoderat heat consume the same before they can be drawne vp; so the moderat affections of the mind may haue their griefes by words and teares expressed; but such as exceed all measure, and with their vehemencie as it were overthrow the mind, commonly make men to stand still mute & silent, or if they speak at all, to speak idly, and nothing to the purpose, as men beside themselves, or in an extasie. But for the resolution of the question by the bishops demanded, the deuout Patriarch decreed, That in the Church prayers he should be remembered before the emperor his nephew, by the name of, The most religious and zealous monke Anthonie: which was done (God wot) for no good zeale to the poore blind man, but the better to colour the matter with the common people, as if hee wearie of the world, had voluntarily taken vpon him that silly profession. Neuertheless, within foure daies after, Synadenus vnderstanding them in euery place to whisper among themselves, and secretly to mutter against the hard dealing with the old emperor, who had long reigned ouer them, and so by right was againe to doe, if his nephew should chance to die; and that the ecclesiasticall lawes enforced no man against his will to enter into religious orders: he therewith enraged, sent vnto him certaine of his owne confederacie, to exact of him an oath in writing, That he should neuer more after that time seeke after the empire, or yet accept of the same if it were offered him, neither to substitute any other: which if he should refuse to do, to put him in feare of his life. And the more to terrifie him, set a guard of insolent barbarous souldiours ouer him; for feare of whom, he yielded to doe whatsoeuer they required: and so his oath being solemnly conceiued into writing (another man leading his hand, because he was blind) he signed the same with a red crosse above, and a blacke crosse beneath, after the manner of the religious. Hauiing thus liued in darkenesse, disgraced, shut vp in his chamber as a man forsaken of the world, with an vnshure guard euer to attend him, by the space of two yeares, it fortune that the twelfth of Februarie towards night, (a day in the Greeke Church dedicated to the vigil of S. Anthonie, whose name they had giuen him) certaine of his friends that were suffered to haue access vnto him, going as their manner was, once in three or foure daies to visit him (amongst whom was his daughter, sometime the prince of SERAIA his wife, but as then a widdow, and Xiaphorus Gregoras, author of this Historie) he entred with them, as with his friends, into a familiar discourse of many matters, wherin he so deceiued the time, that it was past midnight before they perceiued how the time passed. But the cockes crowing, he brake off the talke, and bidding them farewell, gaue them leaue to depart, pleasantly saying, That to morrow they would make an end of their discourse; who all thereupon tooke their leaue and departed, no signe of any sicknesse as then appearing vpon him. And after they were gone, called for meat and did eat: the meate he eat, was certaine shell-fish, for it was with them a fasting day, and he had not eaten any thing: after which, when as hee should haue drunke a cup of wine, for the comforting of his old stomach and digesting of that so hard meate, he drunke cold water, as his manner was, when he felt any inward heat; to drinke the same in moderately: which hurtfull manner of diet he then vsing also, began by and by to feele a great paine in his stomacke, and so presently after became very sicke, falling withall into a great loosenesse of bodie, so that in the space of one quarter of an houre he was glad oftentimes to arise, and to go vnto an homely house of office in an inner chamber: thereby, to discharge natures burden, where after many euacuations, sitting downe vpon an homely bed fast by; and not able to recover his owne bed, hauing as then none to helpe him; there before it was day, died, after he had reigned 43 yeares. His death was by many strange signes and accidents as it were foretold: first, a great eclipse of the Sunne appeared, just so many daies before his death as hee had liued yeares: and after that, another eclipse of the Moone; and with it an earthquake, the day before he died at night, being S. Anthoine his euen, whose name his enemies had thrust vpon him: at which time also, the sea with a great tempest rising about the wonted bounds, made diuers breaches in the wals of the citie towards the sea, as if it had been some violent enemy, and overflowed also diuers houses in the citie. Manie crosse and pinacles were then also from the tops of churches and other high buildings ouerthrowne; and with them a great pillar, sometime one of the ornaments of the citie, standing before the church, commonly called The Church of the fortie martyrs: which being verie high, and below burnt and worne away with time, had put manie in feare as they passed by it, least it should haue fallen vpon them; inso much that the Emperour vpon a time passing that way, was requested by some of the nobilitie there present, to ride farther off from it, for feare of falling vpon him: who smiling at their vaine feare, by chance answered, O would to God I might liue so long as this pillar will stand: which now falling out according to his speech, gaue manie of them that had heard him so say, occasion to maruell. His dead bodie was honorable buried in the monasterie of L I B A, which his mother Theodora the empresse had not long before new built, and his obsequies there (after the maner of that time) yeerely solemnly kept by the space of nine daies.

The Turks kingdom founded by Othoman in Asia, such time as the Greeke emperours were at variance leauing themselves in Europe.

Thus at length hauing passed through the troubled state of the Greeke empire, during the long raigne of the old emperour Andronicus, the considerate Reader may easily see the causes of the declining, and ruine also of this famous empire; and how that the Greeke emperours, troubled with their tempestuous affaires neerer home in EUROPE, yea in the verie imperiall citie it selfe, and in their owne pallaces, were not at leasure to looke over the strait into ASIA, but glad to leaue their territories there vnto the weak defence of themselves. At which time, and euen in the midst of the aforesaid troubles, Othoman, on the one side, with great industrie laid the foundation of his empire in PHRYGIA and BYTHYNIA, now the greatest terror of the world: and then did those things which we now haue of him written. The other princes of the Turkes also, the successours of Sultan Aladin, at the same time on the other side, alongst the riuer M E A N D E R encroaching on as fast: vntill that at last amongst them they had thrust the Greeke emperours quite out of ASIA, and in fine became themselves, together with the Greeke empire, a prey vnto the Othoman kings, as in the proceesse of this historie shall more at large appeare.

Prusa yielded vnto the Turks.

But againe to returne vnto Othoman himselfe, who all this while (that old Andronicus the Greeke emperour was thus troubled) had with his sonne Orchanes sought by all meanes on euerie side to enlarge his kingdom: the garrisons by him left in the two late built castles neere vnto the great citie of P R U S A, vnder the charge of the two valiant captains Ahemur & Balabur Zuck (as is before declared) hauing now continued there certaine yeares, had by shutting vp the passages, and spoiling of the countie, brought the citie into such distresse and penurie, that manie of the citizens and other the poore Christians fled into the citie, there died of famine. The rest now out of all hope to be relieued by the Greeke emperour, not then able to relieue himselfe, came to composition with Orchanes (for Othoman was then sicke of his old disease the gout) couenanting with him, that they might in safetie with life and libertie depart, and so much of their goods as they themselves could carie: and so yielded to him the citie. Which conditions (as most write) were on the Turks behalfe well and faithfullie performed: yet some there be that report them to haue bene in most part by Orchanes broken. Thus was P R U S A, one of the greatest cities of that part of ASIA, yielded vnto the Turks, in the yeere of our Lord 1327: and was afterwards by Orchanes made the royall seat of the Othoman kings.

About this time, or verie shortly after, Othoman in the eight and twentieth yeare of his raigne died, died, at the age of 69, in the yeare of our Lord 1328, and lieth buried at P R U S A, where his tombe is yet at this day to be seene, in a certaine chappell of an old monasterie in the castle, standing in the midst of the citie; couered with a mantle of greene chamlet, & a little Tulipant or Turkish hat (such as he vsed to weare) lying ouer his head, far differing from those which the Turks now weare, especially the better sort of them, so great that they can therewith scarcely come in at a doore. There is also another monument of him to be seene at S U O U R A, fast by the sepulchre of his father Ertogrull, there made by his sonnes in remembrance of him; whereof some haue reported him to haue bene there buried. Howbeit the Turks themselves generally suppose the true monument wherein he is interred to be at P R U S A, as is aforesaid. He was wise, politicke, valiant, and fortunate, but full of dissimulation, and ambitious about measure; not rash in his attempts, and yet very resolute; what hee tooke in hand, hee commonly brought to good effect: to all men he was bountifull and liberall, but especially to his men of warre, and the poore, whom he would many times feed and cloath with his owne hands. Of a poore lordship he left a great kingdom, hauing subdued a great part of the lesser ASIA: and is worthily accounted the first founder of the Turks great kingdom and empire. Of him, the Turkish kings and emperours euer since, haue bene called the Othoman kings and emperours, as lineally of him descended: and the Turks themselves Osmans, as the people or subiects of Othoman, or Osmans, for so he is of the Turks commonlie called.

The death of Othoman. Othoman buried at Prusa.

Note, that in the reckoning vp of certaine of the great Christian Princes and Prelates of the same time, at the end of euery the Turkish Kings and Emperours liues, the first and greatest number following their names, sheweth the yeare of our Lord, wherein such an Emperour, King, or Bishop began to raigne, or sit: and the number following, how long he reigned or sat. As for example: Andronicus the elder began to raigne in the East in the yeare of grace 1282, and reigned 43 yeares: and so of the rest. Wherein we seeke not the exact computation vnto a moneth or day (as not much materiall to our Historie, or any part of our purpose) but onely the reasonable view of the great princes of the foresaid times, as they liued in ages together.

THE LIFE OF ORCHANES, OR VRCHAN, SECOND KING OF THE TURKES.

AFTER the death of Orthoman, his two sonnes Orchanes (whom the Turkes call VRchan) and Aladin his brother, hauing with great solemnitie entered their father at PRVSA, immediatly summoned a Parliament, whereunto both the brethren came accompanied with the chiefe of their nobilitie. This parliament was called especially, for the establishing of the succession in this new kingdome, and for the diuision of Orthomans treasure and goods, betwixt them two, his sonnes. But vpon view taken, there was no money, plate, or jewels found in the kings coffers, for that he had in his life time most bountifully bestowed it vpon his men of warre : so that all the wealth hee left vnto them his sonnes, was, the honourable remembrance of his life for them to immitate; large dominions for their possessions, store of readie horses, and armour fit for seruice, with great herds of beasts and cattell for household prouision. Whereupon Orchanes demaunded of his brother Aladin, what order hee thought was best to be taken with those things by their father so left. To whom Aladin answered, That it was most requisite first to establish a king in their fathers kingdome; which like a good shepherd might gouerne and defend his subjects, rule and maintaine his men of war, prouiding all things meet for defence of his kingdome: And that vnto him of right belonged all these other things by their father left, as the patrimonie of his successour, for the common good and maintenance of his estate. As for mine owne part (said Aladin) I claime no interest therein, you being my elder brother, and so vnto me in steed of a father: by whom also you haue been these two yeares, as it were alreadie put in possession of the kingdom, all things being committed to your gouernment, during the time of his late sickness. His modestie of Aladin was greatly commended of all the ancient counsellors; by meanes whereof, the kingdome in all peaceable maner descended to Orchanes. In regard of which courtesie, Orchanes would gladly haue made Aladin his brother President of his counsell: which honour he would in no wise accept, but requested rather that hee would giue him the lordship of FODORE in Tekenes countrey; which Orchanes frankly graunted. In which lordship of FODORE, Aladin most part liued a priuat and quiet life, and afterwards built two Mahometan churches, and an abbey at PRVSA, there yet at this day to be seene.

Some Latine Historiographers otherwise report this beginning of Orchanes his raigne; as that Orthoman should haue three sonnes, and that Orchanes the youngest obtained the kingdome by murdering of his other brethren. A practise of late much vsed amongst the Turkish princes, but not before the time of Bajazet the first of that name, who first of the Turkish monarchs embred his hands with his brothers blood: where before, they vsed all brotherly loue one to another, as the most probable histories collected out of the Turkes owne Chronicles affirme.

When that barbarous manner of murdering their brethren first began among the Turkish Sultans.

Orchanes second king of the Turks.

The Christian princes and capitaines, presently vpon the death of Othoman recovered the citie of Nice with diuers other castles and forts, out of the hands of the Turks: as it commonly chanceth, that dominions lately woon with great perill, are soone againe lost, the Conquerour dying before there be a firme gouernment established. Amongst other forts by the Christians repossessed, the castle of Tzurichiser, situate vpon the passages of the riuer Sangarius, most grieved the Turks, for thereby their passage into that part of Bythynia was much impeached. Wherefore Orchanes desirous to recouer this castle, disguised himselfe with a few other of his best souldiours, in the apparrell of Christian marchants, and came to the castle, crauing leave to passe as marchants: the warders of the castle verely supposing them by their attire to be marchants, opened the gates, and let them into the castle; who presently drew their swords, slew the warders, and so by force possessed the castle, to the great benefit of the Turkes, and the hurt of the poore Christians yet left in the countrey of Bythynia. For they now hauing opened the way ouer the riuer Sangarius, and as it were broken downe the strongest defence of that side of the Greeke empire, at their pleasure foraged the countrey in such sort, as that the great citie of Nice (for want of victuals to relieue so great a multitude as for feare of the Turks was fled out of the countrey into it) was brought to great extremitie and want. For the reliefe whereof, and for the repulsing againe of the Turks, Andronicus the yong emperor, who then all commaunded, with such an armie as he was then able to raise, passed himselfe in person ouer the strait of Constantinople into Asia: the greatest strength of his armie consisting in two thousand choice horsemen; the rest as well horse as foot, being for the most part artificers taken vp in the citie, men altogether vnacquainted with armes (who in token of their cowardise, and that they were more mindfull of flight than of fight, carried ouer with them almost as many long boats, and such other small vessels, as they were men, to be ready to receiue them at such time as they should flee) or els abject rascals, taken vp here and there, men of whom no great thing was to be expected, and of all others most vnfit for so great a prince (as was the emperor) to commit the defence of his person and honour vnto. But Orchanes hearing of his coming, sent certain of his most expert capitaines, to forlay the straight passages of the countrey whereby the emperor was to passe; following also himselfe after with his armie, of purpose to encounter the emperor. Who in three daies march after his landing in Asia, being come to Philocrène, a little towne in Bythynia, and vnderstanding, that Orchanes hauing before taken the straits, lay not far off encamped with his armie; he there at Philocrène pitched his tents, and staid that night also. But the next morning, the Sunne as yet scarcely risen, he seeing diuers companies of the Turks comming downe from the mountaines fast by, put his armie into order of battell, and so set forward to meet them. Vv here to begin the fight, the Turks archers freely bestowed their piercing shot amongst the Christians, still keeping themselves aloofe off, so to doe the more harme. Vv hich the emperor mistaking, and supposing that their keeping off to haue proceeded of feare, encouraged therewith, commaunded certaine loofe companies disorderly to march forward, &c. to skitmith with them: which his more expert captains not liking, would haue otherwise perswaded him, as to haue kept his strength together against the danger of the battell. Neuertheless, such was his youthfull heat, as that he could by no meanes be otherwise intreated, but that forward needs they must. But all the forenoone spent in this light and tumultuarie kind of skitmithing, and the Sunne at the highest now shining very hot, Orchanes from the top of the mountaines perceiving the Christians well wearied with the heat of the day and long skitmithing, came downe from the hils with a world of men following him; who with a most hideous charge charged the Christians on euery side, some a farre off with their arrowes, and some hand to hand with their swords and other weapons: whose assault the Christians at the first most valiantly receiued, and a great while right worthely defended themselves, hauing wounded and slaine a number of their enemies. Vv hich hard fight was on both sides courageously maintained, vntill the approaching of the night, with great slaughter on both sides: at which time, the Christians wearie of the long fight, and oppressed with the multitude of their enemies, disorderly retiring toward their trenches, and hardly pursued by the Turkes, receiued there a great losse, as well of their horsemen, as of their foot: but by the comming on of the night, the battell was at length ended with vncertaine victorie. Amongst others there hurt, the emperor himselfe was wounded in the foot with an arrow. That night happened a woofull mishap, and a manifest token of Gods his wrath: for Orchanes hauing to his cost made prooue of the strength and valour of the Christians,

Christians, and doubting they would the next day come on farther into the countrey, left three hundred horsemen, as scouts, to attend the enemies remoouing: and himselfe with his armie retired beforehand to take the aduantage of such places as the Christians were to passe by. But the emperor in the euening leauing his campe, and going to Philocrène, a little towne subt by, the better to haue his wound dressed; the rest of the armie vnderstanding of his departure, and supposing him to haue fled for feare (as if Orchanes with a great armie would that night haue slaine them all) fled themselves also out of the campe, euery mothers sonne, some to their long boats and other little vessels they had for that purpose brought ouer the strait; some hasting towards the towne gates, were by the multitude of others running headlong after them, ouerborne, and troden to death; other some hanging one at anothers taile, like a chaine, got some part of them vp to the top of the rampiers of the towne; other some drawne backe by them that hung vpon them, falling downe together by heapes, and trod vpon by others, there perished; some (as is reported) died there for very feare, no man either chasing or hurting them; so weak is mans courage when God withdraweth from him his strength. But in the morning the Sunne arising, the three hundred Turks, left for scouts, perceiving the flight of the Christians, entred the forsaken campe, where they found horses, armour, and emptie tents, yea the emperours owne furniture and his horses readie saddled: of all which, two hundred of these Turks tooke the spoile at their pleasure; and the other hundred pursuing the disperfed Christians, like heartlesse men, wandring here and there, slew a great number of them. The emperor himselfe seeing his armie (thus as it were by the hand of God) ouerthrowne and disperfed, tooke shipping also, and so returned to Constantinople. After whose departure, the Turks seizing vpon many sea townes alongst the coast of Bythynia, and there seating themselves, laid heauie tributes vpon the other countrey townes and villages; for the benefit whereof, they spared to destroy them, together with the inhabitants, which they might at their pleasure full easily haue done.

Now lay the great citie of Nice in the fuds, the enimie commaunding all the countrey about it, liuing as sicke men doe by hope, and holding out onely vpon hope of a thousand horsemen which the emperor (notwithstanding his late discomfiure) had promised forthwith to send, there to lie in garrison for the reprefsing of the Turks. Of which aid so promised, Orchanes vnderstanding, furnished eight hundred of his owne horsemen, after the manner of the Christians: and fetching a great compasse about, came at length into the high way that leadeth from Constantinople to Nice, and so trouped directly towards the citie, as if they had come from Constantinople. At the same time he sent three hundred of his other horsemen, in the habit of Turks, to forrage and spoile the countrey, as much as they could within the view of the citie (now for want of victuals brought into great extremitie) which whilest they were a doing, the other eight hundred horsemen in the attire of Christians, following vpon them, as if it had been by chance, charged them, and in the sight of the citizens put them to flight: which done, these counterfeite horsemen returned directly againe towards Nice. The citizens which with great pleasure had in the meane time from the wals scene the most part of the skirmish; and how they had put the Turks to flight, supposing them to be the Constantinopolitan horsemen whom they daily expected, with great joy opened the gates of the citie to receiue them as their friends: But they being entred the gates, presently set vpon the Christians, fearing no such matter: and being seconded with the other three hundred, which in dissembling manner had fled before, and were now speedily returned, bringing also with them other companies of Turks, before laid in secret ambush not far off, they woon the great and famous citie of Nice, which they haue euer since vntill this day possessed: the spoile whereof was giuen vnto the souldiours for a prey, and the citizens all led away into miserable captiuitie and thraldome. Whilest Orchanes was thus busied, his other capitaines did with great courage and successe enlarge his dominions on all sides, daily encroching vpon their weake neighbours the Christians. Cunger-Alpes, one of his warlike capitaines, subdued the countrey of Mydurn, or Modrin, in Phrygia; and Bolli in Paphlagonia; appointing one Abdurachman, a man of great valour, to gouerne the countrey. And at the same time another of his old captains called Accecozza, brought Candarain in Paphlagonia; and Ermenie, a countrey neere vnto the mountain Horminus, into the Turkish subiection; placing garrisons in all the castles & forts which he had woon, of whom some part of the countrey was after his name called Cozza lani, that is to say, The old mans countrey. So that Orchanes his kingdome grew daily greater & greater, as well by the industrie of his chieftains, as of himselfe.

About

The city of Nice surprised by the Turks.

About this time, it fortuned the captains son of SCAMANDRIA (a town not far from the ruins of the ancient citie of TROY, and about a daies journey from the renowned castle of ABYDUS) to depart out of this world: vnto whose funerals being kept in the country, whilest his would father the captaine with his friends out of SCAMANDRIA resorted, the old craftie Turke Accozza lying alwaies in wait, as a fox for his prey, suddenly set vpon those heauie Christians, whereof he slue the most part, and tooke the rest prisoners. Amongst whom he also tooke the captaine of SCAMANDRIA, with his castle and country: whom he afterwards led prisoner vnto the castle of ABYDUS, which is one of the most famous castles situate vpon the sea coast of ASIA, ouer against SESTVS in EUROPE, where the sea of HELLES PONTVS by the narrow strait falleth into the sea EGEVM: two castles much renowned, by reason of their nigh situation, and yet placed in diuers parts of the world; eternized also by the euer liuing wits of Poets, for the aduenturous passage of Leander ouer that fret of the sea, to his loue Hero: which castles are now called DARDANELLY. Accozza hauing brought the captiue captaine of SCAMANDRIA (lately a man of great account in that country) so neer as he could vnto the castle of ABYDUS, offered to set him at libertie if they would surrender their castle, otherwise they should see him cruelly slaine before their faces. These Turkish threats nothing moued them of ABYDUS, more than to say, That they might if they would cut off his head, seeth him, and eat him, but the castle they intended not to deliuer. The same captaine was afterward by the comandement of Orchanes profered to the emperor of CONSTANTINOPLE, to be redeemed, which he refused. Yet at the last he was ransomed by the gouernour of NICOMEDIA, and againe set at libertie. Accozza of long time held the castle of SCAMANDRIA: yet so continually molested with the garrison of ABYDUS, and men of war sent from CONSTANTINOPLE, that he with his followers were glad for the most part to liue on horsbacke, to be alwaies in more readinesse against the attempt of their enemies. The captaine of the castle of ABYDUS had at that time a faire young gentlewoman to his daughter, who (as she said) chanced to dreame (what she had happily waking, for the most part wished) That being fallen into a deepe mirie ditch, out of which she could by no meanes helpe her selfe, a lustie young gallant comming by, did not onely helpe her out, but also in friendly manner, made her cleane, and afterwards apparelled her in rich and costly attire. The danger of this dreame much troubled the tender gentlewoman, but the image of the yong gentleman was so well phantized in her braine, that waking, she thought she still saw him, and sleeping longed sore for what she saw not. Thus whilst this yong gentlewoman with great deuotion entertained this imaginarie man; the old gray headed Turke Accozza came, and with a strong companie besieged her fathers castle of ABYDUS. During which siege, this gentlewoman oftentimes went vp into the high turrett of the castle, from whence shee might at pleasure see the marshall deeds on both sides, and take full view of all the enemies campe. But see the chance, as Abdurachman with great courage and no lesse brauerie, approached neere to the siege of the castle, she thought (vpon the first sight of him) that he was the verie man whom she had before dreamed of, and whose Idea was in her heart so deeply imprinted: wherefore she fully resolved to performe what she had without witness with her selfe determined. And waiting another time, when Abdurachman approached the castle, she cast downe to his feet a letter written in Greeke, and made fast vnto a stone: which letter he taking vp, deliuered the same to the General Accozza. Wherein after she had discovered her passionat affection, she promised to deliuer the castle into Abdurachmans power, if the Turkes would raise their siege, and Abdurachman himselfe with some few would secretly returne to the castle in the dead time of the night, and then follow her direction. Accozza like an old fox, which is seldome taken in the trap, gaue small credit to these louing lines, for feare of treason: yet for so much as you are the man (said he to Abdurachman) whom she vpon special liking hath made choice of for the purpose, will you aduenture your person? And he, armed with a manly courage, a surer defence than any armour of prooffe, incited also with hope of honour, riches, and beautie, all woorthie prizes for marshall minds; said he would vndertake the atchieuement of that exploit, if it were his pleasure. Whereupon Accozza, because nothing should be suspected by his sudden departure, gaue a sharpe assault to the castle, as if hee would haue taken it by fine force, yet in the end retired; and presently brake vp his siege, as despairing of the winning thereof. The defendants of the castle thinking themselves deliuered from a great danger, greatly rejoyced: and as in like case it oftentimes falleth out, in their great iolitie furcharged themselves that night with

excesse both of meat and drinke. But Abdurachman at the time in the letter appointed, put himselfe vpon the way, with certain select souldiors, and about midnight came to the appointed place of the castle, where the yong gentlewoman was attending his coming: & she by her means was conueyed into the castle, and so by her directed to the porters lodge: where he slew the porter, being fast asleepe, and opening the gates, let in his followers: which went directly to the captaines lodging, and there tooke him prisoner, being before their comming ouertaken with wine, and fast asleepe. Thus was the castle of ABYDUS surprized by the Turks, from whence they had a faire prospect out of ASIA into EUROPE. The captaine with his faire daughter and the greatest part of the rich spoile of the castle was deliuered to Abdurachman, to bee presented to Orchanes at his court, then lying at NEAPOLIS. Who wonderfull glad of so good news, gaue the faire gentlewoman with the greatest part of the prey in reward to Abdurachman. The posteritie of this man (as they say) yet remaine among the Turks. Amongst others of the warlike captaines, there was also one Cararachman, whose name was so dreadfull to the of CONSTANTINOPLE, that when their children cried, they would terrifie them to make them hold their peace, by saying Cararachman comes. Not long after the two valiant forenamed woorthie captaines Cunger-Alps and Accozza died: after whose death, Orchanes made his sonnes, Solyman and Amurath, lords and gouernours of those countries and prouinces. And intending (by the perswasion of Abdurachman) to besiege NICOMEDIA, he leuiued a great armie, wherewith hee tooke diuers small castles and forts as he marched towards the citie. NICOMEDIA was at that time gouerned by an honourable ladie, kinswoman vnto Andronicus the emperor of CONSTANTINOPLE: but the seeing her citie besieged by the Turks, and doubting her owne forces not to be able to hold out the siege, by a trustie messenger offered to yeeld the citie vnto Orchanes, vpon condition, That she with so many of the citizens as would, might in safetie depart with their liues, libertie, and goods: which being graunted, she with so many as would follow her, departed out of the citie by night, taking shipping for CONSTANTINOPLE.

*Nicomedia pre-

Orchanes hauing taken NICOMEDIA, made his sonne Solyman gouernour of the same. The churches of the Christians he conuerted into Turkish Meschitas or temples. The greatest church (being of wonderfull beautie) he conuerted into a colledge or schoole, for the learned professors and students of *Mahomet*s law, which is yet called in NICOMEDIA, Orchanes his schoole or colledge. And because the countrey neere vnto NICOMEDIA, lying open vpon the sea, was euer in danger to be spoiled by the gallies of CONSTANTINOPLE; he placed in those countries diuers of his most experienced souldiors to defend the same, appointing to euer of them possessions and pensions, according to their degrees and merites. After this, Orchanes by the counsell of his brother Aladur, commanded all his men of war to weate white caps, thereby to be knowne from others, which commonly wore red. Such manner of caps the Ianizaries vse at this day. The Turks also in Orchanes reign, & long time after, vsed not to cut or shauie their beards, but did weate them long: so that if the king would disgrace any man, he would in his displeasure commaund his beard to be cut or shauen. The manner of cutting and shauing their beards, which they now vse, they learned of the Italians: of whom they haue also borrowed many other fashions, not onely differing, but quite contrary to their ancient maners & customes. Orchanes about this time remoued his court to NICE, where he lay long time after. There he built a sumptuous church, appointing a preacher to preach vnto the people euery friday: he erected in NICE also two faire abbeyes, in the one of which, he with owne hands serued the strangers and poore the first dinner. He was the first that builded abbeyes or monasteries among the Turks, whose example most of his successours haue imitated, and is amongst them vsed vnto this day.

ued his court to Nice.*

The gouernment of NICOMEDIA, Orchanes committed to his eldest sonne Solyman (as is before said) a prince of great towardlinesse, giuing him in great charge, to haue a vigilant eye vnto the townes of TARAXA, GOVENUCA, and MUDVRNE, which were nigh vnto NICOMEDIA; yet in possession of the Christians: all which townes, with the countries adioyning, Solyman in short time got without force, by composition. This Solyman was of a princely disposition, so tempering justice with clemencie in his gouernment, that many Christians (allured with his vertues) because of his religion, and gladly put themselves vnder his subiection: the politicke laws of the countrey he neither abrogated nor changed, but maintained as they had ben of ancient time accustomed, whereby he greatly wooon the hearts of the people. Amurath his yonger sonne, Orchanes made lord and gouernour of PRUSA, after he had remoued his court to NICE. castle castle of CHARACHIZAR, with the seignorie thereto belonging; he gaue to his cosin Artemus, the sonne of his vnckle Iundus.

Orchanes invades the country of Carasina.

There was at this time in Orchanes court, a noble yong gentleman, called Turson-beg, the son of Charafis, king of CHARASIA; by whose perswasion Orchanes in person himselfe with a strong armie, made an expedition into that countrey: for that his fathers subjects after the death of the king his father, denied their obedience to his elder brother, withing rather to haue Turson for their soueraigne. In whose behalfe Orchanes taking that journey, surprisid by the way many castles and townes to his owne vse. Orchanes was no sooner entred the countrey of CHARASIA, but Turson elder brother fled to PERGAMUM, whither the Turks shortly pursued him: Where Turson desirous to speake with his brother, vnwarly approching the citie, was wounded with an arrow shot from the wals, and there slaine. With whose death Orchanes was so greatly offended, that he threatened to destroy the whole countrey with fire and sword, if they did not by a day prefixed generally submit themselues to his mercie. The people terrified with this proclamation of so great a punishe already in armes, yeelded themselues vnto his subjection. The kings sonne also was led into PERGAMUM, vpon reasonable conditions yeelded himselfe vnto Orchanes, who sent him to PRUSA, where after he had there liued two yeares, died of the plague: after whose death, Orchanes made his son Solyman prince of CARASINA. Neither is this taking in of the countrey of CARASINA to be accounted a small conquest; one of the greatest houses of the Turks the successors of the Iconian Sultan Adadin, now thereby taking end, and their dominions, which were not small (as containing almost all LYDIA, with some good parts of MYSIA, TROAS, and the lesser PHRYGIA) now vnited vnto the Othoman kingdome. Orchanes vpon his returne, for the good successe of this journey, built a church and monasterie at PRUSA, placing therein religious men, with all diligence sought for out of all his kingdome: of which religious, the Turks write many fables, better worth the smiling at than the serious reporting. Hitherto the kingdome of Othoman and Orchanes his sonne, was contained within the bounds of the lesser ASIA, which the Turks call ANATOLIA.

The countrey of Carasina related vnto Orchanes.

Now it resteth to be shewed, vpon what occasion Orchanes, or rather his sonne Solyman Basse, as it were fatally, with a small power first passed ouer HELLESPOINT into EUROPE; where they and their successors haue by little and little so enlarged their dominions, that they haue now long ago quite ouerthrowne the Grecian empire, with many other great kingdoms, &c. are at this present a terrout to all Christian princes bordering vpon them: to the perpetuall infamie of the Greeks, who for want of courage, and busied with ciuile discord, neuer sought in time to impeach their greatnesse.

Orchanes hauing now so augmented his kingdome, that he might from many parts thereof out of ASIA, take view of the pleasant borders of EUROPE, from whence he was excluded only by the narrow sea of HELLESPOINT; and continually incited with the vnstoppable and restless desire of soueraignie, began to deuise how he might possibly passe that strait sea, and set foot into EUROPE, another part of the world. Which his conceit one day he imparted to his sonne Solyman: who presently answered his father, That if it would please him to giue him leaue, he would not doubt to passe the strait of HELLESPOINT, and in time to plant the Mahometane religion in those countries of EUROPE, possessed by the Christians. Which answer of Solyman, much pleased his father, who gaue him leaue to depart into his countrey, and in that matter to proceed further, as he thought best, and as occasion should best serue. Solyman taking leaue of his father, tooke his journey into CARASINA, where riding vp and downe the country, as it had bin for his pleasure only, he made his way to the place where it is thought the famous citie of TROO sometime stood; where yet (as the Turks and some others say) are to be seene the woonderfull ruines of that vnfortunate citie by the sea side: In this place Solyman stood still a great while as it were in a studie, forecasting (as it seemed) some great matter, without spcking one word to any of his followers. When one of his chieftains called Ezes-beg, to put him out of his deep thoughts boldly said vnto him: My lord and great soueraigne, what strange thing is this, that you are so deeply drowned in these your melancholy thoughts, vndoubtedly it is some great matter that you are studying vpon? Truth it is, said Solyman, for I was thinking how it were possible to passe ouer this sea of HELLESPOINT into the borders of EUROPE, and to take view of that countrey, and so to returne vndiscovered. If this bee the matter, said Ezes-beg (joyning vnto him one Fazil-Beg, a man of no lesse valour than himselfe) wee two will by the power of God performe

into you this enterprife. Then was Solyman desirous to know of them, about what place they would passe ouer: which they well knowing the sea coast, shewed him not far off. VV herfore Solyman giuing them leaue, they departed: and shortly after making a little boat, or rather as some suppose a raffe, passed ouer HELLESPOINT by night, and arrived in EUROPE side, neere vnto a castle of the Turks, called ZEMBNIC or ZEMBNIC, but of the Greekes Coiridocastrom, that is to say, The hogs castle, not farre from SASTUS: where going ashore, they tooke prisoner a Greeke in a vineyard neere vnto the castle, whom they finding to bee a good, sensible fellow, without delay put him into their boat or raffe, and returning backe againe, presented him to Solyman. This Christian captiue Solyman entertained courteously, giuing him great gifts and rich apparrell, to discouer vnto him the estate of his countrey: and in fine, learned of him a meanes to take the castle of ZEMBNIC, before the Christians should thereof be aware. For achievement whereof, certaine boats were speedily made readie by Solymans commaundement, and he with eightie chosen souldiors easily passed ouer in them by night, with their Christian guide the Greeke: for in that place, the strait betwixt ASIA and EUROPE is not past an Italian mile ouer. This guide brought Solyman directly to the aforesaid castle, where was a great dunghill, so high, that from the top thereof Solyman with his souldiors easily got into the castle, which they woon without any great resistance; for it was then harvest time, and most part of the people were in the vineyards, or treading out of their corne all night, as the vse of those countries is. Solyman thus possessed of the castle of ZEMBNIC, vsed no extremitie against the inhabitants thereof, seeking rather by courtesie to gaine their good wils, than by extremitie to force them to his: yet such gentlemen as he tooke, with some others also of the better sort, hee sent by shipping, into ASIA; and by the same ships returned souldiors as fast as he could into EUROPE: so that he had in one day two hundred souldiors more brought ouer vnto him. And manning such small vessels as hee had left about the castle, sent Ezes-beg alongst the coast on EUROPE side, to burne such shipping or vessels as he could find, least the Christians should by them hinder his passage vpon the strait of HELLESPOINT. So in a few daies Solyman had transported into EUROPE two thousand good souldiors of the Turks, whom he so gouerned, that they did not in any violent sort injurie the vulgar Christians, by reason whereof the common people began to like reasonable well of the Turks, and to conuerse with them without feare. This was the first comming ouer of the Turks into EUROPE, with purpose there to conquer and inhabit, vnder the fortune of the Othoman kings. For albeit that some of that nation had at sundrie times before come ouer, as men seeking after spoile, or otherwise sent for yea sometimes by the Greeke emperours themselues; yet neuer stayed they long, but hauing done that they came for, or els lost themselves, returned backe againe into ASIA: vntill that now conducted by Solyman, and possessed of the little castle of ZEMBNIC (as is aforesaid) they there tooke so fast footing, as that they and their posteritie after them, were neuer thence to be since that time remoued: but still more and more encroching vpon the Christians, haue vnto their Asian kingdome joyned a great part of EUROPE also, to the terrour of the rest that yet remaineth, as in the proesse of this Historie shall (if God will) at large appeare.

About two miles from ZEMBNIC in CHERSONESVS was another castle called MAT-
TO, or more truly MADITVS, which Solyman also tooke: so that now he had gotten two castles in EUROPE, both which he strongly manned. After which time, the Turkes in great numbers came out of ASIA into EUROPE ouer that narrow strait of HELLESPOINTVS, to dwell in CHERSONESVS: and Solyman instead of them, to make room for his Turkes, sent Christians out of EUROPE to be placed amongst the Turkes in ASIA. The report of this comming ouer of the Turkes into CHERSONESVS, and of the taking of the castle of ZEMBNIC carried in post to CONSTANTINOPLE, was sufficient to haue stirred vp any prouident or careful men, presently to haue taken vp armes for the recouerie of the lost castle, and the driving out againe of the barbarous enemies out of EUROPE, before they had gathered any greater strength, or settled themselues in those places: but such was the carelessse negligence and great securitie of the proud Greekes, that instead thereof they to extenuate the greatnesse of the losse, commonly sayd, That there was but an hogstie lost; alluding vnto the name of the castle: and vainely (as sayth a graue Father of their owne) jesting at that was not to be jeasted at, and laughing at that was not to be laughed, but lamented for; as in few yeates it proued, their foolish laughter being not without good cause conuerted into most bitter teares.

Calicut taken by the Turkes.

Solyman his strength so still increasing by the dayly comming ouer of the Turkes, hee proceeded farther to spoyle the countrey of CHERSONESVS, almost as farre as CALLIPOLIS, distant from the castile ZEMBENIC about two and twentie miles: after which pleasant citie the proud Turke began now to long. Which the gouernour thereof perceiuing by the Turkes continual encroaching vpon him, rayfed what power he was able to make, and so went out against them; all the rest of the Greekes in the meane time lying still as if they had becne asleepe, or that the matter had not concerned them: but meeting the Turkes, he was by them (after a great conflict) ouerthrowne, and for sauegard of his life glad to flie into his citie: after whom the Turkes following, spoyled the countrey round about, and in their returne by plaine force tooke the citie, together with the castile also: which hapned in the yeere of our Lord 1358. Where the madnesse of the Greekes was againe more than before to bee wondered at; for the newes of the losse of CALLIPOLIS being brought to CONSTANTINOPLE, the people there made small account thereof, although it was indeed a right great losse, and much concerned the state: but to extenuate the matter, when they had any talke thereof, in jesting wise commonly said, That the Turkes had but taken from them a pottell of wine: but by taking of such hoghtys and pottells of wine (as they termed it) the Turkes in a few yeares after had gone so farre in TRACIA, that Amurath (this same Solyman his Nephew which now tooke from the Greekes the citie of CALLIPOLIS) euen in the heart (as it were) of the Greeke empire, placed his royall seat at HADRIANOPLE: and immediately after him Baiazer his sonne (hauing subdued all the countrey, euen to the walles of CONSTANTINOPLE) for certaine yeares layd hard siege vnto the imperiall citie it selfe; and had no doubt then carried it, had not the great expedition of the mightie Tartar prince Tamerlaine (vnto Baiazer farall) in the meane time hapned: whereby (God so appointing it) the prosperous succeedings of the Turkes were for a space well stayed; that they should not before the time by him prefinde, deuour the reliques of the Greeke empire. And it were to be wished that the Christians of our time also (by their example warned) would a length awake out of their dead sleepe: who of late haue lost vnto the same enemy, not the castile of ZEMBENIC, or the citie of CALLIPOLIS, but whole kingdomes, as HUNGARIE, and CYPRVS; and are still faire in the way; I say no more for grece, and foreboding of euill fortunes. But againe to our purpose, Solyman hauing made this prosperous entrance into EVROPE, and there got strong footing, by speedie messengers certified his father what he had done, and that it was expedient for him with all speed to send vnto him a great supplie of men of warre, as well for the sure defence and keeping of the castles and forts by him alreadie gotten, as for the further inuasion of the countrey. This message was woonderfull welcome vnto Orchanes, and whereas many families of the Sarazins, at that present were come into the countrey of CARASINA to possesse the dwellings and places of them, which in hope to better their estate were before gone ouer into EVROPE; all these Sarazins hee commaunded to passe ouer into EVROPE likewise: which they did accordingly, seating themselfe for a time in the countrey neere to CALLIPOLIS. In the meane time, Solyman omitted no oportunitie to enter further into the countrey, winning small forts and holds, and still peopling the same with his Turkes: And on the other side, they of CARASINA passed ouer into EVROPE, placing theselues as it were in a new world. For which cause, and for the great desire they had to extend the Turkish dominion and religion, they refused no paines of warre: so that all things at that time prospered with the Turkes, and went backward with the Christians.

In the time of these warres, not farre from CALLIPOLIS, was a litle castile called CONGERR, the captaine whereof was by a Greeke name called Cabo Ioannes, a valiant and painfull man: this captaine continually molested and troubled the Turkes which lay on that side of CALLIPOLIS, vnder the leading of Ezes-beg, many of whom he slew and tooke prisoners; as hee could find them at any aduantage. Solyman much angred herewith, by craftie and secret espials learned a certaine time when he was gone out of his castile to doe some exploit vpon the Turkes: whereupon he presently to beset the castile with souldiours, that hee could by no means returne thither, but hee must first fall into their hands; and for more assurance placed others also in by-ways, least he should by any way escape. The captaine ignorant of all this, prosecuted his enterprise, and hauing taken a Turke prisoner, thinking to returne to his castile, was hastily pursued by Fazil-Beg: for which cause, making the more hast, he suddainly fell into the danger of the Turkes laid in ambush: where his men were all slaine, and he himselfe taken and brought before his own castile, castile, and had there his head presently stricke off: whereupon the castile was forthwith by them that were therein (hauing now lost their captaine) surrendered, and Chazi Il-Beg, a valiant captaine of the Turkes, placed in the same: who from thence neuer ceased to trouble the countrey, euen to the walls of DIDYMOTICHUM, as did Solyman also out of CALLIPOLIS.

Thus in the space of one yeare the Turkes got strong footing in EVROPE, possessing diuers castles and towines, with the countrey about them, which Solyman gaue in reward vnto his captaines and souldiours, as appeareth by the mappe and tombes of Ezes-beg and Fazil-beg, the two which first came ouer into EVROPE, which are yet well knowne.

About this time it is reported, that as this mortall prince Solyman was for his sport hawking in the fields of BORAYRA, on EVROPE side, galloping in to his faulcon, was with his horse ouerthrowne in a ditch, of which fall he being hurt, he died shortly after. The newes of his death being brought to Orchanes his father, he was then (then being sicke) just occasion of great sorrow: so that within two moneths after hee died also, being fourescore yeares old, when hee had thereof reigned 31 yeares; and died about the yeare of our Lord 1359. Some histories report otherwife, both of his death, and of the time wherein hee lived: as that he should be lliane in a battell against the Tartars, or as others write, with an arrow at the siege of PARISA, in the yeare of our Lord 1349. But Ioannes Leunclauius in his historie collected out of the Turkes owne chronicles whom we follow as most probable, reporteth it as before.

This Orchanes was wise, courteous, and bountifull, more ingenious than his father in deuising warlike engines. He built diuers princely Churches, Abbeyes, Colledges, and Cels, and was in his superstitious religion very zealous: in somuch that he appointed pensions to all such as could in the church say the booke of Mahomet law, by heart, and appointed competent maintenance for all Iudges of his courts: because they should not take any thing in reward of his subjects, for the perverting of justice. He greatly enlarged his kingdome in ASIA, and not content to bee indolored with the seas of EVXINUM and HELLASPONTUS, set fast footing in EVROPE; which some attribute to his sonne, Amurath. He was vnto the Christians alwaies a most mortall enemy, and so was.

Whilest Amurath in his deepe thoughts, of greatesse plots the ground:
The wrangling Greekes by force of arms he seekes how to confound.
And wholly bent for to extend his kingdome, with his power, Piercing the confines of EUROPE, doth what he meets deuour.
As men dismayd, the Thracians quake, to fear their foule disgrace:
Amiddest whom, the tyrant stout his keeper proud doth place.
The fierce Bulgarians he did meet, and in the field subdue:
And in COSSOVA fatall plains, the wofull Despot flue.
But long is not the wicked joy, which they in mischief take;
Stab'd by a Slaue, the wretch his end in that same place did make.

THE LIFE OF AMVRATH, THE FIRST OF THAT NAME, THIRD KING OF THE TURKES, AND THE GREAT AVGMEN- TOR OF THEIR KINGDOME.

AMurath the yonger sonne of Orchanes succeeded his father in the Turkish kingdome, his elder brother Solymán being dead a little before his father. This Amurath with greater zeale than any one of the Turkish kings, aduanced the Mahometane religion, and had therein wonderfull successe. In the beginning of his raigne, he gathered a great armie out of all parts of his kingdome, to PRUSA; purposing to passe ouer HELLES PONTUS, to inuade the Christians in THRACIA. But vnderstanding, that the other Mahometane princes in ASIA, had combined themselves against him, hee was thereby enforced to leaue his former determination for EUROPE, and to turne his forces vpon them. In which warre he mightily preuailed against them, and returned with victorie to PRUSA. But hauing fo subdued those confederat princes, he the next yeare after prosecuted his warres before intended against the Christians in EUROPE. For which purpose hauing leuied a strong armie in ASIA, he passed ouer to CALLIPOLIS, accompanied with his tutor, whom the Turks call Lala Schahin: whose graue aduice and counsaile he most followed in all his waightie affaires, being at that time one of his cheefe counsellors. From CALLIPOLIS he marched to the castle of BENUTUM, which was by composition yeilded vnto him. From thence he went to TZVRVLUS, where the Christians gaue him a sharpe encounter: but in the end he wan the towne, and caried away the victorie. And so proceeding farther, tooke diuers other small castles and townes in that part of THRACIA, which of the ancient Romane Colonies was then called ROMANIA, and now of the Turks RUMILIA, namely MESINE, BURGOOS, and others; whereof some he viterly rased, and into the rest put strong garrisons. At this time also, Chasi-ilbeg, and Eurenoses, two of his most valiant captaines, tooke certaine forts standing vpon the riuer MERITZA, in auncient time called HERCULUS. Whereby they much troubled the inhabitants of the countrey thereabouts. Wherewith the captaine of DIDYMOTICHUM offended, gathered his souldiours together, intending to haue intercepted the great captaine Chasi-ilbeg: in which attempt he lost most of his followers, and was himselfe there taken prisoner. For whose rancome and certain other condicions, the citizens of DIDYMOTICHUM yeilded the citie vnto the Turks.

Amurath, succeeding his father Orchanes in the Turkish kingdome.

Didymotichum yeilded vnto the Turks.

Shortly after Amurath sent his tutor Lala Schahin to besiege HADRIANOPLE, now called ANDRINOPLE, but in auncient time ORESTIAS: of whose comming the Christians hearing, encountered him vpon the way, and fought with him a great battaile, wherein many were on both sides lost: but in the end, the Christians being put to the worst, retired againe to the citie. Of this victorie Schahin sent newes vnto Amurath, with certaine of the heads of the slaine Christians: who thereupon sending Chasis and Eurenoses before, he himselfe with a great armie followed after to the siege of HADRIANOPLE: of whose comming, the gouernour of HADRIANOPLE vnderstanding, fled secretly out of the citie by night to ENUS. The citizens seeing themselves forsaken of their gouernour, yeilded their citie vnto Amurath, in the yeare of our Lord 1362.

Hadrianople yeilded vnto the Turks.

The taking of these strong cities in THRACIA, especially of DIDYMOTICHUM and HADRIANOPLE is (by some of the Turks owne Histories) otherwise reported: which, because it is neither improbable nor disagreeing from the subtile dealings of the Turkes, and of themselves also recei-received, I haue thought good to set downe as their owne Historiographers report the same.

The Turkish king Amurath had (as they say, and as truth was) in the beginning of his reigne concluded a peace with the Christians of THRACIA: during which peace, the Gouvernour of DIDYMOTICHUM intending to fortifie his citie with new and stronger fortifications against the assaults of the Turkes, entertaigned all the masons, carpenters, and other workemen hee could by any meanes get: which Amurath vnderstanding, secretly caused two hundred good and lustie workemen and labourers to come out of ASIA, to offer their seruice vnto the gouernour, who gladly entertained them, vsing their helpe in that his great and hastie worke. Which thing some of the wiser sort of the citizens disliking, wished the Gouvernour to beware of those Asian workemen, as by them suspected. But hee presuming vpon the peace made with Amurath, and considering they were but base workemen, and no souldiers, had the lesse care of them: neuertheless (vsing their work all day) hee commanded them to lodge without the wals of the citie euery night. Amurath vnderstanding that these workemen were thus by the Gouvernour chieftained, sent for the valiant capitaine Chafis-Ilbeg, and requested him with thirtie other good souldiers disguised as poore laborers to go to DIDYMOTICHUM to seeke for worke, and in doing thereof to espie if any oportunitie might be found for the surprising of the citie. Chafis with these thirtie according to Amurath his direction, comming as poore men lacking worke, found entertainment at DIDYMOTICHUM, where they caried stones, mortar, and such like things, euer shewing themselves verie diligent in their worke: Chafis with vigilant eye still awaying what might best serue his turne for the surprising of the citie. When night was come, the Turkish workemen and labourers after their accustomed manner, and as they were by the gouernour appointed, went out of the citie into the suburbs to their lodgings: from whence Chafis secretly departing in the night, came to Amurath and shewed him how one of the gates of the citie might vpon the sudden be taken, if it would please him to place a sufficient number of Turkes in ambush neere vnto the citie, to joyne with him and the other Turkish labourers when occasion should serue. Which being resolved vpon, Amurath sent him backe againe to put this his deuise in execution: so Chafis returning to DIDYMOTICHUM brake the matter to so many of the Asian workemen as hee thought conuenient, fully instructing them what was to be done. The next day (according to his appointment) the Christians being then at dinner, these Turkish workemen and labourers fell at wordes among themselves, and from wordes to sayned blowes: in which counterfait brawle & tumult, they suddenly ran to one of the gates of the citie fast by (as was before appointed) and there laying hands vpon the warders weapons, as if it had bene to defend themselves against their fellowes, suddenly set vpon those warders, being in number but few, and then at dinner also, and so presently slew them: which done, they opened the gate of the citie, and let in the other Turkes which lay in wait not farre off: who with great celeritie entering the citie, presently took the same, and there put the cheefest of the citizens to the sword, sparing the rest of the meaner sort.

Rhodes was surprised by the Turke.

The citie of RHODESTUM (of the old writers called RHODESTUM) was by Amurath his commaundement, in this time of peace, by sudden assault giuen in the night by the lord Eurenos, taken also.

With this foule dealing and breach of league, yet in force, the Christians hardly charged Amurath, who turned it ouer to the vtmost of his captaines and men of warre, whom he threatened with great seueritie to punish: and to giue the better colour that it was done without his prouocitie, hee had fained himselfe sicke all the while these things were in doing. But being requested to restore these cities so wrongfully taken fro the Christians, hee utterly refused so to do, saying, That it was against the law of his great prophet Mahomet, to deliuer againe vnto the Christians, any towne or citie wherein the Mahometan religion had ben once openly taught. Wherevpon warre began againe to arise on fresh betwixt the Christians and him, wherein sometime the one preuailed, and sometime the other: in such sort as that those warres at length became vnto them both verie tedious. Wherefore Amurath made peace againe with the Christians of HADRIANOPLE, SELYERIA, and CONSTANTINOPLE: yet desiring nothing more in heart, than to take the citie of HADRIANOPLE: which the better to bring to passe, hee caused Chafis-Ilbeg as a discontented capitaine to flye to HADRIANOPLE, pretending himselfe to haue been hardly vsed by the tyrant his master: where hauing in his companie other such dissembling fugitiues as was himselfe, hee oftentimes issued out of the citie and valiantly skirmished with the Turkes: which so greatly pleased the gouernour of HADRIANOPLE, that he thereby grew into his great fauour. Many other Turkes also vnder pretence of like discontentment, resorted vnto Chafis: where with finding himselfe well strengthened, hee writ letters secretly vnto Amurath, That he would deliuer one of the gates of HADRIANOPLE vnto him at a certaine appointed time, if he would against the same time be ready to send him present succors. All things being agreed vpon, Chafis at the appointed time came in the dawning of the day to one of the gates of the citie, accompanied but with ten of his followers, as if he would haue gone forth to hunt, as he had before accustomed. But so soone as the gates were opened, hee with the other ten well appointed for the purpose, furiously set vpon the warders, whom they slew; and being aided by the rest of the fugitiue Turkes (which with all speed by appointment before made, resorted vnto them) they possessed the gate; vntill a great power of the Turkes, whom Amurath the night before had placed in ambush neere vnto the citie, hauing knowledge what was done, and hearing the alarme, speedily came on, and by that gate entered the citie: where was fought a cruell fight all that day, euen from morning vntill night. But in the end the Turkes preuailed, tooke the citie, which they haue euer since possessed vnto this day.

These great cities of THRACIA thus take, or otherwise as aforesaid (for that I leaue for the Reader to thinke of as he pleaseth) Amurath appointed the seat of his royall Court at HADRIANOPLE, as a place of all others most fit for the further inuasion of the Christians, and enlarging of his kingdom in EUROPE: from whence such a world of mischiefs & woe hath since that time ouerflowed a great part of Christendome & drowned so many goodly kingdoms in EUROPE, as that both they, and most part of the rest that yet remaine (dayly in dread of like destruction) might iustly accuse and detest the wofull carelesse and degenerate cowardise of the Greekes, were not they themselves together with the glorie of their church and empire, swallowed vp in the same gulfe of calamitie and woe, and so become of all others most miserable: but what auaille vaine complaints, but to encrease old griefes: wherefore againe to that we haue in hand.

The prowd Sultan Amurath (hauing to his great content thus seated himselfe at HADRIANOPLE, in the middest of THRACIA) presently sent out his tutor Lala Schahin with a great power to inuade the countrey about PHILIPPOPOLIS with the countrey of ZAGORA, which lyeth towards the great mountain Hæmus, where the best Turkish Scimitars were made; giuing like charge vnto Eurenos, for the subduing of the territorie of IPSALA: who both notably performed what hee had commaunded, and in short time brought all those countreys vnder his subjection, wherein hee shortly after placed diuers sanzacks or gouernours, for the better assurance thereof being so lately gayned.

About this time (by the suggestion of Cara Rustemes a doctor of the Mahometan law) Zinderlu Chelil, then Cadilether or chiefe Iustice amongst the Turkes, but afterwards better knowne by the name of Carradin Bassa, by the commaundement of Amurath, tooke order that euery fifth captiue of the Christians, being about fifteen yeeres old, should bee taken vp for the king, as by law due vnto him: and if the number were vnder fiue, then to pay vnto the king for euery head 25 aspers, by way of tribute: appointing officers for collecting both of such captiues and tribute mony, of whom the aforesaid Cara Rustemes himselfe was chiefe, as first deuiler of the matter. By which meanes great numbers of Christian youths were brought to the court as the kings captiues, which by the counsell of the same Zinderlu Chelil, were distributed amongst the Turkish husbandmen in ASIA, there to learne the Turkish language, religion, and maners: where after they had been brought vp in all painefull labour and trauaile by the space of two or three yeeres, they were called vnto the court, and choise made of the better sort of them to attend vpon the person of the prince, or to serue him in his warres: where they dayly practising all feats of achuie, are called by the name of Ianizars (that is to say, new souldiers.) This was the first beginning of the Ianizars vnder this Sultan Amurath the first, but had great encrease vnder Amurath the second, in so much that Iouius with some other Historiographers, attribute the beginning of this order vnto him: which neuertheless (as appeareth by the Turkes owne histories) had the beginning as is aforesaid: and hath euer since been continued by the Turkish kings and emperors, by the same and some other greater meanes: so that in processe of time they be grown to that greatness as that they are oftentimes right dreadful vnto the great Turke himselfe: after whose death, they haue sometimes preferred to the empire such of the emperours sonnes as they best liked, without respect of prerogative of age, contrarie to the will of the great Sultan himselfe: and are at this day the

the greatest strength of the Turkish empire, and not vnlike in time to be the greatest cause of the ruine thereof: the finger of the highest oftentimes (as wee haue before said) turning euē those helps which were by mans wisdome provided for the establishing of kingdoms, vnto their more speedie destruction; and especially these continuall garisons of martiall men, no lesse to be feared than trusted, as in the course of this historie may appeare.

When Amurath had thus a great while continued at HADRIANOPL, determining now to returne vnto ASIA, he made Schahin his tutor Beg-Lerbeg or viceroy of ROMANIA; and Eurenoses lord gouernour of the marches; Zinderlus Chelil hee made Vezir Azemes or lord president of his counsell, and changing his name called him Cairadin Bassa, that is to say, The Bassa that had well deserued, his name witnessing his good desert. After this hee returned into ASIA, where he spent that winter at PRUSA. These two great men Cairadin Bassa & Cara Rustemes before named, sometimes two doctors of the Mahometan law, were (as the Turkish histories report) the first that corrupted the Turkish court with couetousnesse and briberie, and are therefore of them euē yet much blamed.

Whilst Amurath thus wintered in ASIA, news was brought vnto him, That the Christians of SERVIA and BULGARIA had gathered a great armie for the besieging of HADRIANOPL: which caused him to prepare great forces in ASIA, to aid his captaines in EUROPE. But in returning out of ASIA, hee by the way tooke the towne of BOGA; where hee put to sword all the Christians that were therein able to beare armes, leading the rest into captiuitie, and with the spoile rewarded his souldiours. This strong towne was not long after againe recovered by the Christians, who required the Turks with like measure, and doubting the keeping thereof, raised it downe to the ground: yet was it afterwards reedified by the Turks, as it is at this present to be seene: which was done in the yeare of our Lord 1365.

In the meane time, the Christian armie of SERVIA and BULGARIA, in number berwixt forty and fiftie thousand, marching towards HADRIANOPL, and now come very neere the same, fell in mutinie among themselves. Whereof the Turks by their espials hauing intelligence, suddenly in the night set vpon them: who blinded with inward hatred, and no lesse fearing one another, than their enemies, neglected to joyne their forces against them, but were readie to turn their weapons one vpon another; and so by their owne discord, more than by the enemies force, were made a prey vnto the Turks, by who they were put to flight, & slain, with so great a slaughter, that the place wherein they fell, not far frō GERMIA, is thereof at this day called Zirf Zindugi, that is to say, the place wherein the Seruians were ouerthrowne. The news of this so notable victorie, with the list part of the spoile, & a great number of the heads of the slaine Christians, were (after the barbarous manner of the Turks) sent to Amurath into ASIA, being now readie with a great power to haue come ouer CALIFOLIS: who joyfull thereof, & glad to see such a present, the assured witness of the victorie, returned againe to PRUSA. This was done in the yeare 1366. In which yeare also Amurath with wonderfull triumph circumsified his two sonnes, Baiazet, and Iacup. At which time he also built a temple, with a monasterie, and a colledge, at BILRUGA: and another faire church at NEAPOLIS: at PRUSA he also built a stately pallace in the castle, with a great church at the gates thereof: in which citie he also founded an abbey and a colledge.

German Oghli, a great Mahometane prince in ASIA (whose territorie for the most part lay in the greater PHRYGIA, and the countries thereabout, bordering vpon the Orthoman kingdome) hauing alwaies enuied at the rising of the Orthoman kings (as did all the rest of the Mahometane princes of the Selzuchian familie) and fearing that their greatnesse might after his death grow dangerous vnto his sonne Iacup, being now himselfe very aged; thought good for the more safetie of his state, to joyne in alliance with Amurath. And for that purpose sent Isaach (a learned doctor of the Mahometane law) embassadour vnto him, with many rich presents, and to offer his daughter, the ladie Hatum, in marriage vnto his sonne Baiazet: promising with her in dowrie diuers great cities and townes, with their territorie in PHRYGIA and BITHYNIA, adjoining vpon the Orthoman kingdome; namely CUTATE, SIMAU, ELEGROS, TAUSANIE, and others. Neither was this a small dowrie, but well becomming so great a prince: the citie of CUTATE being at this day the place whereat the Turkish emperours great lieutenant or viceroy in ASIA, is alwaies resident, as in the heart of his kingdome in the lesser ASIA. Of which match so offered, Amurath liking well, contracted his sonne Baiazet vnto the said ladie: and for solemnization of the marriage, prepared all things with great magnificence, sending his embassadours to most of the Mahome-tane kings and princes, both farre and neere, to inuite them thereunto: commaunding also most of the nobilitie of his kingdome, to honour the same with their presence. The time of this marriage drawing neere, embassadours came to Amurath his court, from all the princes before inuited: amongst whom the embassadour from the Egyptian Sultan had the highest place. These embassadours brought with them many great and rich gifts, such as well becomming the great princes their masters, which they with all reuerence presented vnto Amurath. At length amongst the rest of his owne nobilitie came the lord Eurenoses, whom he had before left gouernour of the frontiers of his kingdome in EUROPE: who besides many other rich gifts, not easily to be valued, presented vnto Amurath an hundred goodly boyes, with as many beautifull yong maidens, all Christian captiues, suitably attired in garments richly embrodered with gold and siluer, euē one of them carrying a cup of gold in the one hand, and a cup of siluer in the other; the cups of gold hauing in them diuers precious stones of great value, and the cups of siluer being filled with gold. The richnesse of this present was so great, that all the embassadours of the forraigne princes much wondered thereat. All which rich gift, Amurath most bountifullly bestowed vpon the strange embassadours: and the presents which were sent vnto him from other princes, he liberally gaue to Eurenoses. The learned and religious which came to that marriage, hee so bountifullly rewarded also, that none came to the same poore, but he went away rich. He had before sent diuers of his nobilitie, with an hundred ladies and gentlemen, and a guard of three thousand horsemen, to attend the comming of the bride. On the other side, the old prince German Oghli meeting this honourable companie vpon the way, saluted euery man of account, according to his degree: and bringing them to one of his cities, in most royall manner feasted them, bestowing vpon them many rich and princely gifts: all which things with great solemnitie performed, he deliuered his daughter the bride to two of the most ancient ladies, whereof the one had bene Baiazet his nurse; and so taking leaue of his daughter, sent her away, accompanied with his wife Iehses, and other of his courtiers: who conueying her to PRUSA, she was there in most roiall manner married to Baiazet. The cities and townes promised in dowrie, were accordingly deliuered into the possession of Amurath, who shortly after tooke possession of the same, and furnished them with his owne garrisons.

At this marriage Chusen Beg, prince of AMISUM in GALATIA, by his embassadour sold his territorie of AMISUM vnto Amurath, with many faire cities and townes: doubting as it was thought, how to be able to keep them, now that Amurath was come so neere him, whom he saw not to let slip any occasion offered vnto him for the enlarging of his kingdome. When Amurath had in this sort spent great time in ASIA, hee gathered a strong armie to returne into EUROPE: but before his departure, he committed the gouernment of his kingdome in ASIA (which the Turks call ANATOLIA) vnto his sonne Baiazet, joyning with him Temurtas: a valiant man of great experience: and hauing set all things in order in ASIA, passed ouer HELLESPOINT to CALIFOLIS, from whence hee marched towards HADRIANOPL; and because hee would take some thing in his way, he besieged MAGALARA, which hee in short time woon: where Lala Schahin and Eurenoses with all their forces came to him: which two captaines he sent to besiege the citie PHERR, which was by them after a few dayes siege taken. But he himselfe to bee reuenged vpon Lazarus the Despot, led his armie into SERVIA: where after hee had without resistance forraged the countrey foureteene daies, vnderstanding by his captaines, that the strong citie of NISSA, being the metropolitane citie of SERVIA, was as it were the key of that kingdome, he presently marched thither, and laid siege to the same, and by the aduice of Saxis Beg, the sonne of Temurtas, in short time woon it. Which thing so daunted Lazarus, Despot or lord of SERVIA, that he despairing in his owne forces, hauing so soone lost one of his strongest cities, forthwith sent embassadours to Amurath, to entreat a peace: offering to pay him a yearly tribute of fiftie thousand pounds, and to aid him with a thousand men in his wars, whensoever he should require: vpon which conditions Amurath graunted him peace, and so departed out of SERVIA. In this expedition he also with much ado woon the great citie of APOLONIA, neere vnto the mount ATHOS, and gaue leaue vnto most of the Christians with their wiues and children to depart, and such part of their goods as was not in the taking thereof spoiled by the souldiours. This done, he returned backe to HADRIANOPL, leauing Eurenoses vpon the marches, who shortly after tooke BERRHEA, with diuers other townes. At which time also, Lala Schahin woon ZICHNE and SERES, in the confines of MACEDONIA, with many other strong townes upon the frontiers of Thessalia and Thrace. In the citie Seres Eurenoses made his abode as in a cheefe frontier towne: and because the Christians for feare of the Turks were all fled out of the country about Seres, great numbers of people were sent for out of Asia, to inhabit that country by the Christians forsaken in the confines of Macedonia. Amurath had not long continued at Hadrinople, but that he was aduertised out of Asia, that Aladin his sonne in law, king of Caramania, did with fire and sword invade his dominions in Asia: with which newes he was exceedingly troubled. And for that cause sending for his counsaillors and nobilitie to the court, told them, how that Aladin forgetting all the bonds of religion, faith, peace, and alliance, with all hostilitie invaded his prouinces in Asia, whilest he with the great danger of his person, and greater terror of his enemies, fought with honour the encrease of the Mahometane sincere religion (as he termed it) in Europe: from which godly warres (said hee) I am against my will enforced to turne my sword, in just defence of my selfe, against men joyned with vs both in religion & alliance. And hauing thus declared his mind, he appointed Chairadin Bassa his lieutenant generall in Europe, and also made his sonne Alis Bassa, one of his counsaile, although he were by some thought too young for so great a place. And so hauing set all things in order according to his mind in Europe, tooke passage from Callipolis into Asia, and so to his court at Pruasa, where he spent that winter. In which time embassadours came vnto him fro the Sultan of Egypt, for the renewing of their former amitie and friendship, which Amurath tooke very thankfully, and sent them backe againe laden with kind letters and princely rewards.

When the Spring was come in the year 1387, he leuiued a mightie armie to make war vpon the Caramanian king, his sonne in law. Whereof Aladin certainly informed, prepared no lesse power to meet him, associating vnto him all the other lesse Mahometane princes of Asia, which were not vnder Amurath his obeisance, to whom the Othoman kings were now growne terrible; which princes brought with them great supplies to joyne with Aladin.

Aladin thus aided by his friends, thinking himselfe now strong ynough for Amurath his father in law, sent an embassadour vnto him, certifying him, That he was nothing in power inferior to him, and therefore did nothing feare him: yet if it pleased him to haue peace, that hee could for his part be content to hearken vnto the same vpon reasonable conditions: but if hee had rather haue warre, he should find him readie to dare him battaile in the field, whensoever hee should come. For answer of which embassage, Amurath willed the embassadour to tell the perjured king his master, That he had of late contrarie to his faith before giuen, in most cruell manner invaded his dominions, whilest he was busied in most godly warres (as hee termed it) against the misbeleuing Christians: from prosecuting whereof, hee was by his violence (as hee said) withdrawn, contrarie to the law of their great prophet: for which outrages and wrongs, hee would shortly come and take of him sharpe reuenge; and that therefore hee was to expect nothing at his hands but warre, for which he willed him so to prouide, as that at his coming he might not find him wanting to himselfe. Aladin by his embassadour hauing received this answer from Amurath, assembled all the confederate princes, his allies, with great persuasions and greater promises encouraging them to this warre: and they againe kissing the ground at his feet, as the manner of that nation is before great princes, promised with solemne oaths neuer to forsake him, but to doe all things which princes desirous of honour and fame, ought by their oath to doe for their soueraigne, to whom they ought homage and dutie.

Chairadin Bassa.

In this great preparation for wars in Asia, Chairadin Bassa, generall gouernor in Europe directed: which Amurath vnderstanding, appointed Alis Bassa his sonne to goe into Europe, there to be gouernor in his fathers stead. But he was staied in his journey by vrgent occasions, which Amurath vnderstanding, sent for him backe againe in post.

Aladin foreseeing the great dangers like to ensue of this warre, sent another embassadour to Amurath, with reasonable conditions of peace: to whom Amurath answered; That if Aladin had made that offer one moneth before, hee would perhaps haue accepted thereof: but for so much as he had done him great wrong, and that hee had now to his infinite charge drawne him into the field so farre from home, hee would not make any other end, than such as the chance of warre should appoint: And whereas he in disgrace had called me a heardsman or shepheard (said he) if he be not such a one himselfe, as he saith me to be, let him meet me in the field, and there trie his valour. Hereunto the embassadour replied, saying, That the king his master made this offer of peace not for any feare, but to saue the effusion of innocent blood; which consideration set apart, he should find him not inferior to himselfe, either in number of most expert souldiours, or other warlike prouision: and that therefore, if he rejected this offer of peace, hee needed not to doubt but to meet with men of courage, which would beate themselves so valiantly in the field against his Turks, as that he should haue no great cause to reioice of his comming thither. Which words of the embassadour so needed Amurath, that in great rage he commaunded him to depart, and to will his master, if hee were a man of such courage and valour as he said, to shew himselfe in the field with all his forces, there to make an end of all quarrels: where hee doubted not but in short time to chastise him according to his due deserts. So after the embassadour was departed, marching forward three daies, Alis Beg came vnto him, of whose comming hee not a little rejoyced: for why, he loued him deere, and although he was yet of yeares but young, relied much vpon his counsaile.

The Embassadour returning, recounted vnto Aladin all that Amurath had said, not omitting his hard speeches and proud threats, and how that hee hoped shortly to take from him Icönium and Larenda (the principall cities of Caramania) with many things more, leauing nothing vtold. Which Aladin hearing, said vnto the confederate princes that were with him, Venitie Amurath threatneth to take from vs our cities of Icönium and Larenda, but let him take heed that we take not from him his faire citie of Pruasa. Then demanding of the embassadour, of what strength Amurath might be? It was answered by him, that he deemed him to be about seuentie thousand strong. Whereat Aladin not a little rejoycing said: Assuredly when hee shall see our armie, he will not dare to giue vs battaile; or if he do, he shall fight vpon great disadvantage, his men being both fewer in number than we, and sore wearied with long and painefull trauaile.

In the meane time Amurath held on his way towards Caramania, daily encouraging his souldiours with persuasions and gifts bountifullly bestowed vpon them, filling their heads with promises of greater, the warres once happily ended. At length he came to the great plaines in Caramania called the French plains, because in former time the Christians (whom the Turks for most part call Franks) in those places encamped their great armies, as they went to the winning of Ierusalem (as in the former part of this historie is declared:) into these plaines also came Aladin with his armie, and was now encamped within one daies march of Amurath, and so rested that night.

The next morning Amurath put his armie in order of battaile, appointing the leading of the right wing, to his youngest sonne Iacup, with whom he joyned Cutluces Beg, Eine Beg, Subbassa, Egridum Subbassa, Seraç, and Custendil, two Christian princes; all capitaines of great experience: the left wing was led by Baiazer his eldest sonne, with Ferize and Horç, both valiant capitaines: in which wings were also placed the Christian souldiours sent by Lazarus out of Serua, according to the late conuention of peace: in the maine battell he stood himselfe: the vauntgard was conducted by Temurtases; and the reareward by the Subbassa of Oxylihus (called also Temurtases) and Achmetes. Aladin on the other side, with no lesse care and diligence set his men likewise in order of battaile, placing himselfe in the maine battaile as did Amurath; and the princes his Allies, with his other expert capitaines, some in the right wing and some in the left, as he thought most conuenient: in such sort, as that in all mens iudgement he was in force nothing inferior to his father in law.

These great enemies thus ranged, with ensignes dislaid came on couragiously, one directly vpon the other: where approaching together, the confused noise of trumpets, drummes, fifes, with other instruments of warre, the neighing of horses, and clattering of armour, was so great, that whilst warlike minds thereat rejoyced, cowards thought heauen fell. But the signe of battaile on both sides giuen, Samagaç, one of the confederate princes, with exceeding courage first charged Temurtases in the vauntguard, and broke his rankes: at which time Teberruses, a Tartar prince, and Varsacides, another of the confederats, deliuered their arrowes also vpon the vauntguard, as if it had been a shower of haile. Which Baiazer seeing, and how hardly Temurtases was charged, hauing before obtained leaue of his father, brake in vpon the enemy with such violence, as if it had been the lightening: whereof he was euer after surnamed Gilderun, which is to say, the Lightening. Ferizes and Horç, with the other valiant capitaines in that wing, following Baiazer, with inuincible courage entered the battaile; where for a great space was made a most dreadfull and doubtfull fight. A man would haue thought two wrought seas had met together, swaying one against the other, doubtfull which way the current would at length fall. In this conflict many thousands were on both sides slain, so that the field lay covered with the dead bodies of worthe men and valiant souldiours: yet at length these confederate princes, finding themselves ouermatched by Baiaſet and his souldiours, referuſing themſelues to their better fortunes; turned their backs and fled: when Aladin ſeeing a great part of his armie thus ouerthrowne; and himſelfe now ready to be charged with Amurath his whole power, deſpairing of victorie, ſped himſelfe in all haſt to Icönium, his ſtrong citie. The ſpoile which Amurath got in this battell was great, moſt part whereof he gaue in reward to Temortaſes and his ſouldiours, which had endured the greateſt furie of that battaile. Amurath after this victorie with all ſpeed marched to Icönium, and there beſieged Aladin the Caramanian king, in his ſtrongest citie, giuing out proclamation in the mean time, That none of his ſouldiours vpon paine of death ſhould vie any violence to any of the countrey people, or take any thing from them: to the intent it might appeare vnto the world, that he made that warre againſt that Mahometan king, rather to propulſe injurie and wrong, than for deſire of ſoueraigntie or ſpoile. Which his ſo ſtraight a proclamation, the Chriſtians ſent by Lazarus, amongſt others, tranſgreſſed; and therefore by his commandement ſuffred (many of them) exemplarie puniſhment: which was the cauſe of the Seruian war which not long after enſued, ſatall both vnto Amurath and Lazarus the Deſpot, as hereafter ſhall appeare.

Aladin now on euerie ſide beſieged in Icönium, and without all hope of eſcape, ſent vnto the queene his wife, Amuraths daughter, bewailing vnto her his deſperat eſtate, and requeſting her by all the loue that ſo honourable a minded ladie might beare to her miſerable huſband, to aduerture her ſelfe to goe to her angrie father, and to craue pardon for his great treſpaſſe and offence. The queene forthwith attiring her ſelfe, as was fitteſt for her huſbands preſent eſtate, came vnto her father: where falling downe at his feet vpon her knees, with wordes wiſely placed, and teares diſtilling downe her faire cheeks from her fairer eyes, as if it had been from two fountaines; in moſt ſorrowfull manner, craued her huſbands pardon, imputing vnto the heat of youth what ſoouer he had done; and would not be comforted or taken vp, vntill ſhe had obtained grace.

Amurath moſt entirely loued this his daughter; and therefore for her ſake not onely graunted vnto her, her huſbands life (which in ſhort time was like to haue been in his power to haue ſpilt) but alſo his kingdom, which he as a victorious conquerour might by law of armes haue of right detained. She now aſſured of her fathers promiſe, ſent vnto her huſband Aladin, willing him the next day without feare to come out of the citie, and in humble ſort to acknowledge his fault before her father. VVho the next morning accordingly came out, and proſtrating himſelfe before Amurath, acknowledged his vndutifulnes: of whom (for his wiues ſake) he obtained pardon, and reſtitution to his kingdom, with many other great gifts, contrarie to his euil deſert. The Latine hiſtories miſtaking the man, report that this Caramanian warre, to haue been fought againſt the king of CARAMANIA, Amurath his owne grandfather by the mothers ſide; and that he was by Amurath then ſpoiled of a great part of his kingdom: but it agreeth not with the Turkiſh hiſtories, which make Amurath to be the ſonne of Orchanes and Luluſer, the daughter of the gouernour of the caſtle of IARCHISER, as is before declared in the life of Othoman; which Luluſer lieth buried by her huſband Orchanes, in PRUSA.

This great victorie gotten by Amurath againſt the Caramanian king, and the other confederat princes, was the true beginning of the greatneſſe of the Othoman kingdom in ASIA: wherewith the other Mahometan princes of the Seſſuccian family were ſo diſcouraged, that they were glad to ſubmit themſelues thus firſt vnto Amurath, and after that vnto his ſonne Baiaſet: vntill that Tamerlan the great Tartarian prince, ſome few yeares after, taking Baiaſet priſoner in a great battaile at mount SEBLA, abated the Othoman pride, and reſtored the other oppreſſed Mahometan princes to their old poſſeſſions and kingdoms.

Amurath returning homewards, by the way tooke the citie of DESPOTOLIS, and coming to CUTAT brake vp his armie, and ſo in triumph returned to his court at PRUSA.

Lazarus, Deſpot of SERBIA (in old time called MYSIA) had ſent a thouſand armed men to Amurath in this the late Caramanian warre, according to the conuention of the peace not long before made betwixt them: ſome of which ſouldiours, were with great ſeueritie (to the terror of others) executed in CARAMANIA, for tranſgreſſing Amurath his commandement. This great warre being ended, and the armie broken vp at CUTAT, they with others were licenſed to depart into into their own countrey. VVhoſe Generall (whom they call the Vayuod) returning home reported vnto Lazarus the Deſpot, the ſucceſſe of that war, and withall in what cruell and tyrannicall manner the men he had ſent were in that ſeruiſe vſed by the commandement of Amurath. VVith whom (ſaid this Generall) you without cauſe haue made a moſt diſhonourable peace: firſt by giuing your faith to ſuch a miſcreant, and then in ſending your loyall ſubiect in recompence of their good ſeruiſe, to be ſo butchered at his pleaſure; beſide the ſhamefull tribute which you yearly pay vnto him. VVhereas if it would pleaſe you in the depth of your wiſedome, but to know your owne ſtrength, you ſhould find your ſelfe in warlike force and power, nothing inferior to the tyrant: for wee your ſeruants being in number but a handfull, were in theſe his late wars a terror vnto his enemies, and by our valour and not his owne, hee got the victorie ouer them. VVhat cauſe is there then, that you ſhould ſubject your ſelfe vnto your inferiour? I know he cannot of himſelfe bring into the field aboute fiftie thouſand fighting men: but admit he were able to bring a hundred thouſand, are not you (if you ſo pleaſe) able to leuie a farre greater power? and for all other warlike prouiſion, you are ten fold better prouided than hee. Beſides that, the mightie Chriſtian princes will ſend you ſuch aid againſt this hatefull and common enemy, that being vnitd with yours, his Barbarian forces will be nothing in compariſon of thoſe which you ſhall then be able to bring into the field againſt him: which no doubt the Chriſtian princes will the rather doe, as men deſirous to quench this deuouring fire, in another mans houſe rather than in their owne.

Theſe wordes of the Vayuod ſo much mocked Lazarus, that he determined in him ſelfe, to breake that ſeile league which he before had made with Amurath. And for that cauſe ſent his embaffadour with ſecret inſtructions to the king of BOSNA (in time paſt called ILLYRIA) his neighbour: whereof the cheefe point was, to craue his aid againſt the Turke their common enemy. By whom the king of BOSNA returned anſwere, That it had been much better ſuch conſideration had been thought vpon, before the foule contract (full of diſgrace both to himſelfe, and all other Chriſtian princes) was vpon a vaine feare, by him raſhly made with the Turkiſh tyrant: Yet for ſo much as things done, could not bee vndone, letting that paſſe which was remedieſſe, he promiſed to joyne with him his whole forces, againſt ſo dangerous an enemy. And therevpon appointing a place for an enteruiew, met accordingly, and there fully concluded all the articles of their confederation.

There was in the confines of BOSNA a caſtle called ALEXANDRIA, the captaine whereof being a Chriſtian, was yet tributarie vnto the Turke; wiſhing vnto him ſuch good, as men oppreſſed vſe to doe to them by whom they are ſo wronged. This captaine vnder the colour of frienſhip went to Amurath, and in great ſecrecie opened vnto him the whole ſtate of the kingdom of BOSNA; and withall, that the king thereof intended ſome great matter againſt him: for preuenting whereof, he offered his owne ſeruiſe, and ſhewed ſome probable means, how that kingdom might be brought into his ſubjection, if hee would but ſend ſome wortheie Generall with a conuenient power for the vndertaking thereof. This wonderfully pleaſed the ambitious old tyrant, who therefore commaunded a rich garment to be caſt vpon the captaine (which amongſt the Turks is taken for a ſure token of the kings great fauour) and forthwith appointed his tutor Lala Schahin, according to this captains direction, to inuade the kingdom of BOSNA. Who joyning himſelfe with this deceitfull captaine of ALEXANDRIA, with an armie of twenty thouſand men entred into BOSNA; where ouerrunning a ſide of the countrey, he without reſiſtance tooke great booties: and ſeeing no apparent cauſe of feare, to doe the more harme, by the aduice of the ſame captaine, deuided his armie, which he ſent into diuers parts of the countrey, the more to burne and ſpoile the ſame. Of all whole proceedings, the king of BOSNA by ſecret meſſengers from the captaine aduertified, had in conuenient places laied ſtrong ambuſhes for the intercepting of his enemies. So that as Schahin was returning homeward with a rich bootie, hauing then with him but a thouſand men, ſuddenly appeared in his way thirtie thouſand Chriſtians well armed: which Schahin ſeeing, thinking it ſollie to oppoſe ſo few againſt ſo many, would haue preſently fled; but the reſt of the gallants that were with him, preſuming of their good fortune, and loth to looſe their rich prey, would needs firſt skirmiſh with the Chriſtians: in which deſperate conflict they were almoſt all ſlaine, and the ſpoile they had taken, all recovered by the Chriſtians. As for Schahin, he was glad by ſhamefull flight to ſaue himſelfe. The like miſhap beſell the other Turks in the other parts of BOSNA, who for the moſt part were likewiſe intercepted maine battell stood Lazarus himselfe; the Italians, Valachians, Hungarians, Bohemians, and Bulgarians, he placed in both wings. It is thought, greater armies than these two had sildome before met in EUROPE, Lazarus as the Turkish histories report (but how truly I know not) having in his armie six hundred thousand men; and Amurath scarce halfe so many.

To begin the battaile, Amurath had drawing a thousand of his best archers, vnder the leading of Malcozzens, out of the right wing of his armie; and the like number of archers out of the left, vnder the conduct of one Mustapha: which so placed on both sides of the armie, as he thought best, Eurenos a man of great experience, told Amurath, That the Christians were for the most part well and strongly armed, and shouldering close together in their charge, would be like a rock of yron, vnable to be pierced: but if in joyning the battaile, hee would a little retire, the Christians following vpon good hope, would so loose their close standing (the cheefe part of their strength) and leaue an entrance for his men. Vpon which resolution, Amurath commaunded the archers to giue the first charge: which they courageously performed. At which time, the Turks armie gaue ground a little: which the Christians perceiuing, with great force assailed the left wing of their armie, and after a hard and cruell fight put the same to flight: which Baidzet seeing, with such furie renewed the battaile, that the Turks which before as men discouraged fled in the left wing, began now to turne againe vpon their enemies; and the Christians hauing as they thought already got the victorie, were to begin a new battell. In which bloodie fight many thousands fell on both sides: the brightnesse of the armour and weapons, was as it had been the lightning: the multitude of launces and other horsemens stauies shadowed the light of the sunne: arrowes and darts fell so fast, that a man would haue thought they had powred downe from heauen, the noise of the instruments of warre, with the neighing of horses, and outcries of men was so terrible and great, that the wild beasts in the mountaines stood astonied therewith: and the Turkish histories, to expresse the terrour of the day (vainly say) that the Angels in heauen amazed with that hideous noise, for that time forgot the heavenly hymnes wherewith they alwaies glorified God: About noone time of the day, the fortune of the Turks preuailling, the Christians began to giue ground, and at length betooke themselves to plaine flight; whom the Turks with all their force pursued and slew them downe right, without number or mercie. In which battell

Lazarus slain. Lazarus the Despot himselfe was also slaine. Howbeit some histories report otherwise, as that he with his son were taken prisoner, and by and by afterwards (in reuenge of Amurath his death) cruelly slaine: other some also reporting that he died in prison. Amurath after this great victorie, with some few of his cheefe captaines taking view of the dead bodies, which without number lay on heapes in the field like mountaines; a Christian souldiour, sore wounded and all bloodie, seeing him, in staggering manner arose (as if it had been from death) out of a heape of slaine men, and making towards him, for want of strength fell downe diuers times by the way as he came, as if he had been a drunken man: at length drawing nigh vnto him, when they which guarded the kings person would haue stayed him, hee was by Amurath himselfe commaunded to come neerer: supposing, that he would haue craued his life of him. Thus this halfe dead Christian pressing neere vnto him, as if he would for honour sake haue kissed his feet, suddenly stabbed him in the bottom of his bellie with a short dagger, which he had vnder his souldiours coat: of which wound that great king and conquerour presently died. The name of this man (for his courage worthy of eternall memorie) was Miles Cobelitz: who before sore wounded, was shortly after in the presence of Baidzet cut into small peeces. The Turks in their Annales somewhat otherwise report of the death of Amurath: as that this Cobelitz, one of the Despot his seruants, in time of the battaile, comming to Amurath as a fugitive, offering him his seruice, and admitted to his presence, in humbling himselfe to haue kissed his feet (as the barbarous manner of the Turks is) stabbed him into the bellie and so slew him: being himselfe therefore shortly after (as is aforesaid) in the presence of Baidzet most cruelly hewen into small peeces. Whereupon ever since that time, the manner of the Turks hath been, and yet is, that when any embassadour or stranger is to come to kisse the Sultan his hand, or otherwise to approach his person, hee is as it were for honours sake, lead by the armes vnto his presence, betwixt two of the great courtiers: but indeed by so entangling him, to be sure that he shall not offer him the like violence, that did this Cobelitz vnto Amurath.

Thus this halfe dead Christian pressing neere vnto him, as if he would for honour sake haue kissed his feet, suddenly stabbed him in the

The dead bodie of Amurath was presently with all secrecie conueied into his tent by the Basses and captaines present at his death: whether Baidzet was also brought with an ensigne before before him, as the successeur in his fathers kingdome. His younger brother Iacup surnamed Zelebi (or the noble) yet ignorant of that had hapned, was by the great Basses sent for, as from his father: who casting no perill, but comming into his fathers tent, was there presently by them strangled, by the commaundement of Baidzet, as most histories report: howbeit the Turkes annales charge him not therewith. This was the beginning of the most vnaturall and inhumane custome, euer since holden for a most wholesome and good policie amongst the Turkish kings and emperours, in the beginning of their raigne, most cruelly to massacre their brethren and nearest kinsmen, so at once to rid themselves of all feare of their competitors.

This Amurath was in his superstition more zealous than any other of the Turkish kings; a man of great courage, and in all his attempts fortunat: he made greater slaughter of his enemies, than both his father and grandfather: his kingdome in ASIA hee greatly enlarged by the sword, marriage, and purchase: and vsing the discord and cowardise of the Grecian princes, to his profit, subdued a great part of THRACIA, called ROMANIA, with the territories thereto adjoining, leauing vnto the emperour of CONSTANTINOPLE, little or nothing more in THRACIA than the imperiall citie itselfe, with the bare name of an emperour, almost without an empire: hee was a great part of BULGARIA, and entred into SERUIA, BOSNA, and MACHEDONIA: hee was liberal, and withall seuerer: of his subjects both beloued & feared: a man of verie few words, and one that could dissemble deeply. Hee was slaine when hee was threescore eight yeares old, and had thereof reigned thirtie one, in the yeare of our Lord 1390. His dead bodie was by Baidzet conueied into ASIA, and there royally buried at PRUSA, in a faire chappell at the West end of the citie, neere vnto the Bathes there: where, vpon his tombe lieth his souldiours cloake, with a little Turkish tulipant, much differing from those great turbants which the Turkes now weare. Neere vnto the same tombe are placed three launces, with three horse tailes fastened at the vpper end of them, which he vsed as guidons in his wars: a thing in ancient time not strange. There standeth a castle with a tombe, made in remembrance of him, in the plaines of COSSOVA, where he was slaine and his entrailles buried: which giueth occasion for some to report that hee was there also himselfe entred.

Baizethes fidei pacis & impatiens.
Regni Hadrianopolim sedes sibi legit ut esset.
Possit ut Europa iungere regna sua.
Constantinopolim gemina obsidione fatigat:
Iam Græcas vana spe sibi spondet opes,
Cum Tamburlano præbet sua terga, cæternis Vincit, & in cauea probra pudenda subit.*

Proud Baiazet most false of faith, and loathing blessed peace:
His warlike troupes like lightening, to shake he doth not cease.
Of HADRIANOPLE he makes choice, for his imperiall seat,
That EUROPE kingdoms he might joyne vnto his empire great.
CONSTANTINOPLE he distrest, twice with straight siege and long:
And vainly thought to haue posselt the Græcians wealth by wrong.
But ouercome by Tamberlane, fast bound in fetters sure, Trod vnder foot, and cloas'd in cage, great shame did there indure.

THE LIFE OF BIAZET, THE FIRST OF THAT NAME, THE FOVRTH AND MOST VNFORTVNAT KING OF THE TURKES.

Biazet, or as the Turks call him, Baiafit, of his violent and fierce nature furnamed Gilderun, or lightening; succeeded his father Amurath in the Turkish kingdome, his younger brother Iacup being strangled immediately after his fathers death, as is before declared. He in the first yeare of his raig inuaded SERVIA, and there besieged CRATOVA, a citie of the Despot: whereunto the siluer mines of SERVIA (not the least cause of that warre) belonged. Which citie was yeelded vnto him, vpon condition, That the Christian inhabitants might with life and libertie depart. Who were no sooner gone out of the citie, but that by his commaundement they were all most cruelly slaine by his men of warre, for that purpose sent out after them. At this time hee also woon VSCURIA, with diuers other castles in the countrey neere vnto CRATOVA.

Biazet imitator deus Serbis,

Sigismund at the same time king of HUNGARIE (a yong prince of great hope, and brother to Venceslaus, then emperor of the West) aduertised from the Seruians his allies and confederats, of these proud proceedings of Biazet: by his embassadours sent of purpose, requested him; That as he was a iust prince, and wished to liue in quiet with his owne, to desist from doing of such open wrong, and from inuading off such countries of his friends and confederats, as he had no right in. Which embassadours so sent, Biazet detained without answer, vntill such time as he had ouertun a great part of the Despot his country, and therein done what he thought good. Then calling the said embassadours vnto him into one of the strong townes, which hee had in euery corner filled with his owne fouldiours, told them that they might there see, that his right both vnto that towne and the rest by him taken, was good enough, for as much as the vetie was acknowledged the same: and so giuing them leaue to depart, willed them so to tell their master. Which his proud answer, by the same embassadors reported vnto the yong king, no lesse troubled him, than if open warre had by them been denounced vnto him, seeing the tyrant (as should seeme) pretending right vnto whatsoeuer hee could by force get: neuerthelesse, being himselfe not yet well settled in his kingdome, and in doubt of the contrarie faction (that altogether liked not of his election into HUNGARIE for their king) he was glad at that time to put it vp, and so to hold himselfe content.

The next yeare, Biazet by Ferises Beg, tooke the citie of VIBINA, with many other strong townes and castles in SERVIA, and afterwards returned to HADRIANOPLE. But whilest that hee thus raged in EUROPE, the Caramanian king inuaded and spoiled the frontiers of his countreies in ASIA: which although he was not then at leisure, hee forgot not afterwards to reuenge to the full. At the same time Eurenos, lord gouernour of the marches of his kingdome in EUROPE towards GRÆCIA, departing from SERBS (where he then lay) tooke the citie of SERROS in THESALIA. And Ferises Beg, not content to haue taken VIBINA (as is aforesaid) passed ouer the great riuer of DANVBIUS, and greuously spoiled VALACHIA: from whence he returned loaden with a great prey. This was the first time (that I read of) that the Turkes euer passed ouer over the river DANUBIUS. At this time also Iegides Bassa entered the kingdome of BOSNIA from whence he carried a great number of captiues to HADRIANOPLE, where Baiazet spent that Winter.

In the beginning of the next Spring Baiazet passed ouer HELLESPOINTVS to PRUSA, where he built a faire Mahometane temple, with a colledge, and an almes-house: which works finished, he returned againe into EUROPE, and built a monasterie at HADRIANOPLE: and so returned againe into ASIA, leauing Temurtases, Begler-Beg (or his vice-roy) in HADRIANOPLE. After he was come into ASIA, he laied siege to the strong citie of PHILADELPHIA in LYDIA, which was at that time the onely citie in the lesser ASIA, yet holden by the Christians in the midst of the Mahometane princes: for now was the Greeke emperour by the Othoman kings and the other Turkes quite driuen out of the lesser ASIA. In the beginning of this siege, Baiazet gaue straight commaundement to his souldjors, That they should not spoile or hurt any thing in the country belonging to the citizens: hoping by such faigned courtesie to make them the more willing to yeeld themselves vnto his obedience. But disappointed of his expectation, and finding them resolu'd to hold it out vnto the last, he forthwith gaue out contrarie commaundement not to spare any thing they could waite or destroy: which was accordingly by his greedie souldiours performed. After long siege, the citizens seeing the country about them vterly wasted, & themselves vnable longer to indure, and out of all hope of releefe, yeelded their citie vnto the pleasure of Baiazet. It is written by some, that this famous citie was not besieged without the consent of the emperour of CONSTANTINOPLE: and that the Greekes themselves, mooued with enuie to see that citie so long hold out, did helpe the Turks in the winning thereof.

In time of this siege Aiden Oglu prince of CARIA, a Mahometane, came to Baiazet, and yeelded himselfe into his power as his vassale: vnto whom Baiazet restored certain places which he had in this expedition a little before taken from him: yet vpon such condition, as that hee should not from that time coine any money in his owne name, either be remembered in publicke prayers as a prince in their Mahometane temples, as he had before been: but that all such things should be done in the name of Baiazet, as his dread lord and soueraigne. With which disgrace the poore prince was glad to content himselfe, and to liue as his vassale. From PHILADELPHIA he led his armie into the country of SARUCHANIA, in ancient time called IONIA MARITIMA, which he subdued vnto himselfe vpon like conditions. After that he passed farther, to MENTESIA, or MENTZ, sometime called MYNDOS in CARIA: the prince whereof for feare fled to Cutrun Baiazet, prince of CASTAMONA and part of PONTVS, leauing his country to the pleasure of the tyrant. And for as much as the young king of CARAMANIA had inuaded his countries whilst he was busied in EUROPE, Baiazet in reuenge thereof entred with his armie into CARAMANIA, and tooke CESARIA, with diuers other places there: so that the yong king discouraged with the losse of his towns, and fearing Baiazet his greatnesse, was glad to hold himselfe content with his losse, and to make peace with him as it pleased him to graunt it. As Baiazet was making this expedition into CARAMANIA, another yong Mahometane prince, the sonne of prince Germian, came vnto him with one of his cheefe counsellors, and were both by him sent prisoners ouer the strait to the castle of IPSALA, where they lay in durance many yeares after. Thus Baiazet hauing oppressed and wronged most of the Mahometane princes, the successours of Sultan Aladin in the lesser ASIA, at last returned againe himselfe in triumph to PRUSA.

The prince of MENTESIA, who for feare of Baiazet was fled out of his country, as is aforesaid, had now incited Cutrun Baiazet, prince of CASTAMONA, with a great power to inuade that side of Baiazet his kingdome which bordered vpon him. Which Baiazet vnderstanding, gathered a great armie to goe against this Mahometane prince. At which very time the Vayvod of VALACHIA, hearing of Baiazet his troubles in ASIA, with a strong armie passed ouer DANUBIUS into those parts of SERBIA and BULGARIA that were by the Turks as then possessed; where he spoiled the country, and slew great numbers of the Turkes, making Mahometane saints and martyrs by heapes: for so the Turks account all them whom the Christians kill in their warre: which done, hee retired backe againe into VALACHIA, carrying with him also many of the Turks prisoners. Baiazet thus at once inuaded both in ASIA and EUROPE, deferred his warres purposed against the prince of PONTVS, vntill a more conuenient time, conuerting his forces against the Valachians. Wherefore passing ouer the strait to HADRIANOPLE, he sent his armie from thence to NICOPOLIS, and there passing the river of Danubius, entered into VALACHIA, burning and spoiling the countrey before him as he went. Where the Vayvod to repress his furie, met him in the field, and gaue him battaile, but was therein ouerthrowne and many of his people slaine; so that at last he was glad to sue for peace, which he obtained, by submitting himselfe to Baiazet, and yeelding to pay him a yearely tribute.

Whilst Baiazet was thus busied in VALACHIA, newes was brought vnto him that the Christians of the West with a fleet of gallies did great harm alongst the coasts of his dominions in ASIA. In reuenge whereof he entred with his armie into THESSALIE, destroying all the countrey vnto THESSALONICA: in which expedition he took the citie of NEAPOLIS in GREECE, and IOANNINAIN Aetolia, and after that returned into ASIA where he spent that Winter.

In the beginning of the next Spring, hee with a great power passed the strait of CALLIPOLIS to HADRIANOPLE, intending to haue inuaded HUNGARIE. But as he was vpon the waie, it chanced that a Constantinopolitan spie was by the Turkes intercepted, with letters from the Greeke emperour to the king of HUNGARIE, giuing him warning both of the Turks preparation and comming. By which spie Baiazet also vnderstood of another messenger before sent into HUNGARIE, for like purpose. Whereupon Temurtases (then his great lieutenant in EUROPE) perswaded him to desist from his intended warres in HUNGARIE, and to besiege the imperial citie of CONSTANTINOPLE, as a thing of more honour and lesse danger; the citie being already (as he said, and as in truth it was) surrounded with the Turkish provinces: bringing in PHILADELPHIA (but a few yeares before woon) for example of the like exploit. Of whose counsaile Baiazet liking well, returned with his armie, and shortly after came and sat downe therewith before CONSTANTINOPLE: laying hard siege thereunto, first by land and after by sea, with his gallies sent from CALLIPOLIS. Which hard siege continued (as most histories report) the space of eight yeares: in which long time, hee draue the emperour Emanuel Palaeologus to that straight, that he was glad to leaue his citie, and himselfe in person to craue aid of Wenceslaus the Germane emperour, and Charles the sixt the French king, and other Christian princes also. At which time the citizens were at length brought to such extremitie, that they were euen at the point to haue yeelded vp the citie: and happily had so done, had not Sigismund king of HUNGARIE (assisted with a great armie of the French and other voluntarie Christians, almost out of euery part of Christendome, to the number of an hundredth and thirtie thousand, vnder the leading of Iohn, countie of NIVERS, & after duke of BURGUNDIE) for the releefe of the besieged emperour, passed ouer Danubius into the Turkish dominions; and there hauing recovered VINDINA, with certaine other strong holds in BULGARIA, laied siege to NICOPOLIS: out of which citie the Turks oftentimes sallied, and gaue him many an hot skirmish. It is reported that the young king Sigismund beholding the greatnesse of his armie, in his great iolitic hearing of the comming of the Turkes, should proudly say: What need wee to feare the Turke, who need not at all to feare the falling of the heauens; which if they should fall, yet were we able with our speares and halberts to hold them up for falling vpon vs. But Baiazet vnderstanding what spoile the Hungarian king had made in his late gained countries, and of the siege of NICOPOLIS; commaunded the ladders and other great prouision now in readinesse for the skaling and assaulting of the citie of CONSTANTINOPLE to be burnt: because they should not come into the hands of the Christians: and so raising his siege, marched with a right puissant armie to NICOPOLIS, sending Eurenoses before of purpose to intercept some of the Christians, thereby to learne the state of their campe and armie. But they hearing of his comming, so well looked to themselves, that he with shame returned to his master as he came, without any one prisoner taken. Which thing much troubled Baiazet, as fearing he should haue to doe with a warie enemy. Sigismund vnderstanding of the approach of Baiazet, leauing a sufficient power for the continuing of the siege, rose himselfe, and with the rest of his armie went to meet his proud enemy. Of whose comming and approach Baiazet vnderstanding, diuided his armie into two parts: & being now come within the sight of the Christian armie, made shew but of the one halfe, keeping himselfe close in secret ambush not farre off with the other. The Christians deeming themselves (as they were) farre more in number than the Turks which they saw, deuided their armie also into two parts, purposing betwixt them to haue inclosed the Turks. Of all the Christians that were there present, the French desired to haue the honour of the first charge to be giuen vpon the Turks, and in their heat vpon good hope set forward (the Hungarians with a great part of the armie, not yet set in order) and so began the battaile: where betwixt them and the Turks was fought a right cruell fight, and in a little time many thousands slaine. But this fight had not long endured, when Baiazet with the other halfe of his armie suddenly arising, came on with such violence, as well became his surname of Gilderun or lightning; and so hardly charged the French, that they amazed at the suddenesse of the danger, and oppressed with the furie and multitude of the vnexpected enemy, stood at the first as men dismayed: but seeing no remedie, encouraging one another, valiantly fought it out vntill they were almost all either slaine or taken prisoners; still in hope to haue been releued by the Hungarians and the rest. In this hard conflict diuers of the French horsemen hauing forsaken their horses, fought on foot as their manner was: which horses running backe without their riders, vpon the Hungarians, caused them to doubt that the French were quite ouerthrowne; wherewith dismayed, they without further comming on all turned their backs and fled, in so great hast as that it bootied not the king or any other great commander to goe about to staie their flight. The French thus by their too much hast ouerthrowne, the Turks pursuing the Hungarians and the rest of the Christians, made of them a great slaughter: of whom also many were drowned in the great riuier Danubius. At which time also the Turks tooke so many prisoners, that it was thought euerie scuerall Turke had his prisoner. King Sigismund himselfe, who but a little before had despised euen the falling of the heauens, had then also vndoubtedly fallen into the enemies hands, had hee not in a little boat by good hap got ouer Danubius: not vnlike another Xerxes, who hauing couered the seas with his ships, and with a world of men passed ouer into Grecia, was afterwards by the strange change of fortune, himselfe alone in a small fisher boat glad to get backe againe into Asia. Sigismund being thus got ouer Danubius, and fearing the violence of the Hungarians for the losse of the battaile, fled by sea into Thracia vnto Constantinople; from whence he sailed vnto the Island of the Rhodes, and from thence sailing through the Aegean and Ionian sea, landed at length in Dalmatia: and so hauing wandered from place to place, tossed with many fortunes, after eightene moneths long and painefull trauaile, returned againe into Hungarie. Where hee found the state of his kingdome in his absence much troubled, the contrarie faction in the meane time hauing made choice of Ladislau king of Naples for their king; who was euen then with a great armie going to haue taken possession of the kingdome, had not Sigismund in good time by the helpe of certaine of the cheefe of the Hungarian nobilitie preuented him. In this battaile, called the battaile of Nicopolis, were of the Christians twentie thousand slaine, and of the Turkes threecore thousand. The countie of Niviers, the French kings neere kinsman, was there taken prisoner, with three hundred great commanders more: where after he had endured great contumelie and reproch in the presence of Baiazet, hee was commaunded to make choice of fise other of the captiues, such as he liked best, all the rest being presently cut in peeces before his face, and he with the other fise left aliue, sent prisoners to Prusa: from whence they were afterwards ranfomed for two hundred thousand duckats. This bloodie battaile of Nicopolis was fought in the yecre of our lord 1396.

Baiazet after this great victorie, hauing worthily releued his besieged citie, returned againe to the siege of Constantinople, laying more hardly vnto it than before, building forts and bulwarks against it on the one side towards the land: and passing ouer the strait of Bosphorus, built a strong castle vpon that strait ouer against Constantinople, to impeach so much as was possible all passage therunto by sea. This straight siege (as most write) continued also two years, which I suppose by the circumstance of the historie to haue been part of the aforesaid eight yecres. Emanuel the besieged emperor wearied with these long wars, sent an embassador to Baiazet to entreat with him a peace: which Baiazet was the more willing to hearken vnto, for that he heard news that Tamerlane the great Tartarian prince intended shortly to war vpon him. Yet could this peace not be obtained, but vpon condition that the emperor should graunt free libertie for the Turkes to dwell together in one street of Constantinople, with free exercise of their owne religion, and laws, vnder a iudge of their owne nation; and further, to pay vnto the Turkish king a yearly tribute of ten thousand duckats. Which dishonourable conditions the distressed emperor was glad to accept of. So was this long siege broken vp, and presently a great sort of Turkes with their families were sent out of Bithynia to dwell in Constantinople, and a church there built for them: which not long after was by the emperor pulled downe to the ground, and the Turkes again driuen out of the citie, at such time as Baiazet was by the mightie Tamerlane ouerthrowne and taken prisoner.

Baiazet

Baiazet in the beginning of his raigne, presently after the death of Lazarus the Despot slaine in the battaile of Cossova, wan part of Serua (as is aforesaid) the other part being still holden by Lazarus his sonne, called Stephen the Despot; who about this time sent an honourable embassadour to Baiazet with louing letters, and royall presents: by which embassadour also the old princeesse, Lazarus his widdow, offered her faire daughter Despina (Stephen his sister) a ladie of incomparable beautie, in mariage to him, if it should please him to vouchsafe his handmaid (as shee termed her) so high a place. This ladie was long before promised vnto him, whilst his father Amurath yet liued. Of this embassadour Baiazet was verie glad, but especially for the faire ladies sake: which being knowne vnto the princeesse her mother, and the Despot her brother, she was forthwith honourably sent to Baiazet, and so to him with great solemnitie and triumph shortly after married. Of all his wiues, he held her dearest, and for her sake restored vnto her brother Stephen the citie and castle of Semendre (otherwise called S. Andrevv) and Colubartum in Serua: she allured him to drinke wine, forbidden the Turkes by their law; and caused him to delight in sumptuous banquets, which his predeceffours Othoman, Orchans, and Amurath neuer vied.

As the Turkish kingdome grew in greatnesse, so corruption the canker of great states and common weales increased likewise: but especially in the men of law and iudges of his courts. Wherewith Baiazet greivously offended, commaunded diuers of the same iudges to be apprehended, determining (to the terrour of others) to haue executed them; whose dangerous estate was much pitied, and also fauoured of Alis Bassa, and other the king his great counsellours: yet for so much as Baiazet was of a furious nature, and in his anger dangerous to bee spoken vnto, none of them durst aduenture to intreat him in their behalfe; no not Alis Bassa, Charadyn Bassa his sonne, sometime iudge of Prusa, although he was a man in such speciall fauour with him that he was therfore of the comon people not only reuerenced, but as the king himselfe honored.

There was at that time in the court an Ethiopian jester, who vnder some couert pleasant jeast, would many times bolt out that to the king in his greatest heat, which his grauest counsellours durst not once speake to him of in secret: this jester, Alis Bassa requested to deuise some means to intreat with the angrie king in the behalfe of these Iudges, promising to giue him what he would reasonably desire, if he could appease the kings displeasure. The Ethiopian without feare vnderooke the matter: and presently putting vpon his head a rich hat all wrought ouer with gold after the manner of the Turkes embassadours, and fitting himselfe with other apparell better becoming an embassadour than a jester; thus attired presented himselfe before the king with a great counterfait grauitie. Whereat Baiazet maruailling, asked him the cause why he was so gaie. I haue a request vnto your maiestie, (said he) and wish to find fauour in your sight. Baiazet more desirous than before to know the matter, asked what his request was. If it stand with your pleasure (said the jester) I would faine goe as your embassadour to the emperor of Constantinople, in hope wherof, I haue put my selfe in this readinesse. To what purpose wouldst thou goe, said Baiazet? To craue of the emperor (said he) some fortie or fiftie of his old graue monkes and friers, to bring with me hether to the court. And what should they doe here, said Baiazet? I would haue them placed (said the jester) in the roomes of the old doting iudges, whom you intend (as I heare) to put to death. Why (said Baiazet) I can place others of my own people in their roomes. True (said the Ethiopian) for grauitie of looke and countenance, and so would the old monkes and friers serue as well; but not so learned in your lawes and customes of your kingdome, as are those in your displeasure. If they be learned (said Baiazet) why doe they then contrarie to their learning peruert iustice and take bribes? There is a good reason for that too, said the jester. What reason said the king? That can hee that there standeth by tell better than I (said the jester) pointing to Alis Bassa: who forthwith commaunded by Baiazet to giue the reason, with great reuerence before done, shewed that those iudges so in displeasure, were not conveniently provided for, and were therefore enforced many times for their necessarie maintenance to take rewards, to the staying of the due course of iustice. Which Baiazet vnderstanding to be true, commaunded Alis Bassa to appoint them convenient stipends for their maintenance, and forthwith graunted their pardon. Wherevpon the Bassa set downe order, That of euerie matter in suit exceeding one thousand aspers, the iudge should haue twentie aspers fee for judgement; and for euerie writing and instrument out of the court, twelue aspers: which fees they yet take in those courts at this day.

Not long after, Baiazet in his furie sent for certaine of his captaines and commaunders of his men of warre, with whom he was for some small occasion greuously offended, intending in his rage to haue put them all to death; which was with him no great matter. These captaines being brought before him, the counsellors seeing him all in choler, (at looking vpon the ground, hanging downe their heads (as the manner of the Turks is) not daring to looke him in the face, nor to speake a good word for them. When suddenly the aforesaid Æthiopian iester stept forth, earnestly requesting the king, not to shew them any fauour, but to execute them presently as villains and traitours; rayling vpon them, as if he had knowne some great fault by them. Baiazet (thinking he could haue accused them of some great crime, because of his earnestnes) asked what reason hee had so to exclaime against them. Reason (quoth the iester) because the knaues be good for nothing, and they say that Tamerlan is with a great armie comming against vs: if you will but take vp an ensigne in your hand, and I goe before you with a drum, I will strike vp such a terrible march, and you make such a dreadfull shew, that wee shall neede none of these bad fellows or their fouldiours in the field to get the victorie ouer our enemies. This conceit of the iester stricke such a melancholic imagination into Baiazet his head, that hee stood musing a great while as it were in a deepe studie: at last hauing well considered the drift of the jesters speech, and his furie now somewhat assuaged, graunted them pardon which they looked not for.

This Æthiopian iester, Baiazet vpon a time sent vnto the old queene his mother to bring her news of the good successe of his wars against the Christians, for that she had so desired: who comming vnto her, and by her commaunded to sit downe, she began to demaund of him, how the king her sonne did, and of the successe of his wars. Wherevnto he answered, that he did verie well, and had won from the Christians a great countrey, and greatly enriched his fouldiours. But after a little more talke, the queene mother desirous to heare againe the good newes (or else after the manner of some which thinke nothing sufficiently told except it be told an hundred times) asked him againe how the king her sonne did, and how he sped in his wars. Wherevnto he answered euery word as before: but asking him the third time the verie same question, how her sonne did? Doeest thou aske me so often (said the Æthiopian) how hee doth? Bre Cachpe (O whoore, said he) thou hast brought forth a sonne like a diuell, who roaming vp and downe doth nothing but burne and destroye the world where he commeth. Whereat the queene crying out; vp start the Æthiopian, and betaking himselfe to his heeles was neuer more afterwards seene.

In the wars which Baiazet had against Sigismund, the Vayuod of VALACHIA had giuen aid vnto the Hungarian king; wherewith Baiazet being offended, determined now at length to be reuenged: and therefore intending to make warre vpon the Valachian prince, left Temurtas his great lieutenant at ANCYRA in ASIA, & so passed ouer HELLESPONTUS himselfe against the Valachian. Vpon whose departure, Aladin his sisters sonne, the yong king of CARAMANIA, with a great power came suddenly in the night to ANCYRA, and tooke Temurtas prisoner: who then feared nothing lesse, than in time of peace to haue been so surprised, and carried away in bonds into CARAMANIA. But when he vnderstood that Baiazet had ended his wars in VALACHIA, and was with victorie returned to PRUSA, he fearing his heauie indignation for so great an outrage, presently released Temurtas out of prison, appalled him richly after the manner of that nation, craved pardon for the wrong he had done him, and set him at libertie to goe whither he would, and withall sent one of his noblemen with great gifts and presents to Baiazet to make his excuse in best maner he could: vnto which ambassador Baiazet (yet in choler) would not giue audience, or suffer him to come in his sight: but at the same time leuied a great armie to inuade CARAMANIA. Which Aladin vnderstanding, and now out of all hope to appease this mightie enemy, leuied all the forces he could in his owne kingdom, and withall entertained all the mercenarie soldiours he could get, intending to trie his fortune in the field, as a man of valour, rather than to be thrust out of his kingdom like a coward: & so in readinesse, hearing of the coming of Baiazet, met him vpon the way, & at a place called ACZACGAU him battell: but being too weak, he was overcome & put to flight; in which flight his horse stumbling, & he so falling to the ground, was there before he could recouer himself, takē by his enemies which had him in chase, & so brought bound to Baiazet: his two sons, Muhamet Beg & Alis Beg, being takē in that battell also, were sent prisoners to PRUSA. Aladin himselfe was by Baiazet his commandement deliuered to his enemy Temurtas: who in reuēge of the wrong he had before done him, presently caused him to be be hanged: which when Baiazet vnderstood, hee seemed verie sorry that he had so put him to death, for that he was his owne sisters sonne. Baiazet following the course of his victorie, won ICONIUM, LARENDIA, NIĞDE, with all the rest of ALADIN his kingdom: About this time also, AMASIA the great metropolitall citie of CAPPADOCIA was by the prince thereof deliuered vnto Baiazet, being too weak himselfe to defend the same against the force of Cass-Burghanimin, prince of the great and strong citie of SEBASTIA, his enemy; now growne to be a man of great power in that part of ASIA, and had solicited the Sultan of EGYPT to aid him against Baiazet. Whereupon Baiazet returning from the conquest of CARAMANIA, led his armie towards SEBASTIA, where the citizens had a little before deuiued Cass-Burghanimin of his gouernment, for his crueltie; and placed his sonne in his stead: but in short time no lesse wearie of the sonne than before of the father, they with like inconstancie sent word to Baiazet, that if he would come that way, they would yeeld vnto him the citie: vpon whose approach, Cass (his son) for feare fled out of the citie to prince Nasraddin, his brother in law. After whose departure, the cittizens according to their promise deliuered the citie vnto Baiazet at his comming, wherein hee left Solyman his eldest sonne gouernour. And so hauing in this notable expedition conquered the kingdom of CARAMANIA, and taken the great cities of AMASIA and SEBASTIA, with most part of CAPPADOCIA, and all that part of ASIA which the Turks call RUMILIA ASIATICA, he returned to PRUSA, and there wintered.

Sebastia deliuered to Baiazet.

The next Spring Baiazet (hearing that his old enemy Cutrum Baiazet prince of CASTAMONA and PONTUS, was dead) came to CASTAMONA with a great armie: of whose comming, Isfendiar (Cutrum Baiazet his sonne, and then prince of that countrey) hearing, fled out of the citie to SYNOPE, a little citie vpon the coast of the Euxine: from whence he sent an ambassador vnto Baiazet, humbly requesting him, to suffer him to haue that little citie, as his seruant to liue in, (which he was sure he would otherwise bestow vpon some other of his seruants) & not to seeke the innocent blood of the sonne for the fathers offence. Which his request, Baiazet moued with pitie, graunted: yet neuertheless tooke from him CASTAMONA, with the greatest part of his dominion in PONTUS, which he gaue to his sonne Solyman. At the same time he violently oppressed the prince Germean, and tooke from him the cities of DESPOTOPOLIS and HIERAPOLIS, with all the rest of his dominion.

Baiazet sheweth Isfendiar, prince of Castamona.

The prince of MENTESIA long before driven out of his countrey by Baiazet (as is before declared) and hauing all this while made his abode at CASTAMONA, doubting now of his own safetie after the death of his good friend Cutrum Baiazet, in the habit of an hermit fled to the great Tartarian prince Tamerlane.

Baiazet returning to PRUSA, there built a magnificent Mahometane temple; during which worke, hee with great superstition forbore drinking of wine, reposing himselfe with the company of graue and learned men, and the administration of justice: whereby hee greatly won the hearts of his subjects, and had now so enlarged his kingdom, that all kings and princes bordering vpon him stood in great feare of him.

It fortuned about this time, that Achmetes king of BAGDAD (or new BABYLON) & ETRACVM, with Iosephus Niger king of CHOLCHIS, enforced with the violent incursions of Tamerlane and his Tartars, for safegard of their liues were glad to flie into SYRIA: where they being discovered, were both cast in prison by the commandement of the Ægyptian Sultan, who then commaunded ouer SYRIA: from whence they afterwards hardly escaping, fled to Baiazet his court. Where after Achmetes had staid two moneths, he by the aid of Baiazet recouered the possession of ETRACVM, part of his own inheritance. Iosephus the other Mahometane king, hauing tarried in Baiazet his court eight moneths, at length procured him to inuade the dominions of the Ægyptian Sultan, in which expedition hee mightily preuailed: and hauing slaine the Ægyptian Sultans generall, and discomfited his forces, took the citie of MATATIA or MARTINE in ARMENIA, with DIORIGI, DERENDE, and BEXANE, taken from the Turcomans, and spoiled all the countrey thereabouts. From thence marching with his armie towards ERZINZANE, the prince thereof, called Tachretin, met him vpon the way, yeelding his citie and countrey into his power; which Baiazet presently gaue to Iosephus Niger: who after he had six daies enjoyed this new gouernment, finding the people vnwilling to be gouerned by him a stranger, surrendered the same again into the hands of him that gaue it. Whereupon the citizens of ERZINZANE humbly requested of Baiazet, That they might be again gouerned by their old prince Tachretin, now his vassale, VVhich thing he at their earnest request graunted: but taking his wife and children as a pledge of his loyaltie, sent the away to PRUSA, where they were all not long after made away. VVhen Baiazet had now many yeares thus mightily preuailed against the Christian princes in ROMANIA, BULGARIA, BOZNA, THESSALIA, VALACHIA, and other places of EUROPE, as is before declared; and inflamed with insatiable ambition, had in worse manner oppressed the Mahometan kings and princes of ASIA, of whom some were by him slaine, some driven out of their dominions into exile, some imprisoned; and other some brought into such subjection that they liued as it were but at his deuotion; and was now growne to that greatnesse; that in the pride of his heart he stood in feare of no man; but was (as he thought) a terror vnto the world, hauing ynder his obeisance great and large dominions in EUROPE, but faire greater in ASIA. It fortuned diuers of these miserable oppressed and discontented Mahometan princes, by great fortune as if it had been by appointment, to meet together at the court of the great Tartarian prince Tamerlane, whether they were fled for releeve and succour. The prince German Ogh, after long imprisonment in the castle of IPSA in EUROPE, brake prison, and with Hissar-beg his great counsellor and prison-fellow, comforted themselves with a companie of loytering companions, roaming from place to place, delighting the countie people with their apish toies: in which companie hee passed HELASPONTUS, as a beateward, and at length with much ado came to Tamerlane his court: whether the prince of MENTESTAS was come before, in the habit of an Hermit (as is aforesaid) with his head and beard shaven: Sidin Ogh passing through the countie as a pedler, with a packe at his backe, came thither also: The prince Tachyretin a servingman, came attending vpon the prince Isfendiar: who came also (but in some better sort than the rest) as an embassadour from some other prince. All these poore princes, with diuers others in like miserie, in short time arrived at SAMARCAND (great Tamerlane his court): euerie one particularly complaining of his owne priuat greefe, and all together earnestly requesting that mightie prince, to take vpon him their defence, and to reuenge the wrong done vnto them by the Turkish tirant Baiazet. VVhose pitifull complaints much moued the noble Tartarian: but especially the long and wrongfull imprisonment of German Ogh: and the pitifull complaint and moane of Tachyretin, who had of late lost his wife and children, by the crueltie of Baiazet. Yet in this matter of so great and important consequence, Tamerlane made no great shew of his forwardnesse (although he was by nature in nothing more delighted, than in the releueing of the distressed, and chastising of the proud) but coldly answered those princes, That he could not tell, whether all were so as they had reported of Baiazet, or not, but that he well knew him to be a verie zealous king in setting forth of the Mahometane religion; and that hee had therefore made great warres vpon the Christians, in which godly cause (he said) perhaps they had refused to assise him, or else had giuen him some other greater occasion of offence, to him vnknowne: For I can hardly beleue (said he) that so great and religious a prince as he, would without just and sufficient cause, offer such violence as you complaine of, especially vnto you his neighbour princes, and of the same religion with himselfe: neuertheless, whatsoeuer I intend concerning your request (said Tamerlane) I will send first an embassadour vnto him, to vnderstand more of him and his proceedings before I resolve vpon any thing: with which answer hee willed them vntill then to hold themselves contented. But as Tamerlane was about to haue dispatched his embassadour to Baiazet, he was aduertised that Achmetes late king of new BABYLON, and Iosephus king of COLCHIS, both by him driven out of their kingdomes, hauing broken out of prison from the Sultan of EGYPT, were now come to Baiazet his court, to craue his aid and assistance: wherefore he deferred to send his embassadour, suspecting that Baiazet, incited by these two exiled kings, would first in their quarrell begin to make warre vpon him. But not long after vnderstanding that they were both againe departed from his court (as is before declared) hee then dispatched his embassadour to Baiazet, with many rich gifts and presents, courtously requesting him, the rather for his sake, to deale kindly with these poore Mahometane princes, his friends; as also with the Greeke emperor Emanuel his allie, for whom he was now become an intercessour vnto him. Some report also, that he besides this, requested to haue the two aforesaid Mahometan kings of BAGDAT and COLCHIS deliuered vnto him; and withall seemed not a little to dislike of Baiazet his proceeding against the Turcomans his friends. But Baiazet being a prince of a great and haughtie spirit, and vnaccustomed to heare of any thing which fitted not his humor, highly offended with this embassage, in great scorne reiected the presents by Tamerlane lane sent vnto him; and especially certaine garments which Tamerlane after the manner of those Eastern nations, had in kindeesse amongst other things sent him: willing the embassadour to bid his maister meddle with his owne matters, and to prescribe laws vnto his owne subjects, and not vnto him, with whom he had nought to doe; and to send his ragges for presents vnto his inferiours, and not vnto princes of greater power and state than himselfe. Adding thereto many other words full of despight and disdain, affoording him no better stile than the plain name of Tamerlane: calling him the husband of an whore, if he met him not in the field; and wishing vnto himselfe againe, to take vnto him his thrice diuorced wife, after she had been polluted by another man (as the greatest dishonour that might be) if he failed to meet him: wheresoeuer he durst to dare him battaile. VVhich proud answere of the Turkes, by the embassadour reported vnto Tamerlane, and agrauated by Asalla (a Christian of the race of the Genowais, borne at CAPHRA, and then one of the greatest counsellors about him, and the Greeke emperors great friend) was so euill taken by him, that all other things set apart, hee resolved to goe against the Turke, and to take in hand that war, as of all other the fittest for the encrease of his honour and glorie. Besides that, he thought it not in reason fit for the greatnesse of the Tartarian empire, to suffer such an vniquiet neighbor to grow great; as still encroching vpon other the weake princes confining vnto him; and adding conquests vnto conquests; and yet neuer the more contented, might in the end proue dangerous vnto his owne estate and soueraigntie: a common care to such as both themselves great, and mounted vnto the highest degrees of worldly honor, to haue in ielousie and distrust the suddaine rising of others neere or farther off, as petillous or disgracefull to themselves, or their estate: whose growing greatnesse they therefore seeke by all means to hinder; as did now the mightie Tamerlane the proceedings and encreasing of the great Othoman king, Baiazet: &c. the rather being continually prickt forward so to do, by the solicitation of the Greeke emperor Emanuel, the other oppressed Mahometane princes; and by the great capitaine Asalla, (as is aforesaid) a Christian: of whom for all that Tamerlane himselfe, a Mahometane, for the great fidelitie, valour, and vertue he found in him, made no small reckoning, but was contented euen in his greatest and most waightie affaires to be by him aduised; disliking of no man for his religion whatsoeuer, so as he did worship but one only God, creator of heaven & earth, and of all that therein is. Being himselfe of opinion, That God in essence one, & in himselfe immutable, without change or diuersitie: yet for the manifesting of his omnipotencie & power, as he had created in the world sundry kinds of people, much differing both in nature, manners, and condition, and yet all framed to the image of himselfe: so was he also contented to be of them diuersly serued, according to the diuersitie of their natures and manners; so that they worshipped none other strange gods, but him alone, the maker and creator of all things. VVhich was the cause that he permitted the vse of all religions within the countries subject to his obedience, were they not meere Atheists, idolaters, or worshippers of strange and vaine gods.

Tamerlane his opinion concerning the diuersitie of religions.

Neither was proud Baiazet as one ignorant of the power or purpose of Tamerlane, in the mean time idle, but still prosecuted his good fortune for the enlarging of his empire, & encreasing of his strength: wisely deeming (as the truth was) whatsoeuer messages were sent vnto him from Tamerlane, to be no other than meere threatenings and forewarnings of his more dangerous purposes and designs against him and his state: which he was so far from fearing, as that to prouoke him the more, he spared no intemperat speech, which might moue him to wrath; wishing (as should seeme) for nothing more than to meet him in the field, there to trie the fortune of a battell with him. So weak is our foresight of our fortunes to come, and the reach of our vnderstanding for the apprehension or declining of the fatall doome euen presently hanging ouer our heads; as that we oftentimes through ignorance most desirously wish for those things which are vnto vs the cheefe occasions of our vtter ruin and destruction.

But here before we enter into farther discourse of the mortall warre betwixt these two so puissant princes, it shall not bee much from our purpose to step a little out of the way, to see what this mightie Tamerlane (of whom so many princes craued aid) was: who liuing, held the East in such awe, as that he was commonly called, The wrath of God, and Terrour of the World: which he then filled with the glorie of his name. Most Historiographers report him to haue ben poorly borne, of base and obscure parents; and so himselfe also in his youth to haue liued as a poore shepherd or heardinan in the mountaines; where conforing himselfe with other studie companions of like qualitie and disposition, such as there liued by robbing of marchants and other passengers, passengers, hee became a masterfull theefe amongst them: vnto whom other such leaud men daily still more and more resorting, hee in short time grew (as they say) to that greameffe, that he is reported to haue beene of such power, as neuer man but hee euer yet came vnto. A matter al most incredible. For albeit, that the Romane empire, yea and this great empire of the Turks also, with some others, had their beginnings not much better or greater, the one vnder Romulus, and the other vnder Othoman: yet grew they not as vpon the suddaine, in their times, to any great lustre (neither was it possible for them of so small beginnings so to doe) but by many degrees, and that in long time; euerie of the succeeding princes, according to their fortunes, adding something to their state, before it could be made great: whereas he (by their report) contrarie to the course of things both naturall and ciuile (which from their small beginnings grow to no notable perfection or greatnesse, but by degrees, and that in the long reuolution of time) taking his beginning of nothing, grew vpon the suddaine to be a burthen & terror vnto the world. Wherein our late Historiographers seeme too much to haue followed the report of the Turks; who by him brought low, and their kingdome almost in one battell subuerted, report nothing simply of him; but in what they may, detracting from his wortheie praises, wrongfully charge him with many vntruths, not concerning his parentage onely, but euen in the course of his whole life also: making him (as they would haue the world to beleue) first to haue beene a very abject amongst men; and then for his inhumane crueltie a very monster in nature, or (as it was long before, but more truly said of another great one much like himselfe) a lump of earth tempered with blood. Which incredible reports concerning so great a monarch, I list not to follow, as too full of dishonour: especially whereas others of no lesse credit than they, with farre more modestie and greater probabilitie report of him the greatest honour that may be. Hee was (as they and the others also say) borne at SAMERCAND, the cheefe citie of the Zagataian Tartars, pleasantly situated vpon the riuier IXARTES: his father was called Zain-Cham, or as some others will, Og, prince of the Zagataian Tartars, and of the countrey of SACHETAY (sometime part of the famous kingdome of PARTIA) third in descent from Zingis, the great and fortunate leader of the Tartars, before in the former part of this historie remembred. Which Og, as a prince of a peaceable nature (accounting it no lesse honour quietly to keepe the countries left him by his father, than with much trouble and no lesse danger to seeke how to enlarge the same) long liued in most happie rest with his subjects, no lesse happie than himselfe: not so much seeking after the hoording vp of gold and siluer (things of that nation not regarded) as contenting himselfe with the encrease and profit of his flocks of sheepe, and herds of cattell; then, and yet also, the principall reuemes of the Tartar kings and princes: which happily gaue occasion vnto some, ignorant of the manner and custome of those Northerne nations and countries, to account them all for shepherds and heardsmen; and so also to haue reported of this mightie prince, as of a shepherds sonne, or heardsman himselfe: vainly measuring his nobilitie by the homely manner of his people and subjects, and not by the honor of his house, & heroicall vertues, such as were hardly to be found greater in any prince of that or other former ages. His peaceable father now well stricken in yeares, and wearie of the world, deliuered vp vnto him (not yet past fifteene yeares old) the gouernment of his kingdome, joining vnto him two of his most faithfull counsellours, Odmar and Aly, to assist him in the gouernment of his state (retiring himselfe vnto a solitarie life; the more at quiet to serue God, and so to end his daies in peace:) which two his trustie seruants and graue counsellors he dearly loued whilest they liued, and much honoured the remembrance of them, being dead. The first prooue of his fortune and valour, was against the Moscovite, for spoiling of a citie which had put it selfe vnder his protection; and for entering of his countrey; and for proclaiming of warre against him: whom he in a great battaile ouerthrew, hauing slaine fife and twentie thousand of the Moscovites footmen, and betwene fifteene and sixteen thousand horsemen, with the losse of scarce eight thousand horsemen and foure thousand footmen of his own. After which battell he beholding so many thousands of men there dead vpon the ground, was so farre from reioicing thereat, that turning himselfe vnto one of his familiars, he lamented the condition of such as commaunded ouer great armies, commending his fathers quiet course of life, accounting him happie in seeking for rest, and the other most vnhappie, which by the destruction of their owne kind, sought to procure their owne glorie; protesting himselfe euen from his heart to be grieved to see such sorrowfull tokens of his victorie. With this ouerthrow the Moscovite discouraged, sent embassadours to him for peace, which vpon such honourable conditions as pleased him to set downe, was by him graunted; and so the peace concluded. Now the Great Cham of TARTARIA (his fathers brother) being growne old, and out of hope of any more children, moued with the fame of his nephew, after this victorie sent vnto him diuers presents, and withall offering him his onely daughter in marriage, and with her to proclaime him heire apparent vnto his empire; as in right hee was, being his brothers sonne, and the daughters not at all succeeding in those empires. Which so great an offer Tamerlane gladly accepted, and so the marriage was afterwards with great triumph at the old emperors court solemnized; and he proclaimed heire apparent vnto that great empire. Thus was Tamerlane indeed made great, being euer after this marriage by the old emperour his vnckle, and now his father in law, so long as hee liued, notably supported, and after his death succeeding him also in that so mightie an empire. Yet in the meane time wanted not this wortheie prince the enuious competitor of these his so great honours: in so much, that whilest by the aduise and perswasion of the old emperour, he was taking in hand to make warre against the great king of CHINA (who had as then gone far beyond his bounds) and so was now well on wards on his way, he was by the conspiracie of Calix (a man of greatest power and authoritie in the Great Cham his court) almost thrust out of his new empire: Calix with a right puissant armie hauing already seized vpon the great citie of CAMBALU, and the citizens also generally fauouring those his traitorous proceedings, as disdaining to be gouerned by the Zagataian Tartar. For redresse whereof, Tamerlane was enforced with the greatest part of his armie to returne, and meeting with the rebell (who then had in his armie fourescore thousand horse, and an hundred thousand foot) in a great and mortall battell (wherein of the one side and of the other were more than fiftie thousand men slaine) ouerthrew him (though not without the great danger of his own person, as being there himselfe beaten down to the ground) tooke him prisoner, and afterwards beheaded him. Which so dangerous a rebellion, with the death of the traitour, and the cheefe of the conspiratours repressed, and his state in the newnesse thereof by this victorie well confirmed, he proceeded in his intended war against the great king of CHINA; brake downe the strong wall, which the Chinoies had made foure hundred leagues long betwixt the mountaines, for the repressing of the incursions of the Tartars, entered their countrey; and meeting with the king, leading after him three hundred and fiftie thousand men (whereof there were an hundred and fiftie thousand horsemen, and the rest on foot) in a great and dreadfull battaile, with the slaughter of 60000 of his men, ouercame him, and tooke him prisoner: whom for all that he (in the course of so great a victorie wisely moderating his fortune) shortly after set againe at libertie; yet so, as that hauing before taken from him the one halfe of his kingdome, and therein left Odmar his trustie lieutenant, with a sufficient power for the restraining of the proud king, if he should againe begin to raise any new stirres; and withall, imposed such other conditions as pleased himselfe, with the yearely tribute of three hundred thousand crownes, he well provided for the assuring of those his new conquests: and so in triumph returned with victorie vnto the old emperour his father in law at CAMBALU, not a little glad to see both him and his daughter, who had in all those warres still accompanied him. But leauing him, now thus by birth great, by his fortune greater, but by his vertue greatest of all (as able now to draw after him almost the whole power of the East) let vs againe returne thither from whence we haue for the better knowledge of him, thus with him digressed.

The warre against the Turkish Sultan Baiazet (as is aforesaid) by Tamerlane resolved vpon; he sent Axalla the great capitaine to his countrey of SACHETAY (called of some ZAGATAY) to giue beginning to the assembling of his forces from all parts; to the end, that with the first of the Spring he might set forward for the releefe of so many distressed princes, and the abating of the pride of so great and mightie a tyrant as was Baiazet. Now had Tamerlane procured from the great Tartarian emperour, his vnckle and father in law, an hundred thousand footmen, and fourescore thousand horsemen; hoping to haue as many more from SACHETAY his owne countrey, besides the lords that for honours sake would accompanie him in that his so honourable an expedition, from whence hee made account also of fiftie thousand men more which they would bring vnto him, and diuers other great supplies which hee expected from other places also: wherewith he doubted not well to performe what he had so honourably determined to take in hand, for the abating of the Othoman pride: for which and other such like, he was (as hee would often times say) by God himselfe appointed. So taking his leaue of the old emperour his father in law, and of the princeesse his wife (then left behind him for the

the comfort of her aged father, he departed from CAMBALU towards SAMARCAND, the place of his birth and seat of his empire; leaving behind him the forces brought from the great empire: your his vncler, to come after him to OZARA, where hee had appointed the generall meeting of his armie. At which time amongst other princes that thither brought or sent their supplies, the great Muscouite being requested so to doe, promised to send him fiftene thousand horse, with a certaine summe of money, and leaue for his armie to passe through so much of his territories as should be necessarie: all which hee afterwards performed vnto Tamerlane, being glad that hee did set vpon others, rather than on himselfe; and that so great a preparation, should fall vpon them, whose greatnesse was as dreadfull and dangerous vnto him as to any other. All the earth almost at that time being astonished at the sudden greatnesse of this Othoman king, and the happie successe he had in all his warres; nor the least cause that moued Tamerlane to oppose himselfe against him, deeming it much better to goe and set vpon him in his new conquests, than to stay vntill he therein settled, were come neerer vnto him, and so should debate the quarrell within his owne empire, to his dammage. A good and sound resolution: first in that it tended to the destruction of the enemies countrey; and then, that if any thing should fall out otherwise with him than well, his countrey should not thereby receiue any such astonishment as if the danger were neerer or within the bowels of the same. Now in the mean time that Tamerlane lay at SAMARCAND, Axalla the great captaine and Tamerlane his lieutenant generall, had assembled all the armie at OZARA. Whereof Tamerlane vnderstanding, sent for him to SAMARCAND to conferre with him about the setting forward of his armie. For although he were still accompanied with great renowned princes, yet were they no body in comparison of Axalla, whose found counsell had won him such credit with his lord & master, as by his aduice he did all things, and without him nothing: which his so great authoritie and fauour with his prince, wanted not the enuie of the court; but that his great vertues, and rare found courtesie (in so great fortune) together with so many worthie seruices as he had done, supported him against the malice of the same. He by the commaundement of Tamerlane, leaving the charge of the armie at OZARA, with the prince of THANATS, another of Tamerlane his great captaines, came himselfe to SAMARCAND, and there at large discoursed with him, about the estate and order of his armie. And shortly after, departing with Axalla and the rest from SAMARCAND, for to goe to OZARA the place where all his armie met: being come thither, entered into a great consultation with his most expert captaines, about the taking of his journey, and conducting of his armie; as whether it were better to lead the same by the coasts of the Muscouite directly towards CAPHA, or else on the other side of the Caspian sea by the skirts of PERSTA. Where after long discourse and sundry opinions with their reasons deliuered, it was in the end resolved (although the way were the longer) to passe by the Muscouit, so to come vnto the Georgians, and to TREBIZONDA, and from thence to enter into the Othoman king his countrey. And so setting forward from OZARA, hee came at length to MARANT, where he staid three daies looking for the forces which prince Odmar should send him from CHINA, not long before by him conquered: whereof he there receiued news, and there caused his armie to be paid, and a generall muster thereof to be taken. He had there also newes of the aid the Muscouite did send him: and caused an infinite quantitie of victuals, and most part of his furniture to be conuayed by the Caspian sea; being a great commoditie and ease vnto his armie, which marching by land, was of necessitie to passe some twentie leagues through places destitute both of victuals and water. Tamerlane all the way coasting alongst the sea shore, passed the time in hunting, his armie not coming neere him by ten leagues; which was so great, that it extended it selfe full twentie leagues. Comming to the riuer of EDLE, he staid at ZARAZICH whilst his armie passed the riuer at MESCHET, and two other bridges which he had caused to be made for that purpose. Now the Circassians, and Georgians, hearing of the approach of Tamerlane with his huge armie, by their embassadours offered him all the helpe and assistance they could, in his journey as he passed that way. These Georgians were (and yet are) Christians, a great and warlike people, of long time tributaries vnto the Greeke emperours: and afterwards sometimes tributaries, and sometimes confederats vnto the Persians: but alwaies enemies vnto the Turks, by whom (of late and in our remembrance) but especially by Amurath the third, they together with some part of the Persian kingdome, haue been greuously oppressed, as in the proecesse of this historie may appeare. Of these warlike people glad of Tamerlane his comming, for the repressing of the Turke, Axalla drew great numbers vnto the seruice of his prince: who not a little esteemed of them, being all tall men, verie beautifull, of great strength and courage, and withall most expert souldiours; as hauing oftentimes resisted the power of the Othoman kings, by reason of the aduantage their countrey affordeth them, being verie rough and hard to come into. By these kind people, Tamerlane was in euerie place honourably entertained, and his great armie with all necessaries plentifully releued. In passing through which countrey and the rest as he marched, he tooke such order with his souldiours, that none of the people whereby he passed, were any thing by them injured; insomuch that if a souldiour had taken but an apple, or other thing of like valour from any man, he died therefore, so seuerely were his commaunds. It is reported that one of his souldiours, hauing taken a little milke from a countrey woman, and she thereof complaining, he caused the said souldiour to be presently killed; and his stomacke to be ripped; where the milke that he had of late drunke being found, he contented the woman & so sent her away, who had otherwise vndoubtedly died for her false accusation had it not so appeared. Which his so great seueritie, and in other like cases, was of many accounted for extreme crueltie: yet was it indeed the wholesome preseruacion of his armie, being so great, as that it was thought almost impossible to haue found sufficient victuals for the reliefe thereof; whereof for all that, there was no want, either of any thing else necessarie for the vse of man, his campe being still as a most populous and well gouerned citie, stored with all manner of things: wherevnto both artificers and marchants, from farre countreys resorted with their commodities and marchandise, as vnto some famous mart; and the countrey people, without feare from euerie place brought in their countrey commodities, for which they receiued present money, and so in safetie againe departed. So marching on, he at length came to BACHTICH, where hee staid to refresh his armie eight daies, and there againe tooke a generall muster thereof, wherein were found (as most write) foure hundred thousand horse, and sixe hundred thousand foot: or as some others that were there present affirme, three hundred thousand horsemen, and fiftie hundred thousand foot, of all nations. Vnto whom he there gaue a generall pale, and as his manner was, made vnto them an oration, informing them of such orders as he would haue kept, to the end they might the better obserue the same: with much other militarie discipline, whereof hee was verie curious with his captaines. At which time also, it was lawfull for euerie common souldiour to behold him with more boldnes than on other daies, forasmuch as he did for that time, and such like, lay aside his imperiall maiestie, and shew himselfe more familiar vnto them.

Now could he hardly be perswaded, that Baiazet hauing subdued the most part of GRECIA, distressed the Greeke emperour, and so great meanes to recouer whatsoever hee should loose in ASIA, would bee so aduenturous as to come ouer the straits out of EUROPE, to trie the fortune of a battaile with him; but rather warily protract the time, to wearie him at length with wants, that in a strange countrey drew such a world of people after him: wherein hee found himselfe much deceived, for hauing passed the Georgian countrey, and being come to BUYSABUCH, Axalla (whom he had not seen in eight daies before, because he led the head of the armie) came vnto him with such news as he knew would be right welcome vnto him: which was, that Baiazet had raised his siege of CONSTANTINOPLE (as indeed he had) for to come and defend his new conquests in ASIA; and that hee was certainly resolved, to come to a day of battaile, not so much trusting vnto the multitude of his armie as to the valour and experience of his souldiours, being all men of long well trained vp in the wars. At which vnexpected newes Tamerlane greatly rejoiced: yet without insolencie or vaunting, but rather with the countenance of such an one as judged the events of battailes to be (as they are) alwaies doubtfull: saying sometimes, That a small number well conducted, did oftentimes carie away the victorie, from the confused multitude. Three daies he staid at BUYSABUCH, and caused his souldiours continually to march forward, which at GARGA and CHUSERT passed ouer the riuer EUPHRATES: which he did the rather to maintain his armie vpon the spoile of the enemy, in attending his coming, than vpon himselfe, or his allies. All the cities that yielded vnto him by the way as he marched, he fauourably receiued: the other that refused to submit themselves to his obedience, he vied with all extremitie: especially the great and strong citie of SEBASTIA, where certain of the fore-runners of his armie were by the Turks there in garrison cut off, and slaine, and the gates of the citie as it were in contempt of him, set wide open. Wherewith Tamerlane offended, sent out certaine of his Tartarian horsemen, commaunding them vpon paine of his displeasure so to beare themselves against their enemies, as that he might at his coming either find the citie taken, or the gates thereof shut against him: for he had his men at so great commaund, that no danger was vnto them more dreadfull than his displeasure, neither did he punish any thing so seuerely, as cowardise: inso much, that if in his disport of hunting the wild beast, any did for feare giue way to the Lyon or Beare, and slew him not, was sure to die therefore himselfe: and to turne his backe vpon the enemy, was no lesse danger than to run vpon his owne death. Now the Turkes in garrison at SEBASTIA, seeing these Tartarian horsemen marching towards the citie, making little account of them, for that they were not in number many, issued out for to meet them; where they were so furiously charged by these few horsemen, that they were glad to retire, and for hast to shut part of their owne men out of the citie, lest the enemy following them at their heeles, should haue entered the gates together with them. Which Turkes so shut out, were by the Tartarians slaine at the gates of the citie. Shortly after came Tamerlane with all his armie, and sat downe before the citie, where he lay still seuen dayes, not making shew of any violence at all, the defendants because the citie was of great strength, all that while thinking that he had intended by long siege to distresse the same, and the more because of his long lying still. But about the eighth day, the wals and towers of the citie in many places vndermined, were suddainely ouerthrowne, leauing large breaches for the enemy to enter. Wherewith the Turkes in the citie dismayed, forthwith yielded the citie to Tamerlane, in hope so to haue saued their liues: but hee (as the Turkes report) being entered the citie, commanded a great number of deepe pits to be digged, and all the people of the citie, without respect of age, sex, or condition, to be throwne into the same, and there buried quicke. Which done, the citie was by his commaundement vterly rased also. After that, calling vnto him Malcozzius, the gouernour of the citie, whom he had for that purpose onely spared, he commaunded him to goe and tell his master what was happened to his strong citie of SEBASTIA, and what hee had there himselfe scene. Of which tragicall action, Malcozzius hauing made true relation vnto Baiazet, was by him demanded, whether of the two armies he thought bigger or stronger: for now Baiazet had assembled a mightie armie of three hundred thousand men, or as some report of three hundred thousand horsemen, and two hundred thousand foot. Whereunto Malcozzius hauing before craved pardon, answered, That it could not bee, but that Tamerlane might in reason haue the greater number, for that hee was a commaunder of faire greater countries. Wherewith proud Baiazet offended, in great choller replied: Out of doubt, the sight of the Tartarian hath made this coward so afraid, that he thinketh euery enemy to be two.

Most of the Latine histories report, that when Tamerlane had taken SEBASTIA, he put all the men to the sword, and bringing the women and chidren into the fields without the citie there ouer-ran them with his horsemen, excepting some few which were referred for prisoners. As also that Baiazet there lost his eldest sonne Erthogrul (of some called Orthobulus) whose death with the losse of the citie, so much greeued him (as is reported) that marching with his great armie against Tamerlane, and by the way hearing a countrey shepheard merrily reposing himselfe with his homely pipe, as he sat vpon the side of a mountaine feeding his poore flocke; standing still a great while listening vnto him, to the great admiration of many; at last fetching a deepe sigh, brake forth into these words: O happie shepheard, which haddest neither Orthobulus nor SEBASTIA to loose: bewraying therein his owne discontentment, and yet withall shewing, That worldly blisse consisteth not so much in possessing of much, subject vnto danger, as in ioying in a little contentment, deuoid of feare. Howbeit the Turkes themselves reporting the taking of SEBASTIA, speake not of this at all, but giue him lost six yeares before in the warres against Cassi Burchanians, and hath buried by his father at PRUSA. In this citie of SEBASTIA was lost twelue thousand Turkes, men, women, and children, as their histories report. The rest of the cities all the way as Tamerlane marched, warned by the destruction of SEBASTIA, yielded themselves for feare of like danger: the citizens whereof he courteously vsed, especially the Christians, whom he set at libertie, in respect of Emanuel the Greeke emperour, whom hee seemed wholly therein to gratifie. But he had not gone farre into the Turkes dominion, but that hee was certainly aduertised, how that Baiazet, with a great armie was comming against him, and now within thirte leagues of him: which caused him after that time, to march with his armie more closely, Acalla leading the vangard sent forth Chianfon prince of CIARCAN, with foure thousand Parthian horsemen, to get knowledge of the Turkes armie, and where Baiazet lay, as also what countrey that was beyond SENNAS; and if he could learne any thing thereof, to make relation of it vnto him. This prince of CIARCAN was Tamerlane his kinsman, a man of great reputation, and next vnto Acalla, in whose absence he had the commanding of the auantgard, his charges who also sent before him another Parthian captain with 500 horsemen. So he had not ridden ten leagues, but that he heard news of Baiazet his comming, & hauing surprised SENNAS, vnderstood there the certaine estate of the Turkes armie, which was then at TATAIA, & so marching forward. VV herof Tamerlane certified, commanded him not to retire fro that place, vntill he did see the arriuall of the enemy, and thereof to giue him aduertisement euery hower, being himselfe resolu'd to passe on no farther, as come to a faire large plaine, and a countrey of aduantage for the order of his battaile: for he knew that his armie was farre greater than Baiazets, and therefore made choice of those great plaines. Yet for that his armie consisted of diuers nations, and withall considering that hee was not to fight against the Chinois, a soft effeminate people (as of late) but against the Turkes, a most warlike nation, and well acquainted with all manner of fights and martiall stratagemes, hee thought it good to be well aduised how he proceeded against them. VV herefore hee presently sent for Acalla, with him to view the said place, and to haue his opinion, VV whether it would be for his aduantage or not, there to stay: who not miliking of the choice of the place, yet aduised him also to keepe SENNAS so long as he possibly could: and so sent word vnto them that were therein, vpon the approach of the enemy to set fire vpon the same, and so to withdraw themselves from thence, to the end, that the enemy should not haue any desire to encampe there, but come still forward neere vnto those plains where Tamerlane desired to fight, especially for that he was stronger in horse than Baiazet. Thus the Turkes still marching on, thought to haue surprised some of their enemies in SENNAS, who as soone as they drew neere, retired all, excepting some hundred, left of purpose to fire the towne: who hauing performed the same, retired of purpose in great disorder. Now the prince of CIARCAN had diuided his forces into two parts, and giuen commaundement to the first, that as soone as they perceiued the enemies to pursue the hundred horse, that so disorderly of purpose fled, they should receiue them, and so retire all altogether. He in the meane time with the rest of his power stood close in a valley, neere vnto a wood side, vnto which before retired, now turning vpon them also: so that the Turkes seeing themselves thus beset, and hardly laied vnto both before and behind, as men discouraged fled: in which flight most of them were slaine, and the rest taken prisoners. This was the first encounter betwixt the Turkes and the Parthians: all the prisoners there taken, were by the prince sent to Tamerlane, and amongst the rest the Bassa of NATOLIA, who led these troopes: of whom Tamerlane earnestly demaunded, what caused Baiazet so little to esteeme of him, as to shew so great contempt of his armie, which he should find strong ynough to abate his pride. VV hereunto the Bassa answered, That his lord was the Sunne vpon earth, which could not endure any equal: and that he rather was altoned to see, how he from so farre, had enterprised so dangerous a journey, to hinder the fortune of his lord, in whose fauor the heauens (as he said) did bend themselves, to further his greatnesse, and vnto whom all the world subjected it selfe; and that he committed great follie in going about to resist the same. Vnto which so proud a speech Tamerlane replied, That hee was sent from heauen to punish his rashnesse, and to teach him, that the proud are hated of God, whose promise is to plucke downe the mightie, and raise vp the lowly. As for thy selfe (said he) thou hast already felt (although I pitie thy mishap) what the valour of my Parthian horse is against thy Turkish: and thy master I haue already caused to raise his siege of CONSTANTINOPLE, and to looke to his owne things here in ASIA. Furthermore, Tamerlane changing his speech, demaunded of him, If his master did come resolu'd to bid him battaile: Assure your selfe (said he) there is nothing he more desireth: and would to God I might acknowledge your greatnesse, in giuing me leaue to assilt my lord at that battaile. Good leaue haue thou, said Tamerlane, goe thy waies, and tell thy lord, that thou hast scene me; and that he shall in the battaile find mee on horsebacke, where he shall see a greene ensigne displayed. The Bassa thanking him, swore that next vnto his lord, he vowed vnto him, his seruice. And so returning, declared vnto Baiazet, how that he had scene Tamerlane: and truly reported vnto him all that he had willed him to say; not forgetting ouer all to publish his courtesie and bountie: who besides that he had frankly set him at libertie, had also giuen him a very faire horse well furnished, although he well knew hee was to serue against himselfe. Whereunto Baiazet answered no more, but that hee would shortly make triall of him, and that he well hoped, before the match were ended, to make him acknowledge his owne follie. The next day the two armies drew neere together, and encamped within a league the one of the other: where all the night long you might haue heard such noise of horses, as that it seemed the heauens were full of voices, the aire did so resound, & euery man thought the night long, to come to the triall of his valour, and the gaining of his desires. The Scythians (a people no lesse greedie than needie) talked of nothing but the spoile; the proud Parthians of their honour, and the poore Christians of their deliuerance, all to be gained by the next dayes victorie: euery man during the night time speaking according to his owne humor. All which Tamerlane walking this night vp and down in his campe, heard, and much reioyced to see the hope that his soldiours had already in generall conceived of the victorie. Who after the second watch returned vnto his pavillion, and there casting himselfe vpon a carpet, had thought to haue slept a while. But his cares not suffering him so to doe, he then (as his manner was) called for a booke, wherein was contained the liues of his fathers and auncetors, and of other valiant worthies, the which he vsed ordinarily to read, as he then did: not as therewith vainly to deceiue the time, but to make vse thereof, by the imitation of that which was by them worthily done, and declining of such dangers, as they by their rashnesse or oversight fell into. And afterwards hauing a little slumbered, he commaunded Axalla to be sent for, who forthwith came vnto him with diuers other great lords and captaines, the cheefe commanders of his armie, with whom after he had a while consulted of the order of the battaile, he mounted on horsebacke himselfe, and sent euery one of them vnto their owne charges, to put the same in readinesse. At the which very instant he receiued newes, that the enemy marched forward, and came to take his ground for the battaile: whose order of march Tamerlane was desirous to see, that so accordingly he might match his owne. And hauing caused three thousand horsemen to aduance forward, with charge to begin the skirmish, himselfe followed after to lodge euery part of his forces in such places, as he had foreseene to be fittest for his aduantage. Now seeing the Ianizaries march in a square battell in the midst, and vpon the two fronts, two great squadrons of horsemen, which seemed to be thirtie thousand horse; and another which aduanced and couered the battaillon of the Ianizaries: he thought this their order to be very good, and hard to be broken; and thereupon turning himselfe vnto Axalla, who was neere vnto him, said: I had thought this day to haue fought on foot, but I see that it behoueth me now to fight on horsebacke, to giue courage vnto my soldiours to open the great battaillon of our enemies. And my will is, that my men come forward vnto me as soone as they may, for I will aduance forward with an hundred thousand footmen, fiftie thousand vpon each of my two wings, and in the midst of them thirtie thousand of my best horsemen. My pleasure is, that after they haue tried the force of these men, that they come vnto my auantgard, of whom I will dispose, and fiftie thousand horse more, in three bodies, whom thou shalt commaund: which I will asist with foure score thousand horse, wherein shall be mine owne person; hauing an hundred thousand footmen behind me, who shall march in two squadrons: & for my arereward I appoint 40000 horse, & 50000 footmen, who shall not march but to my aid. And I will make choice of 10000 of my best horse, whom I will send into euery place where I shall thinke needfull within mine armie, for to impart my commaunds. Ouer the first thirtie thousand horse the prince Ciarcan commaunded: ouer the foremost footmen was the lord Synopes a Genouois, kinsman to Axalla, and his lieutenant ouer the footmen, a captaine of great estimation: the prince Axalla his owne charge consisted of five squadrons of horsemen. Baiazet his armie being also both faire, and great, came brauely still on forward towards their enemies, who stirred not one whit from the place they had taken for the battaile: except certaine light horsemen Scythians, Parthians, and Muscovits, who sent out as loose men, hotly skirmished betwixt the two armies. Now was Tamerlane by an espie aduertised, that Baiazet, hauing before giuen order for the disposing of his armie, was on foot in the midst of thirtie thousand Ianizaries, his principall men of warre and greatest strength, wherein he meant that day to fight, and in whom he had reposed his greatest hope. His battaile of horse was verie faire, amounting to the number of an hundred and thirtie thousand horse, all old souldiours. The Sultan of Egypt hauing also sent vnto his aid thirtie thousand Manalukes, all verie good horsemen, with thirtie thousand foot. So that his armie marching all in one front, in forme of an halfe Moone (but not so well knit together as was Tamerlanes, whose squadrons directly followed one another) seemed seemed almost as great as his. And so with infinite numbers of most horrible outcries, still aduanced forward: Tamerlane his souldiours all the while standing fast, with great silence.

There was not possible to be seen a more furious charge, than was by the Turks giuen vpon the prince of Ciarcan, who had commandement not to fight before the enemy came vnto him: neither could haue been chosen a fairer plaine, and where the skillfull choice of the place, was of lesse aduantage for the one or the other; but that Tamerlane had the river on the left hand of his armie, leuening him to some small aduantage. Now this yong prince of Ciarcan with his fortie thousand horse, was in this first encounter almost wholie ouerthrowne: yet hauing fought right valiantly, and entered euen into the midst of the Ianizaries (where the person of Baiazet was) putting them in disorder, was himselfe there slaine. About which time, Axalla set vpon them with the auantgard, but not with like danger: for hauing ouerthrowne one of the enemies wings, and cut it all to peeces, and his footmen comming to ioyné with him as they had been commaunded, he faced the battaillon of the Ianizaries, who right valiantly behaued themselves for the safetie of their prince. This hard fight continued one hower, and yet you could not haue seene any scattered, but the one still resolutely fighting against the other. You might there haue seene the horsemen like mountaines rush together, and infinite numbers of men die, erie lament, and threaten all at one instant. Tamerlane had patience all this while, to see the euent of this so mortall a fight: but perceiuing his men at length to giue ground, he sent ten thousand of his horse to ioyné againe with the ten thousand appointed for the arereward, and commaunded them to asist him at such time as he should haue need of them: and at the verie same time, charged himselfe, and made them giue him roome; causing the footmen to charge also, ouer whom the prince of Thanaïs commaunded, who gaue a furious onfet vpon the battaillon of the Ianizaries, wherein was yet the person of Baiazet, who had sustained a great burthen. Now Baiazet had in his armie, a great number of mercinarie Tartarians, called Desseynes, with many thousands of other soldiours taken vp in the countries of the poor exiled Mahometan princes; in whose just quarell, and the Greeke emperours, Tamerlane had chiefly vnder taken that war: these Tartarians and other souldiours, seeing some their friends, and other some their naturall and louing princes in the armie of Tamerlane; stricken with the terrour of disloyaltie, and abhorring the crueltie of the proud tirant, in the heat of the battaile reuolted from Baiazet to their owne princes: which their reuolt, much weakened Baiazet his forces. Who neuerthelesse with his owne men of warre, especially the Ianizaries, and the helpe of the Christian souldiours brought to his aid from Serua, and other places of Europe, with great courage maintained the fight; but the multitude, and not true valor, preuailed: for as much as might be done by valiant and courageous men, was by the Ianizaries and the rest perfourmed, both for the preservation of the person of their prince, and the gaining of the victorie. But in the end, the horsemen with whom Tamerlane himselfe was giuing a fresh charge, and his auantgard wholly knit againe vnto him, reconfirming the charge, he with much adoe obtained the victorie. Baiazet himselfe wounded, and now mounted on horsebacke thinking to haue scaped by flight, fell into the hands of Axalla. Vnto whom he yeelded himselfe (thinking it had been Tamerlane) who for a space knew him not, but tooke him for some other great commander of the Turks. Musa (surnamed Zebe or, The noble) one of Baiazet his sonnes, with diuers other of Baiazet his great captaines, were there taken also: and amongst the rest, George the Despot of Serua, who notwithstanding this misfortune had that day gained vnto himselfe the reputation of a great and worthie captaine; in somuch that Tamerlane euen in the heat of the battaile, maruailing to see him, and the Seruians with the other Christians which he had brought to the aid of Baiazet, so valiantly to fight, said vnto some of the captaines that were neere vnto him, See how courageously yonder religious fight: supposing them by their strange attire, to haue been some of the Turks superstitious votaries. But being now taken, and afterwards brought to Tamerlane, hee was by him courtously welcomed: but yet withall reprooued, for that he had fought for Baiazet against him, who was come in fauour of the Christian emperour, and the other poore oppressed princes, such as the Despot himselfe was. Who thereto boldly answered, That indeed it was not according to his dutie, but according to the prosperitie of Baiazet, vnto whom it seemed that all the world did bend: and that his owne safetie had caused him, though against his will, to take part with him. Wherevpon Tamerlane held him excused: and so without more adoe gaue him leaue at his owne pleasure to depart.

Baiazet also himselfe, being afterwarde brought vnto Tamerlane as a prisoner, and by him G courteously entertained, neuer shewed any token of submission at all, but according to his proud nature, without respect of his present state, presumptuously answered him vnto whatsoeuer he demaunded. Wherewith Tamerlane moued, told him, that it was now in his power to make him to loofe his life. Vvherevnto he answered no more, but; Doe it: for that, that losse should bee his to greatest happinesse. Tamerlane afterwards demaunding of him, what made him so proud as to enterprife to bring into his subiection so noble a prince as was the Greeke emperor: he answered, red, Euen the same thing that hath moued thee to inuade me, namely the desire of glory and soueraintie. But wherfore then (said Tamerlane) dost thou vse so great cruelty towards them thou hast overcome, without respect of age or sex: That did I (said he) to giue the greater terrour vnto fortune to haue fallen into thy hands, as thou art now in mine: I would (said Baiazet) haue enclosed thee in a cage of iron, and so in triumph haue caried thee vp and downe my kingdome.
Euen so (said Tamerlane) shalt thou be serued. And so causing him to bee taken out of his presence, turning vnto his followers said: Behold a proud and cruell man, he deserueth to be chastis-ed accordingly, and to bee made an example vnto all the proud and cruell of the world, of the just wrath of God against them. I acknowledge that God hath this day deliuered into my hands, a great enemy, to whom we must therefore giue thanks: which he performed the same day. For the battaile was won at foure of the clocke, and there was yet fise houres of day light. The next day Tamerlane commaunded the dead to be buried, where amongst the rest, they found the bodie of the prince of CIARCAN dead, in the midst of the Ianizaries, where he lay enclosed with their dead bodies, in token he died not vnreueged: whose vniuely death Tamerlane for all that greatly lamented; for he was his kinsman, and like mough one day to haue done him great seruice. Whose dead bodie Tamerlane caused to be embalmed, and with two thousand horie, (and diuers of the Turks prisoners, chained and tied together) to be conuaid to SAMERCAND, vntill his comming thether. All the other dead bodies were with all honor that might be, buried at SENNAS.

This great bloodie battaile fought in the yeare of our lord 1397 not farre from the mount STELLA (where sometime the great king Antihrydates, was by Pompey the Great, in a great battaile ouerthrowne) was fought from seuen a clocke in the morning, vntill foure in the after noone: K victorie all that while as it were with doubtfull wings, honering ouer both armies, as next vnto where to light; vntill at length the fortune of Tamerlane prevailed. Vvhoise wisdom (vnto God) gaue that daies victorie vnto his souldiours: for that the politike tiring of the strong forces of Baiazet, was the safegard of his owne; whereas if hee had gone vnto the battaile in one front, assuredly the multitude finding such strong resistance, had put it selfe into confusion: wher-as this successefull manner of aiding of his men, made them all vnto him profitable. The number of them that were in this battaile slaine is of diuers, diuersly reported: the Turks themselves reporting that Baiazet there lost the noble Mustapha his sonne, with two hundred thousand of his men, and Tamerlane not many fewer: and some other speaking of a farre lesse number, as that there should be slaine of the Turkes about threecore thousand, and of Tamerlane his armie not past twentie thousand. But leauing the certaintie of the number vnto the credit of the reporters, like inough it is that the slaughter was exceeding great in so long a fight, betwixt two such armies, as neuer before (as I suppose) met in field together.

By this one daies euent, is plainly to be seen the vncertaintie of worldly things, and what small assurance euen the greatest haue in them. Behold Baiazet the terrour of the world, and as hee thought, superiour to fortune, in an instant with his state in one battaile ouerthrowne into the bottome of miserie and dispaire: and that at such time as he thought least, euen in the midst of his greatest strength. It was three daies (as they report) before he could be pacified, but as a desperate man, still seeking after death, and calling for it: neither did Tamerlane after he had once spoken with him, at all afterwards courteously vse him, but as of a proud man caused small account to be made of him. And to manifest that he knew how to punish the haughtie, made him to bee shackled in fetters and chaines of gold, and so to bee shut vp in an iron cage made like a grate, in such sort, as that he might on euerie side be seen; and so caried him vp and downe as hee passed through ASIA, to be of his owne people scorned and derided. And to his farther disgrace, vpon festiual daies vied him for a footstool to tread vpon, when he mounted to horie: and at other times an iron cage.

A times scornefully fed him like a dogge, with crums fallen from his table. A rare example of the vncertaintie of worldly honour, that he vnto whose ambitious mind, ASIA, and EUROPE, two great parts of the world were to little; should be now caried vp and downe cooped vp in a little iron cage, like some perillous wild beast: All which Tamerlane did, not so much for the hatred to the man, as to manifest the just iudgement of God against the arrogant follie of the proud: It is reported that Tamerlane being requested by one of his noble men that might be bold to speake vnto him, to remit some part of his seueritie against the person of so great a prince, answered; That he did not vse that rigout against him as a king, but rather did punish him, as a proud ambitious tirant polluted with the blood of his owne brother.

B Now this so great an ouerthrow, brought such a feare vpon all the countieys possessed by Baiazet in ASIA, that Axalla sent before by Tamerlane with fortie thousand horie, and an hundred thousand foot, without cariages, to prosecute the victorie, came without resistance to PRUSIA; whether all the remainder of Baiazet his armie was retired, with the Bassa Mustapha the countiey as he went, still yeelding vnto him. Yea the great Bassa, with the rest, hearing of his comming, and thinking themselves not now in any safetie in ASIA, fled ouer the strait of HE-LESPONTUS to CALYPOLIS, & so to HADRIANOPLE, carrying with them out of the battaile Solyman, Baiazet his eldest sonne, whom they set vp in his fathers place; Mahomet his younger brother presently vpon the ouerthrow being fled to AMASIA: of whom; and the rest of Baiazet his children, more shall be said hereafter. Axalla comming to PRUSIA, had the cite without resistance yeelded vnto him, which he rifled: and there with other of Baiazet his wiues & concubines, tooke prisoner the faire Despina, Baiazet his best beloued wife, to the doubling of his greefe.

C Emanuel the Greeke emperor now hearing of Tamerlane his comming to PRUSIA, sent his embassadours (the most honourable of his court) thether before to Axalla: by whom they were there stayed, vntill the comming of Tamerlane, who receiued them with all the honour that might be, shewing vnto them all his magnificence, and the order of his campe, to their great admiration. For it resembled a most populous and well gouerned cite; for the order that was therein, which brought vnto it plentie of all kind of victuals, and other marchandise, as well for pleasure as for vse. By these embassadours, the Greeke emperor submitted all his empire together with his person, vnto Tamerlane the great conquerour, as his most faithfull subject and vas-saile: which he was bound (as he said) to doe, for that hee was by him deliuered from the most D cruell tirant in the world: as also for that the long journey he had passed, and the discommodities he had endured, with the losse of his people, and the danger of his person, could not bee recompenced, but by the offer of his owne life, and his subjects; which hee did for euer dedicate to his seruice, with all the fidelitie and loyalty that so great a benefite might deserue: besides that his so many vertues, and rare accomplishments, which made him famous throughout the world, did bind him so to doe. And that therefore he would attend him in his cheefe cite, to deliuer it into his hands as his owne, with all the empire of GREECE. Now the Greeke embassadours looked for no lesse than to fall into bondage to Tamerlane, thinking that which they offred to be so great and delicate a morcell, as that it would not be refused, especially of such a conquering prince as E was Tamerlane; and that the acceptance thereof in kindnesse, and friendship, was the best bargain they could make therein. But they receiued answer from this worthe prince, farre beyond their expectation. For he with a mild countenance beholding them, answered them, That he was not come from so farre a countiey, or vnderaken so much paines for the enlargement of his dominions already large inough, (too base a thing for him to put himselfe into so great danger and trauaile for) but rather to winne honour, and thereby to make his name famous vnto all po-steritie for euer: And that therefore it should well appeare vnto the world, that hee was come to aid him, being requested as his friend and allie: And that his vpriht meaning therein, was the greatest cause, That God from aboue had beheld his power, and thereby brused the head of the greatest and fiercest enemy of mankind that was vnder heauen: And now to get him an immor-F tall name, would make free so great and flourishing a cite as was CONSTANTINOPLE, go-uerned by so noble and ancient an house as the emperours: That vnto his courage, hee had alwaies faith joynd, such as should neuer suffer him to make so great a breach in his reputation, as that it should be reported of him, That in the colour of a friend, he came to inuade the dominions of his allies: That he desired no more, but that the seruice hee had done for the Greeke emperor, might for euer be ingrauen in the memorie of his poste-ritie,

ritie, to the end they might for euer wish well vnto him and his successours, by remembering the good he had done them; That long might the noble emperor liue, happily to gouern his estate. And that before his returne he would so well consider for the establishing of the same, as that he should not lightly fall againe into the like jeopardie, alwaies assuring himselfe of his good will and fauour towards him. Easie it is to judge, what joy these Greeke embassadours receiued, to heare this so kind an answer from the mouth of Tamerlane himselfe: who rather than he would seeme to breake his faith, refused an empire offered vnto him, with one of the most stately and magnificent cities of the world. Few princes (I suppose) would performe such a part: but so there be likewise but few Tamerlans in the world. These embassadours by the commaundement of Tamerlane, were by Axalla royally feasted, and all the honour done them that might be. One of them being sent backe to carrie these v unexpected newes vnto the Greeke emperor, filled both him and all the citie of CONSTANTINOPLE with exceeding joy and gladnesse, which both he and his subjects in generall spared not with bonfires and all other signes of joy and pleasure to manifest. And the more to shew his thankfulness, shortly after by the aduice of his graue counsaillours, passed ouer the strait into ASIA to see Tamerlane at PRUSA, and in person himselfe to giue him thanks: who hearing of his comming, and very glad thereof, presently vpon the first dayes journey sent the prince Axalla to meet him, and to certifie him of the joy that he conceiued, to haue the good hap for to see him, as also to conduct him to PRUSA: where those two great princes, with the greatest magnificence that might be, met, and so spent one whole day together. The Greeke emperor the next day taking his leaue, was by Tamerlane with much honour conducted out of the citie. Now had Tamerlane himselfe conceiued a secret desire to see this so famous a citie as was CONSTANTINOPLE, from which he was not now farre, yet would he not goe thither as a conquerour, but as a priuat person: which by the meanes of Axalla was accomplished, and he thereto by the Greeke emperor priuately receiued, and with all familiaritie possible, entertained: the emperor shewing vnto him all the rare and excellent things that were therein to be seene: and the other Greeke princes deuising all the meanes they could to do him pleasure, and them which did accompanie him; who were in a manner all apparelled after the Greeke fashion. At which time the Greeke emperor himselfe was curious to shew vnto him all the faire gardens alongst the sea coast, a league or two from CONSTANTINOPLE, and so priuately conducting him, spent fife or six daies, with all the mirth that might be possible: Tamerlane by the way oftentimes saying, That he had neuer seene a fairer citie: and that it was indeed the citie (considering the faire and rich situation thereof) of right, worthie to commaund all the world. He wondered at the costly buildings of the temples, the faire ingrauen pillars, the high pyramids, and the making of the faire gardens, and oftentimes afterwards said, That he nothing repented him of his so long and dangerous a voyage, if it had been onely but to haue presented from fire and sword so noble a citie as that was. In the Greeke emperor he commended greatly his mild nature and courtesie: who knowing him aboue all things to take pleasure in faire seruicable hordes, gaue vnto him thirtie of the fairest, strongest, and readiest, that were possible to be gotten, all most richly furnished; and sent likewise faire presents vnto all the princes and great commanders of the armie, and bountifully caused to bee deliuered vnto them all things which he thought to be necessarie for the armie. So after many great kindneses in short time passed, and a strait bond of friendship made, and by solemne oath confirmed betwixt the two great princes, Tamerlane with great contentment tooke his leaue of the emperor, and returned againe to his armie at PRUSA. Wherewith he now at his pleasure without resistance wasted and spoiled all Baiazet his dominion in ASIA, no man daring to make head against him.

The yeare being now well spent, and Winter drawing on, Tamerlane dispersed his armie into diuers of the prouinces of the lesser ASIA, expecting still when some of Baiazet his sonnes or other friends should make succor or meanes vnto him for his deliuerance, but none came: some fearing Tamerlane his heauie indignation, and others no lesse dreading the fierce nature of Baiazet himselfe, who if hee had bene deliuered, was like ynough (as was thought) to haue taken sharpe reuenge vpon all them which forsooke him in the late battaile, and therefore neuer made intercession for him. Whereupon Tamerlane one day passing by him, said vnto him: I maruell that none of thy sonnes or friends either come to see thee or to entreat for thee, it must needs be that thou hast euill deserued of them, as thou hast of others: yet how thinkest thou, If I should set thee at libertie, would they againe receiue thee as their lord and soueraigne, or not? To whom

Baiazet boldly answered: VV ere I at libertie, thou shouldest well see, how that I want neither courage nor meanes to reuenge all my wrongs, and to make those disobedient & forgetfull, to know their duties better. VVhich his proud answere made Tamerlane to keepe a straighter hand ouer him.

In this great and bloodie warre, wherein the Othoman empire had almost taken end, the Sultan of Egypt had (as is aforesaid) giuen aid vnto Baiazet: which Tamerlane tooke in so euill part, as that he resolved to be thereof reuenged. For as he was vnto his friends of all others most kind and courteous, so was he to his enemies no lesse terrible and dreadfull. Yet thinking it good before his departure out of the lesser ASIA, to take some good order with these his new conquests: and finding nothing more honourable to resolve vpon, he restored vnto the poore Mahometane princes (Tachretin, Isfendiar, Germian, and the rest before fled vnto him for refuge) all their ancient inheritance, with something more, as he did also diuers cities and countries of NATOLIA vnto the Greeke emperor, for the yearely tribute of foure hundred thousand ducats of gold, and eight hundred thousand franks of siluer, which the emperor promised to pay vnto him yearely. And so hauing enticed his armie with the spoiles of the Othoman empire in ASIA, he turned his forces against the Egyptian Sultan, and so passing through CARAMANIA, entred into SYRIA, then part of the Sultans kingdom: where neere vnto ALLEPPO (being before yielded vnto him) was fought betwixt them a great and mortall battaile, the Sultan hauing in his armie an hundred thousand foot, and seuentie foure thousand horse: whereof there were thirtie thousand Mamelukes, accounted the best horsemen of the world. In which battaile, Axalla the great capitaine, with the auantguard of Tamerlane his armie, was hardly distressed, and Axalla himselfe taken: but forthwith againe rescued by Tamerlane: who had hee not by his comming on with new forces, speedily restored the battaile, cunningly protracted by Axalla, that day was like ynough to haue made an end of his good fortune. But the victorie after a long and cruell fight (wherein were fourescore thousand men on both sides slaine) inclining to Tamerlane, the Sultan fled, Tamerlane pursuing him by the space of three leagues. After which victorie, Tamerlane deuising his armie, sent Axalla with fortie thousand horse and fiftie thousand foot, to pursue the Sultan alongst the coast of ARABIA: who oftentimes shewed himselfe, with some foure thousand horse to haue hindered Axalla, who hauing the smallest forces, followed him the nearest. Tamerlane himselfe in the meane time with threescore thousand horse, & an hundred thousand foot, marching alongst the sea coast, had all the cities as he went yielded vnto him, as MAGATA, AMAN, other wise called APAMBA, TORTOSA, BARRUTO, & NEPHTHALIN: only the strong citie of DAMASCO refused to receiue him, whereinto the Sultan had put the prince Zamaden, with a strong garrison, who did what hee might to haue defended the same. But all in vaine, for Tamerlane hauing by batterie ouerthrowne a great part of the wall, by assault woon the citie, only the castle yet remaining, as being of a wonderfull strength, and almost impregnable: whereinto such a multitude had at the taking of the citie retired themselves, as was not possible therein long to liue: who in short time pinched with hunger, and many of them dead, the rest vpon safeguard of their liues offered to yeeld: whom for all that Tamerlane would not receiue to mercie, to make them feeble what it was to hold out against him: so that most of them dying of famine, the rest yielded without condition, and were for their obstinacie almost all slaine. VVhich his feruor towards them of DAMASCO, caused, that thirtie leagues off they brought the keyes of their cities vnto him, in token of their submission: whom he no way molested, more than in contributing vnto the charge of his armie. From DAMASCO he turned directly towards IERUSALEM, at which time they of the citie had driuen out the Sultans garrison, as had almost all they of IUDAEA, submitting themselves vnto Tamerlane. At CHORAZNI the Sultan had left fix thousand men in garrison for the defence of the place, who at the first seemed to stand vpon their guard: but afterward dismaied to see so great an armie before it, and that Tamerlane hauing approached the wals, was set downe to haue it, they submitted themselves and found mercie. In which citie Tamerlane left certaine of his men in garrison, for the better repressing of the Mamelukes, who with often incursions troubled his armie. So marching on, he himselfe with certaine horsemen for his guard, rode to IERUSALEM to visit the sepulchre so much reuerenced of all nations, and there to make his oblations: where hee was of the inhabitants joyfully receiued, and hauing sought out all the antiquities of that ancient citie, would be conducted vnto all the places thereabouts, where Iesus Christ had preached, euen as the pilgrimes doe: and comming to the sepulchre, gave therunto, and the deuout there, many rich and precious gifts, to the great contentment of all men (to see him honour those holy places) but of the Jews only, who greatly blamed him for so doing: of whom of all others Tamerlane made no reckoning, but called them the accursed of God. There had he newes that the Sultan had gathered all his forces, and being come into Ægypt, was there fortifying of his cities, especially the great cities of Alexandria and Cairo. Tamerlane his armie in the meane time by his commandement came towards Ægypt to Damiata: which strong citie hee thought not good to leave behind him, although he was by some perswaded so to do, for that it was thought impregnable, as well in respect of the castle, as of the strong garrison that the Sultan had put therein. But he whose fortune nothing could hinder, would needs goe thither; and so hauing commaunded Axalla to set vpon it, followed himselfe after with the rest of his armie. Now Axalla hauing summoned the citie, and declared vnto the inhabitants (who were most of them Christians) the mildnesse and courtesie of Tamerlane, as also who himselfe was, and what religion he held: causing many of the Greeke captaines to speake vnto them, and to tell them of the miserie they endured vnder the Moores and Mamalukes: so faire preuailed with them, that they all determined to aduantage their liues, to put the Mamalukes out of the citie, with all them that saquered the Sultan. And so in the night taking vp armes, made themselves masters of one quarter of the citie, and deliuered one of the gates to Axalla: whereby he entering, put all the Mamalukes to the sword, or tooke them prisoners, and so gained the citie. Whereof Tamerlane hearing, being as yet vpon his march, was in good hope of so prosperous a beginning, to find an happie end also of his designs in Ægypt. For besides the good fortune thereof, hee knew that this haven of Damiata, might serue him with victuals out of all the parts of Greece, as the emperor Emanuel had promised him, and wherein hee nothing failed him. Into which port Tamerlane hauing made his entrie, left there in garrison two thousand of the emperor Emanuel's souldiours, with a gouernour, of whom he tooke an oath for their obedience. So hauing stayed a space at Damiata, he caused his vanguard to march towards Alexandria: and hauing passed ouer the riuer, euen in an instant turned directly vnto Cairo: to the great astonishment of the Sultan, who made prouision for the defence of Alexandria, as the necesse vnto danger. But vnderstanding of these newes, vied such diligence, that he entered into the citie with fortie thousand horse, and threescore thousand foot, euen as Tamerlane his armie approached, purposing in person himselfe to defend it. By whose coming, the great citie ready before to haue reuolted, was againe in his obedience confirmed, to the great hinderance of Tamerlane his affaires; for to remaine long before it, was impossible, for want of victuals for so great an armie in the enemies countrey. Yet notwithstanding all this, did not Tamerlane forbear to draw neere vnto it, and with all his armie to encampe neere vnto the same, hauing caused a great trench to be made for to couer his horsemen, and thereby to lodge his armie more safely: during which time he caused diuers onsets to be giuen, as well to trie what confidence the enemy had in himselfe, as to see how the people of the citie, especially the slaues (which in that populous citie are infinite) were affected towards him: who certainly enformed him of the state of the citie, and the armie; as glad to see the same by him shut vp, and the proud Mamalukes still put to the worst. But thus lying still at the siege, one day he thought it good to shew his armie before the citie, for to trie whether the enemy had a desire to come to a daie of battaile or not: as also to view what forces he had, and so indeed to seeke occasion to fight. In hope also, that if the Sultan did come forth with all his armie into the field, some reuolt might happen within the citie, as well by the slaues (vnto whom libertie was by him promised) as by the citizens themselves (discontented with the insolencie of the Mamalukes entered of late into the citie with the Sultan) vnto whom he had made it knowne by certaine slaues (for that purpose fled as fugitiues out of his armie into the citie) how that hee was not come to hurt them, but onely for the destruction of the Mamalukes, both his and their enemies. But betimes standing so in battaile array, no man came forth, neither was there any tumult or sturre raised in the citie, as hee had expected. For the Sultan in so great a citie well provided of all things, was resolved to wearie him out with lying still, and not to put all to the hazard of a battaile. Which Tamerlane perceiving, and set downe not to depart thence, but victorious, resolved likewise to force him euen in his greatest strength, in the heart of his greatest citie; although it were not to be done, but with great aduen-

adventure: such confidence he had in the strength and multitude of his armie. Now his purpose was, first to take one of the cities (for Cairo is diuided into three) & therein encamping himself, by litle & litle to aduance forward as he might, still fighting with the enemy. Vpon which resolution, he commaunded an assault to be giuen, and hauing brought his footmen vnto the place where he would haue them to giue the onset (for the citie was not walled, but onely fortified with ditches and trenches) he commaunded the prince of Thanaïs with fiftie thousand footmen, to begin the assault, euen in the face of the enemy: which hee most valiantly performed, and there began a most terrible and cruell fight. Axalla in the meane time, deeming (as the truth was) that the Sultan had drawn his greatest forces vnto the place where the prince of Thanaïs fought to enter, as vnto a place of greatest danger: set a compasse about, and vpon another quarter of the citie, with small resistance passed the trenches; where he presently left thirtie thousand men to fill vp the ditches, and to make way for the horsemen to enter: aduancing forward himselfe, against twentie thousand sent by the Sultan to haue stopped his further passage: the prince of Thanaïs being at the same time almost beaten backe by the Mamalukes. But the way being made plaine, by them that were for that purpose left by Axalla, and ten thousand horse entered, which charged vpon the backs of the Mamalukes, where the Sultan himselfe was; and they seconded by ten thousand more sent in by Tamerlane, following himselfe after, with all his power: the Sultan retired vnto a second strength, which he had made in the next citie. The fight endured full the space of seauen houres, wherein were slaine of the Sultan his men aboue sixteene thousand: and of Tamerlane's betwixt seauen and eight thousand. Who contented to haue lodged the enemy, and gained a third part of the citie, caused a retrait to be sounded, in hope the next daie to winne all the rest, as indeed he did. For the prince of Thanaïs the next daie forcing the enemies trenches in one place, and Axalla in another, the Sultan after a great fight finding himselfe hardly pressed by the obstinate enemy, and too weake long to hold out, retired, and so forthwith abandoned the citie, and encamped himselfe along the side of the riuer Nilus, with purpose to passe the same, and to flye to Alexandria his second strength and refuge. Which Tamerlane suspecting, followed after him with his horsemen (who onely were in order) and some few foot, hardly drawne from the citie, which their fellowes were in spoiling; so as hee was glad to promise them especially, to regard and reward their good seruice. Against whom the Sultan vpon a narrow cawsey, had opposed twelue or fiftie thousand men, whom he called his slaues (to fauour his passage) but were indeed his best souldiours, and stood fast, the place seruing greatly for their aduantage: who for all that at length forced by their enemies, still increasing vpon them, (though not without great losse) cast themselves into the great riuer, and made a most honourable retrait: euerie man hauing his weapon in the one hand, and swimming with the other to the farther bank. The Sultan flying with some eightene thousand horse (for the rest were sundrie waies fled or else drowned) is reported in his flight, to haue comforted his men, by telling of them, That they were not men that had vanquished them, but gods, there appeared in them so great wisdom, force, and valour: diuers of the Mamalukes taken in the late fight, being brought before Tamerlane, and by him courteously vied, were of him demanded, if they could be content to serue him, now that their maister was fled and gone? which they all vterly refused. Whom notwithstanding, for their fidelitie, Tamerlane set at libertie to goe againe vnto the Sultan: as no lesse desirous to be admired of his enemies for his bountie and courtesie, than feared for his force and valour. The wonderfull wealth of this so great and famous a citie became a preie vnto his souldiours: who for the space of foure and twentie houres had the spoile thereof, being then by open proclamation commaunded euerie man to repaire to his quarter. The citizens hest all at libertie, not suffering any of them to be taken prisoners. And so leauing ten thousand good souldiours with a great number of others (whereof he caried a great multitude in his armie, planting euerie where as he passed as it were new colonies) and carrying away with him such of the inhabitants as he thought might hurt him, and taking order for all things necessarie for the keeping of such a citie, he caused his armie to passe ouer the riuer for to follow the Sultan vnto Alexandria, to the end not to leaue his victorie vnperfect. Axalla hastening before with the auanguard, for to hinder the Sultan for joyning his forces againe together; and the rest of his armie conducted by the prince of Thanaïs. He himselfe with an infinite number of boats, and souldiours to attend vpon him, going by water, taking great pleasure to behold the faire riuer, and his swift course sometimes, and in an instant to become so calme as if it scarce mooued.

Cairo assaulted by Tamerlane.

The

The citizens of ALEXANDRIA hearing of his coming, and fearing what might betide them, besought the Sultan to haue compassion of their estate, and to withdraw himselfe into LYBIA, whether Tamerlane for the barrenesse of the countrey could not with any great power follow him; resolved for their parts to giue place vnto fortune, and to doe as the time required; and no more to resist so great a force, whereof they had alreadie made sufficient triall: promising yet to remaine in heart still his, and vpon the first occasion offered, to make the same to him appeare. Whereupon the Sultan seeing all things desperate, determined for a time to retire, in hope, that time would bring some change: as also that Tamerlane his populous armie would not long remaine there. And so departing out of ALEXANDRIA with teares standing in his eyes, oftentimes said, That God was angrie with him and his people, and that hee must of necessity suffer the fatall ouerthrow of his estate, himselfe hauing done as much as in him lay, according to his charge, and the expectation the world had of him: and yet that he hoped at length to returne againe, and deliuer his people from the bondage, whereunto they must now needs submit themselves. Tamerlane coming to ALEXANDRIA (before yeelded to Ascalla) there staid a great while, sending Ascalla to pursue the Sultan, exceedingly grieved that he could not get him into his hands: and therefore still fearing some innouation to be by him raised, which caused him to deale the more hardly with them whom he suspected to fauour him. Now the bruit of these victories hauing with Ascalla passed beyond ALEXANDRIA into LYBIA: had brought such a feare, not onely vpon the people adioyning vnto these conquests, but also vpon all AFRICA (they supposing that Tamerlane did follow,) that two and twentie of the Moore kings sent their embassadours vnto him, to offer vnto him their obedience: the Sultan as a man forsaken of fortune, still flying before him. Of the nearest of which kings, Tamerlane tooke hostages: as for the other farther off, he contented himselfe with their faith giuen, and with the other outward signes of their good wils.

Tamerlane descends to retorne into his country.

Now after this long trauaile and paines taken, was Tamerlane more desirous than hee had before vsed, to see the pleasures of his owne natiue countrey: the rather thereunto moued by the request of his wife, then longing for his returre; and the newes hee heard of the sicknesse of the old Tartarian emperour his father in law; besides that, age it selfe began to bring vnto him a desire of rest: with whom also, the desires of his souldiours well agreed, as men now wearie to haue run so many and diuers fortunes: The onely stay was, that hee expected the coming of Calibes, an old and faithfull seruant of his, whom he for his good desert had of his owne accord appointed gouernour of all his new conquests in ÆGYPT and SYRIA: A great honour no doubt, but not too great for him that had so well deserved. So mindfull was he of the good deserts of his faithfull seruants, as that he needed not by others to be of them put in remembrance, were they neuer so farre off, as was now Calibes, who at this time was with the third part of his armie making way for him along the great riuer EUPHRATES, for the conquest of MESOPOTAMIA and PERSIA: whose coming was now with great deuotion looked for of the whole armie, desirous to returne. Which their expectation he long delayed not, but being sent for, came to ALEXANDRIA, whither the whole armie was now by the commaundement of Tamerlane againe assembled. Vpon whose coming, Tamerlane departed from ALEXANDRIA, hauing there left the prince Zamalkan (a man of great reputation) with six thousand horsemen and ten thousand foot, as gouernour of that place, and lieutenant generall vnder Calibes: whom Tamerlane (as I haue said) had now appointed to commaund ouer all ÆGYPT and SYRIA, together with the countries newly conquered in LYBIA and BARBARIE: and now conducting him vnto the great citie of CAIRE, and there taking the best order he could for the preservation of his new conquest, left him with fortie thousand horse and fiftie thousand foot. And so hauing sufficiently instructed him, how he would haue those kingdomes gouerned, dismissed him, not like a master, but as a companion, seeming very sorry to leave him destitute of his presence. So setting forward with his armie, conducted by the prince of THANAIS, Tamerlane himselfe, with a few to guard him, by the way turned aside vnto IERUSALEM: where he remained eluen dayes, daily visiting the Sepulchre of Christ Iesus (whom hee called the God of the Christians) and the ruines of Salomon his temple: much wondering thereat, and at IERUSALEM, the seat of Dauids kingdom, and of that great Salomon, but grieved that he could not see them fully in their former beautie. He only despised the Jews, which had committed so cruell a murder against him that came to saue them. And to shew his deuotion to-

towards the holy citie, commaunded it to be free from all subsidies and garisons of men of warre: and gaue great gifts vnto the monasteries, and honoured them so long as he remained there. Departing from IERUSALEM, he came to DAMASCO: which great citie, as well for that it was infected with the opinion of Iezides (accounted an arch hereticke among the Mahometanes) as also euill affected to his proceedings, he caused to be rased, and the bones of Iezides the false prophet to be digged vp and burnt, and his graue before much honoured, in despite to be filled with dung. So marching on, and blasting the world before him as he went (for long it were, and from our purpose to recount all his victories) he passed ouer the riuer EUPHRATES, and hauing conquered MESOPOTAMIA, with the great citie of BABYLON; and all the kingdom of PERSIA, loaded with the spoile of the world, and eternized for euer, he returned at length to SAMERCAND, the famous place of his birth, and glorious seat of his empire.

Now had Baiazet (but a little before one of the greatest princes on earth, and now the scorner of fortune, and a byword to the world) with great impatiencie laie two yeares in most miserable thraldome, for most part shut vp in an yron cage, as some dangerous wild beast: and hating no better meanes to end his loathed life, did violently beat out his braines against the barres of the yron grate wherein he was inclosed, and so died about the yeare of our Lord 1399. Yet of his death are diuers other reports: some saying, That hee died of an ague, proceeding of sorrow and greefe: others, that he poysoned himselfe: and the Turks affirming, that he was set at libertie by Tamerlane, being by him beforehand poysoned, whereof hee died three dayes after hee was enlarged (a report not like to be true:) but howsoeuer it was, his end appeareth to haue ben right miserable. His dead bodie at the request of his sonne Mahomet, was by Tamerlane sent to ASPRAPOLEIS, from whence it was afterwards conueyed to PRUSA, and there lieth buried in a chappell neere vnto the great Mahometane temple without the citie Eastward: where also lieth his beloved wife Despina, with his eldest sonne Erthogrul. And fast by in a little chappell lieth buried his brother Iacup, whom he in the beginning of his raigne murdered.

The miserable
death of Baia- zet.

These two great and mightie princes, Tamerlane and Baiazet (both of them whilest they liued, a burthen vnto the world) as they tooke their beginning from the Scythes or Tartars, so were they of like honourable progenitors descended: Baiazet being the fourth in descent from the warlike Othoman, the raiser of his familie; and Tamerlane in like degree from the great Zingis, the first and most fortunat leader of the Tartars (his countrey men) vnto the pleasures of the East: both princes of great power and like spirit, wise, hardie, painefull, resolute, and most skilfull in martiall affaires; but ambitious about measure, the ground of all the former troubles by them raised, to the astonishment of the world. Howbeit, the great vertues and other the honourable qualities of Baiazet, were in him by his chollericke and waiward nature much obscured: which made him to exceed both in crueltie and pride: being also much more handfast than were his honourable predecessors. For which causes he was much feared and lesse beloued of his souldiours and men of warre in generall, and of them at his most need forsaken. He vsed commonly to say, That his treasures were his childrens meat, and not his souldiours pay: which by way of reproch was by a common souldior cast in his teeth, when hee raged to see himselfe by them forsaken in the great battell against Tamerlane, telling him as he fled, That he ran not away, but went to seek his pay, wherewith to prouide his children bread. Whereas all the aforesaid vertues in Tamerlane were graced with diuers others of like nature, no man being vnto his friends more courteous or kind, either vnto his enemies more dreadfull or terrible. The good seruice of his seruants hee neuer forgot, either left the same long vnrewarded: being thereof so mindfull, as that he needed not by them or others in their behalfe, to be put in remembrance thereof, hauing alwaies by him a catalogue both of their names and good deserts, which he daily perused. Oftentimes saying that day to be lost, wherein he had not giuen them something: and yet neuer bestowing his preferments vpon such as ambitiously sought the same (as deeming them in so doing, vnworthie thereof) but vpon such, as whose modestie or desert he thought worthie those his great fauours; so tempering the seueritie of his commaunds with the greatnesse of his bountie, as that it is hard to say, whether he was of his nobilitie and men of war, for the one more feared, or for the other beloued; both, the great staies of princes states: feare keeping the obstinat in their obedience, and loue, the dutifull in their deuotion. But with Baiazet it was not so, who deeming all done for him, but dutie, and by nature chollericke and proud (after the manner of tyrants) desired about all to be of his subjects feared, not much regarding how little hee was of them beloued: not the least cause of his great fall and miserie, and that therein he was of his owne so finally regarded: where in for all that he is to be accounted more fortunat than the other great conquerour hisemie, hauing euer since in the lineall descent of himselfe, had one of the greatest Monarchs of the world to succeed still in his kingdome and empire: as hee hath euen at this day, the great Sultan Mahomet, the third of that name, who now in great majestie raigeth in CONSTANTINOPLE: Whereas the glorie of Tamerlane his empire, euen in his owne time growne to the height thereof, and labouring with the greatnesse of it selfe, and by him deuided amongst his sonnes, shortly after his death decayed, rent in sunder by ambition and ciuile discord; and not long after, together with his posteritie, rooted out by Vsun-Cassanes the Persian king, to the worlds woonder tooke end: nothing of the huge greatnesse thereof now or since then remaining, more than the same thereof: as doth also the miserie of the other so brought low. But leauing this mirrour of mishap (Baiazet) vnto his rest, and Tamerlane for a while to triumph in SAMERCANDE: let vs now proceed in the course of our Historie, yet not forgetting by the way to remember such Christian princes as then liued together with these two great Monarchs.

By force of armes stout Mahomet his fathers kingdome gaines,
And doth the broken state thereof repaire with restlesse paines.
What so the force of Tamerlane had from his father tane,
He by his fortune and his force restor'd the same againe.
The Dacians he vanquished, and Seruians in field,
And forc'd the people neere to thee faire ISTER, for to yeeld.
So once againe the Turkish state (by him rais'd vp on hie)
Hath to thine empire, Romulus, brought great calamitie.

THE LIFE OF MAHOMET, THE FIRST OF THAT NAME, FIFTH KING OF THE TURKS, AND RESTORER OF THEIR SORE SHAKEN KINGDOME.

Ow wonderfully the Turkish kingdome was by the violence of Tamerlane shaken, and the majestie thereof defaced, it well appeareth, in that the Histories of that time, as well those of the Greekes, as of the Turks, in nothing more differ, than in the successors of Baiaſet, their late vnfortunat king. Some writing, that hee had two sons, Orchanes, (otherwise called Calepinus) and Mahomet: and that Calepinus in the second yeare of his raigne was slaine, and his kingdome possessed by Mahomet his brother. Others reporting, That Baiaſet had two sons, namely, Calepinus and Mustapha: and that Calepinus succeeding his father in the Turkish kingdome, when hee had raigned six yeares, died, leauing behind him two sonnes, Orchanes and Mahomet: and that Orchanes being young, was slaine by his vncl: whom Mahomet in reuenge of his brothers death, afterwards slew, & possessed the kingdome himselfe. Others reckon vp seuen sonnes of Baiaſet: Iosua, Musulmanes, Moses, Calepinus, Iosua the yonger, Muſtapha, and Halis; with an vncertaine succession amongst them also. This diuersitie of opinions, full of no lesse vncertainetie; as I meane not to follow in report of this historie, so will I not spend any time in refuting the same (although much might be said in the matter) but leaue these reports, together with the historie following, to such credit, as they shall hap to find with the considerat readers.

The Greeke Historiographers (best like to know the Turkish succession, as well by reason of their neerenesse, as in that they were by them as their bad neighbours, so much troubled) make no mention at all either of Calepinus or of Orchanes: In like manner, Historie Musulmane Turcorum, diligently gathered out of the Turks owne histories by To. Leunclavius (a learned physician, and himselfe a great traualer amongst them, and therefore deseruing the more credit) do not so much as name the succession of Calepinus or Orchanes, after the captiuitie of Baiaſet, but rejecteth them both as counterfeits. But in mine opinion (without prejudice to any, that vpon better reason may deeme otherwise) the great confusion of the Turkish kingdome, in short time wrought by the mightie Tamerlane and his Tartarians, with the ciuile discord and warre afterwards arising among the sonnes of Baiaſet, struiuing (all as it were at once) for the restlesse roome of soueraignetie, which suffereth no parteners; and euery one of them, according to his hap or power, laying hand vpon some oie part or other thereof, and beating himselfe therein for a time as a king, in countries so far distant; neuer leauing, vntill they had like the earth-borne brethren, wrought one anothers destructions; might giue iust occasion of such diuersitie of reports as is before spoken of, concerning the succession of that time, in that troubled and rent kingdome: some reckoning one, some another: and some, such as neuer were, to haue succeeded in the government, and so vntuly augmenting the number of the Turkish kings. VV herefore leauing Calepinus & Orchanes vnto them that first found them, with that little, which without any good ground and lesse probabilitie is written of their supposed raigne: I (following the authoritie of the Turkish historie) reckon this Mahomet, one of the youngest sonnes of Baiaſet (of whom we are now to intreac) fifth king of the Turkes: who after great and dangerous wars, as well against his own brethren, as his forraigne enemies, was at length solely inuested in the Turkish kingdom, about ten yeares after the captiuitie of his father Baiaſet, as shall hereafter be declared.

The true posterity of Baiaſet.

Baiaſet after the manner of the Turkish kings, hauing laied vp the hope of his posteritie in the common treasure house of nature, rather than in the bodie of one lawfull wife, had by diuers wiues and concubines seuen sonnes, Ertogrud, otherwise called Orthobules, Emer-Soliman, Muſtaſpha-Zelebi (that is to say, the noble) Iſa-Zelebi, Muſa-Zelebi, Sultan Mahomet, and Casan-Zelebi. Of whom, Ertogrud the eldest was lost in the wars against Cass. Butchaniden, as is before said in the life of Baiaſet. Muſtaſpha was slaine in the great battaile against Tamerlane, and there buried in the bed of fame. Casan the yongest was a child in Baiaſet his court, when his father was taken, and afterwards with his sister Fatime deliuered as hostages, by their brother Solyman, vnto Emmanuel the emperor of CONSTANTINOPLE, where they both happily became Christians, and so shortly after died.

Solyman was by Alis Bassa president of Baiaſet his counsell, and other great captaines, conueyed out of the battaile against Tamerlane, into EVROPE: and so by them at HADRIANOPLE saluted Sultan. Mahomet fled out of the same battaile to AMASIA in CAPADOCIA, where he was in his fathers time gouernour. Iſa hearing of his fathers captiuitie, after the departure of Tamerlane with his Tartars, seized vpon PRUSA, a citie of BITHYNIA, the ancient seat of the Turkish kings, with the countrey adioyning, and there reigned as king. Muſa-Zelebi was taken prisoner with Baiaſet his father, and afterwards set at libertie by Tamerlane. But of their fortunes more shall be said in this historic following.

Mahomet's Conquest of Amasia.

Mahomet was but fiftene yeares old, when his father Baiaſet in the vnfortunate battaile at mount STELLA was taken prisoner, and was at the same time by his appointment gouernour of AMASIA, with a great part of CAPADOCIA adioyning: which places became so troublesome after the great victorie of Tamerlane, that the Turkes in that countrey were glad day and night for the safeguard of themselves, their wiues, and children, to keepe continuall watch and ward: inso-much, that many of them, wearied with those troubles, and despairing of better times, went into voluntarie exile, because they would not see so great miseries: which thing much greeued young Mahomet. Wherefore calling vnto him his most faithfull counsellors, to consult what course to take in the midst of so many dangers, it was by generall consent thought best (for so much as they could not without apparent danger continue neere vnto Tamerlane his forces) to get themselves farther off into places of more strength: and from thence to expect the departure of their enemies, and in the meane time to content themselves with such aduantages as occasion and chance of war might minister; cutting them short by policie, whom they were not able to meet in the plaine field: and so by little and little to weaken or wearie their mightie stragling enemies: For albeit that Tamerlane himselfe was not neere him, as then lying in CARIA; yet did the captaines of his great and victorious armie, at their pleasure spoile and forrage the countries farre and neere all ouer the lesser ASIA. Vpon this resolution, hee with all his forces departed from AMASIA, to DERBYN in PAPHLAGONIA: where by the way he encountered with Cara Tabin, a nigh kinsman to the prince Iſfendiar of CASTAMONA, his enemies; whom he put to flight, with great slaughter of his men. This was the beginning of Mahomet his good fortune. From thence he went to KEREDEN, and there staying certaine daies, sent a spie into Tamerlane his campe, to see how all things went there: and afterwards entered againe into counsell with his captains concerning his further proceedings. In which consultation, some were of opinion, That it was best for him to withdraw himselfe into the mountaines of the lesser ASIA, as a place of good safetie, vntill the departure of Tamerlan, which was shortly hoped for: for that it was not to be thought that Tamerlane would with his huge armie pursue him in that mountainie countrey, flying from hill to hill, and as it were from strength to strength. Others better aduised, thought those mountaines to be no places to trust vnto, and therefore that it were more honourable and as free from danger, for him to returne againe to AMASIA, and there to liue amongst his subjects, protecting them in such sort as he might, and not to leaue them for a prey to euery stragling company of the rude Tartarians. Which counsell he followed, as most reasonable: & being ready to set forward, the spie before by him sent into Tamerlanes campe, returned, certifying him, That he had seen his father Baiaſet in good health in the Tartars campe, but could not by any means speake with him by reason of the straight guard set ouer him: and that all that part of ASIA was by Tamerlane pos-possessed, who then with his armie wintred in CARIA and LYSIA: whereupon Mahomet returned backe againe to AMASIA: where he had not long staid, but that newes was brought vnto him, That one of the Tartarian princes called Cara Duletſchach (that is to say, the fortunate blacke king) was with an armie of twentie thousand comming to spoile his countrey, being giuen him by Tamerlane. With which newes he was exceedingly troubled. Wherefore with all speed calling together his forces, for the safeguard of his countrey, he sent before a spie to discouer the enemies doings. This diligent spie returned in all haſt, told Mahomet, That Cara Dulet lay at the towne of EGIOLVIS in GALATIA, in great securitie, lauding about him but a small power: for that he fearing no danger, had at that time disperſed his armie, to seeke after pillage abroad in the countrey. Mahomet taking hold of this oportunitie, marched thither with great celeritie, and suddenly setting vpon Cara Dulet, ouercame him. In which conflict Cara Dulet himselfe was shot through the head with an arrow and slaine, and his armie vtterly diſcomfited. Mahomet returning backe to AMASIA with victorie, refreshed and rewarded his souldiours, yet no lesse carefull for the safetie of his kingdom than before.

Cara Dulet slain.

Shortly after, he was aduertised that Cubad Oglu with a great armie laied hard siege to the citie of CASARTIA in CAPADOCIA, and was like in short time to take it, if it were not speedily relieved. By taking of which citie, that Tartar prince was like to make a great entrance, to the hazzarding of the whole countrey. Wherefore Mahomet hauing his armie alwaies in readinesse, marched day and night with such speed to CASARTIA, as that he was vpon Cubad Oglu before he was aware of his comming, and there slew most of his souldiours, and put him with the rest to flight. After that, hee entered into Cubad Oglu his countrey in PONTVS, and greuously spoiled and destroyed the same: at which time, he also by force wane the strong castle PALTAT in the confines of PHRYGIA.

Immediately after that, Inall Oglu another of Tamerlanes captaines (which at their pleasure with-out let, foraged all the countreys of the lesser ASIA, during the time that Tamerlane made his abode within the Turkes dominions) vpon the suddaine entered into CAPADOCIA with an armie of twentie thousand fighting men, killing the inhabitants, and spoiling the countrey before him: so that the people for feare left their dwellings, and fled into the woods and mountaines to hide themselves from his furie. Whereof Mahomet, hearing, was therewith exceedingly greeued, and wrote vnto him as followeth:

Sultan Mahomet vnto the Prince Inall Oglu.

Whereas without any iust or lawfull cause, or any war proclaimed, you haue invaded our kingdom, and cease not cruelly to kill our subjects, by God committed to our protection; and to spoile their wealth and labours, to the great disturbance of the Mahometan common weale; and make no end of your malice and cruelty: you doe therein quite digresse from the manners and lawes of the true Mahometans or right beleeuers. For if thou wouldest not onely bee accounted, but indeed bee a true Musul-man, thou shouldest forthwith depart out of my kingdom with thine armie; thou shouldest not thus shed the innocent blood, or without cause thus wrong my people: but forasmuch as thou knowest not what besee-meth thee, neither wilt listen vnto good counsaile, but wilfully proceed in thy wicked purpose; falsely persuading thy selfe, this my kingdom to bee destitute of a lawfull inheritor; and therefore doeſt so great wrong and iniurie vnto the defendours of the true Mahometan religion: I would thou shouldest know, that I with my so often victorious armie, will shortly by the power of God come against thee, and in plaine field according to thy deserts chastise thee. Therefore whileſt thou yet mayest, reclaim thy selfe, and proceed not too farre in thine obstinacie: too late repentance did neuer man yet good. Thus much we thought good to aduerſe thee, that thou shouldest not bee ignorant of our purpose, but mightest so better consider and dispose both of thy selfe and thine affaires. Mahomet fifth king of the Turkes.

to intreat) fifth king of the Turkes: who after great and dangerous wars, as well against his own brethren, as his fortaime enemies, was at length solely inuested in the Turkish kingdome, about ten yeares after the captiuitie of his father Baiaſet, as shall hereafter be declared.

The true poſſeſſion of Baiaſet.

Baiaſet after the manner of the Turkish kings, hauing laied vp the hope of his poſteritie in the common treaſure houſe of nature, rather than in the bodie of one lawfull wife, had by diuers wiues and concubines ſeuſon ſonnes, Ertoghrul, otherwiſe called Orthobules, Emer-Soliman, Muſtaſpha-Zelebi (that is to ſay, the noble) Iſa-Zelebi, Muſa-Zelebi, Sultan Mahomet, and Cafan-Zelebi. Of whom, Ertoghrul the eldeſt was loſt in the wars againſt Cafi Buichaniden, as is before ſaid in the life of Baiaſet. Muſtaſpha was ſlaine in the great battaile againſt Tamerlane, and there buried in the bed of fame. Cafan the yongelt was a child in Baiaſet his court, when his father was taken, and afterwards with his ſiſter Fatime deliuered as hoſtages, by their brother Solyman, vnto Emmanuel the emperour of CONSTANTINOPLE, where they both happily became Chriſtians, and ſo ſhortly after died.

Solyman was by Aliu Baſſa preſident of Baiaſet his counſell, and other great captaines, conueyed out of the battaile againſt Tamerlane, into EUROPE: and ſo by them at HADRIANOPOLE ſaluted Sultan. Mahomet fled out of the ſame battaile to AMASIA in CAPADOCIA, where he was in his fathers time gouernour. Iſa hearing of his fathers captiuitie, after the departure of Tamerlane with his Tartars, ſeized vpon PRUSA, a citie of BITHYNIA, the ancient ſeat of the Turkish kings, with the countrey adioyning, and there reigned as king. Muſa-Zelebi was taken priſoner with Baiaſet his father, and afterwards ſet at libertie by Tamerlane. But of their fortunes more ſhall be ſaid in this hitoriſe following.

uerneur of Amaſia.

Mahomet was but ſitcene yeares old, when his father Baiaſet in the vnfortunate battaile at mount STELLA was taken priſoner, and was at the ſame time by his appointment gouernour of AMASIA, with a great part of CAPADOCIA adioyning: which places became ſo troubleſome after the great victorie of Tamerlane, that the Turkes in that countrey were glad day and night for the ſafegard of themſelues, their wiues, and children, to keepe continuall watch and ward: inſomuch, that many of them, wearied with thoſe troubles, and deſpairing of better times, went into voluntarie exile, becauſe they would not ſee ſo great miſeries: which thing much greued young Mahomet. Wherefore calling vnto him his moſt faithfull counſellors, to conſult what courſe to take in the middeſt of ſo many dangers, it was by generall conſent thought beſt (for ſo much as they could not without apparent danger continue nere vnto Tamerlane his forces) to get themſelues farther off into places of more ſtrength: and from thence to expect the departure of their enemies, and in the meane time to content themſelues with ſuch aduantages as occaſion and chance of war might miniſter; cutting them ſhort by policie, whom they were not able to meet in the plaine field: and ſo by little and little to weaken or wearie their mightie ſtragling enemies: For albeit that Tamerlane himſelfe was not nere him, as then lying in CARTA; yet did the captaines of his great and victorior armie, at their pleaſure ſpoile and forrage the countries ſane and nere all ouer the leſſer ASIA. Vpon this reſolution, hee with all his forces departed from AMASIA, to DERBY in PAPHLAGONIA: where by the way he encountered with Cara Iahia, a nigh kinsman to the prince Iſfendiari of CASTAMONA, his enemy; whom he put to flight, with great ſlaughter of his men. This was the beginning of Mahomet his good fortune. From thence he went to KAREDEN, and there ſtaying certaine daies, ſent a ſpie into Tamerlane his campe, to ſee how all things went there: and afterwards entered againe into counſell with his captaines concerning his farther proceedings. In which conſultation, ſome were of opinion, That it was beſt for him to withdraw himſelfe into the mountaines of the leſſer ASIA, as a place of good ſafetie, vntill the departure of Tamerlane, which was ſhortly hoped for: for that it was not to be thought that Tamerlane would with his huge armie purſue him in that mountainie countrey, flying from hill to hill, and as it were from ſtrength to ſtrength. Others better aduiſed, thought thoſe mountaines to be no places to truſt vnto, and therefore that it were more honourable and as free from danger, for him to retorne againe to AMASIA, and there to liue amongſt his ſubjects, protecting them in ſuch ſort as he might, and not to leaue them for a prei to euery ſtragling company of the rude Tartarians. Which counſell he followed, as moſt reaſonable: & being ready to ſet forward, the ſpie before by him ſent into Tamerlane his campe, returned, certifying him, That he had ſeen his father Baiaſet in good health in the Tartars campe, but could not by any means ſpeake with him by reaſon of the ſtraight guard ſet ouer him: and that all that part of ASIA was by Tamerlane poſpoſſeſſed, who then with his armie wintred in CARTA and LYSIA: when vpon Mahomet returned backe againe to AMASIA: where he had not long ſtaied, but that newes was brought vnto him, That one of the Tartarian princes called Cara Duletſchach (that is to ſay, the fortunat blacke king) was with an armie of twentie thouſand comming to ſpoile his countrey, being giuen him by Tamerlane. With which newes he was exceedingly troubled. Wherefore with all ſpeed calling together his forces, for the ſafegard of his countrey, he ſent before a ſpie to diſcouer the enemies doings. This diligent ſpie returning in all haſt, told Mahomet, That Cara Dulet lay at the towne of BOGIOLVS in GALATIA, in great ſecuritie, lauing about him but a ſmall power; for that he fearing no danger, had at that time diſperſed his armie, to ſeek after pillage abroad in the countrey. Mahomet taking hold of this oportunitie, marched thither with great celeritie, and ſuddenly ſetting vpon Cara Dulet, ouercame him. In which conflict Cara Dulet himſelfe was ſhot through the head with an arrow and ſlaine, and his armie vtterly diſcomfited. Mahomet returning backe to AMASIA with victorie, reſtrefhed and rewarded his ſouldiors, yet no leſſe carefull for the ſafetie of his kingdome than before.

ſlaine.

Shortly after, he was aduertified that Cubad Ogli with a great armie laied hard ſiege to the citie of CESARTIAN CAPADOCIA, and was like in ſhort time to take it, if it were not ſpeedily releued. By taking of which citie, that Tartar prince was like to make a great entrance, to the hazzarding of the whole countrey. Wherefore Mahomet hauing his armie alwayes in readineſſe, marched day and night with ſuch ſpeed to CESARTIA, as that he was vpon Cubad Ogli before he was aware of his comming, and there ſlew moſt of his ſouldiours, and put him with the reſt to flight. After that, hee entred into Cubad Ogli his countrey in PONTVS, and greedouſly ſpoiled and deſtroied the ſame: at which time, he alſo by force wan the ſtrong caſtle PELTA in the confines of PHRIGIA.

Immediatly after that, Inall Ogli another of Tamerlane his captaines (which at their pleaſure without let, forraged all the countreys of the leſſer ASIA, during the time that Tamerlane made his abode within the Turkes dominions) vpon the ſuddaine entred into CAPADOCIA with an armie of twentie thouſand fighting men, killing the inhabitants, and ſpoiling the countrey before him: ſo that the people for feare left their dwellings, and fled into the woods and mountaines to hide themſelues from his furie. Whereof Mahomet hearing, was therewith exceedingly greued, and wrote vnto him as followeth:

Sultan Mahomet vnto the Prince Inall Ogli.

Whereas without any juſt or lawfull cauſe, or any war proclaimed, you haue inuaded our kingdome, and ceaſe not cruelly to kill our ſubjects, by God committed to our protection; and to ſpoile their wealth and labours, to the great diſturbance of the Mahometan common weale; and make no end of your malice and crueltie: you doe therein quite digreſſe from the manners and lawes of the true Mahometans or right beleeuers. For if thou wouldeſt not onely bee accounted, but indeed bee a true Maſul-man, thou ſhouldeſt forthwith depart out of my kingdome with thine armie; thou ſhouldeſt not thus ſhed the innocent blood, or without cauſe thus wrong my people: but ſo far as thou knoweſt not what beſeemeth thee, neither wilt liſten vnto good counſaile, but wilfully proceed in thy wicked purpoſe, falſely perſuading thy ſelfe, this my kingdome to bee deſtitute of a lawfull inheritor; and therefore doeſt ſo great wrong and iniurie vnto the defendours of the true Mahometan religion: I would thou ſhouldeſt know, that I with my ſo often victorior armie, will ſhortly by the power of God come againſt thee, and in plaine field according to thy deſerts chaſtiſe thee. Therefore whileſt thou yet mayeſt reclaim thy ſelfe, and proceed not too farre in thine obſtinacie: too late repentance did neuer man yet good. Thus much we thought good to aduerſe thee, that thou ſhouldeſt not bee ignorant of our purpoſe, but mighteſt ſo better conſider and diſpoſe both of thy ſelfe and thine affaires. ing thy selfe but a boy and in truth a verie child. It becometh thee not to haue entred into these countreys, or to lay hands thereon, wrongfully gracing thy selfe with the title of a Sultan. Neither is there any cause, why thou shouldst complaine that I should lie in waight or seek after thy life, thy kingdom, or any thing that thine is. I challenge vnto my selfe this kingdom, but none of thine: out of which it is reason for thee, as a wrongfull intruder of thy selfe, to depart; whom otherwise I will forthwith thrust out, and joyne the same vnto the rest of my territories. Wherefore except thou without delay get thee packing, and cease to oppose thy selfe against my designs. Shortly after, Mahomet according to his promise meeting with this Tartar prince, by plaine force ouerthrew him, and had of him a notable victorie.

The like good hap he had also not long after, against Cosser Oglu, and Kiupeck Oglu, two other Tartarian captaines, at the castle of CHARACHIZAR and the plaine of ARTUCK OVA. And hearing that one Mesites, a Turk, had fortified himselfe in the ruines of SEBASTIA, and from thence spoiled the countrey round about, he sent Baiazet one of his Bassaes against him; who in short time tooke him and brought him bound vnto him: by whom he was adjudged to die. But seeing in the man an inuincible courage, and contempt of death, at such time as he should haue been executed; mooued therewith, he gaue him his pardon: for which he euer after continued vnto him faithfull, and did him great seruice.

Mahomet hauing many times thus vanquished the stragling Tartarian princes, which had fought the spoile of his countrey, became thereby famous amongst the great commanders of Tamerlane his armie: in so much that the bruit of his name came at length to Tamerlane his care, yet lying in the lesser ASIA: who as he thought it not worth his greatnesse and labour, himselfe in person to goe against so weak an enemy; so he thought it not good or conuenient quite to neglect him, but by some other meanes (if he could) to ouertake him. For which purpose he began to speake many times verie honourably of him, highly commending his great valour and forwardnesse in so tender yeares. And calling for Baiazet, told him what great commendation he had heard of his sonne Mahomet, and that he was therefore verie desirous to see him: where if he found that true which was reported of his great vertues, he would bestow one of his daughters vpon him in marriage, with many other great preferments: and therefore willed Baiazet to write vnto him, Not to doubt to come vnto him, to the great good both of himselfe, and his father. VVhich thing Baiazet at the first doubting the worst, requested Tamerlane not to beleue of his sonne, being yet verie young and not worthie of so great a fauour. Neuerthelesse partly perswaded by Tamerlane his protestations, and importuned by him that might now command him: hee with an euill will wrote to his sonne Mahomet to such effect as Tamerlane required. VVith which letters, and others of like purport from himselfe, with many rich presents, Tamerlane sent Hozza Mahomet, (one of his secret counsellours) embassadour to Mahomet, of whom he was right honourably receiued, and likewise entertained. But hauing read the aforesaid letters, and thereby vnderstood the cause of his comming; hee entred into counsaile with the great Bassaes about him, whether he were best to goe to Tamerlane or not. VVhere his counsellours were all cleere of one opinion, That it was not good for him to aduenture his person to the danger of such a journey, or the mercie of so mightie an enemy, of whose faith he had no assurance. And if so be (said they) he therewith offended, will by force seek to haue you, we at his comming will take the refuge of the woods and mountaines, and there shroud our selues vntill he be departed againe: for that he with his huge armie cannot here long stay in this bare countrey, for want of necessaries. Neuerthelesse Mahomet hoping his journey might be both for the good of his father, and his owne aduancement; contrarie to the mind of all his counsellours, resolved to goe: and so hauing prepared all things needfull for the honour and safetie of his journey; set forward. But as he was vpon the way in the marches of PONTVS, Carahabia whom he had before ouerthrowne, vnderstanding of his comming that way, thinking now to bee reuenged; and hauing got vnto him some of the prince Isfendiars forces, set vpon him by the way: but with as euill successe as before, most of his men being there by Mahomet slaine, and himselfe glad shamefully to flie. So traauiling on further, hee vnderstood that Alis Beg, a great lord in those countreys, went about to intercept him also: which caused him in such hast to goe on, that hee was vpon Alis, before he was aware of his comming, or well prouided for him: so that for feare he was glad to betake himselfe to flight. Mahomet considering the danger he had escaped in that journey, and that the neerer he came to Tamerlane, the more like hee was to fall into greater, although happily without Tamerlane his knowledge: by the aduice of his graue and faithfull counsellours, resolved to go no further. Wherefore calling vnto him Tamerlane his embassadour hee thus spake vnto him:

Thou see the dangers and injuries I endure in this my journey, and my mind forbodeth greater to ensue: for which causes I may not goe any further, but here returne. Commend me therefore I pray you vnto the most mightie Tamerlane, with my father: and tell them what dangers haue happened vnto me vpon the way. Which considered, I hope they will haue me excused: For which purpose I will also send in your companie an embassadour of mine owne.

Mahomet his speech to Tamer-lane's embassadour

Mahomet at that time had with him a graue, wise, and learned man, called Sophis Baiazet, sometime his schoolemaister: whom he sent embassadour to Tamerlane and his father, to haue him vnto them both excused: and so departed, he homewards leauing the way he came (for feare of further danger): and they towards Tamerlane, who honourably receiued Mahomet his embassadours and letters. But taking pleasure in the man sent vnto him, gaue him his honourable entertainment, but would neuer after suffer him to returne againe vnto his maister.

It was not long after, but that old Baiazet died of impatiencie (as is aforesaid): whose dead bodie Tamerlane left at APROPOLIS with the prince German, to be deliuered vnto his sonne Mahomet; with Musa his elder brother (who all this while had ben kept prisoner with Tamerlane) if Mahomet should require them. And so the mightie prince Tamerlane, after he had long time wasted PHRYGIA, CARIA, LYDIA, with the most part of the lesser ASIA; and conquered all SIRIA, IUDEA, EGYPT, and PERSIA, with many other great countreys and prouinces; returned at last into his owne kingdom, vnto the great citie of SAMARCAND, which hee woonderfully enlarged, and beautified with the spoiles of a great part of the world, before by him wasted: where he afterwards in great peace and glorie reigned, no lesse honoured than feared of all the princes of the East. To the terror of whom, and for the assuring of his estate, he kept alwaies a standing armie of fortie thousand horse, and threescore thousand foot readie at all assaies: beside other his great garrisons which he kept in SIRIA, EGYPT, CHINA, and CAMBALV; as also against the Muscovits and Turks; being commonly in euery place threescore thousand strong, though not still in field, but as occasion required. Vntill that at length hearing of the rising againe of the Turkish kingdom, vnder the Osman princes, the sonnes of Baiazet, with whom the oppressed Mamelukes of EGYPT, and the Greeke emperor (as doubtfull of his estate) had now also for feare of him combined themselves: he by the perswasion of Axalla (then Generall of his imperiall armie) made great preparation for a second expedition to be made for the vter rooting out of the Osman familie, and the conquest of the Greeke empire. But hauing now all things in readinesse, and also giuen a good beginning vnto these his intended conquests, (one of the Turks great Bassaes being by Axalla his lieutenant in a great battaile ouerthrowne, and thirtie thousand of the Turks slaine) hee in the midst of these his great hopes, as also of his greatest power, died of an Ague the 27 daie of Ianuarie, in the yeare of our lord 1402. A little before whose death, appeared a great and terrible blasing starre, portending as it were vnto the world the death of so great a prince. Hee was a man of the middle stature, somewhat narrow in the shoulders, otherwise well limmed, and of a great strength. In his eies fat such a rare majestic, as a man could hardly endure to behold them without closing of his owne: and many in talking with him, and often beholding of him became dumbe; which caused him oftentimes with a comely modestie to abstain from looking too earnestly vpon such as spake vnto him, or discoursed with him. All the rest of his visage was amiable and well proportioned: he had but little haire on his chinne; and ware the haire of his head long and curled, contrarie to the manner of the Tartars, who shaued their heads, hauing the same alwaies couered: whereas he contrariwise was for the most part bareheaded, commanding his sonne also to be so by his tutors brought vp: his haire was of a dark colour, somewhat drawing toward a violet right beautifull to behold: which his mother comming of the race of Sampson (as he gaue it out) willed him to nourish, in token of his descent: the cause that made him to be the more respected of his men of war; most part of them beleeuing that in those haire was some rare vertue, or rather some fatall destinie: an old practise of many great commanders of former ages, to fill the heads of their souldiours with

In English thus,

Of Tamerlane a Xerxes new, which did the East subdew,
And in all places where he came, the nations ouerthrew;
That filld the fields with Scythian troupes, brought from those climates cold,
This was the feature and the shape which thou doest here behold.
At whose approach, the strongest townes could small resistance make,
The earth it selfe vnder his feet seeming for feare to quake.
The mountaines high, mating the skie, and vncouth valleys low, Vnable were the force to beare, where he did come or goe.
All ASIA from mount CAYCASVS, vnto the bankes of NILE,
With valiant hand he vanquished and made his force to feele.
EUPHRATES, TIGRIS, and the swift ORONTES gaue him way,
With force, wast, and destruction great, on what he list to prey.
And as in tempests great oft times, when all things goe to wracke,
The fierie lightning flashing forth, out of the clouds so blacke, Doth breake downe what it lights vpon, and with a dreadfull fall Ouerthrowes the temples, with their towers, and stately buildings all,
So that the earth dismayd therewith, doth lower downe descend,
And fearefull wights wrapt vp in woe, are brought to their wits end:
In like sort he with fire and sword seeking all to confound,
The strongest castles, towers, and townes, laid equall with the ground.
And like an whirlewind taking vp great Baiazet away, Coupt vp in cage, so carried him, for his disport and play.
But whilest he rageth thus about, and plotteth in his head
Such hard commaunds and heauie doomes, as all the world should dread:
A little feauer in three fits, oppressed him with woe,
And cloasing vp his vitall spirits, did lay his head full low.
So that for all the world of wealth and kingdomes he possest,
The small remainder of himselfe in simple graue doth rest.

His great empire by himselfe deuided betwixt his sonnes, was by their discord, and the ambition of some of their disloyall subjects, in short time after brought to great confusion, and his posteritie utterly rooted out by Vjun-Cassans, the Armenian prince, as in the processe of this historie may appeare. But to returne againe vnto our purpose, Mahomet deliuered of his greatest feare, by the departure of Tamerlane out of those countie, determined to goe to PRUSA in BYTHINIA, where his brother Isa as then reigned: But vnderstanding that Isa had before taken the straits whereby he should passe the mount HORMINVS, he tooke another way about, & came to PALBO-CASTRON, where the valiant capitaine Eine-beg-Sub-bassa then remained: who with all honor and gladnesse receiued him, and there for certain daies refreshed both him and his armie. Afterwards greater forces still repairing vnto him, he marched thence to VLEAD, called in ancient time LOPADIVM. Of whose comming Isa before vnderstanding, and hauing assembled his armie, marched thither also, and encamped on the other side of the town towards PRUSA, ready to giue him battaile. But Mahomet seeing his brother so forward, consulted with his captaines what were best to bee done : where Eine Sub-bassa a man of great experience, and of late one of Baiaſet his great counsellours and captaines, told him; That it was not for their honours being brethren, to pollute their hands one in the others bloods; but to assaie if the quarrell might by some other good meanes be composed, and they made friends. For which purpose Mahomet presently sent letters vnto his brother Isa, concerning the partition of their fathers kingdome in ASIA betwixt them: offering vnto him the prouinces of AIDINIA, SARYCHANIA, GERMEANIA, CHARASIA, CHARAMANTIA, with other countreys to them belonging: so that he might haue PRVSA with all the other prouinces about the saide. Which letters, when Isa had read, and saw that Mahomet offered him but titles for kingdomes, and such countreys as were rather sometimes tributaries vnto their father Baiaſet, than any part of his kingdome, and now of late by Tamerlane againe restored vnto their ancient libertie and gouernours, sharing out the best, and strongest part thereof vnto himselfe, he brake forth into choler and said:

Isa to Mahomet
his offer.

What? doth not my fathers kingdome of right belong vnto me being the elder brother? Mahomet is yet but a youth, and scarce crept out of the shell: by what right then can hee claime my fathers kingdome as his inheritance? If he can by the sword win it, let him take it, and so hold it.

Mahomet hauing receiued this answer, prepared himselfe to the field, where his brother as readie as himselfe, stood expecting his comming: and hauing set his armie in order of battaile, gaue the first charge: which was the beginning of a most cruell and bloodie fight, wherein as it commonly falleth out in doubtfull battailes, many were on both sides slaine. At last the fortune of Mahomet preuailling, Isa his armie began to retire: which he seeing, left nothing vndone for the encouraging of his fainting souldiours, which belonged to a politicke Generall, or valiant souldiour to doe; but presing into the thickest of his enemies, there with his owne hand slew the ancient and valiant captaine Eine Subbassa, who had many times beene Generall of the footmen in old Batazet his warres. But what preuaileth courage against euill fortune? Isa must either flie or die. And therefore hauing done what he could in so desperate a case, being himselfe on euerie side forsaken, in the end was glad himselfe to flie to the sea side: where finding a shippe readie bound for CONSTANTINOPLE, he passed ouer therether in fastie, and there yeclded himselfe vnto the protection of the Greeke emperour Emanuel. In this chase Mahomet his souldiours tooke the valiant captaine Temurtases prisoner, another of Baiaſet his great commanders, and brought him to Mahomet: who in reuenge of the death of Eine, commaunded his head presently to be smitten off, and his bodie to be hanged vpon a tree by the hie way side. Of this victorie, Mahomet certified his brother Solyman at HADRIANOPLE, and in token thereof sent him Temurtases his head. This battaile was much spoken of, both for that it was fought betwixt two brethren; and also for the death of the two famous old captains Eine and Temurtases, who both together as louing friends, had fortunadly fought many great battels vnder Baiaſet his ensignes; and now as it were by destinie, and against their wils, without any priuat grudge, were both drawne into contrarie factions and slaine: both whilst they liued wishing a good peace betwixt the ambitious brethren. But as the Turks vse to say, What is by God written in a mans forehead before his birth, cannot in his life be auoided.

After this victorie, Mahomet thiniking himselfe now in sure possession of all his fathers dominions in ASIA, led his armie to PRVSA, where he was of the citizens joyfully receiued as their Sultan: and for his great bountie, of all men highly commended and honoured. From thence he went to NICA, and so to NEAPOLIS and there in both places was likewise receiued. Thether resorted vnto him all the garrisons of CARASINA, SARYCHANIA, and AIDINIA, with other the inhabitants of those countreys, with all loyaltie submitting themselues vnto him, with such honour and reuerence as belonged to their king.

All things thus fortie according to his desire in ASIA, he sent to the prince Germean for the bodie of his father Bataſet, and for his brother Musa, which were there left by Tamerlane, as is before declared. This dead bodie was by the same prince at the request of Mahomet, with great solemnitie sent to PRVSA, and there sumptuously buried, with all the Turkish obsequies and ceremonies: the Turkish Alcoran or booke of their law, being read seauen daies vpon his tombe. All which time great chere was kept for all commers, and much giuen to the poore (vpon the Turkish deuotion) for Baiaſet his soule: but aboue all others, exceeding bountie was extended to the posteritie of their prophet Mahomet; which are knowne from others amongst the Mahometans, by the colour of their apparell, which is all greene, and not lawfull to be wotne of any but but of them: so that they were by the bountie of Mahomet at that time greatly enriched. He also endowed the Abbey which his father had there lately built, with great lands and possessions for the maintenance thereof. All which things done, and the solemnitie past, he went in progresse to all parts of his kingdome, and was in euerie place joyfully receiued, and so afterwarde returned to AMASTIA: and there in great pleasure spent that summer. Where we will for a while leaue him to see what Solyman his eldest brother in the meane time doth at HADRIANOPLE: whole liuely countenance is by the skilfull workemans hand thus expressed.

Quicque minus bello conuenit ingluuiis

IAC. BOISARDVS.

Euill art thou not, except leaue lust doe hasten on thy fall:
Or riot, which becometh not a martiall man at all.
Thy brother Musa entertained by Marke to thine annoy, Doth take no rest, but waiteth still how he may thee destroy.

Solyman

Soliman the eldest sonne of Baiazet (who kept his court at HADRIANOPLE, there peaceably reigning all this while ouer the countries which his father Baiazet sometime possessed in EUROPE) hearing what his brother Mahomet had done, and how violently against all right hee had driuen Isa out of PRUSA, and made him glad to flie to CONSTANTINOPLE: was with this his outrageous dealing much offended, and thereupon calling vnto him his Bassaes & faithfull counsellors, declared vnto them the vnnaturall proceedings of Mahomet against his brother Isa. Wherein (said he) he doth me also great wrong in taking vpon him the soueraignie ouer those great dominions and countries in ASIA, which of right belong to me his eldest brother, and not to him the youngest of six. In reuenge of which iniurie and wrong, I intend in mine owne right to passe ouer into ASIA with a strong armie, and by force of armes to recouer mine inheritance there. If I may not otherwise come by it. Vnto which speech one of his graue counsellors replied: That in his opinion it was not the best course for himselfe to goe in person into those wars. For although (said he) your brother Mahomet be but young, and therefore by your greatnesse lesse accounted of, yet is his fortune great, and his experience aboute his yeares. None haue yet had to doe with him, but they haue had yongh of him: yea, it is worth the noting, how politically he hath borne himselfe for his owne safetie and the safeguard of the countries which he gouerned, all the while that the great and mightie Tamerlane with his innumerable forces couered the face of the countries fast by him: most part whereof, Mahomet hath now since his departure, againe recouered. Wherefore it were best for you to send for your angrie brother Isa, to CONSTANTINOPLE, and to make him generall of the armie you intend to send into ASIA against Mahomet. In which wayes it is not unlike, but that one of your brethren will be lost, whereby you shall haue one competitor of your kingdom the lesse. So shall you afterwards with lesse trouble subdue him that is left, or at leastwise please him with some part of that which they haue so mightily striuen for.

Good counsell.

Isa with a great armie sent by his brother Solyman into Asa against Mahomet.

This counsell was of Soliman and all the rest well liked of, and approued. So was Isa presently sent for vnto CONSTANTINOPLE, and a great armie leuiued. Who being come to HADRIANOPLE, was by Soliman courteously welcommed, and made generall of his armie: and there with shipped ouer the strait of HELLESPONTVS into ASIA. Where at his first coming, hee possessed the whole countrey of CARASIA or LYDIA: and passing further, in all places where he came, was receiued of the people with great reuerence; they all promising him their obedience, if it were his fortune to preuaile against his younger brother Mahomet: where with he held himselfe well contented. So comming to the citie of BEGBAZER, otherwise called DESPOTOPOLIS, he there wintered with his armie. In which time, hee with many kind and louing letters still directed to Mahomet as his younger brother, seemed to be glad that he was so well obeyed and liked of by his subjects: and that presuming of his loue and fauour, he was as his louing brother, and not as an enemy come into ASIA, to entreat with him of such matters as much concerned the good of them both. Whereunto Mahomet with like dissimulation answered, That hee was right glad of his comming, for which he needed not (as he said) to make any excuse; for that he was entered into a kingdom, in part his owne, and the rest open before him: in token whereof, he commaunded a rich garment to be cast vpon the messenger as a fauor, sending also diuers rich presents vnto his brother, with great prouision of victuals, and other necessities for his souldiers.

But Winter past, and the Spring come, Isa marched with his armie to PRUSA, and there shewed vnto the citizens the louing letters he had at sundry times before receiued from Mahomet: and telling them that hee was in good hope that they should in short time right well agree; requested to haue the citie deliuered vnto him, sometime their soueraigne: whereinto the better sort of the citizens had retired themselves, and made fast the gates against him: but when he saw that he could by no faire words or pollicie gaine the possession of the citie, enraged with that repulse, he set fire vpon that goodly citie, and burnt it downe to the ground. Mahomet not ignorant how his brother Isa romed vp and downe his kingdom, vising all kindnesse to such as yielded vnto him; and exercising no lesse crueltie vpon such as refused his obedience: and how that hee had rased the royall citie of PRUSA: hauing gathered a strong armie, marched in ten daies from AMASIA to PRUSA, and by the way meeting with his brother Isa, in a great battaile ouerthrew him with all his forces. Isa himselfe, accompanied with no more but ten persons, fled vnto CASTAMONA, prince Isfendiar his citie: who hearing of his arrival there, entertained him with all the honour he could; in recompence of the great friendship he had before found at his hands, at what time he was an humble suter in his father Baiazet his court.

Prusa burnt by Isa.

Mahomet comming to PRUSA, grieued exceedingly to see that faire citie so destroyed: yet to comfort the poore citizens, he gaue exceeding summes of money to be bestowed amongst them, and tooke order for the new building of the citie, and there continued certaine daies himselfe to see the worke begun.

Isa in the meane time, hauing incited the prince Isfendiar in his quarrell to invade his brother Mahomet, and going thither himselfe in person, was by him now the third time ouerthrowne and put to flight. Neuertheless he with some small forces, twice afterwards entred into Mahomet's dominion, but finding few or none willing to follow his euill fortune, was glad at last to flie to the prince of SMIRNA, by whom he was both honourably entertained and comforted.

This prince of SMIRNA moued with Isa his pitifull complaints, in so manifest a wrong, did not onely promise him what helpe he could of himselfe, but also by his embassadours solicited the princes of AIDINIA, SARUCHANIA, and MENESTIA, to giue him aid in so iust a quarrell, for the releefe of Isa against his vsurping brother: These princes pitying the case of the distressed prince, and moued with the request of the prince of SMIRNA, and fearing also the ambitious spirit of Mahomet; amongst them sent such aid, that being all assembled together, Isa had now twentie thousand men in armes. Mahomet vnderstanding of this great preparation made against him, and hauing raised a strong armie, thought it not best to expect his brothers comming into his countrey (where perhaps many might joyne themselves vnto him, being so strong in field) but entred the prince of SMIRNA his country, with such speed, that he was vpon him and the rest of his enemies before he was looked for; where after a great & bloodie fight, he obtained of them a notable victorie. Isa hauing lost the battaile, and therewith his hope also, fled into CARAMANIA, and there in such obscuritie ended his daies, that no man can tell where nor how he died. This was the end of this noble prince, alwaies of greater courage than fortune. The prince of SMIRNA the chiefe authour of this watre, humbling himselfe to Mahomet, obtained his fauour. The other confederate princes which gaue aid to Isa, were shortly after by Mahomet for most part spoiled of their dominions. Which done he returned with victorie to the building of PRUSA, hoping now to liue at more quiet.

Isa fleeth into Caramania, and there dieth in obscuritie.

But whilst Mahomet after this victorie, dreading no danger, was in the midst of his pleasures at PRUSA, he was certainly aduertised, That his eldest brother Solyman had raised a great armie in EUROPE, to invade him in ASIA. Vpon which aduertisement, hee furnished the citie of PRUSA with a strong garrison, and all things needfull for the induring of a long siege, and placed Iacup-Beg (the sonne of Firofes) capitaine therein; and afterwards departed himselfe, because that citie lately before burnt by Isa, was not as yet to be defended, much lesse to be accounted of as a place to retire vnto, if need should so require. From PRUSA he came to ANCYRA, & from thence directed commissions for the taking vp of souldiers in all parts of his kingdom. At which time hee writ letters also to Doioran a Tartar prince (whom hee had many times greatly pleased) for aid: who presently came vnto him with certaine troupes of braue horse, promising him his faithfull seruice.

Not long after, hearing that his brother Solyman was with a puissant armie now come ouer HELLESPONTVS, he consulted with his best leaders, what course first to take; being himselfe of opinion, without delay to meet his brother in the field, deeming it great shame not to offer him present battaile. But he was by his more expert capitaines aduised, to consider that he was to fight against his eldest brother, of whose good or bad fortune hee had as yet no experience: and that many secretly fauoured his quarrell, and claime, as the eldest sonne and right heire of his father Baiazet: and that therefore it were better for him to retire farther off into the strength of his kingdom, and so temporizing, to await all good opportunities which might chauce, as it doth in nothing more than in martiall affaires; rather than to commit all to the hazard of one bartell, wherein if fortune failed him, all were then vtterly lost. Vpon which resolution he retired from ANCYRA towards AMASIA. At which time Doioran the false Tartarian, marching out at the other side of the citie, fell to robbing and spoiling of Mahomet's subjects as an enemy, burning the countrey villages as they went: which thing when Mahomet vnderstood, he with his horsemen pursued him; and ouertaking him before he was looked for, slue most part of his men, and recovered all the spoile which hee had before taken; all which Mahomet gaue to his souldiers. Doioran himselfe hardly escaping by flight. And so Mahomet hauing reuenged himselfe vpon his dissembling friend, held on his way towards AMASIA.

Solyman

The castle of Prusa besieged by Solymán.

Mahomet fifth king of the Turks.

Solymán being come into ASIA, led his armie towards PRUSA: where the citizens vnderstanding of his coming, went out of the citie to meet him, and hauing done vnto him such honour and reuerence as belonged to their Sultan, brought him peaceably into the citie. But Iacup-Beg stood vpon his guard, and would by no meanes deliuer vnto him the castle which was before by Mahomet committed to his charge: for which cause Solymán laid hard siege vnto it, and gaue therevnto diuers sharpe assaults, whereby the defendants were greatly weakened, many of them being slaine, and the rest for the most part wounded. Whereupon Iacup by letters sent by one Eine Hozze, certified Mahomet how things stood, and that the castle could not long be holden against the furious assaults of Solymán, except it were with speed releued: vpon which newes, he in all hast made towards PRUSA, returning the same messenger before him with letters to the capitaine of the castle, if happily he could find meanes to deliuer the same: Wherein he highly commended him for his faithfull seruice, and promised him speedie releefe. This messenger with his letters, chaunced by Solymán his souldiours to be intercepted, and brought to Alis Bassa, Solymán his chiefe counsellour (a man of a sharpe conceit) who of nothing could make something, but hauing any thing to worke vpon, could doe wonders: He hauing straightly examined the messenger, and perused the letters, suppressed the same, and presently writ others in the name of Mahomet, commending the capitaine for that hee had already done in his seruice; but yet for as much as he could not possibly in time releue him, he willed him therefore to deliuer vp the castle, and to prouide for the safetie of himselfe and his garrison, by such conditions as he could best obtaine. These counterfeit letters Alis Bassa found meanes to bee as cunningly deliuered vnto the capitaine, as they were craftily endited: who hauing read the same, and now out of all hope of releefe, expecting also euery houre to be assaulted by the furious enemy; vpon reasonable conditions yeelded the castle to Solymán. The newes whereof being brought vnto Mahomet, now come within one dayes march of PRUSA, exceedingly grieved him: but seeing no remedie, he returned backe againe to AMASIA; whither Solymán (now possessed of the citie and castle of PRUSA, and hauing thereby got a great name in ASIA) shortly after came with his armie, and hardly besieged his brother in AMASIA: but seeing no hope to win the citie, he retired backe againe to PRUSA, and there after his wonted manner spent his time in riot and excess, whereunto he was exceedingly giuen. Iacup Beg for yeelding of the castle, was afterward by Mahomet straightly imprisoned, and in danger to haue bene put to death, had not the great Bassas become earnest intercessours for him.

Mahomet lying at AMASIA, was by his secret espials aduertised, That his brother Solymán hauing dispersed his armie, lay in great securitie at PRUSA, guarded but with a small power, passing his time in all voluptuous pleasure, his common exercise. Whereupon he in all hast marched with his armie thitherwards, to haue surprised him, before hee should bee able to call together his dispersed forces. But when he was come to the riuer SANGARIUS, hee was discouered by Solymán Subbassa, a great capitaine, whom Sultan Solymán had sent, for the taking vp of men in that side of the countrey. Who returning in all hast, gaue Solymán knowledge of his brothers coming: with which suddaine newes he was so dismayed, being now of small strength, that for the auoiding of the imminent danger, he would presently haue fled into EUROPE, had not Alis Bassa otherwise perswaded him: telling him, That if he should so cowardly flie away, it would not onely blemish and defame his honour, but discourage his friends also in ASIA, and encourage his enemies to pursue him perhaps vnto the gates of HADRIANOPE: and that therefore it were better, with such forces as hee had, to take the straits about NEAPOLIS, and so to stay his brothers further passage into that countrey, vntill such time as hee might assemble the rest of his armie. According to which good counsell, he first tooke the beforenamed straits and passages, whereby Mahomet was of necessitie to passe, and there strongly fortified himselfe. Mahomet coming thither, with great force entered those straits, but was still valiantly by Solymán repulsed. The like attempt hee many times valiantly gaue, for that he knew himselfe to be at that time too strong for his brother: but Solymán hauing the aduantage of the place, with little danger or losse frustrated those his brothers braue attempts, although hee were then a great deale the weaker. Alis Bassa, whose willic head, fraught with long experience, could (with nothing) effect great matters, in the meane time was not idle, but (making Solymán before acquainted with his doings) sent a secret messenger (one of his owne trustie seruants) to Mahomet with letters, certifying him, That most of his nobilitie and great captaines had secretly conspired to betray him into the hands of his elder brother Solymán, as the vndoubted heire of his father Baiazet; and so with the price of his head, to make their owne peace and attonement with him: and that for the performance thereof, they had bound themselves first vnto Solymán, and afterwards one to another, by solemne oath. Which treason hee discouered vnto him, with great protestation of his loue and good will, as hee that had of long time eaten bread and salt (as the Turkes vse to say) in his fathers court; and therefore could not but with well vnto him, being one of his lord and maisters sonnes. These letters something troubled Mahomet, breeding in his head many a jealous conceit: for all that, hee ceased not for six or seauen daies space, to giue many a hot skirmish for the gaining of those straight passages, but all in vaine. In which time, it chaunced one of his seruants neere about his person, to flie vnto the enemy; which caused him the more to suspect all that to be true, whereof Alis Bassa had forewarned him. Which considered, and that by lying there hee pretailed nothing, but lost and wearied his men (for it was all that while exceeding foule weather) and withall doubting to be betrayed, returned as he came, to AMASIA. And Solymán glad also of his departure retired to PRUSA, giuing order into all parts of his kingdome, for the assembling of a great armie: but vnderstanding that the king of CARAMANIA had made a league with his brother Mahomet, and that they were agreed to joyne their forces against him for the driuing of him out of ASIA, he forthwith drew all his forces to ANCYRA, as a place of more safetie.

Whilest Solymán thus lay at ANCYRA, it fortuned that Musa (which had all this while remained with his brother Mahomet, since he was set at libertie by Tamerlane) though not altogether well pleased with his owne estate, one daie by way of talke, thus spake vnto his brother: You see (said he) how our elder brother Solymán ceaseth not to vex and molest vs daily, and is not unlike in the end to preuaile against vs, to our utter destruction: Now if it might please you to giue me leaue, I would goe to Isfendiar prince of CASTAMON and PONTUS, our brothers enemy, and of him procure shipping to passe ouer the Euxine sea into EUROPE: where I doubt not to find oportunitie to make some great innovation in that kingdome, now in my brothers absence: by reason whereof, Solymán shall of necessitie be driuen to leaue ASIA, to be againe by you solie possessed: or else be brought in danger, there to lose his kingdome in EUROPE: which if it shall be my good hap to gaine out of his hands by your supportation, I promise you faithfully to hold the same of you, as of my lord and soueraine. This greatly pleased Mahomet, and therevpon not long after they concluded betwixt themselves, one to stand fast vnto another, and the one to help the other in what they could, during life; confirming the same with great solemnitie of their Turkish faith giuen, and taken. Wherevpon Mahomet furnished his brother Musa with great summes of money and other needfull things, for the taking in hand of so great an enterprize.

Musa thus furnished, taking his leaue of his brother, set forwards towards the prince Isfendiar: who hearing of his coming met him on the way, and entertained him as a great prince. But after that Musa had made him acquainted with his purpose for passing into EUROPE, and had obtained graunt of his helpe therein, he tooke his leaue of him for a time, and went to visite the king of CARAMANIA; who also most honourably entertained him, and the rather in despite of Solymán. But whilest Musa was thus passing the time in CARAMANIA, it fortuned that Marke (of some called Mirxes) prince of VALACHIA, hauing his countrey much spoiled by Solymán his garrisons; and hearing that Musa one of Baiazet his sonnes, was with the prince Isfendiar; he writ vnto him, promising to bestow his daughter and heire in marriage vpon Musa, if he would come ouer into EUROPE, and reuenge the wrong done vnto him by Solymán: whereof Musa aduertised by the prince Isfendiar, gladly returned out of CARAMANIA, and was by him transported ouer the Euxine or blacke sea, into EUROPE: where the prince of VALACHIA glad of this coming, receiued him with great honour, and according to his promise gaue him his daughter in marriage.

The fame of Musa his coming into EUROPE, and of his marriage, was in short time bruted through all Solymán his kingdome in EUROPE, and wrought such effect in the minds of the mutable vulgar people (alwaies desirous of noueltie) that they all as it were with one consent, submitted themselves vnto him, as vnto their lord and soueraine. In so much that coming to the royall citie of HADRIANOPE, in the absence of his brother Solymán, hee was there receiued as their king.

Solymán now lying at ANCYRA in ASIA, vnderstanding of these proceedings of Musa in EUROPE:

Musa married the prince of Valachia his daughter.

Musa in the absence of Solymán receiued at Hadrianople as king.

EUROPE, and that he was possessed of a great part of his kingdom there, was therewith exceedingly troubled. Wherefore leaving his depute in ANCYRA, he with all his army came to the strait of BOSPHORUS, and there of Emanuel the Greeke emperor obtained passage, promising for the same to restore vnto him certaine places before taken from him in ASIA: for Musa had so provided, that he could haue no helpe of the Turkish shipping, which was by his commaundment all before brought ouer vnto EUROPE side. Musa hearing of Solymans his arriuall in EUROPE, made towards him with a great power: but after that both their armies were come the one within view of the other, and now readie to joyne bataille, many of Musa his captaines forsooke him and fled to Solymans the elder brother and their vndoubted king: which Musa beholding, was glad to flie, and to take the safegard of the woods and mountaines for his refuge. After which victorie, Solymans returning to HADRIANOPE, tooke againe possession of his kingdom, and there without measure gaue himselfe to riot and excesse, according to his wonted manner.

After the departure of Solymans out of ASIA, Iacup-Beg (but lately before againe received into Mahomet his fauour, and now left as Solymans his depute) deliuered ANCYRA with the castle of PRUSA, and all the rest that Solymans had gained in ASIA, to Mahomet; who shortly after led his armie through the countries of CARASIA, AYDINIA, SARUCANIA, TEBKENSIS, and GERMEANIA, reducing them once again vnto his obeisance: and afterwards returned to PRUSA, where he now the second time tooke possession of his fathers kingdom in ASIA.

Musa still aided by the Valachian prince his father in law, gaue many great attempts against his brother Solymans: but was still put to the worke. At length hauing gathered some good strength, and diligently attending the least smile of better fortune, drew neere vnto the place where Solymans lay, who at that time was (as his manner was) banqueting with great pleasure in his campe, and full of wine. In so much that when newes was brought vnto him, That his brother Musa was at hand with a great power; he in his drunkenesse caused the messenger that brought the newes to be beaten: and when he with greater earnestnesse than was to his liking, affirmed that his report to be true, he commaunded him to be slaine for troubling his mirth. But not long after, Musa was come so neere, that the vauntcourours of his armie did skirmish with some of Solymans his souldiours: when as Chafis Eurenoses one of his fathers old captaines, pressing in, told him that Musa was at hand, and had skirmished with part of his armie. Whereof Solymans (now farre in wine) had no regard, but said: Good tutor doe not trouble me no more, my brother Musa dare not come so nigh me, if I doe but hold vp my cappe, he is gone. With which answere the old captain going out discontented, sent in Chafan, Aga of the Ianizaries: who boldly coming vnto him, told him plainly of the iminent danger, and sharply reprooued him for his intemperance and securitie. With whose free speech, Solymans mooued, in great rage commaunded his beard to be cut off (then no smal disgrace amongst the Turks.) Chafan presently coming forth thus disgraced, said to them that stood waiting without: This is the honour where-with Sultan Solymans in his excesse, rewardeth his most faithfull seruants. Wherefore bee it knowne to you all, I will from henceforth (and not without cause) seru: Musa, a prince of greater temperance and discretion: who so will follow me, come and welcome. So mounting to horse, and accompanied with a number of his Ianizaries, of whom hee was greatly beloued, went ouer to Musa: as did many other great captaines also with their companies, mooued by his example so to doe. But when Solymans vnderstood that Chafan with most part of the Ianizaries, and many other worthy captaines with the greatest strength of his armie, were reuolted to Musa, then fast by, and readie to set vpon him; it then repented him too late of his dissolute folly: and finding no other remedy now to escape, hid himselfe vntill it was darke night; then taking horse, accompanied onely with

Caratze Beg and Cara Muchill, two of his noblemen, and one country Turke (whom they had retained for their guide) thought to haue fled to CONSTANTINOPLE. This malicious clowne, hauing of purpose led them by vnknowne waies all that night too and fro, as it were in a maze, oftentimes misnaming vnto them the places they passed by, as if they had been in the right way; brought them in the morning to a village not farre from the place from whence they departed the euening before: and there riding a little before them, of purpose, gaue warning to a sturdie peasant or two of his acquaintance, That Solymans was coming after: willing them to make stay of him. These rude country churles, with some others of like breed, running out with bats and stauces, and such other homely tooles as first came to hand, slew Caratze, and Cara Muchill, which would

would not yeeld vnto them but stood vpon their guard, and tooke Solymans aliue: where, as it commonly falleth out in the vulgar peoples furie, some cried out to kill him, and so to end the warres; some likewise to burne him; and some to hang him; and some few to saue him: euerie one as his rude affection lead him. In the heat of this countrey vpror came Musa, who glad to see his brother Solymans so hardly beset, caused him presently to be there strangled, when hee had reigned in HADRIANOPE six yeates and ten moneths.

This was the miserable end of Solymans, the eldest sonne that Baiaze left aliue. A man much giuen to excesse, otherwise endued with many great vertues, being both of great valour and exceeding bountifull. In his time liued the learned doctor Schmetes which wrote the historie of Alexander the Great, in Turkish verse, and published it in the name of Solymans himselfe: for which he was by him bounteouslie rewarded. The dead bodie of Solymans himselfe, was by the commaundment of Musa conuained to PRUSA, and there lieth buried fast by the bodie of his grandfather Amurath. So now of these Cadmeian brethren, remained none but Mahomet and Musa, the one reigning in ASIA, and the other in EUROPE, diuers parts of world, and well bounded with the surest bounds of nature: yet not sufficient to content or containe their ambitious minds, vntill that the younger had most vnnaturally deuoured the elder: whose liuely counterfait, as it is by the skilfull workeman expressed, you may here behold.

Musa

Mahomet fifth king of the Turks.

Musa presently after the death of his brother Solyman, tooke vpon him the Turkish kingdome in EUROPE: who in the beginning of his raigne displaced most of them which had borne great offices before in the time of his brother Solyman, and had now of late reuolted to him, fearing to be by them betrayed or forsaken, as his brother was: and in their tooimes placed other his owne creatures. And not so content, proceeded farther, vpon small causes most vnkindly to inuade and put to death many of them that had of him well deserved. Which cruell dealing so alienated the minds of his nobilitie, that many of them kept themselves out of the way, doubtfully expecting the euent of such his tyrannicall gouernment: Chasis Eirenos, that old and renowned captaine, to escape his hands, was glad to feigne himselfe blind, so to absent himselfe from court. At this time hee also by his embassadours demanded of diuers Christian princes his neighbours, such tribute as they had in times past either paid or promised to pay vnto his father Baiazet: and in that quartell intaded diuers of them, namely, the princes of SERVIA and BULGARIA. Amongst others he sent Ibrahim Bassa, a learned man of great experience, and sometimes one of his fathers graue counsellours, vnto Emanuel Paleologus, the emperor of CONSTANTINOPLE, to demand the like tribute of him: Who so soone as he was come to CONSTANTINOPLE, from thence by letters aduertised Mahomet of the vndiscreet gouernment of his brother Musa in his new gotten kingdome; and what vntimely things he began to make, before he was therein well settled, loosing the loue both of his subjects and neighbour princes: with much other matter concerning his misgouernment. Which things when Mahomet vnderstood, he sent a messenger with letters backe againe to CONSTANTINOPLE, requesting the Bassa to come ouer vnto him into ASIA, and in token of his great fauour sent him diuers rich garments, with many great and princely promises: wherewith the Bassa moued, and detelling the cruell gouernment of Musa, went ouer vnto him to PRUSA, and there was of him honourably entertained, and sware one of his priue counsell: in which place of honour he long time afterwards serued him faithfully, and after him his sonne Amurath also.

Mahomet thinking vpon the aduantage of his brothers cruell gouernment, to find meanes to thrust him out of his kingdome, and so to draw the whole gouernment of the Turkish empire vnto himselfe, as well in EUROPE as in ASIA; assembled an armie of fiftene thousand choise souldiours to iugade his brother in EUROPE, before hee were there well established in his kingdome. And so shoking downe towards the straits of BOSPHORUS, by his embassador concluded a league with Emanuel the Greeke emperor, That one of them should neuer wrong or damme the other: and that if Mahomet should hap to obtaine the Turkish kingdome in EUROPE, he should alwaies honour and reuerence the emperor as his especiall good friend; but if it should chance him to be distressed or ouerthrowne by his brother Musa, that then the emperor should presently transport him and his armie backe againe into ASIA. This league was with great solemnitie of words on both parts confirmed. And shortly after Mahomet with all his armie was by the emperours shipping at the strait of BOSPHORUS nere vnto CONSTANTINOPLE, transported ouer into EUROPE: for Musa possessed of GALLIPOLIS, had stopped all the other passages.

Musa hauing before knowledge of his brothers comming, was forthwith in readinesse to meet him with a strong armie. So that Mahomet had not marched faire from the sea side; but that the vauntecounters of his armie met with his brothers; at a place called INTZUG; and there began a light skirmish: wherein Musa his forerunners were by Mahomet put to flight, and chased vnto Musa his campe. Whereof such a suddaine feare arose in the armie, that they were almost readie to flie, thinking Mahomet had beene vpon them with all his power: but vnderstanding the truth of the matter, both armies rested that night, which as then drew fast on. The next day these two brethren, armed with equall hope, brought their armies into the field, & gaue the signall of battaile, whereupon began a mortall and bloodie fight: in the furie whereof, Mahomet Oglu, Bassa of ROMANIA, and certaine other of Musa his great captaines, vpon secret discontentment reuolted to Mahomet: wherewith many of Musa his souldiours discouraged, fled. Which Mahomet his souldiours seeing, pursued the chace with such earnestnesse and furie, that few were left with himselfe: yet with such as were left, in hope of good hap, he set vpon his brother: who although hee was halfe discomfited with the flight of the greater part of his armie, whom the enemies had yet in chace, yet stood he fast himselfe with seuen thousand Ianizaries, his best souldiours; so taking the vnexpected good hap, presented vnto him by his brothers forwardnesse, nesse, valiantly receiued his charge. But Mahomet finding there a greater strength than hee had before supposed, and himselfe too weake to withstand the furie of the Ianizaries, because most of his men also were following the chace, was now for safegard of his life glad to flie himselfe to CONSTANTINOPLE: whether hee came accompanied scarcely with two hundred men: and was from thence, according to the agreement before made betwixt him and the emperor, speedily shipped ouer into ASIA. Musa hauing thus put his brother to flight, with great slaughter of his men, presently tooke his tents with all that was therein, and there encamped himselfe. They of Mahomet his armie, which followed the chace of such as had fled in the beginning of the battaile, not knowing what had happened to Mahomet, returning to the campe, doubting no perill, and finding it at their returne possessed by their enemies, stood as men amased and vtterly discouraged: at which time Musa would not suffer his sculdious to put them to the sword, as they would faine haue done, but commaunded them to bee despoiled of their armes and such other things as they had, and so with life suffered them to depart.

After this ouerthrow, whilest Mahomet lay still at PRUSA, the prince of SMYRNA forcibly entred into AIDINIA, purposing to passe through into SARUCANIA: which thing Mahomet hearing, gathered a great armie, and entering into the princes countrey, made such spoile as hee went, and so distressed the prince himselfe, that he was glad to submit himselfe vnto him, and from thenceforth to hold his dominion of him, as of his lord and soueraine, and so returned vnto AMASIA.

Mahomet could not well digest the losse he had so lately receiued in EUROPE, and therefore leuied an armie of choise souldiours out of all parts of his kingdome, once againe to trie his fortune against his elder brother Musa. For the better successe whereof, he by his letters craued aid of the prince Duldager Oglu, written to this effect:

Sultan Mahomet vnto the prince Duldager Oglu, his father in law.

My purpose is to lead mine armie into ROMANIA in EUROPE, and there againe to trie my quarrell with my brother Musa. My hope is, that you will not with your aid be wanting vnto me your sonne in law, in my so great affaires, neither for want of good will to hinder this my purpose. Fare you well, in the year of our great Prophet Mahomet 814. From AMASIA.

Mahomet his letters vnto the prince Duldager Oglu his father in law.

Whereunto the prince returned this kind answer:

Prince Duldager Oglu vnto the great Sultan Mahomet.

I doubt not most mightie Monarch, but that whither so ever your desires shall draw you for the vnder-taking of any great exploit, he that ruleth above in beauen, will be alwaies your aid, prosper your attempts, minister vnto you fit occasions, and bring all your actions vnto most happie end, with most assured victorie. Wherefore seeing (God so disposing our affaires) I cannot my selfe in person come vnto you with my power, and give you my trustie helpe in this your intended warre: yet will I in no case faile with all speed to send my sonne your seruant, to aid you with our forces, in this warre. Fare you well this same year of our Prophet 814.

The answer of prince Duldager Oglu to Mahomet.

And so shortly after, the prince sent vnto him his sonne, according to his promise, with a companie of braue souldiours, excellently furnished: for the welcomming of whom, Mahomet his brother in law made a great and royall feast: and there in his mirth gaue vnto the young prince the rich apparrell hee wore himselfe, with the horse hee rode vpon, and all the rich plate of gold and siluer wherein they were serued at that feast, a matter of great value. And to euery one of his noblemen he gaue a rich garment, made for that purpose: with some other gift, as a fauour: and afterwards gaue them all to vnderstand, That he intended forthwith to passe ouer into EUROPE, and there to recouer all his fathers kingdome, or els there to end his daies: As for the spoile and prey (said hee) shall bee theirs that can win it: one horse, one sword, one horsemans mace shall content my selfe. So hauing furnished his armie with all things needfull for so great an enterprize, hee set forward, and came to the strait of BOSPHORUS; and from thence gaue knowledge of his

his comming to the emperour of CONSTANTINOPLE: who glad thereof (for the displeasure he bare to Musa) transported him and all his armie ouer that itrait into EUROPE; and there in one of his countrey pallaces royally feasted him. At which time Mahomet requested the emperour to joine with him in that warre against their common enemy: but hee excused himselfe by reason of his great age; yet neuerthelesse, assisted him with certaine companies of valiant Christians, whose seruice afterward stood the Turke in great stead.

So Mahomet taking his leaue of the emperour, marched with his armie to the riuer NYZEN in THRACIA, where by the way he receiued letters from the ancient capitaine Chafis Erenofes, aduising him to be very circumspect in his marching, and not to make too much hast to joine battaile with his brother: counselling him also (if he could by any means) to allure Iegides Bassa, Barac Beg, and Sinan Beg, to forsake his brother, and to follow his ensignes; for that in those men consisted Musa his greatest strength: and promised in good time to come vnto him himselfe also, if he were not too hastie. This messenger that brought this newes, Mahomet bountifullly rewarded, and so sent him away. Shortly after, as he was marching towards HADRIANOPLE, part of the enemies armie, began to shew it selfe vnder the leading of Cara Calile, and was presently charged by Michael Oglu, and put to flight. So holding on his way to HADRIANOPLE, hee laid siege to the citie: where the citizens sent out vnto him certaine of their grauest and most substantiall burgeses, to certefie him, That by reason of the garrison there left by Musa, they could not as then deliuer the citie vnto him; but if it should please him to goe and trie his fortune in the field against his brother, who should be the commander thereof, he should find them readie to follow his good fortune, and to yeeld themselves, the citie, and all therein, to his pleasure, if it were his good hap to carrie away the victorie. With which answer Mahomet contenting himselfe, raised his siege, and tooke the way towards ZAGORA. In that place Musa is reported to haue come secretly disguised into Mahomet his campe, and to haue taken full view thereof, but perceiuing himselfe too weake to encounter his brother, withdrew his armie into the safegard of the great woods and strong places: and so from thence retired with his armie towards PHILIPPOPOLIS, and so marched along the riuer MERTZE, called in ancient time HEBROS: Where Iegides Bassa, with Hamza Beg, and Ismir Oglu (three of Musa his great captaines) set vpon the reuerward of Mahomet his armie, and were by Michael Oglu repulsed. Mahomet holding on his way, came to SOPHTA: where as he went, Musa diuers times from the mountaines made shew of his armie, but durst not come downe into the plaine to giue him battaile. Mahomet hauing refreshed his armie at SOPHTA, marched to SARKIV, where he receiued letters from Iegides Bassa, Barac Beg, and Sinan Beg, all secretly perswaded by old Erenofes to renolt vnto him: the tenor whereof in breefe was this.

Iegides Bassa, Barac Beg, and Sinan Beg, vnto the great Sultan Mahomet.

We are three young men (most mightie Monarch) and haue with vs three thousand choice soldiers, men of incomparable valor, such as the world hath scarce the like: draw your forces neare vnto vs with as much speed as you can, and you shall find vs readie to come ouer vnto you. Fare you well.

Musa his chiefe captaines renolt to Mahomet.

VV hereupon he marched all the next night after, vntill he came to the riuer MORAVA, and there encamped: where the three aforementioned captaines, according to their promise joined themselves vnto him with all their souldiours. Thither came also old Erenofes, of all others the most famous capitaine amongst the Turks, and now no longer blind, bringing with him a great companie of most expert souldiours. Marke the Despot of SERVIA (for the displeasure he bare vnto Musa) sent him aid thither also. By which supplies, Mahomet his armie was greatly encreased: who after he had courteously welcomed all these new come captaines, he began againe to march farther vntill he came to COSSOVA, the vnfortunate plaine; where Hamza Beg the prince of MYRNA his sonne, hauing forsaken Musa, came vnto him with fife hundred horse, certifying him that all the nobilitie had forsaken his father: so, as he marched from place to place, his forces still encreased by the reuolt of his brothers. Musa seeing his souldiours thus daily fall from him, in somuch that he had almost none now left, but the souldiours of the court (which were indeed his best men of warre, and alwaies vnto him faithfull, because he had been euer vnto them exceeding ding bountifull) thought it best to attempt something, before he were left himselfe alone. Wherefore hauing yet with him seuen thousand of those expert souldiours, he drew neerer vnto his brother seeking to haue taken him at some aduantage. But Mahomet hauing knowledge of his purpose, and contented to be aduised by his old expert captaines, had euer a vigilant eye vnto him. Yet at last, whether it were vpon good hope, or els prickt forward with despair, Musa vpon the suddaine, valiantly set vpon his brothers armie: but his souldiours oppressed with multitude, rather than ouercome with true valour, after a hard and bloodie fight were put to the worst: which he seeing, desperately brake into the midst of his enemies, seeking there for death amongst the thickest of them. But being knowne by Baiazet Bassa, Mahomet his lieutenant generally, desirous to take him alive, he was beset on euery side: where seeing himselfe in more danger to be taken than slaine, hee with great courage brake from amongst the midst of them, and fled. In which flight his horse falling into a deepe muddie ditch (or as some others say, hoxed by Sarutzes his owne seruant, and himselfe wounded) ouerthrew him, and there before he could againe recouer himselfe was taken by Baiazet Bassa (the great lieutenant) Michael Oglu, and Barac Beg, Musa taken, which had hardly pursued him out of the battaile: and so was with his handes bound, by them brought through the midst of the armie. VVhich pittifull sight, greeued not a little the hearts of many; to see him but euen now so great a king, and one of the sonnes of great Baiazet, by the strange change of fortune, bound like a captiue slaue led forth to execution: yet were most part glad thereof, hoping this long ciuile wars would now in him take end. Shortly after came vnto him a noble man called Balta Oglu, sent (as was thought) from Mahomet himselfe: who after he had in few words bitterly reprooued him, for the crueltie by him before shewed vnto his brother Solyman in like case, caused him presently to be strangled with a bowstring. His dead body was by and by after, presented to his brother Mahomet: who seeing it, shed a few Crocadil teares ouer it. He reigned three yeares and seauen moneths, and was afterwards conuained to PRUSA, and there lieth buried by the bodie of his brother Solyman, in the same chappell with his grandfather Amurath.

Mahomet after the death of Musa, now free from all competetours, tooke vpon him the sole government of the Turkish kingdome, as well in EUROPE as in ASIA. And here the Turkish histories begin the raigne of this Mahomet fifth king of the Turks: accounting the troublesome time from the captiuitie of Baiazet, vnto the death of Musa, as a time of vacancie or Anarchie, wherein the Turkish kingdome was not at any time wholely possessed by any one of Baiazet his sonnes. Ifa possessing one part, whereof hee was by Mahomet dispossessed: who afterwards vsurped all that part of the Turkish kingdome in ASIA, being the right of his eldest brother Solyman: Who at that time raigning in EUROPE, was deposed and strangled by his brother Musa: who was in like manner serued by his youngest brother Mahomet, the onely sonne of Baiazet then left, as is before at large declared. Which diuers mutations, and interrupted successions, was the cause that the Historiographers doe so greatly dissent vpon the successour of Baiazet: some reckoning one, some another; and some more, some fewer; and some, such as neuer were. But forasmuch as Mahomet held all or most part of the Turkish kingdome in ASIA, during this troublesome time; and in the end possessed the other part thereof in EUROPE also; I reckon him for the fifth king of the Turks, and successour to his father Baiazet: including also in this Historie of his life, all that intestine and serpentine-like tragedie, wherein he himselfe was the principall actor.

Whilest Mahomet was (as is aforesaid) thus busied in his wars in EUROPE, against his brother Musa: the king of CARAMANIA taking the aduantage of his troubles there, with a great armie invaded his kingdome joyning vpon him in ASIA, burning and spoiling all before him as he went: Einafes Bassa, Mahomet his lieutenant, then lying at PRUSA, not able to withstand him; and fearing his comming thither, because it was the seat of the Othoman kings in ASIA, caused the citizens to bring the greatest part of their wealth into the castle: whereinto he also receiued so many of the citizens as he conveniently could, willing the rest to shift for themselves as they might, in such case of extremitie. Shortly after, the king of CARAMANIA (according to his expectation) came to PRUSA, and without resistance tooke the citie, not as yet fully fortified; which he without delaie caused the second time to be burnt downe to the ground: and afterwards laid siege to the castle, giuing many great assaults thereto by the space of thirte daies; but was alwaies valiantly repulsed by Einafes the Bassa, who ceased not continually to encourage his souldiours, still putting them in comfort, That Mahomet hauing now overcome his enemies in EUROPE, would in few daies vndoubtedly come to their releefe. It chaunced at the same time, that the dead bodie of Musa, sent to PRUSA to be buried, was honourably conuaid vpon the way, with much people following it. The Caramanian king hearing of the comming of such a multitude, and fearing it to haue been Mahomet with his power, raised his siege and with speed departed: whereat the Turks long time after jeasted, saying, If the Caramanian king runne away for feare of the dead bodie of the Othoman king; what would he doe if hee had come against him aliue? but the truth was, he feared Mahomet and his power.

Orchanes the sonne of Solyman (yet a boy) hauing liued at CONSTANTINOPLE euer since the death of his father, about this time departed thence, because of the league but lately made between the emperour and his vnkle Mahomet, purposing to haue gone into VALACHIA: but by the way as hee was traucelling, the Turkish voluntarie souldiours vnderstanding that hee was the sonne of their late king Solyman, resorted vnto him in great numbers, offering in his quarrell to spend their liues. Of which insurrection Mahomet hearing, marched thither in all hast, with a great power to suppress the same: of whose coming the souldiours with Orchanes vnderstanding, disperced themselves and fled. As for Orchanes himselfe, he was by his vnfaithfull tutor Zaganos betraied vnto his vnkle Mahomet: who presently caused his eies to be put out, and so sent him to PRUSA: allowing him great reuenues to liue vpon, and euer after vsed him with great honour. The sister of this Orchanes he gaue in marriage to one of his noblemen, with a great dowrie. This is that Orchanes, whom some historiographers reckon vp among the Turkish kings, as one of the successours of Baiaŕet; and that hee was betrayed to his vnkle Moses: erring as I suppose, both in the succession and the name, mistaking Moses for Mahomet.

Now Mahomet calling to remembrance the iniurie which the Caramanian king had done to him in his absence, returning to PRUSA, assembled a great armie to reuenge himselfe of that wrong. At which time, he sent to the prince Isfendiar for aid, who sent him his sonne Cassumes. He commanded also the prince Germian Oglu, to make prouision for the victualing of his campe, as he should passe by his countrey: which was accordingly done. And so prouided of all things necessarie, he with his armie entred into the Caramanian countrey: Where he tooke the cities ASPROPOLIS, DESPOTOPOLIS, HIEROPOLIS, and besieged ICONIUM: but by reason of the imoderate raine which at that time fell, he was glad to make peace with the Caramanian king, called also Mahomet. And so raising his siege, departed towards PONTUS, where hee had not long staid, but that newes was brought vnto him, That the Caramanian king renouncing his league, was againe vp in armes. Wherefore returning into CARAMANIA, and so to ICONIUM, he there ouerthrew the king in battaile, and tooke both him and his son Mustapha prisoners: who redeemed themselves by deliuering diuers of their strong cities and castles into his hands: and afterward concluded a peace, they receiuing from him an ensigne (as the Turkish manner is) in token they were now become his vassales.

The Caramanian warre thus happily ended, he went ouer into EUROPE, and passing ouer DANUBIUS, foraged the countrey of VALACHIA TRANSALPINA, making there great spoile: for redresse whereof, the Valachian prince by his embassadours sent him such tribute as hee demanded, and his son also to serue him in his court. About which time happened a great earthquake in PRUSA, and other places of ASIA, whereby many houses & towers were ouerthrowne; after which ensued great troubles in most parts of ASIA: howbeit Mahomet going thither, by his presence kept all his dominions in peace and quietnesse.

Isfendiar prince of CASTAMONA and part of PONTUS, reseruing vnto himselfe CASTAMONA, with a litle part more of his dominion, gaue the rest vnto Mahomet, vpon condition that he should restore no part thereof againe vnto his sonne Cassumes: who hauing long time serued in Mahomet his court and warres, could not be perswaded to returne againe vnto his father; and therefore was by him thus disinherited. VVhich great gift, Mahomet thankfully accepted, and in lieu thereof assigned vnto Cassumes other great and large possessions within his owne kingdom.

Mahomet after the death of his brother Musa, had sent Scheiches Bedredin (his brothers Cadescher) to NICIA in ASIA, as vnto a place of exile, allowing him neuertheless a great pension wheron to liue. This Bedredin had in his house one Burghuzes, Mustapha his steward: these two laid their heads together, how to raise some tumult or rebellion to trouble the peaceable government of Mahomet. For which purpose, Burghuzes (according to the plot by them laid) tooke his way into AYDINIA (sometime called CARIA) & there pretending a great zeale of reformed religion, with a wonderfull grauitie began to broach diuers new and strange opinions, farre differing from the Turkish antient superstition, yet very plausible and well fitting the humour of the vulgar people. By which meanes he was in short time reputed for a famous learned deuout man, and had many followers, drawing after him much people, fit to begin some great innouation. Bedredin glad of his mans successe, fled from NICIA into the prince Isfendiar his countrey, from whence he tooke shipping ouer the Euxine into VALACHIA, and there withdrawing himselfe into a great Forrest, as if hee had beene some deuout and religious man, allured vnto him a great number of outlawes and theues which there liued. VVhom when he had sufficiently instructed and flamed to his purpose, he sent them in the habit of religious men into the countrey of ZAGORA, and other places in the frontiers of Mahomet his dominions, neere vnto him, as his disciples: who with great boldnesse and confidencie, published Bedredin his doctrine and authoritie; and how that he was by God appointed to be the king of iustice, and commaunder of all the world: whose doctrine and manner of gouernment was (as they said) already receiued (as they gaue it out) in ASIA, being set forth but by one of his schollers, Burghuzes, whose fame was now disperced throughout all the Turks dominion: and that therefore, if any were desirous of preferment, they should repaire to Bedredin, who would in short time shew himselfe vnto the world, and promote his followers according to their desires. Many of the countrey people deluded with this phantasie and practise of these seditious seed-men, resorted to Bedredin in hope of preferment, and with them some of good calling also. At last, out of the Forrest commeth this great prophet, with banner displaid, attended vpon with a great multitude of the seditious vulgar people, which daily resorted vnto him more and more. Mahomet for the representing of these dangerous tumults, sent his sonne Amurath, and Baiaŕet the great Bassa, with two thousand men to apprehend Burghuzes in AYDINIA: but when they came thither, they found him guarded with three thousand men well appointed, ready to aduenture their liues in defence of their foolish prophet. Neuertheless, Amurath and Baiaŕet not dismayed with the multitude of those vplandish people, set vpon them: where was fought a right bloodie battaile, for the number, and many slaine on both sides: yet at last the rebels fled; in which flight Burghuzes himselfe was slaine, and hewen all to peeces. After which victorie Baiaŕet from thence halted to MAGESIA, and there executed Torlac Kemal, another seditious Turkish monke, which with two thousand, by him seduced, did much harme in the countrey thereabout. At the same time also Mahomet sent another power against Bedredin; but most of his followers seeing in him no such matter, as was by his disciples and himselfe promised, and as they hoped for, were already fallen from him; so that of that great multitude which before followed him, few or none were left with him, whereby he was easily apprehended by them that Mahomet had sent against him: and so being brought to Mahomet at SERRAS, was there in the market place before a tauerne dore, faire hanged, without any further harme.

Mahomet in the short time of his raigne finished the great Mahometane temple at HADRIANOPLE, before begun by his brethren Solyman and Musa. VVhere he also built a princely pallace, the seat of the Turkish kings in EUROPE, vntill the taking of CONSTANTINOPLE. Hee also built another temple, with a most sumptuous abbey, and a publicke schoole thereto adjoining, endowing the same with great reuenues, such as had by him and those his brethren of late been taken from the Christians. He gaue also great summes of money, yearly to be paid at MEDINA and MECHA, for the releefe of poore pilgrims traouelling from far to the sepulchre of their great prophet Mahomet, at MEDINA, or his temple at MECHA.

Shortly after Mahomet fell sicke at HADRIANOPLE, and perceiuing himselfe in danger of death, by his last will appointed his eldest sonne Amurath to succeed him in his kingdom; and sent Eliuan-beg (a man in great fauour with him) in post to AMASIA, to will him with all speed to repaire to the court at HADRIANOPLE. But feeling death to approach, and that hee could not possibly liue vntill the comming of his sonne, he straightly charged his Bassas with all secretie to concale his death, vntill his comming, for feare least any trouble should arise vpon the bruit thereof, before his comming thither. And so hauing set all things in order, he departed out of this world vnto his prophet Mahomet, about the yeare of our Sauour Christ 1422, when hee had reigned seuentene yeares: accounting in his raigne that troublesome ten yeares next after the capitiue of Baiaŕet, in which time the Turkes kingdom was by his ambitious sonnes rent in under (as is aforesaid) vntill it was at length againe by this Mahomet restored vnto the former integrity, about 7 yeares before his death, which the Turkes account for the whole time of his reign: and the other troublesome 10 yeares as a vacancie or Anarchie of their kingdome, as is aforesaid.

Mahomet being dead, the three great Bassaes, Eiuas, Baia, and Ibrahim (to rid themselves of the feare they had of the Ianizaries, and other fouldiours of the court) called a Diuano or counsell for the warres, as if the king had been aliue: wherein it was pretended, That Mahomet had determined to make warre vpon the prince of SMYRNA: and that for that seruice it was his pleasure, That the Ianizaries should forthwith passe ouer into ASIA, to the castle of BAGA. Whereupon presse money was presently giuen them, and they sent ouer with letters directed to the viceroy of ANATOLIA, for the assembling of an armie for BAGA. In the meane time, the great Bassaes of the court sat daily in counsell, placing and displacing, promoting and disgracing whome they thought good, as if the king had so commaunded: The kings physicians also, to countenance the matter, were commanded continually to go too and fro with their potions and receits, after their wonted manner, as if they had had the king still in cure: And letters were sent in post to Eliuan Beg, for speedie dispatch of the businesse for which he was sent into ASIA. Yet for all this cunning dissimulation, the pensioners, and other fouldiours of the court, went to be nere vnto the kings person, and some of them alwaies of the priuie chamber, began to suspect the matter: and comming to the Bassaes, said they maruailed that the king in so long time did neuer shew himselfe as he had alwaies before done. Whereunto the Bassaes answered, That he had been dangerously sicke, and was as yet but a litle recovered, and that therefore the physicians would not suffer him to looke abroad, or take the aire, for feare of casting him downe againe. Then will we our selues said the pensioners goe in and see his majestie, and with that were readie to force in vpon the Bassaes. Eiuas seeing their importunitie, desired them to hold themselves contented, and not as then to trouble the king, for that hee had that day, as hee said, taken physicks: but to morrow (said he) we will request his majestie, if he so please to shew himselfe, that you may see him: wherewith they for that time held themselves content. Now amongst the kings physicians there was one Geordiron, a Persian, a man of a quicke spirit and subtill deuise, which found means to deceiue the pensioners: he deuised, that the dead bodie of the king being apparelled in royall large robes, should be brought betwixt two, as if he had been led into an high open gallerie: and being there set, to haue a boy so neatly placed behind him vnder his large robes, as that he vnperceiued, might moue the kings hand vp to his head, as if he should stroke his face or beard, as his manner was. The next day the dead king being accordingly brought forth by the Bassaes in his rich robes, and wrapped with clothes about his head, as if it had been for feare of the aire, or of taking cold, and so placed in an high open gallerie, as was before deuised: suddainely the physician came running in fuming and raging, as if he had been halfe mad, readie to teare his clothes for anger; and in great choller casting his cap against the ground, asked the Bassaes, if they meant to kill the king, by bringing him into the open aire? We (said he) haue with great pains, in long time, a litle recovered him, and will you thus foolishly cast him downe againe? Pardon vs good doctor (said Eiuas) for these gentlemen (pointing to the pensioners) were so importunat to see his majestie, that to satisfie their desires, he was content to be led forth of his chamber: wherof we hope shall ensue no harme. The pensioners seeing the king many times mouing his hand to his face, and as it were stroking his beard, held themselves well contented, supposing him to haue bene aliue, although but weake, and therefore not willing to speake vnto them. The physicians taking him vp amongst them, carried him into his lodging againe, which was but fast by, making as if they had carried an extreame sicke man. Thus was his death cunningly concealed one and fortie daies, vntill the coming of Amurath his sonne.

This Mahomet was both wise and valiant, and withall exceeding bountifull, but ambitious: and may of right be accounted the restorer of the Turkes kingdome; for he recovered againe all those countries in ASIA which Tamerlane had taken away and giuen vnto other Mahometane princes, after the ouerthrow of Baia. And when as the kingdome of the Turkes was rent in peeces and almost brought to naught by ciuile wars, and the ambition of himselfe and his brethren, he at length got possession of the whole, and so left it to his sonne Amurath an entire kingdome, in the former greatnesse, although not much by him augmented. His bodie lieth buried in a faire tombe made of artificiall stone, very beautifull to behold, in a chappell at the East side of PUSIA, where we leaue him at his rest.

*Europam luctu & funestis cladibus implens
Seuus Amurathes totus in arma ruit.
Maior at Huniades virtute & fortibus ausis,
Cogit cum trepida vertere terga fuga.
Consilia Eugenij bellum furialia suadent,

(Arma viri tractent, cures sua templa sacerdos)
Europæ exitium res tulit ista grane.*

Fierce Amurath doth EUROPE fill with blood and wofull cries:
And wholic giuen to martiall deeds, doth whole in armes arise.
But yet Huniades (than he, of greater strength and might) Enforced him right fearefully to turne his backe in flight.
Eugenius his infernall spels, stirs vp a fatall jarre:
Who hauing charge of sacred rites, runs headlong into warre.
(Leaue martiall deeds to martiall men, and let the priest goe praie)
Such diuelish counsell, worse receiued, wrought EUROPEs great decaye.

THE LIFE OF AMVRATH, THE SECOND OF THAT NAME, SIXT KING OF THE TURKES, AND THE GREAT ESTA- BLISHER OF THEIR KINGDOME.

After that the death of Mahomet had been politiquely concealed one and fortie daies by the three great Bassaes, Baiazet, Ethases, and Ibrahim: ^{Murat is the same that we call Desulerma.} Amurath or Murat. (as the Turkes call him) his eldest sonne, at that time comming to PRUSA, was by them placed in his fathers seat, and the death of Mahomet at the same time published: wherevpon great troubles began on euerie side to arise.

The princes of SMYRNA and MENTESI arose vp in armes: and at ^{Mustapha the supposed sonne of Baiazet raised rebellion against Amurath.} THESSALONICA an obscure fellow, crept as it were out of a chimneys corner, tooke vpon him the name and person of Mustapha, the sonne of Baiazet, which was slaine many yeates before, in the great battaile against Tamerlane at mount STELLA, as is before declared in the life of the ynfortunate Sultan Baiazet. This counterfait Mustapha animated by the Grecian princes, and going from THESSALONICA to VARDARIUM, let to good a countenance vpon the matter, with such a grace and majestie, that not onely the country people (apt to beleue any thing) but men of greater place and calling also, as Tzunites Beg, the prince of SMYRNA his sonne, with the sonnes of old Eurenoses Bassa, persuaded that he was the verie son of the great Baiazet, repaired vnto him, as vnto their naturall prince and soueraigne. From VARDARIUM he went to SERRAE, and from thence to HADRIANOPE, (Amurath being as then at PRUSA) where he was receiued as if it had been that noble prince Mustapha, whom hee feigned himselfe to be: so that in short time he was honoured as a king in all parts of the Turkish kingdome in EUROPE.

Amurath to repress this so great and dangerous a rebellion, sent Baiazet Bassa, a man of great authoritie in his court, with a strong armie into EUROPE. This great Bassa passing ouer HEBRESPONTUS, found all the country reuolted vnto their new found king Mustapha: but marching on towards HADRIANOPE, with purpose to haue giuen him battaile, he was first forsaken of the European souldiours, which he brought out of ASIA, and afterwards of all the rest also: and so being left post alone, with his brother Hamze Beg, was for safegard of his life glad to yeeld himselfe to Mustapha, of whom he was graciously entertained, and vpon promise of his loialtie, sworne one of his priuie counsaile.

Mustapha thus now possessed of the Turkish kingdome in EUROPE, and entertaining great thoughts, the better to maintaine his credit, leauied a great armie to make war vpon Amurath in ASIA. And as he was vpon his way, at a place which the Turkes call SASLIDERE, of the place of Willows, his other counsaileurs repining at the great honor he gaue to Baiazet Bassa, aduised him to beware that he trusted him not too farre, of whose small faith he had sufficient triall already, and was like ynough when occasion should serue, to reuolt from him to Amurath, and to draw after him some great part of his armie, to the great perill both of himselfe and all them his faithfull seruants and followers. Vpon which jealous conceit, this great Bassa Baiazet was there forthwith as a traitour apprehended, and without further triall executed: at which time his brother Hamze was with much adoe spared. This done, Mustapha proceeded on his journey, and passed

ouer with his armie at CALLIPOLIS into ASIA. Amurath vnderstanding of the proceedings of Mustapha in EUROPE, and of his preparation made for his inuasion of ASIA, created three new Bassaes, Omer, Vruge, and Alis, all three the sonnes of Temurtases; these he joyned with his old Bassaes, Ibrahim and Eiuases. All these fiue he vsed as counsellours for the wars, by whose aduice he sent for Mahomet Beg, surnamed Michael Ogl, who in the time that Musa reigned, was viceroy in EUROPE, and therefore a man well knowne to most principall men in Mustapha's armie, but had been kept prisoner in the castle of AMASTIA, from the time that Musa was deposed and put to death by his brother Mahomet, vntill now that hee was after eight yeares imprisonment, for this speciall purpose enlarged and received into fauour.

About the same time that Mustapha set footing in ASIA, Amurath hauing gathered his armie, set forward from PRUSA to meet him; yet with such distrust in his forces, which were thought to be much inferior to the European souldiours which followed Mustapha, that hee was glad vpon a superstitious opinion or zeale, to prostrate himselfe at the feet of an Emir (one of the false prophet Mahomet's posteritie) to receiue at his hypocritical hands a gracelesse blessing for his better speed: by whom he was made to beleue, that after two repulses, he had with much adoe, at the same time, obtained graunt of the great prophet Mahomet, that he should preuaile in that war: and therupon had his sword girt vnto him with the Emir his holy hands, with many other vaine and superstitious ceremonies. Yet for all these charmes, hee marched on with his armie in feare enough, vntill he came to the riuer of VLIBAD, (otherwise called RINDACUS) where hauing intelligence of the approach of Mustapha, he for feare caused the bridge ouer the riuer there to be broken downe, and encamped himselfe on that side the riuer. Not long after came Mustapha, and finding the bridge broken, encamped at the foot thereof on the other side: so that nothing parted the two armies but the breadth of the riuer onely. Whilste they lay thus neere encamped together, that the souldiours might on both sides take the full view one of another, and also talke together: Mahomet-beg surnamed Michael Ogl, but lately deliuered out of his long imprisonment (as is aforesaid) came to the riuer side, and with a loud voice called by name vpon the great captaines, and old souldiours that were in Mustapha's armie; asking by name for many of his old friends and acquaintance: many of them being there present, rejoycing to see that honourable man (whom they supposed to haue been dead in prison many yeares before) came gladly to the side of the riuer to heare what he could say.

Then with a loud voice he began to perswade them, that the man whom they followed was not the honourable Mustapha, but some base minded fellow, set vp by the Grecians, abusing the obscuritie of his birth, as the vaile vnder the couert whereof, hee went craftily about to intrude himselfe into the honourable descent of Baiazet; and so masking in the counterfeit titles of stolen honor, had misseled them from their dutie to their naturall king and soueraigne, to follow him a meere deceiver. And further assured them, that Mustapha, Baiazet his sonne, was dead and buried in the bed of fame, two and twentie yeares before; honourably ending his daies in defence of his country, in the great battaile of mount SABELA, against Tamerlane: Wherfore they should doe well, to forsake that supposed Mustapha, and againe to yeeld their dutifull obedience vnto their vndoubted soueraigne Amurath. These words deliuered vnto them by Mahomet, whom they generally both reuerenced, and trusted; wrought such effect in their minds, that some presently aduencured to swimme ouer the riuer, and joyned themselves vnto him: and many others that staid still, began now to doubt, least they had worshipped a wrong saint. At the same time also, Eiuases Bassa, to terrifie Mustapha, sent vnto him letters as in great secret, aduertising him, That Amurath had the next night purposed with his armie to passe ouer the riuer about the broken bridge; at which time the chiefe captaines of his armie being (as hee said) corrupted, had promised to deliuer Mustapha into his hands, and with his head to pay the ranfome of them all. This he coloured with such faire glosses; that Mustapha partly beleeued the same. So when the dead time of the night was come, Eiuases with certain troupes of horsemen, passed ouer the riuer, at the verie same place hee had in his letters named; and that with such a noise and tumult, as Amurath with his whole armie had been comming. Mustapha seeing things begin thus to worke, according as Eiuases Bassa had before written: and with this, doubting also to be presently betrayed, and carying about him a guiltie conscience, the mother of feare and distrust, tooke horse (sleenderly accompanied, but with ten persons of his whole armie) and fled in hast, no man pursuing them, vntill he came to the riuer of BOGA, and there with a great summe

of money obtained passage, by corrupting the capitaine that dwelt in the castle vpon the passage of the riuer: and the third day after passing ouer the strait of HALLESPONTUS, landed at CALLIPOLIS. The flight of Mustapha once knowne in his armie, they all yeelded themselves to Eiuases Bassa: who taking possession of Mustapha his tent, caused the broken bridge to be repaired; whereby Amurath passing with his armie, joyned himselfe with Eiuases. The other Bassa (Ibrahim) counsailed Amurath to put to sword all those rebels that had followed Mustapha: but by the mediation of Eiuases, to whome they had yeelded themselves, they were generally pardoned.

Amurath departing from VLIBAD or LOPADIUM, came to BOGA; and there hanged vp the capitaine that had giuen Mustapha passage. From thence he held on his way to LAMPSCUM, intending to pursue Mustapha into EUROPE: but being come to the sea side, hee could find no passage, for that Mustapha had caused all the shipping on that side, to be brought ouer into EUROPE. Yet at last Amurath by good fortune chaunced vpon a great Genoway ship, which hee hired for foure thousand duckats to transport his armie, and so with much adoe, at length landed in EUROPE. Mustapha seeing that Amurath was now come ouer, fled to HADRIANOPLE, where he found such cold welcome, that fearing to bee betrayed hee, was glad to speed himselfe thence, thinking all the world to little to hide himselfe in: and so came to an obscure place in the countrey of the Turks called KISUL-A-GATZ-GENITZE: where, the souldiours sent to pursue him, ouertook him, and brought him bound to Amurath then being at HADRIANOPLE: by whose commandement he was shamefully hanged, from the battlements of one of the highest towers of the citie, and there left to the worlds wonder.

Mustapha hanged.

This Mustapha, is of some writers reported to haue been indeede the sonne of the great Sultan Baiazet, and that he was kept in prison all that long time, and thus at length set vp by the Greeks to trouble the state of the Turkish kingdome: but the Turkish histories report as before, calling him Dusme or counterfeit Mustapha. And it is verie likely, that if he had been one of the sonnes of Baiazet, he would haue found some meanes to haue made some great stirre long before that, as all the rest of the vnquiet brood of Baiazet did, which neuer rested vntil they had like the earth borne brethren one destroyed the other: besides that, their bloodie natures considered, it is verie like that Mahomet his younger brother, who reigned in HADRIANOPLE almost eight yeares, and was in league all that time with the emperor of CONSTANTINOPLE, would for his more safetie haue got him into his owne power, if hee had been in prison with the emperor; or else haue dispatched him, if he had been in prison with himselfe. All which I am the rather perswaded to thinke, for that Orchanes (a child, the son of Solyman) could find no safe place of abode at CONSTANTINOPLE in the reigne of Mahomet; but flying, was apprehended and his eyes put out, as is before declared in the life of Mahomet: much lesse is it like that Mustapha, being a warlike prince, and his elder brother, could haue been so long preserved and kept in prison from his furie.

It fortuned in these late broiles (as oftentimes it doth with others in like case) diuers of the rebels Asapi, or common souldiours (whom he for his greater countenance had apparelled and armed like the Ianizaries) to fall into the hands of the true Ianizaries, Amurath his faithfull guards; whose liues indeed they spared, but vsing them with all the despight and indignities possible. Amongst the rest, one of the Ianizaries being an hungred, brought two of these Asapi his prisoners vnto a cooke shop, offering to sell them vnto him for a little victuall: which the cooke refused to giue him, as hauing no vse for such vnneccessarie seruants. Wherewith the proud Ianizarie enraged, swore many a great oath, presently to cut off their heads, & to giue them him for nought, if he would not for a thing of nought redeeme them. And like ynough he was to haue so done, had not the cooke, moued with pitie, offered him for them both a sheepes head: which the Ianizarie tooke for them, swearing, That the cooke had giuen for the more than indeed they were worth. Which disgrace, so long since done vnto these Asapi, is yet oftentimes by way of reproch in great contempt, by the matterfull and insolent Ianizaries, objected vnto the whole bodie of the Asapi (the greatest part of the Turks huge armies) of whom for all that the proud Ianizaries make small reckoning, accounting them scarcely for men, & in their rage oftentimes telling them, That two of them are not worth a foddren sheepes head.

Amurath hauing at length with much adoe thus pacified the dangerous rebellion raised by the counterfeit Mustapha, both in EUROPE and ASIA, was yet not a little grieved, to thinke how the same had to the great hazard of his estate, bene first plotted by the Greeks, and afterwards

ouer with his armie at CALLIPOLIS into ASIA. Amurath vnderstanding of the proceedings of Mustapha in EUROPE, and of his preparation made for his inuasion of ASIA, created three new Bassaes, Omer, Vrue, and Alis, all three the sonnes of Temurtases; these he joynd with his old Bassaes, Ibrahim and Eiuses. Amurath hauing at length with much adoe thus pacified the dangerous rebellion raised by the counterfeit Mustapha, both in EUROPE and ASIA; was yet not a little grieved, to thinke how the same had to the great hazard of his estate, bene first plotted by the Greeks, and afterwards

Constantinople in vaine besieged by Amurath

wards countenanced by the Greeke emperor, of whom he thought now to be reueged. And therefore sending before him Michael Ugli, his lieutenant generall in EUROPE, with his European souldiors to invade the countrey about CONSTANTINOPL, followed himselfe after with the Ianizaries and his Asian forces: and encamping before the citie, filled all that necke of land which lieth before it, from sea to sea. And so encamped, began right furiously to batter the wals, in hope so to haue made a breach, and by the same to haue entered the citie: but finding the wals of greater strength than hee had before supposed, and the defendants still repairing whatsoever the furie of his artillerie had beaten downe or shaken, hee ceased his batterie, and coming on with all his forces, desperately attempted by assault to haue gained the citie: wherein his attempt was not answerable to his desire. For approaching the citie, with arrowes, as showers falling upon the defendants, and scaling ladders in the mean time clapt vp to the wals, and the Ianizaries with others of his best souldiors courageously mounting the same; they were by the defendants nobly repulsed and beaten downe, loosing some their hands, some their armes, some their heads, but most their liues, no shot falling in vaine from the wals. VVhich Amurath beholding, and grieved to see (though vnwilling) commaunded a retreat to be sounded, and the assault quene ouer: and shortly after seeing no hope to preuaile, in great rage raised his siege and departed. Vnto whom for all that the Greeke emperor not long after sent his embassadours, to entreat with him for peace; whereof he would by no meanes heare, but proudly threatened to be ere long of all his wrongs reuenged. VVhich caused the Greeke emperor to deuise what he might for the troubling of his estate, so to keepe him otherwise busied: as he did shortly after with the Caramanian king, by countenancing another Mustapha (surnamed Cutzug or the little) Amurath his younger brother, against him, to the raising of new stirres, and Amurath his no small trouble.

Mahomet the late king had fise sonnes and seuen daughters, whereof Amurath was the eldest, and succeeded in his fathers kingdom; Mustapha the second, surnamed the little; Achmet the third, who died before his father: the other two, Iosephus & Machmutes, both died of the plague, being but children, after the death of their father. Thre of their sisters were married to the three sonnes of the king of CARAMANIA, Ibrahim, Aladin, and Isa: other two were bestowed vpon the sonnes of the prince Isfendiar, Ibrahim, and Casimes: the sixt was giuen in marriage to Cozza-Beg, viceroy in ANATOLIA; and the seuenth to the sonne of Ibrahim Bassa, who died at Mebra, whither she went vpon superstitious deuotion on pilgrimage.

At such time as Amurath was busied in his warres in EUROPE against Mustapha, the supposed sonne of Baiazer: the younger sonne of Mahomet (called also Mustapha) being but thirteene years old, and Amurath his brother indeed, was set vp to raise new troubles, by the king of CARAMANIA, and other princes, as well Mahometans, as the Christian princes of GRECIA; who thought it good pollicie, by that meanes to impeach the greatnesse of Amurath. This young prince Mustapha, strengthened with the forces of his friends, entered into his brothers dominions in ASIA, and besieged Nice, which was at length yeilded vnto him. Amurath aduertised of this new rebellion, by great gifts and large promises corrupted Ilias Beg, the young princes tutor, to betray the prince into his hands. VVherupon Amurath with great celeritie set forward with his arme from HADRIANOPL, and in nine daies came to Nice, where he entered the citie with small resistance, as was to him before promised, where Mustapha was by his false tutor to him presented: who because he would not spill one drop of the sacred Othoman blood (as the Turks call it) commaunded the executioner presently to strangle him with a bow string; which was done accordingly, and his bodie afterwards buried by his father at PRUSA.

Amurath hauing suppressed these two rebellions, and now out of all feare of any competitor, thought his fise counsellors too many by three, and therefore remoued the three Bassas, Omar, Vrutzi, and Alis (the sonnes of Temurtases) into honorable places; retaining of his counsell, onely the two old Bassas, Ibrahim and Eiuases. But shortly after, Eiuases was secretly accused to Amurath, That he sought by his fauorites, the souldiors of the court, to aspire vnto the kingdom himselfe, and to depose the king; and that intending some such matter, hee did vsually weare a priuie coat. This suspicious report troubled the jealous tyrant: wherefore on a time as he rid accompanied with Eiuases, he cast his arme about him, as if it had bene in kindnesse: but finding him secretly armed, wou! needs know the cause thereof: whereunto Eiuases answered, That it was for feare of some enemies hee had in the court: but this excuse could by no meanes serue his turne: wherefore he was forthwith apprehended by the commaundement of Amurath, and both his eyes burnt out with a hot Steele glasse.

Whilest Amurath was thus busied in subduing rebellions at home, Muhamethes the Caramanian king besieged ATTALIA, a great citie in PAMPHILIA, by the space of six moneths, which was valiantly defended by Hamza-beg, Amurath his lieutenant there: at which siege the vnfortunat king himselfe, as he was taking view of the citie, was slaine with a great shot out of the citie: whereupon Ibrahim, which succeeded him in the kingdom, brake vp the siege, & returned home to burie his father. At this time also, Dracula prince of VALACIA, passing ouer DANUBIUS, did the Turks much harme about SILISTRA, but was afterwards enforced to submit himselfe to Amurath, and become his tributarie.

About this time also Tzunites, the prince of SMYRNA, which had before aided the rebell Mustapha, did by all meanes he could vex and molest Iaxia-beg, (Amurath his lieutenant in ARDINIA) & hauing by chance taken his brother prisoner, put him to death. This prince of SMYRNA was descended of the antient princes of ARDINIA, and therefore pretended an interest in that siegnorie: which his claime the people of the countrey secretly fauoured, so farre as they durst for feare of the Turks. Amurath hearing of the harmes that this prince of SMYRNA did, commaunded Hamze-beg, viceroy of ANATOLIA, with all his power to make warre vpon him. The viceroy without delay assembled a great armie, and invaded the princes countrey: and the prince being well provided for his coming, meeting him vpon the way, gaue him battaile: wherein Hasan the princes sonne, leading a great part of his fathers armie, had put one part of the Turkes armie to flight: and pursuing them with too much furie, left his father at the same time so hardly beset by the viceroy, that he was glad to flie to his castle of HIPSILY fast by. Hasan returning from the chace of the enemy, not knowing what had happened to his father, was by the Turkes in his returne overcome and taken prisoner. After which victorie the viceroy presently laid siege to the castle wherein the prince was. This siege continued a great while: at length, the prince brought to extremitie, was content to yeeld himselfe vnto the viceroy, vpon condition he should vse no violence against the person of himselfe or his sonne, but to send them prisoners vnto Amurath: which thing the viceroy by solenne oath promised, whereupon the prince came out of the castle, and yeelded himselfe prisoner to the viceroy. Iaxia-beg, whose brother the prince had before put to death, attended the going of Hamze the viceroy to his tent, where finding Hasan the princes sonne sitting vpon the ground, as the manner of the Turkes is, tooke him by the choller with great furie, and drawing him along to the feet of the prince his father, there most cruelly strucke off his head: and in the same rage laying his bloodie hands vpon the aged prince, strucke off his head also: to the great dishonour of the viceroy, who had before giuen his faith for their safetie. The heads of the prince and his sonne were set vpon two launces, within the sight of the castle; which the defendants seeing, and now despairing of all rescue, yeelded themselves, with the castle. This infortunat Tzunites was the last prince of SMYRNA, after whose death all his territorie was vnto the Othoman kingdom. After all these troubles, Amurath with great triumph married the daughter of the prince Isfendiar.

Amurath hauing laied vp in the depth of his thoughts the remembrance of that the Grecian princes had done, in giuing aid to the rebels aforesaid, thought it now high time to take reuenge of that wrong: and for that purpose gathered a great armie, wherewith he ranged at his pleasure through MACEDONIA, vntill he came to THESSALONICA, surprising by the way diuers cities and castles, at that time belonging to the Constantinopolitan empire. This famous citie of THESSALONICA, now called SALONICHI, for beautie and wealth sometime not inferiour to any of the greatest and most renowned cities of GRECIA, is situate vpon the borders of MACEDONIA, close vnto a bay of the ARCHIPELAGO or the sea EGEUM: which bay was in antient time called THERMATICUS-SINUS, and now the bay of SALONICHI. To the Christian congregation there dwelling, S. Paul wrote two Epistles, in the latter whereof, hee forewarneth them of a great defection to come before the latter day: Before this Christian citie, then in the protection of the Venetians, Amurath encamped his great armie of misbeleuing Turkes; and laied hard siege to it, with most terrible batterie: at which time hee by secret meanes corrupted certaine of the wicked citizens, to haue betrayed the citie by a secret mine; and to haue let him in: which treason was by the Venetian gouernors perceiued, and the plotters therof for safeguard of their liues glad to leape ouer the wals, and to flie into the Turkes campe.

Amurath hauing greatly battered the wals of the citie, the more to encourage his souldiors, promised promised to giue them all the spoile thereof, if they could by force winne it. The greedie desire of this rich prey, wherein euery common souldior promised vnto himselfe whatsoeuer his foolish fancie or vnbridled affection could desire, so inflamed the minds of these barbarous souldiors, and especially of the Ianizaries, that giuing a most terrible assault to the citie, they by force entered the same, and wan it. The Venetian souldiors fled to their gallies, lying at anchor in the hauen, and so got to sea: but the infinite miseries which the poore Christian citizens indured in paine than the ignominious outrages and vspeakable villanies which many good Christians there suffered, heartily wishing to die, and could not; and yet the furious enemies sword deuoured all the people without respect of age or sex, except such as for strength of bodie, or comeliness of person, were reserved for painefull labour or beastly lust; which poore soules were afterwards disperfed into most miserable seruitude and slauerie, through all parts of the Turkish kingdome. The infinite riches of that famous citie, became a spoile vnto the barbarous souldiors; the goodly houses were left desolate, void of inhabitants. Thus the beautifull citie of THESSALONICA, sometime one of the most glorious ornaments of GRÆCIA, the late pleasant dwelling place of many rich Christians, was by the tyrant giuen for an habitation to such base Turkes, as at their pleasure repaired thether to seat themselves, and so is by them at this day possessed. This calamitie happened to THESSALONICA in the yeare of our Lord 1432.

Thessalonica taken by Amurath.

THESSALONICA being thus taken, Amurath returned to HADRIANOPOLE himselfe, and at the same time sent Caratze with the greatest part of his armie into ÆTOLIA. Charles prince of that countrey, dying a little before the coming of Amurath to THESSALONICA, and hauing no lawfull issue, had diuided the countrey of ACHARNANIA amongst his three base sons, Memon, Turnus, and Hercules, leauing all the rest of his dominion to his brothers sonne, called also Charles. But shortly after, such discord fell among these brethren, that Amurath sending his Turkes to aid one of them against the other, as he was by them requested, in fine brought all that countrey of ÆTOLIA into subjection to himselfe, leauing nothing for the foolish brethren to strue for, more than the bare titles of imaginatiue honour. The other Græcia princes of ATHENS, PHOCIS, BOETIA, and all the rest of GRÆCIA, vnto the strait of CORINTH, terrified by their neighbours harness, were glad to submit themselves to the barbarian yoke, and to become tributaries vnto the Turkish tirant; vnder which slauerie they of long time most miserably liued, if intollerable slauerie joyned with infidelitie may be accounted a life. Thus the Grecians lost their libertie, (which their auncestors had many times before, to their immortall praise, worthily defended against the greatest monarchs of the world) and are now so degenerate, by the meanes of the Turkish oppression, that in all GRÆCIA is hardly to be found any small remembrance of the ancient glory thereof: insomuch that whereas they were wont to account all other nations barbarous in comparison of themselves, they are now become no lesse barbarous than those rude nations whom they before scorned. Which miserie with a thousand more, they may justly impute to their owne ambition and discord.

At this time amongst the distressed princes of MACEDONIA, and GRÆCIA, one John Castriot reigned in EPIRUS: who seeing how mightily the Turke preuailed against the princes his neighbours, and considering that hee was not able by any meanes to withstand so puissant an enemy, to obtaine peace, he was glad to deliuer into Amurath his possession, his foure sonnes, Stanisus, Reposius, Constantine, and George, for hostages: whom Amurath faithfully promised, well and honourably to intreat. But as soone as he had got them within his reach, he falsified his faith, and caused them to be circumcised after the Turkish manner, and to be instructed in the Turkish superstition, to the great griefe of their Christian parents: and afterwards, when he vnderstood of the death of John Castriot their father, hee poisoned all the three elder brethren: And by Sehahie (one of his great captaines) seized vpon CROIA, his chiefe citie, and all the rest of his territories, as if they had by good right deuolued vnto him. But George the youngest, whom the Turkes named Scander-beg or lord Alexander, for his excellent feature, and pregnant wit, he alwaies entirely loued, and as some thought, more passionatly than he should haue loued a boy. Him he caused to be diligently instructed in all kind of actiuitie, and feats of warre, wherein he excelled al other his equals in Amurath his court; and rising by many degrees of honor, came at last (being yet but verie young) to be a great Sanzack or gouernor of a prouince, and was many times appointed appointed by Amurath to be generall of his armies; in which seruice hee so behaued himselfe, that he got the loue of all that knew him, and increased his credit with Amurath: vntill at last he found oportunitie by great policie and courage, to deliuer both himselfe and his natie countrie, from the horrible slauerie of the Turkish tyrannie, as shall be afterwards declared.

Shortly after that Amurath had thus daunted the princes of GRÆCIA, he turned his forces into SERVIA: but the prince of SERVIA vnable to withstand so mightie an enemy, to procure his fauour, sent embassadours, offering to pay him a yearely tribute, and to doe further what he should reasonably demaund. Amurath beside the yearely tribute, required to haue Marie (this princes faire daughter) in mariage; and that he should not suffer the Hungarians to passe through his countrey to inuade him; and further, not at any time to denie passage vnto the Turkish armie, when he should send forth the same for the inuasion of the kingdome of BOSNIA. All which unreasonable conditions the prince was glad to agree vnto, and sent his faire daughter by Saratze, who was afterwards married to Amurath.

About this time, Iosephus and Machmites, Amurath his brethren, and Orchanes the sonne of Plague among the Turke. Solyman, who had his eyes put out by his vncl Mahomet, with many other men of great account among the Turkes, died of the plague at PRUSA.

Whilest Amurath was thus busied in his wars in EUROPE, the king of CARAMANIA his brother in law, inuaded his dominions in ASIA: for so it was agreed betwene the Christian princes of EUROPE, and the Mahometan princes of ASIA, to whom the greatnesse of the Othoman kingdome was now become dreadfull, That whensoever hee inuaded the Christians in EUROPE, the Mahometan princes should inuade his countie in ASIA; and that whensoever hee should turne his forces into ASIA, the Christian princes should spoile his countie in EUROPE. Against this Caramanian king, Amurath transported his armie into ASIA: and as he went, seized vpon the countie of SARUCHANIA, MENTESIA, and other prouinces, which were before but tributaries vnto him, driuing out the poore princes before him: and so entered into CARAMANIA, and inforced the king so farre; that he was glad to agree to such conditions of peace as it pleased him to propound vnto him, and to send his sonne to wait at his court. And at the same time picking a quarrell with Isfendiar prince of CASTAMONA, caused him to become his tributarie, and to send his sonne to his court also. By which means the name of Amurath became terrible to all the Mahometan princes.

When Amurath had thus quieted all his troubles in ASIA, he returned to HADRIANOPOLE: and vnderstanding that the Hungarians passing ouer DANUBIUS, had in his absence made diuers incursions into his dominions, hee was therewith greatly offended, and in reuenge thereof first sent Alis Bassa the sonne of Eurenosis, with an armie to inuade HUNGARIA; which he performed accordingly by the space of a month, and returned from thence with rich bootie. Not long after, he himselfe in person made another road into HUNGARIE, commanding the prince of SERVIA his father in law, to giue his armie free passage through his countrey, and charging Dracula prince of VALACHIA to aid him with his forces in that expedition: which his commandement both the Christian princes (more for feare, than of good will) diligently performed. So Amurath hauing enriched his souldiors with the spoile taken in HUNGARIE, returned home and wintered at his court at HADRIANOPOLE.

Hungarie spoiled by Amurath.

The secret confederation betwene the Hungarians and the Mahometan king of CARAMANIA, was not suspected of Amurath; which he was the rather induced to beleue, for that whensoever he inuaded the one he was presently set vpon by the other, either in EUROPE or in ASIA: of which plot hee doubted not but that George prince of SERVIA (his father in law) was chiefe author, although in shew he was therein the least actor. Wherefore Amurath intending to spill the play, sent for the prince his father in law to come to the court at HADRIANOPOLE: but hee doubting some Turkish tragedie, pretended great occasions that he could not come; and fearing that which afterwards fell out, fortified and manned all his strong cities and castles: by all meanes he could possibly, especially his chiefe citie SEBENDRE (otherwise called SEBENDROVIA) and left therein his sonne Gregorie (or as some call him, George) as gouernour; for his other sonne Stephan was long before in Amurath his court, with the queene his sister. The prince of SERVIA himselfe went into HUNGARIE to procure from thence some aid, hauing there also himselfe certaine territories, which he had in exchange of Sigismundus (late emperor and king of HUNGARIE) for the citie of BALGRADB. It was not long after, but Amurath forgetting both the affinitie and league hee had with the prince his father in law, entered with a great armie into SERBIA, destroying all before him, and hardly besieged SEMENDRE: where, after long siege, the young gouernour (the princes sonne) doubting to fall into his enemies hands by suddaine assault, yielded himselfe, with the citie. Which thing so discouraged the rest of the Seruians, that in short time SOPHIA, NOVOMONT, with all the rest of the cities of SERBIA were yielded into the power of Amurath. After which conquest he returned to HADRIANOPLE, and hearing that the prince of SERBIA with the Hungarians, were making head against him; and that the two yong Seruian princes, Gregorie and Stephen his wiues brethren, had intelligence with their father, he commaunded them both to be cast in prison at DIDYMOTICHVM, and their eyes cruelly to be burnt out with a brasse balon made red hot, a comon vnmerefull practise among the Turks.

About this time Albertus duke of AVSTRIA hauing before married Elizabeth the only daughter of Sigismund the emperor, and succeeding his father in law both in the empire and kingdome of HUNGARIE (vnto which type of highest honour nothing more furthered him than the remembrance of Sigismund:) in the second yeare of his raigne, before hee was well settled in those new atchieued honours, died of the flux, as he was making great preparation against Amurath the Turkish king: who hauing lately driuen George prince of SERBIA and RASCIA out of his dominions, had now extended the Turkish kingdome euen vnto the borders of HUNGARIE. This Albertus dying, left his wife great with child. The Hungarians, in whose minds the remembrance of Sigismund was yet fresh, could haue bene contented to haue liued vnder the gouernment of the queene his daughter, the widow of Albertus (then great with child:) but that the Turkish king was now growne so great, and come so nigh, that it was thought more than needfull by John Huniades, and other of the Hungarian nobilitie, for the defence of that kingdome, not wholly to rest vpon the deuotion of the people toward the queene, and the expectation of her issue, whereby they should be nothing strengthened: but to make choice of some great prince, by whose power they might the better defend themselves and the kingdome against their dangerous enemies. Whereupon with consent of the queene it was resolved vpon, to make choice of Vladislavus, the yong king of POLONIA, then a prince of great power, but of farre greater fame and expectation: and by embassadors to offer vnto him the mariage of the queene, & with her the kingdome also. This embassage being sent vnto Vladislavus, the matter was too and fro debated in the Polonian court, whether it were to be accepted of or not? Some began to speake of the inequalitye of the match, considering that the king was but in the prime of his youth, and the queene well steep into yeares: vrging farther, that nothing was offered in that match but wars; and that the Hungarians therein sought for nothing more, than by the Polonian forces to defend themselves against the Turks. Others of contrarie opinion, said, That the vniuing of those two mightie kingdoms would be to the great good of them both, and to the great honour of the king, whose very name would thereby become terrible vnto the Turkes: and that it were greater pollicie, by the forces of both the kingdomes, to keepe the Turkish king from entring into HUNGARIE, than to leaue that kingdome to him for a prey, and afterward be inforced to fight with the same enemy in the heart of POLONIA: and as for inequalitye of yeares betwixt the king and the queene, it was not so great a matter, that in regard thereof so honourable and commodious alliance should be rejected; for as much as princes doe more regard the vertues of their choice, with the increase of their honour, and wealth of their kingdomes, than the Summer fruit of youth and beauty: which of itselfe in short time doth rot and perish, although it be neuer so carefully kept and preserved: and that for as much as there can be but one king in a kingdome, such choice was to be preferred of kings as had not therein the greatest hope of many children. After long deliberation, Vladislavus gave answer vnto the embassadors, That he would accept of the offers by them made: whereupon some of them returned to make relation thereof vnto the queene, and some of them staid behind to haften the king forward. But whilst these things was adoeing, the queen in the mean time was deliuered of a faire son, whom she caused to be baptized and named Ladislavus. After the birth of this child, the queene mooued with a motherly affection, began to repent her selfe, that she had given her consent for the calling in of the Polonian king, to the prejudice of her sonne: And being animated by some of the Hungarian nobilitie (who presuming of the good grace they were in with the queene, hoped to grow great themselves, if they might first draw the gouernment of that kingdome to the queene and her young sonne) determined now by all possible means to exclude the Polonian king: but the greater part of the nobilitie better considering what was most expedient for

for the present estate, and that they could neither with honor nor safetie flie from that which was before (for the common good) by the embassadors concluded; continued firme in their former resolution, for the bringing in of Vladislavus: so that by this meanes, some taking part with the queene and her young sonne, and others standing fast for Vladislavus, the kingdome of HUNGARIE was deuided into two factions, and as it were rent in peeces, and so grew to ciuile wars. The queene with such as fauoured her claime, the more to gaine the minds of the common people (which are many times no lesse carried away with shewes than matter) caused her sonne Ladislavus being then but three moneths old, to be solemnly crowned king at ALBA-REGALIS, the vsuall place for the coronation of the Hungarian kings. But after that the Polonian king had entred into HUNGARIE with a goodly armie, and joined his forces with his friends, most part of them which before followed the queene and her sonne, reuolted vnto Vladislavus. So that when she had done what she could, she was glad at last to commit the tuition of her sonne, together with the crowne of HUNGARIE, vnto Fredericke the third, then emperor: neuer ceasing for all that, to the vttermost of her power, to trouble the gouernment of Vladislavus, continually stirring vp great wars against him both at home and abroad, vntill that at the last by her death her quarrell tooke end, together with her life.

In the midst of these ciuile warres, Amurath thought a faire oportunitie presented vnto him, to make an entrance vnto the conquest of HUNGARIE, which kingdome he had in his ambitious mind already deuoured. And therefore gathering a great armie, he marched along the riuer DANVBIUS, vntill he came to the strong citie of BELGRADE, called in ancient time TAV-RUNVM, and of some ALBA GRACA, but now commonly GREIS WEISENBURG. This citie is enuironed on the East side with the famous riuer DANVBIUS, and on the South with the great tiuer of SAUS or SAWE, which there falleth into DANVBIUS; and on the other two sides is defended with strong wals, with deepe and large ditches; and was then accounted the gate or entrance into HUNGARIE. Vnto this citie Amurath at his first comming gaue two terrible assaults, & was in good hope so to haue woon the same, but yet was both times valiantly repulsed, with great slaughter of his men. Wherefore finding it to be a matter of more difficultie than was by him at the first supposed, he began to raise mounts against the citie, and high towers of wood to annoy the defendants, and furiously battered the wals. At this time also he caused great numbers of gallies and small pinnaces to be brought into both the riuers of DANVBIUS and SAWE to assault the citie on those parts where was least feared, and by that meanes also to keepe them of the citie from all succours to be sent that way out of HUNGARIE. Yet for all he could doe or devise, the citie was still valiantly defended by the Christian soldiours, which vnder the leading and conduct of Ioannes Vranus, a Florentine, gouernor thereof, with often sallies and continuall shot slew great numbers of the Turks. At the time of this siege, Vladislavus, king of POLONIA, and lately elect king of HUNGARIE, was sore troubled by the queene and her faction in HUNGARIE: which thing the Turkish king knew right well, and thereupon continued his siege, although famine began greatly to encrease in his campe; hoping in nothing more, than that the defendants despairing of helpe from the king, would in short time yeeld vp the citie. Vladislavus being so entangled with ciuile wars, as is aforesaid, that he could not possibly prepare such force as might relieue the besieged citie: yet for as much as the Turkish king had not long before by his embassador required to ioine with him in league & amitie, he thought good now to assay if he could raise the siege, by sending vnto him the like embassage. Whereupon he sent Dobrogensis, Ostrogensis, and Lucas Gorfensis, three of the Polonian nobilitie, embassadors vnto Amurath: declaring vnto him, That for so much as he had first offered by his embassadors, to ioine with him in league before he came out of POLONIA, the remembrance thereof had taken such deepe impression in his mind, that hee would not take vp armes against him, although it were in his owne iust defence, before hee had offered vnto him reasonable conditions of peace: wherefore if hee would desist from inuading of HUNGARIE, whereof Vladislavus was now by God his permission, and consent of the people, chosen king, and so raise his siege, that then they should afterwards easily agree vpon the desired peace: in concluding whereof, he should not find Vladislavus inferior to himselfe in any manner of princely courtiesie; but if he had rather to proceed in armes, & to make prooffe of his strength, he would then doe the best that he could, to make him know, that he was of sufficient power, in so iust a quarrell, to withstand his greatest forces, and to reuenge the wrongs to him done. When Amurath had receiued this embassage, he appointed the embassadors to with- draw draw themselves for a while to SYNDEROVIA (a citie of SERVIA, not farre off) untill he might better consider of their demands: pretending, that he did it for their safetie; but as appeared afterwards, secretly resolving with himselfe, presently to do his uttermost deuoir for the gaining of the citie, and vpon the successe thereof to shape them answere accordingly. Wherfore he soon as the embassadours were departed to SYNDEROVIA, hee first by his messengers assailed the minds of the citizens and souldiours with magnificall promises of large liberties; and infinit rewards and preferments, if they would yeeld vp the citie: and many arrowes with letters made fast vnto them, full of like promises, were at the same time shot into the citie. But when he saw no hope to preuaile by that means, hee called together the capitaines and commanders of his armie, and there in the presence of them all spake vnto them as followeth:

The notable speech of Amurath sixt king of the Turks to the souldiours to the assault of Belgrade.

Although I know it is in mine owne power, to graunt, or not to graunt, the peace wherof our enemies haue made a motion: yet it is my pleasure (worthie souldiours) to know your minds also. For so much as we haue that warre in hand, wherein with worldly felicitie, (whereof amongst you I hold the cheefe place) is also in dangered our religion, and puritie of life; the defence and care wherof equally belongeth vnto vs all: for although we differ much one from another in the manner of our vocation and liuing here, yet after death we all hope for one and the selfsame felicitie. And therefore I would haue you to understand, all that I shall say, as proceeding not of any regard of mine owne priuate, but vpon the consideration of the common good of you all. For as concerning mine owne estate, I possesse so large countries in ASIA, such great dominions in EUROPE, that either part thereof (in good time bee it said) might seeme a sufficient kingdome: so that perhaps it might better stand with my estate, for the more care for keeping of that I haue, than to trauell for the gaining of more: but you are to consider with your selues, whether you haue euery man sufficient to suffice himselfe or not, and how long you thinke your selues assured of the same; and moreover, that together with these worldly things we shall be driuen at length to forsake our profession and religion, if we shall now lay downe armes. For our enemies require, that we should first cease from warre, and then afterwards they thinke it meet to talke of peace. I will not speake of the indignitie, that men besieged, and in euill plight, should propound conditions of peace to them that besedge them, and are well furnished of all things; that feeble and cowardly men should promise peace vnto courageous and expert souldiours: omit what labour and paines we haue taken in laying our siege, in raising of mounts, in making of shipping, all which our enemies command vs to forsake, as if they had vs already bound or coup'd up in hold, as we haue them. All BULGARIA, and the greater part of RASCIA is now by vs conquered, and most part of SERVIA is at our command: all which places are either by vs to be kept, or els all the rest of that we possesse in EUROPE, is with them to be quite lost and forsaken. Whosoener shall haue in their power this citie which we besiege (and that our enemies know right well) shall haue not onely as it were a fortresse and bulwarke of defence for his owne, but also a castle and entrance for the subduing of others. The kingdome of HUNGARIE is now deuided in it selfe, and full of domesticall sedition: neither is it so much strengthened by the uniting of the kingdome of POLONIA, as it is by ciuile dissention weakened: and in this motion of peace nothing is sought for, but to gaue time for the pacifying of their priuate quarrels, that they may afterwards with their doubled forces set vpon vs. For if we shall breake vp our siege before we haue woon the citie, they will easily find deluies so long to protract the conclusion of peace, untill that either Vladislavus his good fortune, or els the Hungarians being of themselves better aduised, shall make an end of their ciuile wars. What manner and conditions of peace will they then require of vs, when they are at unitie amongst themselves, and in armes against vs; seeing that now being in danger with mutuall discord, and almost by vs vanquished, doe thinke it reasonable (as if they had woon the field) that we should first raise our siege, and then entreat of peace? Their proud demands for the restitution of BULGARIA and RASCIA, with other countries and cities woon by our trauell and danger; already sound in mine eares: which if wee shall refuse to graunt, not onely the Hungarians being then at unitie among themselves, but also the Polonians, joined vnto them, will bring those wars home to our dores which we now at great aduantage make vpon them, troubled with discord and ciuile broiles. And if for desire of peace we could be content to yeeld vnto such shamefull and miserable conditions, and restore vnto them all they should or in reason could desire; do you thinke the prince of SERVIA would rest contented with his owne? whose haughtie mind (I am sure) being inflat with the combining of two such mightie kingdomes, thinketh not onely of the recouerie of that hee hath lost, but euen now gapeth at all that is ours in EUROPE. He will not thinke himselfe satisfied, before hee (himselfe)

ning brought the Hungarian and Polonian forces against vs) shall see the same hauocke and spoile made in our kingdome with fire and sword, which he hath before seene made by vs in his owne. Where if his fortune should answere his desires (which God forbid, but yet it may chance) beside all the miserable and intollerable outrages, which are to be feared of an angrie conquerour, it is accounted with them for a godly and religious worke, to vse all cruell and unspeakable villanies against our nation, except wee will forsake the faith and religion deliuered vnto vs by our ancestors, and follow their new and incredible ceremonies. Neither doe they thinke they can more easily and effectually procure the fauor of God with any other kind of sacrifice or seruice, than by ouerthrowing and prophaning our temples, by scoffing at our most sacred and secret rites and ceremonies, by scorning our religion, and priests: and that you may know all the furie wherewith they rage against vs and our religion, they account all them for holy saints which die in fight against vs. There is no cause (valiant souldiours) that vpon the vaine hope of peace, we should expect, whilst the enemy doth gather and unite his forces and armes against vs, especially such an enemy as propoundeth not spoile and worldly honours, but immortalitie it selfe, as a reward of his victorie. We haue already taken much more labour than we haue to take, we haue filled the ditches with reslesse labour, we haue cast up bulwarkes equal with the wals, and part of the wals we haue beaten euen with the ground, so that you see the towne halfe opened: and that towne, by gaining wherof, all that ours is, may be made safe and quiet; and that which our enemy possesseth, subject to our spoile and prey. If you will but a little inforce your selues as men mindfull of our good fortune and forwardnesse, you shall find our temples, our sacrifices, our religion, all worldly and heauily felicitie to bee then assured vnto vs, when as you shall to morrow ouerthrow the very foundation of the enemies wall. Then (courageous souldiours) we may crie victorie, not for the present, but for euer. If this warre should bring vnto vs nothing els but an assured securitie of our estate, it were sufficient reward: for which we ought cheerefully to aduenture our selues to all dangers, and to challenge in combat euen death it selfe. But as this victorie doth defend all our things as with a deep trench or sure wall, so doth it lay open and expose all our enemies dominions vnto danger & spoile. Hitherto we haue stricken with nature her selfe in the rough and abrupt mountains of BULGARIA & RASCIA, where we were to stricke with hunger, thirst, labor, & desperation: all them we haue ouertome, allured with no other reward, but that at length we might attaine vnto the wealth of fruitfull HUNGARIE, from whence we must fetch the querdon of our victorie, and the ground of our glorie. We are come to the gates, which being laid open, we are not to passe over inaccessible rocks, or uncouth deserts, but we shall go through most pleasant places, dec'd both by nature her selfe, and the industrie of man; where the temperatnesse of the aire, and liuely springs with the fruitfulness of the soile, doth euery where yeeld plentie of all manner of food both for man and beast, not only to serue for natures necessitie, but euen to glut our wanton desires. What thing soeuer curious in-dewor hardly bringeth forth in other places, that the fertilitie of this soile yeeldeth plentifully of it selfe: so that it is to be thought, that nature adorned HUNGARIE with a certain extraordinary care, when as she would set forth a pattern of good husbandrie, for other countries to imitate. Neither hath she in any place been more bountifull in bestowing her rich gifts: for gold, which other men most painfully dig up, & that in few places shee Hungarians gather at their ease, as if it were a growing plant. It is in your power (worthie souldiours) whether you will to morrow open a way to all these good things for your selues for euer, or els leaue the way open for your enemies vnto all that you hold. I would that you would remember when you goe vnto the breach, that all the store of happie fortune is laid open vnto you for a prey, without any other defence, without any other garrison, without any other keeper; and that behind you are your wiues, children, your houses, your temples, and religion, together with the rewards of all your former victories: our whom (except you win this citie) the furie and insolencie of the victorious enemy, will most cruely and shamefully insult. I, according as I shall see you fight at the breach to morrow, shall easily perceiue how you are set downe: to command as conquerors, or els as slaues to be commanded; and also what to answere to the most insolent demands of the proud embassadours. In the meane time make much of your selues, and together with your armour haue all things in readinesse, that to morrow with the dawning of the day we may assault the breach.

The Turkish capitaines for that time joyfully departed, as if they had been already assured of the victorie, and of all those good things which Amurath had so liuely set before their eyes. The next morning very early, Amurath commanded the assault to be given vnto a great breach which he had made in the wall with continuall batterie: the souldiours with great courage assailed the breach, especially the Ianizaries, who vnder the leading of Haly-Bassa valiantly woon the same, and were entering the citie with assured hope of victorie. The Christians seeing all in danger to be lost, running to the breach from all parts of the citie, so forcibly charged the proud Ibanizars on euerie side, that they were glad to retire with more hast than they before entered. In which trait, many of them were slaine, and the rest flying out at the breach, were either slaine or burnt to death in the towne ditch with wild fire; whereof the defendants had cast great store vpon the Turks at the breach, which hauing taken hold vpon the faggots, hurdles, and other light matter, wherewith the Turks had vpon the sudden made their way ouer the towne ditch, did so terribly burne, that the Ibanizars which had entered the breach, being againe repulsed, were in that fierie lake consumed, or else with smoke strangled. In this assault Amurath is reported to haue lost eight thousand of his best men, beside seauen thousand others ouerwhelmed or strangled in the mines, by the countermines of the Christians. The other part of the Turks which at the same time assailed the citie by water, out of their gallies and small ships, had as euill or rather worse success: many of them were sunke with great shot, and some burnt by the fire cast from the wals, and so fired one another; and diuers of them in that sudden feare, for avoiding of that present danger, ran a ground vpon the shells in the riuer, and so split. Amurath wonderfully discouraged with the slaughter of his men, and shamefully beaten from the assault, returned to his camp with his Turks, much like men which had lately escaped from some great shipwracke. And thus partly by famine, and partly by the defendants force, hauing lost the greatest part of his armie, he determined now after seauen moneths siege to returne home. Yet because hee would not encourage his enemies, by shewing his feare, he sent for the embassadours into the campe, and with sterne countenance answered them in this sort.

answer to the embassadours.

*I*ve will (said hee) then talke of peace, when Vladislaus shall deliuer vnto vs all that part of Rascia which he yet holdeth, and also this citie of Belgrade, as a pledge of the league. And for this time I will raise my siege, to giue Vladislaus time to aduise himselfe: yet I would wish him, rather to accept of my friendship vpon these conditions, than by denying that little which is demaunded to hazard the state of both his kingdomes. I aske but that which is mine owne by law of armes, before Vladislaus was called into Hungarie: and the Hungarians cannot transfer vnto him that right which they had not themselves. Wherefore if hee will proceed rather to strue for that which is other mens, than quietly to possesse his owne, I will in good time reparaire hether againe, with my God the beholder and reuenger of wrong.

With this answer he dismissed the embassadours, and forthwith rise with his armie, fore-repenting his comming thither: yet because he would take something in his way, he left his nephew Isa-beg with certaine troupes of horsemen at Scopia in Servia, who so troubled the king of Bosna, that he was glad to require peace of Amurath, and to promise vnto him a yearly tribute of fife and twentie thousand duckats.

Vladislaus newly elected king of Hungarie, seeing that part of his kingdom which is called Transilvania, or Pannodacia, to bee much subject to the incursion of the Turks, (who hauing got into their possession all the countrey of Moldavia, and growne insolent by continuall victories ceased not to inuade and spoile the countrey of Transilvania) for remedie of that daily mischiefe, created Iohn Huniades Vayvod, or his vice-gerent in Transilvania. This Huniades as some write, was Earle of Bestrice, borne in Valachia: others say that he was borne but of meane parents, and called Humades of the village wherein he was borne, and grew to be great by his vertue and prowesse. Whatsoeuer his parents were, he himselfe was a most pollicke, valiant, fortunate, and famous capitaine, his victories so great, as the like was neuer before by any Christian prince obtained against the Turks: so that his name became vnto them more so dreadfull, that they vsed the same to feare their crying children withall. This worthie capitaine according to the trust reposed in him, began to keepe the Turks short, by cutting them off; whensoever they presumed to enter into his countrey; and also by shutting vp the passages wherby they were wont to forrage the countrey of Transilvania; & when he had put his owne charge in good safetie, hee entered into Moldavia, and neuer rested till hee had won it quite out of the Turks hands. And not contented with this, passed many times ouer Danubius into the Turks dominions, making hauocke of the Turks, and carying away with him great bootie, with many captiues.

Now

Now were two great and worthie captaines met together, in places nigh one to another, Huniades in Transilvania, and the next part of Hungarie; and Isa in Rascia, and the vpper part of Servia: the one lying at Temesvvar, and the other at Sinderovia; both men of great spirit, and desirous of honour. Of these two, Isa in great fauour with Amurath, and by him highly preferred, to increase his credit with the Sultan his vnle, & to enlarge the bounds of the Turkish kingdom committed to his charge, continually foraged the countrey about Belgrade, to the intent that hauing wearied the inhabitants with the harms he daily did them, and brought the citie into great wants, he might so at length gaine the same; for the most part abandoned of the citizens, which Amurath could not by force obtaine; and so to open a way into Hungarie. Thus was the countrey by him spoiled, the villages rifled and burnt; and great numbers both of men and cattell daily caried away: yea sometimes not contented to haue spoiled the open countrey, he assailed the verie suburbs of the citie, and was thence hardly repulsed: and finding Huniades the onely man that hindered his further proceedings; to requite him, and prouoke him the more, he brake sometimes into his countrey, laying in euerie corner as he went strong ambushes, so to haue circumuented that warie capitaine, if it had been possible. But hee greued to see the countrey thus spoiled, and purposing to be therof reuenged, secretly raised a strong power, both of horse and foot, and with his companion Nicholas Vilach a right valiant capitaine, passing ouer Danubius, came and encamped betwixt Belgrade and Sinderovia, being about twentie miles distant. Of whose comings Isa-beg vnderstanding, forthwith set forward with a great armie against him, least he should by longer delaie, seeme to stand in doubt of his enemy, whom he had by many injuries so often prouoked. So marching on with his armie ranged in order of battaile, hee found Huniades as readie for battaile as himselfe, who in both wings had placed his light horsemen, and behind them his men at armes, with certaine companies of crossbowes on horsebacke: in the middest stood his armed men with his archers, and other souldiours more lightly armed, readie at all assaies, all strongly guarded with men at armes: after whom in the reareward followed also a strong squadron of valiant footmen. The signall of battaile being giuen, there began a great and cruell fight, as amongst men desirous either to overcome, or there honourably to end their daies. At the first encounter, the wings of Huniades his battaile were by the Turks enforced to retire: but comming to the men at armes, their furie was there staied, and a cruell battaile fought, wherein many fell on both sides, but of the Turks more; who trusting to their agilitie and nimblenesse of bodie, were not able long to endure the shocke and strength of the men at armes, but were there by heapes ouerthrowne, and most miserably slaine. Which Isa-beg beholding, and perceiuing the Hungarians couragiously to fight, as men almost in possession of an assured victorie; to saue himselfe turned his backe and fled to Sinderovia. The rest beholding the flight of their generall, betooke themselves to flight also: after who the Hungarians fiercely followed, especially Huniades himselfe, who by his example to animate the rest, left not the chase vntill he was come almost to the suburbs of Sinderovia: few of the Turks escaped, the rest being either taken or slaine. Huniades after so great a victorie, with a rich prey and a multitude of prisoners returned to Belgrade: hauing now sufficiently reuenged himselfe of the wrongs he had before receiued: after which time, Isa the Turke was more quiet, as hauing sufficient proofe of his valour. The fame of this victorie increased not a little the fame of Huniades, the report whereof comming to Buda, filled the citie with joy and gladnes; but most of all king Vladislaus, who therevpon caused publique praiers, with thanksgiving to be made in euerie Church: and by his letters gratulatorie, with many rich presents, encouraged Huniades to the prosecution of the religious warre, wherein was propounded vnto him not onely the increase of his wealth (a base regard in the honourable) but the immortalitie of his name, and hope of eternall blisse.

Not long after this victorie, Huniades obtained a farre greater in Transilvania. For Amurath much greened with the losse he had first by himselfe, and after by his lieutenant Isa, re- ceined at Belgrade, and in the countrey thereabout; least he should seeme to yeeld vnto the Hungarians, repaired his broken forces with new supplies, with purpose againe to renew his warres in Valachia. And so hauing put all things in a readinesse, sent one of his Bassas called At-sites (his Viceroi in Asia, a man of great wisedome, experience, and valour) with a puissant armie vpon the suddaine by the way of Valachia Transalpina, to inuade Transilvania. This worthie capitaine according to his charge, departing out of Servia, and pas-ling ouer DANVETVS, suddenly entred into Huniades his countrey; burning and spoyling what focuer came in his waie, and killing all that he light vpon, man, woman, and child, without respect of age, sex, or condition; filling all the countrey as he went, with tumult and terror. Whereof Huniades (but lately come into the countrey) vnderstanding, and hauing as then; no sufficient forces to oppose against the furie of so puissant an enemy, either meanes to raise any; in so great a confusion and feare; was wonderfully grieved thereat, and perplexed in mind, as not well knowing which way to turne himselfe.

Huniades flieth.

At length hee tooke his flight into ALBA IULIA, vnto his old friend George Lepe, Bishop of that citie, a man of great vertue and grauitie: but whilest hee there staie with his friend, about the raising of a tumultuarie armie, the enemy was now come nere vnto him; who hauing ouer-runne the greatest part of the countrey; had scraped together such a bootie, and taken such a multitude of prisoners, that surcharged as it were with the spoile, he was glad to march soe slower: yet still burning the countrey before him. Which Huniades and the good bishop beholding out of the citie, so much grieved thereat, that albeit that they both well knew themselves, with an handfull of men in half taken vp hand ouer head, too weake to encounter with their enemies: yet thought it better with such power as they had, to goe out; and so in defence of their countrey honourably to die, than longer to behold the most miserable destruction of the same.

Huniades & the bishop of Alba Iulia entrapped by the Turkes.

But whilest they vpon this resolution (caried forth with too hot a desire of reuenge) march vnadvisedly on headlong, without any scouts or espials sent out before them; they fell before they were aware into such ambushes, both of horse and foot, as the craftie enemy had in the secret woods and vallies wherby they were to passe, laid of purpose to intercept them; which now with great force and horrible outcries breaking out vpon them on euerie side; dismayed them with a great feare. Huniades and the bishop, seeing themselves so entrapped and beset with the multitude of their enemies, as that they must needs perish if they should longer staie; fled incessantly backe againe; after whom followed all the rest of their armie, and at their heeles the egre Turkes, who spared none of the flying Christians they could ouertake, but put them all to the sword: neuertheless, most part of them escaped backe againe to ALBA IULIA. The Bishop thinking to haue saued himselfe by the swiftnesse of his horse, comming to a riuer, in taking the same was ouerthrowne, and there by the enemy slaine. With whose death the Bassa encouraged, as also with the present victorie, began now more at libertie to range abroad, and at his pleasure with fire and sword to wast that part of the countrey which yet remained vnspoiled: leauing in the meane time (as a man out of feare) the rich prey hee had taken, together with his baggage and cariages, to be carried all together, as a notable testimonie of his victorie vnto his great lord and maister. Huniades in the meane time, with wonderfull celeritie running about the borders of his countrey, and out of euerie towne and village taking such souldiours as he could, perswaded also the Sicilians (or people commonly called Siculi) in defence of their wiues and children to take vp armes: who all, in respect of the present necessitie, cheerefully did whatsoeuer he commaunded. With this tumultuarie armie, he followed the Bassa (who the in great pride was returning, laden with the spoile of the whole countrey) with purpose to set vpon him, as time or place should giue him occasion. In the meane time Mesitis being told, that Huniades with a great power was comming after him, and now euen at hand: is reported to haue made no great reckoning thereof, but to haue proudly answered vnto him that brought the newes, Let him come, and with the spoile of himselfe enrich our victorie. There was present when he thus said, one Iohn, one of Huniades his espials, who discovered vnto him many of the Turkes designs, concerning the joyning of battaile with him; but especially, that the Bassa had commanded through his armie, That about all things they should in the beginning of the battell assaile the person of Huniades himselfe, for that he being once slaine, the rest would easily be put to flight, as all depending on his direction: and that for the performance thereof, he had appointed certaine companies of his best souldiours, giuing them certaine tokens whereby they might know both him and his horse. There was then in the armie, one Simon Kemene a right valiant and couragious gentleman, not much vnlike vnto Huniades, with whom he chaunged both his horse and armour, appointing vnto him a strong troupe of his choise horsemen to attend vpon him: neither was this counterfait Huniades vnwilling to expose himselfe vnto the danger, accounting it honour inough, if by his death he might giue the life of his friend, and preferre so worthie a defender of the common weale. Huniades following fast after the Bassa marching before him, fought by light skirmishes sometimes on the one side, sometimes on the other, and sometimes in the reareward, to stay him; and at some ad-

uantage, if any such were giuen, to fight with him, before he should get out of the countrey. At length finding such an oportunitie as he thought good to lay hold vpon, he with all his forces, as if it had been a violent tempest, came vpon the Turkes so suddenly, that they had not time to put themselves into order of battell, but were glad confusedly to fight as they might, and without order: in which disordered fight many fell on both sides, but farre more of the Turkes. But whilest both armies with like obstinacie encounter together, certaine troupes of the most valiant Turkes defying Simon the counterfeit Huniades, and by the signes before deliuered vnto them, both of his horse and armour, supposing him to haue been Huniades indeed; with all their power made towards him, to haue slaine him, according as they had in charge: where meeting with right valiant men, of no lesse courage than themselves; there was fought a most terrible & bloodie battell, in such sort, as if in that very place should haue ben tried the whole fortune of the day. But the Turkes still bending their forces more & more thither, for the killing of him, of who they stood in more dread than of all the rest: at length by plain force made a way vnto him; & hauing slain them that were about him, though not without their own great losse, furiously assailing him, slew him vainly supposing it to haue ben the very generall himselfe: who had he there perished (as like inough it was he should, had hee not bene before warned of the Bassas purpose) no doubt, but that the whole countrey had bin with him, or shortly after, quite lost. But Huniades in the meane time riding too and fro in the armie, encouraged his souldiours not to forsake the victorie they were now as it were in possession of, nor leaue vnreueged so many slaughters and harries so lately committed by their enemies, but to remeber as they were fighting, that they caried in their hands their wiues and children, and were in that one battell to reuenge the wrong by them done both to God and man. Sometime he with new supplies encouraged such as were ouercharged and euen now ready to flie; other some he with cheerfull words staied, that had already turned their backs; performing in euery place all the parts both of a wortheie commander and valiant souldior, as the necessitie of the time and place required. In the heat of this battell, fortune yet fauoring neither part, but both fighting with all their power, the Transiluanian prisoners: that in great number were kept in the campe, wishing rather there to die than to be caried away in captiuitie, and thinking it now or neuer, time for them to attempt their deliuerance; with one consent brake in sunder their bonds, & with such weapons as first came to hand, set vpon their keepers, of whom they slew a great number: and so desperately issuing out into the battell, encouraged their countermen, and discouraged their enemies. Yet was the battell hardly fought, though not altogether with like courage, or for like cause: for why, the Transiluanians fought for their countrey, their wiues, their children, their liues, their libertie, their religion and altars: but the Turkes for the rich prey they had before taken, and that they were by victorie in hope of. But at length the Turkes by the breaking out of the prisoners (who laid about them like desperat men) out of hope of the victorie, began by little and little to retire: and the other on the contrary part, by this vnexpected aid encouraged, and quickly finding the enemies fainting, fought more fiercely than before: Mesitis seeing his armie thus in euery part wauering, was therewith exceedingly troubled: but presently after, beholding some of his men retiring, as if they had fled, and other some flying outright, and no means to stay them, for safeguard of his life turned his horse and fled also: after whom the Hungarians followed with most terrible execution, as men desirous of the blood of the that had done them so great harme. In this chase Mesitis himselfe with his son, were both slaine: the report of whose death, in the pursuit, added swiftnesse vnto the Hungarians to the increasing of the slaughter of the Turkes, who for the desire of reuenge, they ceased not for certain daies to pursue, vnto the top of the alps. In this battell were slaine of the Turkes 20000, & of the Hungarians about 3000. Huniades with this victorie recouered all the prey the Turkes had taken of the spoile of the countrey, together with their tents & baggage: vnto whom at his returne into the campe, a wonderfull number of the poore captiues came, and falling at his feet and kissing them gaue God thanks for their deliuerance by him: some called him the father, some the defender of his countrey; the souldiours, their inuincible generall; the captiues, their deliuerer; the women, their protectors; the yong men & children, their most louing father. In all which joyfull acclamations, no honourable additions was heard, which in the iudgement of all men, worthely agreed not with his deserts. He againe with teares standing in his eyes, courteously embraced them, reioicing at the publicke good: and himselfe giuing most heartie thanks vnto God, commaunded the like to be done in all churches of that prouince. Sometime he commended the souldiours valour, and in generall, the peoples loyalty. The nobilitie and worthie captaines he extolled by name, according as their deserts had beene in that notable battaile; nor detraacting any thing from any manis worthie praises: part of the spoile of the Turks he appointed vnto deuout vles, and the other part he deuided amongst the souldiours; and willing as it were with the first fruits thereof to gratifie king Vladislaus; and the Despot of SARVIA, then present with him, he sent a great waggon, which ten horses could scarce draw, laden with the Turkes, signes and the cheefe of their heads, where the heads of the Bassa and his sonne stood, for most, and about them was placed an old Turke, sometime well knowne vnto the Despot, who in this order presented vnto them, is said to haue thus deliuered his message, as followeth:

The speech of an old Turke, in delivering the present vnto the king.

Huniades your maiesties most humble seruant, and the most honourable Despot's sonne, sendeth vnto you this part of the spoile gained by this late victorie, least he should seeme to defraud you of the honor of the battaile happily fought vnder your good fortune. These heads of the Asian nobilitie, bee senden you for a present, that you should not want the assured testimonie of so notable a victorie: these are two princes heads, the one of Mesites Bassa the generall, and the other of his sonne. The rest are the heads of the other great commanders and Sanzacks. All these witnesse the greatnesse of the late slaughter, and exhort you to greater atchieuements. What your royall maiestie for the naturall instinct of pietie and religion ingrafted in you, may hope for; and what an occasion of immortalitie and glorie is offered vnto you, Huniades wisheth you hereby to consider: and humbly requesteth, that generall supplications may be commaunded, and a great armie provided, for as much as all men suppose, that the Turke will gage his whole forces, and leaue nothing unattempted, in reuenge of so great a slaughter of his people.

Having ended his speech, he shewed vnto them the grisly mortified heads: which the nobilitie and others there present, earnestly beheld and wondered at, especially the king and the Despot, who by letters farther vnderstanding the whole proceeding of the warre, and fortune of the battaile, highly commended the discreet valour of Huniades, together with the glorious victorie, worthie (as they said) of a Romane triumph: for which, Vladislaus commaunded publicke supplications to be made in all churches through HUNGARIE, and by honourable messengers sent of purpose to Huniades, gaue him great thanks, according to his deserts, with many rich presents also, commending his faithfull and worthie seruice: and requesting him with like courage and care to prosecute the warre so happily begun, promising him, That hee should want neither men nor money, or any thing els needfull thereunto. Vpon this victorie, the countries of MOLDAVIA and VALACHIA, before tributaries vnto the Turks, now reuolted againe vnto the Hungarians, to the great griefe of Amurath: & the fame of Huniades was in short time disperfed through all EVROPE, and a generall hope conceiued of him, as of one most like to be one of the greatest champions of the Christian commonweale, as in his time vndoubtedly he was.

The report of this late ouerthrow, with the death of the Bassa Mesites, and the losse of his armie, being brought to HADRIANOPLE, much troubled the Turkish tyrant: but most of all the reuolt of the two countries of MOLDAVIA & VALACHIA. So that full of wrathfull indignation and desire of reuenge, he commaunded a great armie to bee raised against the next Spring, with intent to haue gone therewith himselfe: but afterward vpon better aduice changing his purpose, he committed the leading thereof vnto one Schech Abedin Bassa (corruptly called Sciabedin Bassa) an eunuch, and yet neuertheless a right valiant and expert captaine, and his viceroy in EVROPE; with charge first to enter into VALACHIA, and there hauing done what harme hee could with fire and sword, to doe the like in MOLDAVIA: and after that with all his power to breake into TRANSILVANIA, there to reuenge vnto the full, the losses before receiued, and with the slaughter of the Hungarians to sacrifice vnto the ghosts of their dead friends & companions. The Bassa according to his charge, departing out of MACEDONIA, and marching through MYSTIA, and so passing ouer Danubius, with an armie of fourescore thousand fighting men, whereof foure thousand were of the best Janizaries, entered into VALACHIA, filling the country with feare and tumult: the Valachians now altogether in despaire to bee able to defend themselues against the furie of the Turks, and sore repenting them of their reuolt from them vnto the Hungarians. Whom for all that, Huniades comforted with cheerefull words, willing them betime to retire themselues vnto the safest places of their countrey, and not to expose themselues with their too weake forces against the furie of the Barbarians, promising in good time to come himselfe to their releefe; not doubting by the power of Iesus Christ, to dare them battell in the plaine field, & to haue of them a glorious victorie, although they were in number farre more than they were reported to be. The Bassa diuiding his armie into two parts, foraged the countrey farre and neere, burning the countrey townes and villages before them, spoyling whatsoeuer came in their way, and killing who-soeuer they light vpon, men, women, or children, without respect of age, sex, or condition. But the Valachians for the most part, had retired themselues, some into the mountains, some into the strong townes, and some into places further off; so that few fell into the enemies hands, but such as were not able to flie, or not regarding the danger had negligently staid the enemies coming, and so perished. VALACHIA thus spoiled, the Turks passing ouer the mountains, descended into TRANSILVANIA, as Amurath had commanded, with purpose there to haue done the like or greater harme, if possible it had been to haue so done: but there was Huniades with 15000 chosen souldiours readie to encounter the. A small power indeed, in comparison of the multitude the Bassa led: but all men of great experience and resolution, in valour counteruailing the great number of their enemies, men resolute rather to die than to flie. Of whose approach the Bassa (vnto whom the name and fortune of the man was dreadfull) by his espials vnderstanding, stayed his intended furie, and as one well aware with whom hee had to doe, without farther proceeding, encamped himselfe with his armie, to see what power and courage the enemy had. But certainly informed by his scouts, for that purpose sent out, That he was not in number a quarter so many as the Turks, but lay strongly encamped with his waggons and carriages, as in a sure fort, in such order, as that he could not without great danger bee assailed, and yet might at his pleasure come forth, and so if need were retire againe, as into a strong hold: he wondered at his courage and skilfull manner of encamping; yet presuming of his own multitude and strength, he doubted not to march forward, and to offer him battell. Being come within halfe a mile the one of the other, although they were on neither side vnwilling to fight, yet hoping both for a great victorie, they thought it not best to attempt any thing rashly, but betooke themselues both vnto the highest of their wits, as willing in so great a conflict as well to shew the vttermost of their policie and skill, as of their courage and valour. The Turke thought it best not to ioine battaile with his enemies in one front, for feare of confounding so great a multitude, but to deuide his armie into certaine battalions, and so to fight by degrees and in good order, whereby to make all his men profitable: or if he could not do so, then with his multitude to enclose the Christians round, and so to ouerwhelme them. On the other side, Huniades charged his souldiours, about all things to keepe their order, and in no case to suffer themselues to bee deuied by their enemies. The next day, being come vnto a place which they call VASCARIE, both the armies by the breake of day began to dislodge, at which time the Bassa spent a good space in the martialling of his great armie, as did also Huniades, seeking by prouident foresight and policie to match the multitude of his enemies. And so hauing set all things in order, calling vnto him the cheefe captaines and commanders of his armie, with cheerefull countenance encouraged them as followeth:

No courage (believe me) worthie companions, and fellows in arms, could haue induced me to encounter so great a multitude, did not necessitie it selfe enforce me, your approoued valour persuade me, & the assured hope I haue in Christ Iesu above all things confirme me: hauing made choice of vs to fight this his sacred battaile, and by our right hands to reuenge the dishonour of his holy name. In which his especiall choice we are to consider how much hee hath beloued vs: and for the same to praise his infinite goodnesse and mercie. Three such commodities hath God thereby euen this day propounded vnto vs, if we will be the same men we haue been in times past, as that the least thereof were sufficient to encourage men of worth, for the same to lay downe their liues, held they them neuer so deare: First, you are to fight for the health and welfare of your children, wiues, and countrey, ioyned with your whole estate: then, for eternall glorie and renoune in this world: and last of all, for immortalitie and a crowne that shall neuer be taken from you, in the world to come. How many miseries and calamities we haue in former times, and of late, receiued from the Turks, would to God you had rather heard thereof by report, than seene the same with your eyes, and endured them in your selues. You had long since been bereft of your welbeloued wiues and children, whom most miserable seruitude had ouerwhelmed; you had had neither house nor church, wherein to dwell or to serue God, had not the diuine power of God, and your rare prowesse been at hand for present rescue: your countrey, your goods, your honour, your libertie, you could not haue kept, had not your valor, confirmed by an assured confidence in the highest, preserved all these things vnto your selues: The horrible furie of the Turke had now brought all these things into the power of it selfe, had they not been by your armes defended: and he by so many bloodie overthrowes repressed. He could not before be staied: the Grecians, the Macedonians (both sometimes the greatest commanders) the bold Thracians, the strong Bulgarians, the valiant Epirots, and Dalmatians, could not abide their force: The Athenians, the Thebans, the Lacedemonians, authors and masters of the antient discipline of warre, willingly gave place vnto these. Vnto vs, is this praise and great glorie of this victorie by God assigned, who often times with a small power, yea and that sometime against all hope, haue with a notable slaughter ouerthrowen them; vanquished them, & put them to flight. Neither is there any men in the world whom they more feare and stand in dread of, than you, whom though in number but few, they haue by their daily slaughter and losses, learned no lesse to feare, than if you were many. And now to trie the vittermost of their power, they are come with their innumerable legions: but are not for that of you any thing the more to be feared than before, seeing that we all beare armes vnder the conduct of the most mightie God; and are by daily victorie, long experience and approoued valour taught, what we are to dare: besides that, the greatest part of their armie is of common souldiours, slaves, or rude countrey peasants, or men by force by them compelled; more than the Ianizaries, are no good souldiours among them, the rest as men enforced, serue them for feare, and against their wills, and they by their cowardize brought into that bondage and slauerie. What Greeks, Macedonians, or Sclauonians sooner are sent to their aid, forasmuch as they are not yet reuolted from the Christian faith, deeme them not to stand for them, but for vs; they long for vs the reuengers of their wrongs, and for you as victorious conquerours: in this warre they haue giuen vnto the Turkes their names, but vnto vs their hearts, and power, and pray heartily for our victorie: wherefore you ought so much the more valiantly and courageously to fight, by how much greater you see the victorie, the honour, the prey before your eyes. We are not to fight for other mens houses, and altars, but for our owne; so our present necessitie requireth, in such sort, that if wee our selues deliuer not our selues, and beare our selues vpon our wonted hope and valour, wee shall this day be enforced to endure the greatest miserie that men may possible: First, the losse of our goods and substance, the captiuitie of our children, the despoiling of our daughters, the rauishing of our wiues, the slaughter of our parents, the burning of our houses, and churches; and that which worse is than all this, the scorning of our Saviour Christ Iesus, and his saints, whose images you shall see in despite broken, or dragged in the dirt, or moulden and conuerted into other prophane uses; all religion trodden downe, and God himselfe (if it were possible) with violence and dispaire drinen out of our hearts, if we stand not manfully vpon it as becometh worthie champions. God is able with his little finger, if he so will, forthwith to destroy all the Turkes in the world; but seeing he hath committed vnto our right hands the defence of his name, he first maketh prooffe of our courage and valour, that finding the same faithfull, and readie, hee may strengthen and defend it with his owne right hand. He neuer yet forooke any faithfull or deuout man, neither will our Saviour Christ be wanting vnto you, if you be not wanting vnto your selues: in the power of his name, which is aboue all names, he shall tread down his rebellious enemies, and exalt the righteous that put their trust in him. Moreover, the causes that we and they combat for are diuers, and our hopes much stronger: They fight for their Prophet, a most prophane man, author of all impietie, for spoile and prey, for the destruction of nations and countreys, for other mens kingdomes, for the enlarging of their dominions and territories, for worldly praise and glorie: But wee contrariwise beare armes for the sauiour of the world, for our faith and religion, for the Christian common wealth, for our native countrey, for our wiues and children, for our fortune and state; than which nothing can be more excellent, more commendable, or honourable. What reward is laid up for them in heauen which haue worthily protected or deliuered their countrey, or laid downe their liues in defence of their faith and religion? Neither, hauing often prooued, are we ignorant, that God will neuer forsake them that honour, feare, and serue him. Whereby (fellow souldiours) you may plainly perceiue, how farre your hopes are beyond theirs. Beluee our Saviour promising vnto you an eternall reward: and shew your fidelitie and valour vnto God and your countrey together. Wherefore, seeing without the power of God wee can doe nothing, before the signall of battaile be giuen, I beseech you colonels, captaines, and lieutenants, by your effectuall and Christian exhortations in your regiments and companies, to encourage your souldiours, valiantly to fight the Lords battaile; and for the present, euerie man by taking a little earth in his mouth, to prepare himselfe according to the necessitie of the time, as it were to the receiuing of the lords supper: so hauing clenfed your soules, embrace you one another, plight your mutuall faith with your right hand and a kisse; and make a perpetuall couenant among your selues, none of you to forsake one another in this holy battaile, but for your religion and countrey valiantly to fight it out, even vnto the

the last man. And a little refreshing your selues with a short repast as you stand, vpon the signall giuen, thrice calling aloud vpon the mightie name of Christ Iesu, fight with the like valour and courage so nere as you can, that he in the agonie of death fought for your redemption and libertie: which that you will willingly do, I request and charge you this for our sauiours sake, for the loue of our countrey, and for the faith you owe both to God and man. I also pray and beseech you, so to fight, as men resolu'd either to gaine a most glorious victorie, (whereof I doubt not) or else if it should otherwise chauce, this day to purchase vnto your selues a blessed life in the kingdome of heauen: not to slip in Hell with the Turkes, but with the blessed wights in heauen: For Christ Iesus our Saviour will be alwaies present with vs, who (beluee me, and so hope) will this day not onely deliuer vs out of the hands of the Turkes, but to our immortal glorie lode vs with the rich spoiles of our enemies, and so in safetie bring all home againe with much ioy and triumph.

The Bassa on the other side likewise encouraged his souldiours, putting them in remembrance of their former victories, exhorting them not to degenerate from their worthie ancestours and themselves, by whose great valour the glorie and empire of the Turkes had been so mightily increased: and vnto whom their great prophet Mahomet, the interpreter of the gods, had foretold the empire of the whole world to be by all the gods allotted; and had by diuine inspiration prophesied, that ancient and stately nation in time to become the terror of the world, the scourge of the wicked, and commander of all nations. He farther declared vnto the what an increase of kingdomes they had got in that short time, since which they first passed ouer into Europe and filled them with the hope of a great spoile; promising vnto them that should in the battaile valiantly bechaue themselves, not onely the spoile and prey, but whole villages, towns, and cities, and other great preferments, according as they should deserue. As for the victorie, considering the weak power of their enemies, and the great number of themselves, hee assured them thereof, if they would but a while valiantly fight it out like men. In conclusion, he told them, that hauing overcome Huniades, whom onely, as hee confessed, he had found to bee the most valiant and skilfull capitaine of the Christians, nothing should afterward be able to stand in their way, or to hinder their farther conquests: and that if this day they should vterly ouerthrow him, they should gain the most honourable victorie that was euer yet got in Europe. Wherefore hee willed them about all things, in the battell to seeke after him; promising vnto him that should kill him, a great reward, with most honourable preferments. Hauing thus sufficiently, as he thought, encouraged his Turkes, he set forward with his armie in order of battaile. His horsemen and footmen he deuidd into two great wings, betwixt which marched the Ianizaries in a square battaile, all men of approoued valour: after whom followed the rereward: vnto the wings he had also ioyned certaine loose companies of light horsemen to begin the battaile, and to flie about the enemies, and so as occasion should serue, either to charge or retire. Huniades likewise had placed in both wings two square battailions of men at armes, and with them certaine horsemen with crosse-bowes: before these wings he had also placed certaine troupes of light horsemen, to encounter the enemies: in the midst stood two square battailes of men at armes: and betwixt them a strong squadron of armed men, guarded behind with a conuenient number of pikemen and archers: both the wings he had compassed about with a multitude of carts and waggons, and they also well manned. So marching forward, and both armies being come within a quarter of a mile together, the signall of battaile was on both sides giuen, and the battaile begun. Huniades seeing the multitude of his enemies, cast his first battaile into the forme of a wedge, the more easily to deuide them: and they on the other side in forme of a paire of sheeres, were readie to receiue him: where on both sides they encountered together with such furie and outcrie, as neuer was thing more terrible to be heard or scene. The Turkes trusting vnto the multitude of their nimble light horsemen, first with their light staues, and afterward with their crooked Scimitors fiercely assailed the Christians light horsemen, in which first encounter many fell on both sides. But the wedge battaile of the Christians could not of the Turkes be broken, as consisting all of valiant expert souldiours, and they also strongly armed; who, doe the Turkes what they could, with a great slaughter cut their armie in sunder, but not without a great fight, and some losse also vnto themselves. In the wings also the light horsemen for a while fought courageously and with like hope: But the Turkes with that kind of fight better acquainted than the Christians, & better appointed for that purpose, and exceeding in number also, put the Christian light horsemen to the worst, and enforced

ced them to retire to the men at armes. Here began the fortune of the Turks to stay, where both parts desperately assailing the one the other, was made a most terrible fight, wherein most part of the Turks light horsemen were slaine: for why, they were not able to abide the force of the men at armes, although in comparison of them, but few; but were with their launces & arming swords ouerthrowne and slaine, no otherwise than if they had beene naked men: so that in both wings the Turks began now to faint. But the battaile in both the wings yet wauiing and the victorie doubtfull, in the maine battaile was fought a most cruell fight: the Ianizaries with a strong power of men at armes, and certaine troupes of light horsemen, compassed about the men at armes that stood (as we said) in the maine battell of the Christians, where the old Ianizaries with their crooked Scimitaries, with great courage cut in funder the legs of the horses of the men at armes; of whom many fell downe, and lying along vpon the ground, were made shorter by the head: as likewise on the other side, the Ianizaries whilest they seeke the destruction of the men at armes, were themselves ouerborne and troden vnder foot. VV hereupon such a slaughter was made, that the blood ran like riuers, whilest they desperately fight with furious rage both on the one side and the other. In this cruell fight most part of the Ianizaries were slaine, and many of the Christian men at armes also. The Bassa now perceiuing the Hungarians to haue the better, both in the wings and in the maine battaile, and yet in hope that with long fight they would faint (although hee saw great slaughter of his men in euery place) came on with the rereward, and a number of other fresh souldiours which he had left for the guarding of his baggage, all yet sound men, in good hope so to ouerwhelme the wearied Hungarians. It was now foure houres that this cruell fight had endured, when as the Bassa began it afresh: neither was this by him done without reason; for why, he was afraid least if his men should turne their backs and flie, the whole armie should follow after: and therefore to make vse of all the men he had, he brought on his rereward, in hope that his enemies, now spent with long fight, would not longer endure a fresh charge. And the more to encourage his men, he commaunded them to compasse in the Hungarians round, and to dispatch their wearied enemies, vainly boasting, That it would bee the last battaile that euer the Hungarians would fight. On the other side, Huniades perceiuing the enemies purpose, sufficed his men to bee in part enuironed, and by and by, caused the waggons with the armed cars and waggons to thrust in behind them, and so to compasse them in, deuicid in part from the rest, and afterward with fresh supplies renewed the battaile with the enemy. The fight was great, and in euery place right terrible: and albeit that the slaughter of the Turks was in many places great, yet by reason of their multitude they felt it not much, but fought yet still most desperately: vntill that they in the right wing seeing themselves compassed in behind with the waggons, & so from thence charged with shot, darts, and other such misliue weapons; standing in doubt which way to turne themselves, and beset with danger on euery side, began to faint, and fearing the danger behind them, shrunk from the fight. On the other side, the Hungarians, now in good hope of victorie, with great and cheerefull outcries, as men inspired with fresh spirits, more furiously assailed their fainting enemies afront, than before; encouraging them also that assailed the behind in the waggons, to approach them neerer: with which double danger the Turks hardly beset, fought disorderly, and doubting to be all inclosed round, first retired, and presently after betook themselves to plaine flight. But they which were already shut in betwixt the waggons and them that fought before the, perished euery mothers son. They which fought in the left wing also, discouraged with the flight of their fellowes, fled likewise: after whom the Hungarians fiercely followed. The Bassa himselfe seeing both the wings of his battell put to flight, & his own battell fore broken also, stricken with dispaire fled, with certain companies of the Ianizaries, which he had still kept about him against al euent, for the safegard of his person: after who followed also so many other of the Turks as could; the rest disperdely flying through the woods, forrests, & mountains, either there perished with hunger, or falling into the hands of the Valachians, were by them slain. Of so great an armie as the Bassa brought into TRANSILVANIA, scarce the one halfe returned againe ouer Danubius. It is reported by some that were in that battell, that if Huniades hauing them in chace, had pursued them vnto Danubius, scarcely one man of them had escaped ouer the riuer. But he contented with so great a victorie, & to haue driuen his enemies out of the field, pursued them not far: but enuing into their campe, with the spoile thereof greatly enriched both himselfe and his souldiours. Beside the great multitude of the Turks here slaine, 5000 more were taken prisoners, & 100 of their ensignes. Long it were to rehearse and reckon vp the rich spoile there taken, the guilt armour, and goodly furniture, both of men and horses, beside the rich pavillions and tents there standing. In breefe, the wealth there found, was so great, as that there was no man in Huniades armie, which was not thereby for euer enriched. Huniades for this so great a victorie, and for his countrey, deliuered from so great a feare, caused generall prayers with thanks giuing, for the space of three daies, to be made in all churches of those three prouinces, vnto whom that danger was threatened; and at VASCAPE, where the battaile was fought, hanged vp certaine of the Turks ensignes, as trophies of the victorie there gotten. This was the famous battaile of VASCAPE, wherein Huniades got the greatest victorie that euer any Christian prince before that time obtained against the Turkish kings. The fields thereabouts lay couered with the dead bodies of the slaine Turks, whose carion carcases so infected the aire, that many of the better sort of the inhabitants of the countrey were glad for a season to leaue their dwellings, and to get them further off, for feare of infection. Afterwards he in great triumph came to BUDA, and there presented vnto king Vladislavus the enemies ensignes, with such a part of the spoile, as might both well declare the greatnesse of the victorie, and beseeke the greatnesse of so great a prince, which the king thankfully receiued, highly commending his great valour, the same wherof had in short time filled euery corner of EUROPE.

Amurath a little before this great ouerthrow of his armie in TRANSILVANIA, assuring himselfe of the victorie, had sent a proud embassage vnto king Vladislavus into HUNGARIE, offering him peace, vpon condition, That he should deliuer vnto him the strong citie of BELGRADE or els yeeld to pay him a yearly tribute: vnto which, vpon the first report of the victorie, answer was giuen by the king, answerable to the proud demaund, That according to the issue of matters in TRANSILVANIA, hee would shortly in person himselfe come and giue him farther answer. VVith which short answer the proud embassadors were dismissed and gone, a little before the coming of Huniades to BUDA.

How much this late ouerthrow greeued the great king Amurath, Vladislavus was not ignorant; either of his power and desire of reuenge, as sufficiently warned thereof by the worthe Huniades: for the withstanding whereof, he thought it good not to be vnprovided. VVherefore calling together the states of his kingdome, and with them Julian the Cardinall of S. Angel, the Popes Legat at such time as they were all assembled, he propounded vnto them the greatnesse of the danger threatened by the angrie Turke, leauing it vnto their graue consideration, to determine how the same were by strong hand and plaine force, or otherwise to be auerted. In which most honourable assemblie, Julian the Cardinall, of purpose sent thither by Pope VRBANE to stirre vp the Hungarians against the Turks, being requested by the king to deliuer his opinion first, spake vnto them as followeth:

Since the time that the Turkish pestilence began to rage in EUROPE, no man was euer more welcome vnto the great Bishop, vnto the Apostolicall Senate, and other princes of ITALIE (most mightie king, and you other most worthe princes) than when it was told them, That Vladislavus, king of POLONIA, was by you also chosen king of HUNGARIE. For a fitter gouernour of the Hungarian state, and leader of their power, could not the Hungarians any where haue found: as he in whom iustice, religion, wisdom, valour, and martiall skill, doth so abound, that he seemeth rather for the good of this kingdome by God sent from heauen, than here in earth chosen by men. By this happy & fortunate choice, the minds also of all the Italians, which before lay heauie and discouraged, were lightened and reuiued: and therefore, that this choice might be vnto the Christian commonweale both glorious and fortunate, they made their solemn vowes and prayers. At such time as the most holy Senat vnderstood of the ciuile discord of this kingdome, and the danger of the Turks fast by, it sent me hither to deale with you for the appeasing of those troubles, and repressing of that mischeefe (as you haue oftentimes heard me say.) The kingdome is by your force and valour, by my mediation, and the death of the queene, well pacified: but yet the other remaineth full of honour, full of profit, full of safetie, glorie, and immortality, best fitting Vladislavus conduct and fortune, and the valour of the Hungarians. The Turkish tyrannie and their proud command (worthe princes) is to be repressed: yea their seruile yoke, hanging euen now ouer our neckes, is to be shaken off, and to be driuen away. What you are to doe, the valour and fortune of Huniades foretelleth you: the fortune said I of Huniades, pay the fortune of the Christian commonweale, and present meycie of our blessed Saviour, which suffereth his people to be up and downe tosed, but not quite drowned. If so great an armie of the enemies was vanquished and put to flight by the power of one of thy captaines, and that but small: what is to bee hoped of thee. (most mightie king) if thou shalt lead forth thine armies thy selfe in person, vnder thine owne conduct, and the protection of Christ Iesu. The eyes of all Christian princes are cast vpon thee, vpon thee, Hungarian and Polonian forces; vpon thee haue they reposed all their hopes, they all expect that thou shouldst be the reuenger of the Barbarian crueltie, the defender of the faith, and protector of EYBOLIA; and this is it for which the Pope doth with his letters dayly sollicite and importune you. And albeit that the common cause and quarrell of the Christian religion require it yet doth the necessitie of HUNGARIA and POLONIA no lesse enforce it: of which, the one is most miserably and daily vexed with the Turki forces and furie out of SERBIA and DALMATIA; and the other out of MOLDAVIA and VLACHIA. Now if any there be, whom neither the Zeale of religion, the necessitie of the cause, the hope of immortall fame and glorie, can moue, let their owne safetie, the present seruitude of their wiues and children, the safeguard of their wealth and substance, the lawfull reuenge of the wrongs done them, stir them vp to take in hand this sacred expedition. So fit an oportunitie is now giuen vnto you, that at one and the selfesame time you may set your bodies in perpetuall safetie and happinesse, your soules in quietnesse and rest, and vnto both giue eternall glorie and happinesse. You lacke not (worthie captaines) money, the sinewes of the warre, which shall be brought vnto you from all parts of the Christian commonwealth, not lustie and courageous souldiours, not policie, not fortune, not the propitious heavenly powers, which haue made choice of you for the defence of the true faith and religion: you want nothing (worthie princes) but will. It is an expedition necessarie, religious, profitable, and honourable: wherein are propounded most ample rewards both in this life, and in the life to come. Wherefore (most mightie prince, and you right worthie princes all) I pray and beseech you by the faith of Christ Iesu, by the love of your children, by the health of your kingdome, and deliuerance from your present destruction, with valiant courage, and one consent to take this sacred war in hand, and so thereby to enroll your names in the eternall booke of fame. And sith that you are to goe, not so much to a worldly as a spirituall war, against the enemies of Christ and his truth, take up your armes with such Zeale, courage, and cheerefulness, as the expectation and hope of men, as your valour, the present danger, and the mercies of God towards you seeme of right to require.

The pitifull complaint of the Despot, of the cruelty of the Turks, perswading the Hungarians to take the warre against them in hand.

The Legat hauing made an end, forthwith ensued the miserabie supplication and teares of the Despot, perswading them, of the necessitie of that expedition to be taken in hand, declaring vnto them the cruelty of the Turks, their torments and strange tortures, his sonnes deprivied of their fight, and spoiled of their genitoires, many halfe mangled, and moe cut in sunder with lawes; some flaine quick, and other buried aliue, with many other strange kinds of death, such as would abhorre any Christian eares to heare. And warning the Hungarians, by his example to beware how much they had need to looke to themselves, told them, That they were but by the riuer Savaus, deuided from the Turks; which in Summer was oftentimes to be waded ouer, and in Winter hard frozen, and so to bee passed: that the countrey beyond DANUBIUS lay all open vpon them; and that he, sometime the rich king of SERBIA, was now driuen into exile by the power of the Turke, deprivied of his kingdome, of his children, shamefully disgraced, spoiled of his wealth and fortune, glad to flie from place to place, and yet not able to find any safe place to rest in. First he fled (as he said) to RAGVSIVM, where by and by he was sought after, and endangered by the Turks: then into HUNGARIE, which was also forthwith by them on euery side infected; and whereof the Barbarian king now asked tribute, to haue some colour for the inuasion thereof: which dreadfull enemie was not farre off from it, but still howered euen ouer it: as well witnessed VLACHIA and TRANSILVANIA, two of the greatest and richest provinces of the Hungarian kingdome; which had not the valour of Huniades, the fortune of the commonweale, and about all, the mercie of God, deliuered out of the hands of this filthie nation, the state of HUNGARIE had now ben viterly forlorne. The euents of war (he said) were diuers, fortune vncertaine, and that God would not euery day bee tempted. Wherefore with many teares abundantly running down his aged face, he besought king Vladislav & the rest, not to let slip this faire occasion, neither by cowardise or negligence to break off the course of their good fortune and victorie: but to make choice rather to become reuengers of other mens harmes than of their own, and to satisfie the good opinion the world had conceiued of them. He was (as he said) a sufficient example to all men. Besides that he offered a great sum of mony himselfe towards the defraying of the charges of the war, assuring the also of great supplies both of men & mony from diuers other

Christian princes. Which opinion of the Legat & Despots, being generally liked & approued, a decree was made by the whole court of parliament there assembled, That the king should himselfe in person with all speed possible entertain that honorable war. So that though it were now vpon the approach of winter, yet were men taken vp in euerie place, and embassadours sent vnto the Emperour, and the other neighbour princes, to pray of them aid against the common enemie. Who for the most part excused themselves by their owne particuler affaires, but sent no aid at all. Neuerthelesse many deuout Christians both out of FRANCE and GERMANY, for the zeale they bare vnto Christ and the Christian religion, forsaking wife and children, and whatsoeuer they had else, came and worthily serued vpon their owne charge. The Spring being come, and supplications made in all places for the prosperous successe of that religious warre, king Vladislav the first of May set forward from BUDA, where passing the riuer DANUBIUS and marching faire and softly, and coming to the riuer TRIBISVS, hee therestaied three daies for the comming of his armie. Departing thence, and marching on alongst the side of DANUBIUS, vntill he came within the sight of BVLGARIA, hee there at a place called COBIS, oueragainst SYNDEROVIA, passed ouer DANUBIUS with his armie, which was now growne verie great: and so marched directly to SOPHIA situate about fixe daies march from DANUBIUS, in the frontiers of BVLGARIA, so called of a most sumptuous and magnificent temple there built by Iustinian the great emperour. Which citie being then old and ruinous, and but badly fortified, was easily taken; and afterward for that it was not well to be holden, was by the kings commandement burnt, as were all the other countrey townes and villages thereabouts; to the terror of the rest. Marching thence hee came vnto the riuer MORAVA and there encamped: where the plaine countrey easily riseth and falleth in manner of the sea when it is mooued with a little wind. Here fixe hundred light horsemen, being sent ouer the riuer, not so much to seeke after preie, as to view the countrey which way the armie might most safely and easily passe, hapned vpon the Turks scouts, of whom they tooke foure: and vnderstanding by them, that two thousand of the Turks were comming at hand, knowing themselves to weake to encounter them, they retired backe againe with all speed they could vnto the riuer: where many of them, for feare, leapt headlong from the high and broken banks, and so perished in the deepe; the rest terrified with the misfortune of their fellows, stood still doubtfully expecting what should become of themselves. Beyond the riuer was another hill, vpon the top whereof the king with a great number of horsemen were hunting: whom the Turks a far off discrying, and doubting to fall into some ambush, of purpose laid for them betwixt them and the riuer, without coming on further, retired. Which they that before fearefully staied on the farre side of the riuer perceiuing, and now encouraged by the comming of the king downe to the riuer, followed a while after, so to increase their feares and so hauing well feared one another, retired on both sides worse affraid than hurt. The next daie the king passed ouer the riuer, sending out his scouts to see if all were cleare before him: by whom he was aduertised that the Turks were at hand, hauing placed certaine ambushes fast by, expecting but a fit time to set vpon him. Wherevpon entring into counsaile with his best and most expert captaines, what were best to be done; it was resolued vpon, that Huniades the next night with ten thousand choice horsemen, should vpon the suddaine set vpon the enemie, then fearing nothing lesse. Who conducted by the espials, was in the first watch of the night brought verie neere vnto them. The moone by chance as fauoring his great attempt, did then shine out, so that he might well discern how the enemie lay encamped; and which way for to charge them to his most aduantage; which was by the same way they were most like to flye, if they should be put to the worst: vnto which place he led his men, and there with a most hideous outcrie, entred the campe, as then for the most part buried in sleepe and securitie: when as the Turkes awaked with the suddaine noise as it were out of a dead sleepe, and dismayed with the horrour of the crie, began to betake them some to their weapons, some to their heeles. Of whom such as fled, lighting vpon the enemies troupes standing in their way, ran as fast backe againe: the other scarce yet well awake, and ouercome with feare, and now scarcely themselves, had much adoe to make themselves readie to fight. Huniades in the meane time riding vp and downe amongst his men, cheered them vp, still crying out and calling vpon them, courageously to assaile their sleepe-naked and fearefull enemies, and not to let slip so faire an occasion and so notable a victorie now alreadie in their hands. At the first encounter the Turks rather made a stirre than fought; but after that they heard that Huniades was there, as men dismayed with his name, they turned their backs and fled, finding which way soeuer they tooke, their fellowes halfe dead or wounded: such a confusion was raised amongst them, with the greatnesse of the sudden feare, that thrusting together, with an inconsiderate desire of flight, they trod one another vnder foot, and thrust themselves vpon one anothers weapons: the greatest part of them driuen headlong into the thickets, and other straits, and not able in time to get out thence, were there by the victorious enimie fiercely pursuing of them, slaine. All that night the fearefull Turkes were with great slaughter held in chace: but as soone as it was day, the rest that remained of them ran also the same fortune with their fellowes. A farre greater slaughter was there made, than a man would thinke that so few men could haue made, when as but with ten thousand horse, thirtie thousand Turkes were in one night slaine, and foure thousand taken, with a number of their ensignes. Of Huniades his men were not many lost, for the greatnesse of the slaughter, most report not aboue fise hundred: a few of them found any enimie to resist them. There was taken all the spoile of a most rich campe, the enimie hauing caried with them nothing out of it. Huniades hauing in so short time gained so notable a victorie, and enriched his armie, returned to the king in great triumph: neither was that day more joyfull vnto these victorious souldiors, than vnto the rest of the armie, who most joyfully expected their returne. The king and the Despot, hearing of the approach of Huniades from the slaughter of the Turkes, with the great applause and joyfull acclamation of the other legions went to meet him three miles: and at such time as at their first meeting Huniades was about to haue lighted to haue done him honour, he would in no case suffer him so to doe, but taking him by the right hand, joyed with him for the victorie, thanking God in the hearing of the whole armie, that hee of his mercie had giuen him such a capitaine, as without enuie in all mens judgements was worthe to rule the Romane empire. In briebe, he shewed how much his country, his kingdome, yea the Christian commonweale was bound and indebted vnto him, gave him his due praises, exhorting all others to imitate his glorie: the like honour did also all the rest of the nobilitie vnto him. As for the common souldiors, they could not be satisfied with beholding of him, but embracing one another, as if they would haue died one in anothers armes, welcomed their victorious friends. So with joy joyning their forces together, and sending the rich spoile of the enimie, with the prisoners chained together in long rancks, before them; the king and Huniades, in great triumph returned into the campe, where they caused generall prayers with thanksgiuing vnto almightie God, for so great a victorie, to bee made thoughour the armie.

The Legat Julian, generall of the voluntarie Christians, which for deuotion serued of their owne charge, after so great a victorie most earnestly perswaded the king and the rest of the great commaunders of the armie to prosecute their good fortune, and in God his so great fauor not to loiter, but daily to march forward, and to take in the rest of BVLGARIA. Now had Huniades by his espials learned, that from SOPHIA it was but three dayes journey to PHILIPPOPOLIS, a great citie of THRACIA; and the like distance from thence to HADRIANOPLE, the cheefe seat of the Turkish tyrant; and as much more to CONSTANTINOPLE. The onely difficultie was, how to passe the great and rough mountaine HEMVS, which running a maruellous way in length, euen vnto the Euxine sea, and mating almost the skie, deuidenth the countries of BVLGARIA and SERBIA, from MACEDONIA and THRACE: and for the great height and roughnesse thereof, was not to be passed out but in two places; the one made by the great emperor Traian and the Romanes, where as yet is to be seene a mightie strong gate built of great square stone, whereby the passage that way was opened or shut at the pleasure of them that had the keeping thereof: the other neere vnto a little riuer, which the Bulgarians now call SALTIZA. By either of these waies if he should find them open, Huniades, vnto whom the king had committed both the leading and the conduct of the armie, purposed to enter. Wherefore marching forward, they tooke all such townes of BVLGARIA as stood in their way; some by force, some by composition: when as was no small helpe, the conformitie of the Christian religion, the horrible crueltie of the Turkes, and great affinitie of language, the most effectuell meanes to win the loue of strangers: For the Polonians and the Bulgarians, both descended of the Sclauonians, and vsing the same language, the Polonian horsemen came to no towne, but it presently yielded. But being come vnto the mountaine HEMVS, to haue entered into THRACIA, the Winter weather being now very cold, they learned by their espials, that the aforesaid passages were both fast shut vp with great stones, timber, and such other like matter, so strongly, as that they were very hardly to be forced. Wherefore Huniades leauing the straighter way made by the hand of man (which beside the former fortification at the great gate, the Turkes had in many places, with abundance of water poured downe the steepe hill in the night, and hard frozen with the coldnesse of the weather, made so slipperie, as that it was not possible either for man or beast there to stand, or to get vp that way) vpon Christmas euen came to the other, by which the riuer Saltiza runneth, the which he found likewise shut. Here they met with many inconueniences: first, the difficultie of the passage, which old Amurath had nor without great reason shut vp, and there placed strong garisons, so at ease and without danger of battaile (so often by his Bassaes vnfortunatly proued) to defend his kingdome in MACEDONIA and THRACIA from the inuasion of the Hungarians, whom now of all nations he most dreaded. Beside that, in the armie was such want of all things, as that the souldiors were ready to forsake their ensignes, and to rise vp in a generall mutinie: for the country neere vnto the mountaine HEMVS, rising high with broken rocks and inaccessible places, was altogether barren, and victuals failing in the campe; they were glad to liue with a little wheat and flesh boiled together, and that so sparingly, as that the souldiors began now generally to grow weake and faint. Besides that, the Winter was exceeding cold; and the frost so great, that many times they could not goe out of their tents to seeke for forage or water. So that the armie enforced with hunger and cold, and the difficultie of the passage, began to retire; & had now vndoubtedly bene dissolved, had it not been for the often and earnest persuasions of Huniades: for he daily told them, that the greatest difficulties were already past, that that which remained, was with their wonted valour and courage to be endured, whereunto nothing was high or difficult: that they should forthwith come into the borders of THRACIA, where they should find plentie of all things: that they were now come so farre, that if they would go backe againe, they should in those wast countries, through which they were to passe, find greater difficulties and dangers than in going forward: that these straights once opened, remained no more trauell, but cheerefully to fall to the spoile of a most rich and pleasant country. They were not (as he said) to stay in the midst of their fortunes, for that it was not alwaies permanent: and for that the contempt of God his fauours, caused them to be oftentimes taken from vs: all that was yet done (hee said) was nothing, if they proceeded not farther: for that whatsoever they had already woon, was easily by the enimie to be recovered; except that those which yet remained (for that most part of them, as he said, were slaine with their houses burnt ouer their heads) were driuen out of THRACIA and MACEDONIA, and so quite out of EUROPE. So whilst the souldiors heard Huniades speake, euery man was well encouraged: but when they remembered the miseries wherewith they were enuironed, they cursed all the rash attempts of ambitious princes. In the meane time newes was brought by the scouts, that the Turkes were coming after them: but then began they to reioice, as deeming it much more honor, manfully to die in battell, than to stauie with hunger and cold. Against these Turkes was Huniades sent, with certain troupes of horsemen: who encountering with them, easily enforced them with losse to retire. Eight times he encountered them (as the souldiors there present reported) and as often put them to flight. In retiring backe from the impregnable mountaine, the king with the greatest part of the armie went before; after whom followed Huniades & the Despot, a good daies march: when the Turkes that kept the passage vpon the mountain, vnderstanding of their return, followed them downe the hill, in good hope to be of them well reuenged, before they should get out of BVLGARIA. Carambey the Bassa of ROMANIA, and brother to Caly-Bassu (a man of all others in greatest fauor with Amurath, and his brother in law, as hauing married his sister) was generall of this armie, and by him appointed for the keeping of these straits; with expresse charge, vpon no occasion whatsoever, although it made shew of neuer so assured a victorie, to fight with the enimie: for he thought it victorie ynough, without any losse to haue kept his enemies out of THRACIA. Whiche the old kings commaund, Carambey for all that neglected, in good hope by a notable victory easily to answer the contempt of that he was commanded. The Christian armie descending downe the broken mountains was come to a great mountaine, which the Bulgarians call CYNOBIZA, and part of the mountaine HEMVS: at whose heeles followed Carambey, with his Turkes, still houerling ouer their heads, to take them at some aduantage: whom the Christians beholding, could not by their capitaines be staied, but that they would many times by companies flie forth vpon them, and desperatly fight with them in places of great disaduantage, saying, That they had rather die in fight like men, than to stauie with hunger and cold. Here Carambey, being himselfe a man of great courage, and desirous of honour, and by the rashnesse of his enemies allured to fight; and withall, beside the advantage of the ground, perceiuing himselfe to exceed his enemies both in strength and number of men, could not be staied but would needs giue battaile, with such a desire, as if he had been already assured of the victorie. Huniades and the Despot had before perceiued, that the Turkes, prouoked with the brauing of their men, would assuredly fall vpon them, and were therefore much troubled with the absence of the king, who (as is before said) was gone a dayes march before they saw they could neither shun battaile, neither if they could haue so done, would their desperat souldiours be staied, for the desire they had to fight. Yet seeing Carambey comming down vpon them, they put themselves (though vnwillingly) in best order they could to receiue him, perswading their souldiours not rashly in furie to run vpon their enemies, as desperat men prodigally of their liues, but to keepe their ranks, and orderly to fight, and so like valiant men to carie away the victorie, or to leaue vnto their enemies a bloodie remembrance thereof. Now had Carambey sent his horsemen downe the hill, and the battaile was begun, where both the armies met together with great furie, and a cruell fight was made both at the foot of the hill and amongst the hills and vallies also: in which hard encounter many were slaine, as well on the one side as the other. The Polonian men at armes (whom the king but a little before had left with Huniades against all euents) with the Hungarian light horsemen (of whom the Despot had the leading) fought so that day, as if they had fought for nothing more but how honourably to die. And the Turkes for a space stood hard to it, so that many were there slaine: yet at length finding themselves hardly laied to, as by desperat men, resolu'd to sell their liues deere, they began to faim and to giue ground: when as Carambey comming in behind them with new supplies, rated the cowardly, stay'd them that were flying, and sometime with rough speeches, sometime with faire persuation, encouraged the wauering, and restored the battaile, before almost quite lost. Neither did Huniades and the Despot lesse bestirre them, but as soone as they perceiued the enemy a little to faint, by and by cried out Victorie; with cherefull speech encouraging their men, still calling vpon them, To keepe their ranks strong, and to vrge their present good fortune, assuring themselves, that they fought against those infidels, vnder the fauour and protection of the Almighty. And forthwith sent certaine companies of footmen, who climbing vp the hill, amongst the bushes with their halfe pikes and bore-speares paunched the Turkes horses as they passed by them. These loose companies did the Turkes horsemen much harme, and here began their battaile to decline; they which were comming downe, for feare of the danger reirring backe againe vnto them that were left aboue, for the keeping of the straits. And the border sort of them, which were come downe into the valleyes, compassed about with the men at armes, hardly recouered the rising of the hill. Carambey in the meane while crying out behind them, one while called backe them that fled, another while releued them that fainted, and to the vttermost of his power restoring the battaile, performed all the parts both of a valiant souldiour and worthie capitaine, courageously fighting himselfe in the thickest of his enemies, and by his owne valour staied for a time the lost battaile. At length performing his last endeavour, deceived by the snow, he fell into a bogge, where sticking fast with his horse, and not able to helpe himselfe, hee was taken prisoner by a common souldiour. The rest that escaped out of this bloodie battaile, retired themselves vnto them that were left aboue vpon the mountaine for the defence of the passage. After whom the Christians followed, through the vntract and rough places, untill that hindered of their farther pursuit by the approach of the night, and the abruptnesse of the way, they were glad to found a retreat, and so retired vnto the campe. Many other great men were taken beside Carambey, but many more slaine in the battaile, and most of all in the flight; few escaped, but such as fled backe againe vp into the mountaines. In the retreat Huniades seeing so gallant a man as was Carambey (though to him altogether vnknowne) vnworthily bound, and led prisoner by a common souldiour, asked the souldiour, if he would sell his prisoner: who said, he would; and asked for him ten duckats (a poore price for so great a man) vnto whom Huniades commaunded to be giuen foure hundred, and so sent him to his tent, comforting of him vp with cherefull words, and willing that he should be well vsed. The Despot the same night comming to Huniades his tent, to conferre with him about the remainder of the war, and seeing so braue a man standing among the rest by the fire side, began to talke with him in the Turkish language, whereof hee had some knowledge, by reason of the neerenesse of the nation, and such matters as he had sometimes to do with them; and hauing some gesse by his talke what he was, and pittying his estate, asked Huniades, how he would ransom him: who said, that hee cost him foure hundred duckats, but that he valued him at fortie thousand, which the Despot offered to pay him. Thus by the strange change of fortune was Carambey, of late so great a commander, and so neere alied vnto the great Turke, valued and prized twice in one day, by his enemies, as a mirrour of the vncertaintie of worldly blisse and felicitie. The Polonians report somewhat otherwise of this battaile, as that Vladislaus should himselfe therein be present, and the chiefe that therein commaunded: howbeit the Hungarian writers, whose credit herein we follow, report it as before, not to haue bene fought vnder the good fortune of the king then absent, but vnder the leading of Huniades and the Despot.

Out of this battaile (or as some others report, a little before out of the battaile of MORAVA) fled the great capitaine George Castriot, otherwise of the Turkes called Scanderbeg, now seeking to deliuer both himselfe, and his native cuntry of EPIRUS out of the thraldome of the Turkes, as presently after he did: whose vnwonted flight, not a little terrified the rest of the Turkes armie, and much furthered the Christians victorie, whose proceedings he alwaies secretly fauored: hauing (as it was thought) secret intelligence with the great capitaine Huniades, who not without instructions from him (as some say) gaue that great ouerthrow vnto the Turkes at MORAVA. But of him and his worthie acts done for the deliuerance and defence of his cuntry, more shall be said hereafter.

Shortly after this great ouerthrow and discomfiture of the Turkes, the two great captaines Huniades, and the Despot, together with the king, consulted for the remoouing of the Turkes garisons left aboue for the keeping of the stait passages of the mountaine, and the prosecution of the war. Which Vladislaus (considering the difficultie of the matter, and his souldiours necessities) thought it not good further to prosecute, but forthwith to returne. But Huniades and the Despot, the one thirsting after honour, and the other in no lesse hope, by the good successe of this war, to recouer again his lost kingdome, sayd, That the Turkes were in any case to be remooued, the passage opened, and the sparks that yet remained, for feare of raising a greater fire, extinguished: opposing against the difficultie by the king alleged, the inuincible courage of his souldiours, whereunto they said nothing was impossible or difficult. Vnto which opinion the king also (least he should seeme to distrust the valour of his captaines or souldiours) easily yelcled, and so commaunded on God his name to set forward. The first that mounted the hill was the king his battaile, which by the roughnesse and abruptnesse of the mountaine hindered, oftentimes staied. But Huniades still caried with an earnest desire to prosecute the victorie, and leauing nothing vnattempted, in searching about found a crooked turning way, whereby he with his men more easily and readily got vp to the top of the mountaine euen with their enemies, vnderfired or molested, by reason of the broken couert of the place: from whence they were in good hope easily to haue come vnto their enemies. But being come vp to the place they desired, they found such a deepe and wide gaping of the rocke, betwixt them and the enemy, as was neither to bee passed, or filled vp: yet being come verie neere, they attempted by crosbow shot, and great stones cast out offlings, and other such engines to haue remooued the Turkes from their places: who were therewith and with their vnexpected approach, at the first so greatly both annoyed and discomfited, that they were almost at the point to haue forsaken the passage, had not Alis Beg (but the night before chosen for their Generall in stead of Carambey) encouraged them and taught them, how by throwding themselves vnder the broken rocks, and parapets with tumultarie labour cast vp, to saue themselves from the shot of their enemies. In the meane time also, Huniades by another more high and steepe way, whereby the enemy was also to be approached, had sent vp other companies of souldiours: who fighting at too much disadvantage, were by the Turkes easily rejected. So at length seeing the vain attempt giuen by himselfe vpon the top of the hill: and the desperate danger of the other in climbing the inaccessible mountaine, where one might keepe downe an hundred, despairing to inforce the enemy, hee by the kings commaund, caused a retreat to bee sounded, and so againe retired downe the mountaine, to the great reioycing of the Turkes. The next daie the winter cold raging, and wants in the armie still more and more increasing, the king with the rest of the great commanders entred into consultation for the halting of their returne out of that rough and barren cuntry, into places of greater plentie, before the armie were brought to any greater extremitie. Wherevnto Huniades (giuing place vnto necessity, which alwaies suffereth not to bee regarded that is seemely) now easily yelcled: onely the Despot spake against it, blaming them, that hauing taken the Generall, and put their enemies to flight, and victorie now as it were in their hands, they would not prosecute the small remainder of the warre, but cowardly turne their backs vnto their vanquished enemies: promising that he himselfe would find money enough for the prouiding of all things needfull for the releefe of the armie. So said the Popes Legat also. But forasmuch as the wants in the armie were great, and the souldiours presently pinched with hunger and cold, they could with no hope of any profit, were it neuer so great, be persuaded to staie; openly crying out, that it was not their captains and lieutenants, which wanted nothing, but them the poore souldiours that starued for hunger: as for the Despot, that he in hope of recouering of his kingdome, perswaded things impossible, and no way to be performed, neither to be any thing moued with the death of their men or cattell. Need (they said) could not be vanquished: but that when Winter was past, they would willingly returne againe vnto the sacred warre: In the meane time Winter raging, and hunger commanding, let vs giue ouer (said they) and depart into more fruitfull places, there to refresh our bodies, spent with labour, cold, and hunger. For which reasons, the king sending before his baggage, retired againe by the same way he came. Which the Turkes from aboue beholding, and strengthened with new supplies, followed after them, as after men that had fled: oftentimes assailing them in the rereward, and setting vpon them sometimes on the one side, sometimes on the other, with often skirmishes both did and receiued much harme. Whose manner of fight was, to retire when they were themselves charged, and presently by great troupes to charge againe their enemies, their backs once turned to them; and so troubled the armie, that it was constrained oftentimes to stay; besides that, loaded with the rich spoile of the enemy, and much baggage, it could not of itselfe make any great hast. Now was it by the way come into a great thicke wood, full of deepe boggs and water-courses, hard to be passed through: where the rest of the armie going before, in the rereward, at the entrance of the wood, were left certaine strong companies of men at armes, as a wall against the pursuing enemies; whom the Turkes with their readie light horsemen fiercely charged: where betwixt them, in the wood, was fought a great fight, and a great tumult raised: vnto the noise whereof, they which marched before hastily returning, in skirmishing, many of them fell into those deepe boggs and queachie places, out of which they could hardly rid themselves againe. Besides that, there were many crooked and troublesome turnings and windings, with suddaine descents, so steepe, as that in going downe the same, their horses came tumbling heeles ouer head, and there lay ouerthrowne, together with their riders: in such sort, as that to auoid these difficulties, they were oftentimes enforced to fight on foot. In which troublesome skirmish, about fourescore of the men at armes were lost; but of the Turkes, beside them which were slaine, were taken an hundred and seuentie, all whom Huniades caused to be presently slain. In this wood the Christians were more troubled with the difficulties of the place, than the enemies assaults. Wherefore wants daily more and more encreasing in the armie, which by reason of the multitude of their carriages, abundance of their baggage, and often assaults of the Turkes, was able to make no way: the king for feare his armie should in so long & slow a march through those troublesome and barren countries, be consumed with hunger and other wants, caused all the carriages and baggage to be brought into the midst of the armie, and of it, all such things as serued rather for burthen than vse, to be there burnt: and the armes as well of such souldiours as he had lost, as of the enemy, to be buried in the ground, and all the weake beasts that serued for burthen, to be killed. So the armie well discharged of such vnprofitable burthens, marched much more speedily, neither was so much subject vnto the assaults of the Turkes, as before. And so at length by long iournies, Vladislaus with his armie arrived at Belgrade, where hee was of his subjects honourably receiued. And hauing there staied certaine daies, and well refreshed his armie, departing thence, and passing the riuer Sauus, came to the royall citie of Buda: where he was of all his subjects joyfully receiued also. The Legat and Huniades going on his right hand, and the Despot on the left: after whome followed other colonels, captaines, and lieutenants, with their companies; who at the first meeting with the citizens, more than a mile out of the citie, in token of their mutuall joy, gaue together such joyfull acclamations and outcries, as that the heauens seemed to resound, and the earth to shake with the noise thereof. Before the king, at his coming vnto the citie, went a long companie of the notable Turkes captiues; and next before him, Carambey, bound in chaines, vpon whom all mens eyes were fixed. With them were also carried the enemies ensignes, and such spoyle as had bene found

Behind

Behind the king came Huniades in a triumphant robe, in the midst betwixt the Legate on the right hand, and the Despot on the left, as he that next vnto the king had best deserved the honor of the triumph. Next vnto them followed the deuout Christians, that for the zeale of religion had most honourably of their owne charges voluntarie serued in those wars: and on both sides of them the ciuile magistrates and best of the citizens: behind them came the rest of the legions, and about them both vpon the right hand and the left, the promiscuous common people, doubling and redoubling the praises of the king, and Huniades. Before all these went the prelates and priests in solemne procession, singing hymnes and psalmes of thanksgiving vnto almightie God: Vladislaus coming vnto the gate of the citie, acknowledging God to haue bene the author of so great a victorie, alighting from his horse, on foot went first vnto the Cathedrall church of our ladie; and there giuing most hartie thanks vnto almightie God, hanged vp the enemies ensignes, and part of the spoile, in perpetuall remembrance of so notable a victorie: which hee afterward caused to bee most liuely depicted in a faire table of most curious worke, and there in the same church to bee hanged vp: as were also the armes of all the noble Christians that serued in that most famous expedition, which there long time after remained: Which solemnities ended, he went to his palace in the castle, and there hauing giuen vnto euery man, but especially vnto Huniades, his due commendation, gaue them leaue to depart. Thus the Hungarians, with whom also the Polonians in most part agree, report of this notable expedition of their king Vladislaus: howbeit the Turkes (notable dissemblers of their own losses) confessing the great ouerthrow, call the Bassa so ouerthrowne not by the name of Carambey, but of Cassanes; and the noble prisoner that was taken, by the name of Mechmet Beg, Sanzacke of ANCIARA Amurath his son in law, and brother to Cali-Bassa Amurath his great counsellour, of some called Carambey after the name of his father.

Out of this late slaughter of the Turkes, wherein Carambey was taken, escaped that valiant prince and famous warrior George Castriot (of the Turkes called Scanderbeg) as is before declared: whose noble mind had long time desired to breake out of the golden fetters of the Turkish thraldome, and to be reuenged of the intollerable injuries by Amurath done to his countrey, his parents, his brethren, and himselfe. Although hee had alwaies most warily dissembled the same, for feare of the old tirant: being oftentimes solicited and animated therevnto by secret letters and messengers from his friends in EPirus, knowing right well that the least ouerture thereof, had been vnto him present death. But finding no fit meanes for the accomplishing thereof, wisely dissembled the same, with all the shewes of loue and loyaltie vnto Amurath that might be: vntill that now in this great ouerthrow of the Turkes armie, vnder the leading of Carambey, and in so great a confusion, he tooke occasion to put in practise what he had long before in his deepe conceit plotted, for the deliuerie both of himselfe and his countrey from the Turkish bondage and slauierie. At which time Scanderbeg (for so from henceforth we will call him) hauing a little before imparted the matter vnto some of his trustie friends and countrey men, no lesse desirous of libertie than himselfe, but especially vnto his nephew Amesa, the sonne of his brother Reposius, a young man of great courage (in that great confusion of the Turkish armie, when euery man was glad to shift for himselfe) had euer in his flight a vigilant eie vpon the Bassaes principall secretarie: whom accompanied with a few Turkes, he with his nephew Amesa, and other of his faithfull friends closely followed, as he fled from the slaughter: but when he had got the secretarie with his few followers in place most conuenient for his purpose, he set vpon the Turkes and slew them euery one: and carying the secretarie away with him fast bound, when hee had brought him whether he thought good, with great threats compelled him (soe against his will) to write counterfait letters, as from the Bassa his maister, vnto the gouernour of CROIA, commanding him in Amuraths name, Forthwith to deliuer vnto Scanderbeg, the new chose Gouernour, the charge of the citie with the garrison there: cunningly enterlacing many other things in the same letters, whereby the matter might seeme more probable. Which letters so extorted, he presently slew the Secretary, & as many more of the Turkes as came in his way, of purpose that his doings might be the longer kept from knowledg of Amurath; who not hearing what was become of him, might reasonably conjecture that he was slaine by the Hungarians amongst the rest of the Turkes.

Whilest the same of this great ouerthrow is going to HADRIANOPLE, and there filleth the Turkes court with sorrow and heauinesse, in the meane time Scanderbeg hauing with him three thousand Epirot souldiours which followed him out of the battaile, as men desirous rather to fight for the libertie of themselves and of their country, than in the quarrell of the Turke, was with incredible celeritie come into the vpper country of DIBRA, in the borders of EPIRVS, about seauenty miles from CROIA: into which country he was most joyfully receiued, where he staid but one daie, and chose a few of those three hundred which he brought with him, to wait vpon him when he went to CROIA, as if they had been his domesticall seruants: the rest, with other three hundred lustie souldiours, which were then come vnto him out of DIBRA, he appointed to be led by secret by-waies through the woods and mountaines by perfect guides, vntill they came so nigh CROIA as was possible for them to come, vnperceiued; and there to stay, vntill he might find oportunitie to conuaine them into the citie to oppresse the Turkish garrison. So hee with a small companie of his followers, as if they had been his priuat retinew, tooke the way towards CROIA. But when he began to draw neere to the citie, he sent Amesa before with two seruitors attending vpon him, as if he had been his Secretarie, to certifie the Gouvernour of the cheefe citie of EPIRVS, the night following found by this policie got the government of the cheefe citie of EPIRVS, who were by this time come according as he had before appointed: most part of them hee placed in most convenient places of the citie, and for the speedie suppression of the Turkish garrison, hee with the rest first set vpon the Turkes which kept the watch vpon the wall, and slue them; and afterwards breaking into their priuate houses, slew many of them in their beds: the Christian citizens also taking vp armes at the same time, helped to increase the slaughter of the Turkes, so that in the space of a few houres, there was none of the Turkish garrison left aliue, except some few which were content to forsake their Mahometan superstition, and to become Christians. Many of the Turkes might haue saued their liues, and would not, choosing rather to die, and (as it is reported) also to kill themselves, than to forsake their damnable superstition: so small is the regard of life vnto resolute mindes, in what quarrell soeuer.

The citie of CROIA being thus happily by Scanderbeg recovered, wherein appeared both the greatest difficultie, and hope of his good or bad successe in so great an attempt; he presently sent Amesa backe again into DIBRA, and other speedie messengers likewise into all the parts of EPIRVS, to disperse the newes, and to stirre vp the people to take vp armes for the recouerie of their lost libertie: but flying Fame, the speedie post, had preuented the messengers by him sent, and alreadie filled euerie corner of EPIRVS with report of Scanderbeg his comming, and of all that was done at CROIA. And the oppressed Epirots which had long wished to see that happy daie, were now vp in armes in euerie place, wanting nothing but leaders; whose comming, although they greatly desired, yet they stayed not therevpon, but running together by heapes (as the manner of the common people is in all great tumults) they set vpon the Turkes garrisons, which lay abroad in the country; and slew most part of them, whereby it came to passe, that no Turke could stirre in the country, but that he was snatched vp and slaine, so that in few daies there was not a Turke to be found in EPIRVS, but such as lay in garrisons in strong townes. In this sort of the people, the Gouvernour of CROIA, with all his retinue, was by the country people by the way as he went set vpon and slaine, and all his goods taken as a prey.

When Scanderbeg had thus recovered CROIA, and secured the country, yet to remove the garrisons which Amurath had put in euerie strong citie, was thought to be a matter of great importance, and more difficultie. For which purpose he commaunded those whom he had appointed for capitaines, speedily to repaire vnto CROIA with all the power they could make: At which time also, diuers noble men his nigh kinsmen, returned vnto him with their followers: so that within a few daies, he had together at CROIA twelue thousand souldiours well appointed. With this armie he marched from CROIA to PETRELLA, a strong citie 25 miles distant from CROIA, and encamped before it. This citie is strongly situate vpon the top of a steep mountaine, as all the rest of the cities of EPIRVS be, and was by the Turkes well furnished with men, munition, and others things needfull: yet Scanderbeg was in good hope, that the Turkish garrison there, terrified with the fortune of the garrison of CROIA, and the slaughter of the Turkes in the country round about, would be glad to hearken vnto reasonable conditions. Which to make proofe of, as soone as he was encamped, he sent one of those souldiours which had followed him out of HUNGARIE (a faithfull and wise fellow) vnto PETRELLA, to offer vnto the souldiours, That if they would yeeld vp the citie, it should be at their choice, either to continue in seruice with Scanderbeg, with whom they should find most bountifull entertainment; or else to depart in safetie with bagge and baggage at their pleasure, with an honourable reward to be diuided amongst them. The subtile messenger comming thither, and framing his tale according to the present occasion, and necessitie of the time; first declared vnto them, how that Amurath of late vanquished by the Hungarians in a great battaile, and looking euerie day to be set vpon by diuers other Christian princes, was so busied that he had no leasure to looke into EPIRVS, or to send them any releefe: after that, he in the name of Scanderbeg, offered them the conditions before rehearsed, setting the same forth with many great words; willing them oftentimes by the way to consider the dreadfull miserie that but the other day befell to the garrison at CROIA, and other their fellowes abroad in the country, whose dead bodies as then lay in euerie corner of EPIRVS for a prey to the hungrie dogs and greedie wolues: which thing was easily beleueed of them of the garrison, for that diuers of the Turkes lately fled out of the country into the citie, had themselves seene the same to be true. The Gouvernour hauing a little considered of the matter, was content to giue vp the citie, vpon condition that he with the souldiours might in safetie depart with such things as they had: not couenanting vpon any further reward, because it should not be said that he had sold the citie. Which when Scanderbeg had faithfully promised to performe, the Turkish Gouvernour comming forth with all his garrison, yeelded vp the citie: and Scanderbeg mindfull of his promise, gaue vnto them both meat and money, and sent them with a sufficient conuoy of horsemen in safetie out of EPIRVS.

Petrella yeelded vnto Scanderbeg.

When Scanderbeg had thus gained PETRELLA, he placed therein a convenient garrison, and set all things in order as he thought good: but suffered none to enter into the citie, more than the appointed garrison, although it was then verie cold and frostie weather. This done, he presently raised his campe, and following his good fortune, marched towards PETRA-ALBA in such hast, as if the citie had been running away from him; well knowing, that though Time be euere more precious, yet neuer more than in martiall affaires, wherein the least moment is often times of such power as to effect or frustrate mens greatest designs. PETRA-ALBA is a citie in the country of ÆMATHIA distant from PETRELLA thirtie miles, strongly scituate vpon the top of a mountain, neere vnto the riuer ÆMATHVS. Scanderbeg had scarcely well encamped himselfe before this citie, but that the Gouvernour thereof, terrified with the fortune of CROIA, and PETRELLA, offered to deliuer vp the citie, vpon the same conditions that were graunted at PETRELLA: which being agreed vpon, the citie was forthwith deliuered, and the conditions by Scanderbeg faithfully performed.

Petra-Alba yeelded.

PETRA-ALBA being thus taken, & all things set in order, Scanderbeg caried with the course of his victorie, without delay came to STELLUSA, which is also a strong citie of ÆMATHIA, fiftie miles distant from CROIA, pleasantly (as it were of purpose) built vpon the top of an high hill, standing in the midst of a pleasant and fruitful vallie, with great plaines round about it. There Scanderbeg encamped a little before the going downe of the sunne, and rested that night. In the morning he sent a messenger to the citie, with like conditions as were accepted at PETRELLA and PETRA-ALBA: which most part of the garrison souldiours of the Turkes would gladly haue accepted, but that Desdrot the Gouvernour of the citie, with some few others, earnestly withstood the rest; wherevpon a great contention arose amongst the garrison souldiours. But the greater part desirous to yeeld vp the citie, when they could by no means persuaade the Gouvernour and those few which tooke his part, to yeeld to their desires: they violently set vpon him, and deliuered him with the rest to Scanderbeg, fast bound, and so yeelded vp the citie. For which fact, fearing to returne to Amurath, some of them remained with Scanderbeg, and afterwards became Christians: the rest were either honestly prouided for, or else well rewarded and suffered to depart whether they would. All the other weaker places of EPIRVS wherein any of the Turkish garrisons lay, hearing that the strongest cities were alreadie deliuered vnto Scanderbeg, in short time yeelded themselves vpon like conditions: onely S F E T I G R A D E (otherwise called the holy citie) remained in the possession of the Turks: which citie is placed in the vpper country of D E P I R V S, in the frontiers of E P I R V S, vpon the top of an high & steep hill, as if it were an Eagles nest. Vnto this citie came Scanderbeg with all his armie: and hauing placed his tents, hee began first to assay if he could gaine it by composition, as he had done the rest: and the rather to moue them by the examples of others, he caused his embassadours to declare vnto them all that had happened at C R O I A, P E T R E L I A, P E T R A A L E A, and S T E L L V S A; especially how he had vied the garrison of S T E L L V S A which yeelded vnto him, with all bountie and courtesie; and how that on the contrarie part he had the gouernour in bands with all his wilfull partakers, whom they should presently see executed before their faces, if they forthwith deliuered not the citie. This message troubled the minds of all the garrison, but especially of the gouernour, seeing before his eyes in the wofull example of another man, what might by and by happen vnto himselfe. Wherefore fearing to deliuer his owne opinion and to giue answer vnto the embassadour, for offending the inconstant multitude and vnkowne minds of the people, he first entertained the embassadours honourably, and afterwards turning himselfe vnto the citizens and souldiours, said vnto them: Worthie men and most faithfull souldiours, what is your pleasure, or what shall we answer to these enemies demands? Then one of the souldiours that stood by (a rough bold spirited fellow) vniuersally for his owne part to giue vp the citie, and deeming the gouernour to be of the same mind, in that he had tearmed them worthie and faithfull, and Scanderbeg by the name of an enemy, drawing out his sword, and with his right hand shaking it on high, answered:

A notable speech of a common souldier to the rest of his fellows for the holding out of the citie against Scanderbeg.

Most valiant Gouernour, this same and the like, shall make answer for vs. Nothing was to lesse purpose, than with premeditated words to seeke to terrifie valiant minds, first with the diuers fortune of C R O I A, and then of S T E L L V S A; for as the faces and countenances of men are diuers, so also are their minds and dispositions. Euery man wisely directeth his owne actions, according to his owne proper humour, and by the same plaies the foole or bedlam. We prescribe no laws to them of P E T R E L I A, nor to them of S T E L L V S A, neither let them prescribe any vnto vs. Let neuer so base examples of cowardly slaues euer enter into the thoughts of courageous men: braue minds disdain to imitate other men in their honest actions, much lesse in their cowardise. And why? for euery man lieth after his owne fashion. Wherefore let Scanderbeg proceed, let him kill the gouernour of S T E L L V S A before our faces, let him sacrifice our fellow souldiours, doe you therefore thinke that we shall die in their bodies? Shall our liuing spirits be there extinguished? Shall our blood there be spilt? But o happie bodies, o ghosts of me euer to be reuerenced, which in worthie defence of your libertie and faith haue indifferently contemned gold, siluer, death and torture, and what soeuer els miserable worldlings hold deere and dismall! Wherefore carrie thou backe againe vnto thy master this answer from a common souldier, if he seeke to impose these conditions vpon vs let him once more haue that arme of his, which men of courage feare not so much as he thinketh. He may peradventure inforce vs to these conditions of his, if God forsake vs: but assuredly, persuade vs vnto them, shall be neuer. And yet for all that, your master Scanderbeg is not the man we haue long since heard him reported to be, of an honourable mind, easie to forgine, and such a one as will indifferently iudge betwixt the enemy and himselfe: for why then doth he hold in bonds the gouernour of S T E L L V S A, for that he freely, iustly, and honorably stood in defence of his king, his faith, and libertie? Why doth he threaten him with death, where as he hath not deserved the same, although he hath resolutely offered himselfe thereunto, for defence of his libertie?

All they which were present, listened with great attention to the souldiours speech, neither was he interrupted by any, vntill he had said what he would. The souldiours thronging about him, and beating their swords & targets together, withall gaue a great shout, in token that they all approved his speech for answer. So the gouernour, encouraged with the cheerfulness of his souldiours, returned the embassadour without other answer than that of the common souldiours, and presently appointed euery man to his charge, and with great carefulnesse ordred all things for the better defence of the citie. But when Scanderbeg had heard the answer that was sent him from the citie, deliuered by the mouth of a common souldier, he smiled thereat & said: He is undoubtedly a valiant souldier: if his death be answerable to his speeches: but if my force faile me not, I will also make him happy amongst the happy ghosts of the S T E L L V S A: and by & by commanded the gouernour of S T E L L V S A, with the other captiues to be brought before him, & there caused some of the which were content voluntarily to forake their Mahometane superstition, to be presently baptized, to the great griefe of the other Turks. Desdrot the Gouernour, with the rest, to the terrout of the defendants, were in their fight put to death: whereupon the garrison souldiours with great indignation gaue a great shout from the wall, and bitterly rayled vpon the Christians.

Scanderbeg considering the strength of the citie, with the time of the yeare, vniuersally for souldiours to keepe the field, for Winter was now growne on; left Moses Golemus, a most valiant capitaine, with a garrison of three thousand souldiours, to keepe in the Turkes garrison at S F E T I G R A D E, and to defend the borders of E P I R V S, vntill he might at more conuenient time himselfe returne againe to the siege: and so with the rest of his armie repaired to C R O I A, when hee had in the space of little more than one moneth, to his immortall praise, recovered his kingdome, and driuen the Turks out of euery corner of E P I R V S, excepting onely S F E T I G R A D E: which citie also not long after was by composition deliuered vnto him. During all this time, from his first comming into E P I R V S, he neuer slept about two houres in a night, but with restlesse labour prosecuted his affaires. He euer fought against the Turkes with his arme bare, and that with such fiercenesse, that the blood did oftentimes burst out of his lips. It is written, that he with his owne hand slew three thousand Turkes in the time of his warres against them. But of his great and worthie victories obtained against the two mightie Turkish kings, Amurath, and Mahomet his sonne, more shall be said hereafter in due time and place.

After that Scanderbeg had thus by great force and pollicie wrung his inheritance out of Amuraths hands, and secured the Turks out of euery corner of E P I R V S; he proceeded further, and ouertan part of M A C E D O N I A, making sundrie incursions into the heart of that country, being then in the Turks possession, whereby he so enriched his souldiours, that they desired of him no better pay. Which was so vsuall a thing with this restlesse prince, as that it began to grow into a prouerbe in most princes courts, That the spoile of Amurath his dominions, was Scanderbegs reuenues. Complaint hercof came daily to Amuraths court, which the craftie aged fire (being then troubled with the Hungarian warres) seemed at the first to make no great account of, but as of that hee could easily and at his pleasure remedie; although hee was therewith inwardly grieved at the heart. But when the certaine report of one mischeefe as it were in the necke of another, continually founded in his eares, and that he saw no end to be expected of these miseries; he sent Alis Bassa, one of his greatest men of warre, with an armie of fortie thousand select souldiours, at once to subdue the country of E P I R V S, and to bring it againe vnder his obedience. The setting forth of this great armie, vnder the conduct of so famous a captain, replenished the minds of the Turks with such an assured hope of victorie, that a man would haue thought Scanderbeg had been already taken, and now brought to execution: yea the common souldiours before their setting forth, were oftentimes at vaine contention for the diuision of the spoile they were neuer like to haue: So readie are men to promise wonders to themselves, whilest they conserue but with their owne desires. And on the other side, Fame, the forerunner of great attempts, had filled all the small country of E P I R V S, with great terrout and feare of Alis Bassas comming. The countrey men with their families fled into the strong citties, and the citizens within their wals fell to fortifying the same, and kept continuall watch and ward, as if the enemy had then lien euen fast by them: the aged men and women commended themselves and all theirs first vnto God by prayers, and then to the courage of the lustie souldiours with teares, as in case of extreame perill and danger. Onely Scanderbeg was nothing moued either with the terrible report of the Bassas comming, or the vaine feare of his subiects; but alwayes kept the same cheerefullnesse both of countenance and speech, as he was wont, being well acquainted with the tumult of the Turkish wars, and hauing (as was supposed) certaine intelligence before from his secret friends in the Turkes court, of all Amuraths designs. So that hauing set all things in order for the safetie of his countrey, he began to leuie an armie at C R O I A: at which time most part of his subiects of E P I R V S, which were able to beare armes, repaired vnto him: the confederate Christian princes also, his neighbours, and for most part his kinsmen, sent vnto him great supplies: beside other deuout and warlike minded Christians, which voluntarily resorted vnto him from farre, in great numbers. Out of which multitude of people he chose only eight thousand horsemen and seuen thousand foot, when as he might haue raised a far greater armie: and placing some few in garrisons in the frontier cities where he thought most conuenient, all the rest he sent home againe to their dwellings. At which his confidence, his friends, yea and his enemies, also much marvelled, that when hee might might haue had so many, he would take the field with so few. With which small armie of fiftene thousand, he marched from CROIA, fourescore miles to DYERA: where hearing by his espials, of the approach of his enemies, after he had with cheerefull speech encouraged his souldiers, he encamped with his armie in the lower countrey of DYERA, neere vnto a wood side, right in the way where the Bassa must needs passe. In which wood, he placed Gnez Musachee and Amesa in ambush with three thousand men: commanding them to stand close, vntill they saw he had thoroughly joynd battaile with the Bassa, and then with all their force to breake forth vpon his reterward. The Bassa marching forward, came and encamped neere vnto Scanderbeg: a litle before the going downe of the Sunne, and there rested that night, making great shew of mirth and joy, with great fires in euerie corner of the campe, as the Turkish manner of encamping is. VVheras in Scanderbegs campe, all things were silent, and no shew of any fire at all: for so Scanderbeg had commanded: which made the Turkes the more carelesse, deeming thereby the Christians as good as already discouraged. The next morning Scanderbeg ranged his armie in order of battaile, placing Tanussius in the left wing, with fiftene hundredth horsemen, and as many foot; and Moses in the right with like number: and leading the maine battell himselfe. The reterward was committed to Vranacotes, a man renowned in those daies, both for his grauitie in counsell, and for his valour in armes, fit to command or be commanded; but afterwards, amongst the most famous, for the worthie defending of CROIA against Amurath, being then there himselfe in person. Alis Bassa contemning the small number of Scanderbegs armie, seeing nothing therein to be feared more than the good order thereof, gaue the first charge with a small troupe of horsemen: who at the first encounter retired, as if they had fled, of purpose that the Christian hastily pursuing their vntimely hope, might disorder their battaile, and so giue occasion to their owne ouerthrow. But by the commaundement of Scanderbeg (who easily perceiued the Bassas meaning) their dangerous forwardnesse was warily waied, and all with safetie kept in good order. So both armies comming on, the wings beganne the battaile a fresh, and Scanderbeg with great courage bringing on his maine battell in the face of the Bassa, valiantly charged him. But by that time that the battailes were thoroughly joynd, Musachee and Amesa suddenly issued out of the wood, and fiercely set vpon the reterward of the Turkes armie, where they made great slaughter, and forced many of the Turkes for feare to flie. Thus was the Bassas great armie driuen to fight both before and behind, being hardly beset and laied vnto with a small number. The Bassa had placed his best souldiours neere vnto himselfe in the maine battaile, as his most assured strength and last refuge: these valiant men stood fast, and renewed the battaile, before almost lost. And here Scanderbegs fortune was euen at a stand: vntill that the well aduised and valiant capitaine Vranacotes hauing receiued the wearied souldiours into the reterward, and setting all things there in safetie, accompanied with certaine troupes of fresh souldiours which he brought out of the reterward, brake through the Bassas armie with such slaughter of the Turkes, that hee made way for Scanderbeg and all the rest of his armie. The Turkes discomfited with the inuincible courage of these old souldiours, and the slaughter of their fellows, which lay by heapes wallowing in their owne blood, betooke themselves to flight; whom the Christians fiercely pursued; and slew of them two and twentie thousand: at which time were also two thousand others taken prisoners, with foure and twentie of the Turkes ensignes: whereas of the Christians were slaine not past a hundredth and twentie. The enemies tents with all their carriages, were at the same time taken also. After this great victorie, when Scanderbeg had made all his feauen thousand footmen, horsemen, by giuing vnto them the hofes of the slaine Turkes, he brake into the enemies countrey; and entered farre into MACEDONIA, where he filled the desires of his souldiours with the wealth and spoile thereof, sparing nothing that fire and sword could deuoure: and so with victorie returned to CROIA, where he was of his subjects joyfully receiued. Alis Bassa with the remainder of his discomfited armie, returned to HADRIANOPLE, and there by Amurath was hardly charged of cowardice, and want of discretion, for that he had lost so puissant an armie to so weake an enemy. VVherof when he had cleared himselfe by the modest rehearsal of his former victories, and the testimony of all the other capitaines present with him in that battaile, he was pardoned, and so againe receiued into fauour, and that great ouerthrow imputed to the chance of warre.

Amurath hauing recieued two so great ouerthrowes, first from Huniades and the Hungarians, and now from Scanderbeg; and seeing himselfe elsewhere beset with so many mischances, that he could not tell which way to turne himselfe; tormented with dispaire, and desire of revenge, whereof hee saw small possibilitie, fell into such a melancholic passion, that ouercome with the darke conceits thereof, he was about to haue become the bloodie executioner of himselfe, had not Cali Bassa by his graue aduice comforted vp his dying spirits: by whose persuation, contrarie to his haughtie nature, he yeilded by his embassadors sent for the same purpose, to desire peace of Vladislaus king of HUNGARIA, vntill the exiled Despot of SERBIA (his father in law, then present with the king) as a meane therein. VVho at the first gaue small credite vnto the embassadors, or vnto such things as they told him, vntill that at length better persuaded of the true meaning of the Turke, he so wrought the matter both with the king and the rest of the nobilitie, and especially with Huniades, that there was an honourable peace concluded. The captiuities wherof were, first, That Amurath withdrawing all his forces and garrisons, should deately depart out of SERBIA, and restore the same vnto the possession of George the Despot; the right lord and owner thereof deliuering also freely vnto him his two sonnes, Stephen and George; who bereft of their sight, he had long time kept in straight prison: Also, that from thenceforth he should make no claime vnto the kingdome of MOLDAVIA, nor to that part of BULGARIA which he had in the last wars lost. And finally, that he should not inuade or molest the Hungarians, or any part of their kingdome, during the whole time of that peace: and to pay 40000 ducats for the ranfome of Carambey. Vnto which hard conditions, when the Turkish tyrant full fore against his will had condiscended, a peace for ten yeares was forthwith on both parts concluded; and the same by solemne oath confirmed: king Vladislaus taking his oath vpon the holy Euangelists, and Amurath (by his embassadors) vpon their Turkish Alcoran. This was the most honorable peace that euerr Christian prince had before that time made with any of the Turkish kings, and most profitable also, had it been with like sinceritie kept, as it was with solemnitie confirmed.

Amurath with this peace deliuered of his greatest feare, conuerted all his forces against the CARAMANIAN king, in reuenge of the injuries by him done, whilst he was occupied in the Hungarian warres. This king of CARAMANIA knowing himselfe vnable to withstand so great an enemy, durst neither meet him in the field, nor trust himselfe to the strength of any of his cities or strong castles, but fled into the mountains, there fortifying himselfe more surely than in any other his strong holds. Amurath entering into CARAMANIA, made great spoile in the countrey as he went, and tooke great booties. At last comming to ICONTIVM, he laid hard siege to the same. The poor king seeing his kingdome spoiled, and his cheefe citie in danger to be lost, sent embassadors, and with them his wife also, which was Amuraths sister, to intreat for peace; offering to pay vnto him yearly the double tribute which hee before paid, and for the performance thereof to giue his sonne in hostage. Vpon which conditions Amurath graunted him peace, and so returned. In this warre, Aladin, Amuraths eldest sonne, died, to the great griefe of his aged father, being slaine with a fall from his horse, as he was hawking.

Old Amurath thoroughly wearied with continuall warres, and other troubles incident vnto restless roomes, resolved now to retire himselfe to a more priuat and quiet kind of life: and therefore sent for his sonne Mahomet, being then but fiftene yeares old, to whom hee voluntarily resigned his kingdome, appointing Caly Bassa his tutor, with one Chosroe, a learned doctor of their lawe to be his trustie counsellors and cheefe directors. And so taking with him Hamze-Beg, one of his noblemen in whom he tooke greatest pleasure, departed to MANGRESTA, and there as a man wearie of the world, gaue himselfe to a solitarie and monasticall kind of life, in the company of certaine religious Turkish monks, as they accounted of them.

Many great kings and princes, as well Mahometanes as Christians, glad before of the Hungarian victorie, were now no lesse forrie to heare of the late concluded peace betwixt king Vladislaus and the old Sultan Amurath: as being of opinion, That the prosecution of that warre so happily begun, would haue bene the vtter ruine and destruction of the Turkish kingdome. VVherfore they sought by all possible meanes to induce the young king Vladislaus to breake the league he had so lately and so solemne made with the Turke: especially John Paleologus the emperour of CONSTANTINOPE, did by letters importune the king to remember the consideration he had made with the other Christian princes, for the maintenance of the wars against the common enemy of Christianitie: which princes were now prest and readie (as he said) to assist him with their promised aid: adding moreouer, That whereas Amurath had diuerse times sought to joyne with him in amitie and friendship, hee had vtterly rejected that offer of peace, preferring the vniuersall profit (like to ensue to all Christendome by that religious warre) before his owne proper securitie and profit, being for his part in readinesse to joyne his forces with with the kings, if he would presently enter into armies: which he could neuer doe in better time than now, whilest Amurath, terrified with his late overthrow, and still beset with doubtfull war, had drawne his greatest forces out of EVROPE into ASIA, in such disorderd haile, as that should seeme he rather fled for feare of his enemies in EVROPE, than marched to encounter his enemies in ASIA, and now being wearie of all, had betaken himselfe vnto a priuat kind of life. To conclude, he requested the king not to leaue him and the other Christian princes offsmall power, as a prey vnto the Turke, who would assuredly with all hostilitie intrude them; so soone as he thought himselfe safe from the danger of the Hungarians. At the same time also, and vpon the departure of the Turkes embassadours, for the performance of such things as they had promised, letters came from Francis the Cardinall of FLORENCE, Generall of the Christian fleet, declaring how that Amurath hauing left almost none in EVROPE, was with all the power he could make, gone ouer into ASIA against the Caramanian king, leauing a most faire occasion for the Christians easly to recouer whatsoever they had before lost in EVROPE: and that there was in good time come with his fleet vnto the straits of HELLSPONTVS, according vnto promise, and there lay readie to embarre the Turkes passage backe againe out of ASIA. Both these letters being read in the Counsell, so much moued the king, with all the rest of the nobilitie of HUNGARIE there present, as that they were neuer more forrie or ashamed for any thing they had done in their liues, than for the league so lately with Amurath concluded: for why, they saw that all the plot they had laied, for their immortall glorie, was now by this lastie peace that they had made with the Turke, without the good liking or knowledge of their confederats, brought to nought; and that they had thereby most shamefully decieued the generall expectation that the Christian commonweale had conceiued of them; and that they, of long time called the protectors of the Christian faith, the defendours of true religion, the reuengers of Christ his name, and deliuerers of the faithfull nations; should now be accounted the breakers of the Christian league, men forgetfull of their confederation both with the Latines and the Greeks, contempters of immortallitie, and louers of their owne profit onely. In this doubtfullnesse of minds whilst they stood yet thus waiting, Julian the Cardinall and Legat, alwaies an enemy vnto the peace, and by reason of his place a man in greatest authoritie next vnto the king, tooke occasion to diluade the same as followeth.

The cunning speech wherewith Julian the Cardinall perswaded the King to break the league he had before made with Amurath.

If any of you right worthie (said hee) shall happily marnell, that I should speake of breaking the league, and violating our faith, let him first vnderstand, That I at this present am to perswade you to nothing els, but the faithfull obseruing both of the one and the other: led with like repentance with you, repentance I say, and not sorrow, when as I, as from a watch-tower foreseeing all these things which were decreed against my will, to sort also contrarie to your expectation, am now for the dutie of my religion, and the zeale vnto the Christian religion, enforced with you to doubt: and so much the rather, for that at this present the question is of the losse and hazard of all our honours and credit in common: which except we by common consent, and wonted valour, endeavour to amend; o how much it is to be feared, lest for shame neither may you goe out of HUNGARIE, or I returne to ROME, where all things are with most deepe judgement censured. Consider I pray you into what miseries this lastie resolution hath cast vs. We haue entred into league with the Turke, an insidell, to violate our faith with the Christians, and to breake the holy league before made with the great bishop, and the other Christian princes our confederats. And that for what, for what profit I say? Forsooth, that so we might againe recouer SERVIA, long before destroyed. Verily a small and wofull profit which may againe in short time be cut off, andprineth vs of others farre greater, and of much longer continuance. For what can bee more fond or inconsiderat, than in our consultations to haue regard to our priuat profit only, and not the publicke, without respect of religion, honestie, or conscience? It is not demanded of you at this present (right honorable) what you owe vnto the periured Turke: but you are by me Julian, the great bishop, and the confederat Christian princes Legat, and Agent, before the tribunall seat of your owne consciences, accused of breach of faith, breach of league, and breach of promise; and thereof euen by your owne judgement, rather than by the judgement of God, or other man, I will condemne you. Answer me you noble worthies: After you had happily six moneths made warres against the Turke in BVLGARIA and the borders of THRACIA, and after that, triumphantly returning into HUNGARIE, received you not honourable embassages from almost all ITALIE, and from the great emperour, with common reioycing for your so glorious a victorie, and exhortations to continue the war? We received them. Did not you in my presence, and I the author thereof, willingly make a most holy league with the Italians and Greeks, That the one should with their aid and power meet you out of THRACIA; and the other with a great fleet should come into the HELLSPONTVS? We made it. If you made it, why breaking this, made you another with the Turke? or by what right can you keep the same, being made? Wherefore, if the last year you made a league with the great Bishop (God his vicar here on earth) if you be men, if you be in your wits, if you be Christians, this second league is to be broken, least you should violate the first, and that a most Christian league: which except you doe, I feare least that as Iudas betraied Christ, so you may seeme to betraie his vicar; or that God, whom hether to you haue alwaies found present, propitious, and fauourable, you shall hereafter find him angry, and an enemy to your proceedings. And now I pray you tell me, what will you answer vnto the Constantinopolitan emperour: who according to your appointment, hath now with the first taken the field, and in so great an oportunitie expecteth but your comming? what will you answer the great Bishop? what the Venetians and Genowais, who haue their great fleet readie as was appointed? what the Burgundians, who for their zeale vnto the Christian faith & religion haue long since passed the Ocean, and so by many dangers of the sea now fote in the HELLSPONT? Deuise (I praie you) if you can, some excuse and colour, that we may not seeme altogether vnlike our selues: if out of your hidden skill you can coine any thing, shew it. You promised with the first of the Spring, that you would be in the field: and now your souldior, both the Spring and Summer, play, so great and so whollome occasion passing away, through your wofull slouth and negligence. O the great blindnesse of mens minds! O grosse cowardise! O detestable league, made to the destruction of the common weale! Some man happily will blame mee, and aske, why I suffered it with the rest? I was present I confesse: but as much as in mee was, I intreated it might not be. I disliked it: and as many of you here present can testifie, I utterly condemned it. I was overcome by the wisdom and authoritie of Humiades, and the compassion of the Despot, lest vnhappy man, he should by my intercession seeme longer to want his kingdom and children: and least any man should call me a contemner or impugner of your good, I full of sorrow, and unwillingly, gaue way; not ignorant the health of the Christian common weale to be therein weakened; the hope of your immortall glorie extinguished, and vs all (by your leaue may I say it): accounted breakers both of diuine and humane leagues, forsworne men, and traitors vnto all good Christians. Wherefore except before the report of our perfidioussnesse be further bruted, we deliuer our selues from this infamie, nothing can be greater or more miserable than our shame or villanie: if we will so doe, we may not so easly, as iustly and religiously do it. Hauing made restitution againe of SERVIA and the captiues, what remaineth els for you to do noble worthies, but to repaire your arme, to prepare what so is needfull for war, & to keep your first league with the Christian princes? and so say, That king Madillaus, after his league made with the Greeke and Latin princes, could not without the consent of those his confederats and allies, vnder whose good fortune that common war was undertaken, conclude any thing, especially with the enemies of the Christian religion? And that therefore, if any thing were agreed vpon betwixt him and the Turke, it was frustrate, & the first league to be stood vpon. Who is so partiall an esteemer of mens actions, that would not easly iudge, That in case Faith were giuen to both, it were rather to be kept with a Christian, than with a Turke, with a beleeuier than with an insidell? Against a perfidious enemy it is lawfull (as they say) for a man to vse all cunning, force, and deceit, deluding craft with craft, and fraud with fraud. By craft the Turke first passed ouer into EVROPE, by little and little he crept into that kingdom, he neuer kept faith with any, he grew to this height rather by cunning than by strength: and are you become so blind, as to thinke it better to keepe your promise with the Turke, deuoid of all faith and humanitie, rather than with the faithfull Christians, and especially the most holy Bishop? All great things are done by deuice and policie: the Romanes our ancestors uprightly and religiously alwaies kept their leagues with their confederats, but deluded the deceiverfull with their cunning. Caesar was of opinion, That for soveraigntie the law was sometimes to be broken. And Philip the father and master of him that conquered ASIA, oftentimes used cunning and deceit for the desire of rule: yet were not these men called traitors. It is sometime lawfull for the commonweale sake, neither to stand to our leagues, neither to keepe our faith with them that be themselves faithlesse. Lawfull it is to breake unlawfull oaths, and especially such as are thought to be against right, reason, and equitie. Was it lawfull for Diomedes, rowing for to sacrifice vnto the gods whomsoever he first met at his returne into his country, to kill his sonne by that his vow and oath? Verely it was a great impietie. Wherefore a iust and lawfull oath is in the judgement of all men to be religiously kept, but such an oath as tendeth not onely vnto priuat but publicke destruction, that ought to be vaine and frustrate. Wherefore before our faithlesse dealing be farther ther spread abroad, I beseech you worthie men, and thee especially most glorious king, not in any point to violate your faith for the good of the Christian commonweale giuen vnto the most holy father and the other Christian princes. The league you haue made with the Greekes and the Latines faithfully and religiously keepe; the expedition by common consent taken in hand by the example of your confederates, prosecute; the foundation of immortall glorie by you laid; build vpon. Deliuer the Christian provinces oppressed with the Turkish seruitude, satisfie the hope conceiued of you, and deceiue not the expectation the world hath now conceiued of you, than which nothing can be more dishonourable: make no confidence of the league you haue made with the Infidell, but thinke it a great impietie and wickednesse to violate the holy league made with the great bishop, and the other Christian princes: thinking, that if you should doe otherwise, God (which he of his mercie forbid) would become of that your falsified faith, most seuerie and sharpe reuenger: and that you can do nothing more acceptable vnto our Saniour Christ, or more glorious to your selues, than to deliuer the oppressed Christian countries from the cruell slauiery and bondage of the Turke. Suffer not this so fit an occasion to slip away, than which a fitter can neuer be giuen. EVROPE is vnfurnished of the Turks, busied in the Caramanian war; their returne is enbarred by the Christians fleet, now in the sea of HELLESPOINTVS; you need but to goe see, and it were to take a view of THE ACIA, MACEDONIA, GRECIA, and EPIRVS, there is no enemy there left to oppose himselfe against you. Wherefore for God his cause, I request you aboue all things to continue the Christian league, and with your happie and victorious forces, to march forward into MACEDONIA and THRACIA, as is before by you with the other Christian princes your confederates, agreed.

In conclusion, hauing much spoken of the authoritie and power of the great bishop, he in his name disanulled the league whatsoever, by the king made with the Turke; and absolved him, with the rest whom it might concerne, from the oath they had giuen, and the promises they had made. Which so well contented both the king and the rest, that there was now no more question of the oath, or of the lawfulnessse of the warre, but a decree made for the continuation of the league with the other Christian princes their confederates (and for the prosecution of the warres against the Turks) as was with them before agreed: whom they could now say, they were not to forsake, and to leaue them as a prey vnto the Turke their greedie enemy; now for nothing more in danger, than for that, at their request they had taken vp armes in their quarrell. Vnto which vnfurnat decree, both the Despot and Huniades, the cheefe authors of the late peace betwixt the king and Amurath, easily consented: the Despot, induced with the great hope he had conceiued of the good successe of the war; and Huniades, with the desire of the kingdom of BULGARIE promised vnto him by Vladislaus, and by faire charter also (as some said) assured vnto him.

Of this the kings resolution for the breach of the peace with the Turke, notice was with all speed giuen vnto the Constantinopolitane emperor, and Francis the Florentine Cardinall, then lying with a fleet of seuentie gallies at the straits of HELLESPOINTVS; for feare least they hearing of the former concluded peace, should alter also or els quite desist from their former purposes. In the meane time whilest these things were yet in plotting, the Turke ignorant hereof, according to his promise had withdrawne all his garnisons out of SERBIA, and other places before agreed vpon in the late concluded peace, restoring the same vnto the Despot, and others the full owners, although it was not done at the very prefixed day, at which it should haue been done. In which time also he let at libertie great numbers of captiues, & amongst the rest, the two blind sonnes of the prince of SERBIA; faithfully performing whatsoever he had before vpon his religion promised in the league with the Christians before concluded, so desirous hee was of peace with the Hungarians. Howbeit, Vladislaus by the counsell of Huniades, detained to his owne use certaine of the strong holds in SERBIA: for which cause, George the Despot euer afterwards bore a secret grudge against Huniades.

Now as king Vladislaus (hauing by the persuation of Italian the Cardinall, renounced the league betwixt him and Amurath) was preparing his forces, the same of the Epirot prince Scanderbeg was also (by the recouerie of his fathers kingdom of EPIRVS, out of the Turkes hands, and by the late ouerthrow of Alis Bassa) growne great, euerie man speaking of him honour and praise. Wherewith Vladislaus moued, and reasonably perswaded what a furtherance it would be vnto his haughtie designs (aiming at no lesse than the viter ouerthrow of the Turkes kingdom in EVROPE) if he might vnto his owne great preparations ioine also the strength of that so forfortunate a prince, by the consent of his nobilitie, with all speed dispatched away his embassadours with letters vnto him, certifying him of his honorable purpose, for the rooting out of the Turks, and in that common cause praying his aid against such a dangerous and dreadfull enemy: the purport whereof here followeth.

Vladislaus king of Hungarie and Polonia, vnto the noble Scanderbeg, priince of EPIRVS, greeting.

It may be that some good hap hath deferred this our late congratulation vntill this present, to the intent we might at this time together with you reioyce in the double successe of your prosperitie: first, for the happie recouerie of your estate; and then, for that the same hath by your wisdom and valour bene of late so notably defended. Wherefore in this we reioyce, not onely in your behalfe, but in the behalfe of all good Christians, that it hath pleased God of his goodnesse, by your valour to haue giuen so great an encrease and comfort vnto the Christian commonweale: for as much as amongst other our great euils, the losse of the Albanian people hath not bene to be accounted the least; at such time as Iohn Castriot, a worthie prince, your father, oppressed by Amurath and by the vngratefull destinies taken out of this world, had neither the meanes to leaue vnto you his kingdom and scepter (as vnto his sonne, then living in his enemies power) either was able yet otherwise to prouide for his affaires. And would to God this your father, most happie in such a soone, might haue till now lived: whose felicitie had in that surmounted all others, if he might but haue serued you before his death. For as you seeme vnto me aboue all other princes in the world (without offence bee it said) most accomplished with all the good graces and perfections both of bodie and mind, so are you endowed also with a certaine diuine and wonderfull fortune: vnder the good conduct whereof, not onely the whole kingdom of EPIRVS may thinke it selfe in securitie; but all the rest of the other nations also, lately by the detestable fraud and violence of the Othoman kings dismembred from the realme of MACEDON, may also recouer the former beantie of their antient lawes and liberties. For (to say nothing of those things which euen from your childhood hauing continually made you enuied, haue heretofore purchased vnto you an immortall fame and glorie euen amongst the Barbarians themselves) what can be more glorious than this victorie, which (as wee haue heard and beleeue) you to your singular admiration, haue obtained by the ouerthrow and viter discomfiture of Alis Bassa, with his so great and mightie apower? But now O Scanderbeg (God so appointing it, who in his deepe and secret wisdom hath reserved you vnto these so dangerous times, for the publicke good and comfort of the Christian commonweale) there offers it selfe vnto you an object of farre greater glory, with a most faire and fit occasion for you to reuenge your selfe of all the wrongs and injuries both new and old, by Amurath the Turkish Sultan done, not in priuate to the person of your selfe onely, but vnto the whole state and kingdom of EPIRVS also; and not the domesticall and ciuile miseries of your owne country onely, but the publicke calamities also, and those opprobrious disgraces done against the Christian faith and religion in generall, now oppressed (I will not say extinguished) and that is, if you with your victorious forces will succour vs in this extremitie of our affaires, not yet altogether desperate: Hereunto doe all the princes of HUNGARIE and POLONIA, and all other men of courage inuite you, Italian the Cardinall of S. Angell entreatheth you, with all those deuout and courageous Christians, which long since here with vs, and readie in armes, wish for nothing more than the presence of your victorious ensignes. Which so faire an occasion (by God himselfe now offered) if you refuse not, will in all mens iudgement bee a sure meane to vanquish and ouerthrow our common enemy the Turke, and to drive him quite out of EVROPE, wrongfully by him of so long time possessed. I neede not therefore (as I suppose) to vse any kind of persuation vnto you in this cause and quarrell, the defence whereof doth purchase vnto vs health, light, and libertie: but being neglected, I feare and abhorre to forbode what may ensue thereof. Wee Christians haue bene too too slacke and backward in helping one another: the same hath now well nere consumed vs all, whilest no man thought it would haue come nere himselfe. What doe we see of the Greeke empire? what of the Bulgarians, and Seruians? yea mine owne losses and manifold calamities, already, and yet also to bee endured, who is able to recount? The braue and most valiant princes, the surest bulwarks and defences of the kingdom of HUNGARIE, from time to time lost; and the puissant armies with one and the same fatal chaunce of warre consumed and brought to nothing, who is able to reckon up? Inasmuch that there is no house, wife, or mayne, in all HUNGARIE, which is not in some mea-measure partaker of this heavinesse. All this doe the Christian princes heare of, and yet the miserable estate and condition of their allies can nothing moove any one of them: but suffer vs thus as a sacrifice for the rest, to be on all parts exposed to the rage and furie of the common and mercilesseemie. Onely Eugenius the most holy bishop of ROME, and Philip duke of BURGUNDIE, have not refused to beare a part of the burthen of this our afflicted fortune: The one hath sent hither his Legat Julian the Cardinall, with notable and puissant succours; and the other with his fleet at sea, and comm as farre as HELLESPOINTVS, so much as in him lieth doth notably hinder the Turkes passage into EVROPE. And one other hope there is not now farre from vs, and that is, your helpe, whereof we are so desirous: which we require of you, mooved therunto, partly by your valour so well knowne, and partly in regard of the imminent perill and common danger of vs all. And albeit we are not ignorant, how euill you may be at leisure to take such an expedition in hand, for the late troubled estate of your affairs, and your new recovered kingdome, as yet scarcely well established: yet notwithstanding, let it not withhold you or keepe you backe; assuring you, that as this expedition cannot be put vnto you most honourable, euen so this your present desert shall not be bestowed vpon vngratefull or thanklesse men: but that which you shall now first begin and undertake for our preservation & dignitie, we will from henceforth and ever continue for your glorie and for the increase of your greatnesse. Fare you well from our regall citie of BUDA, the fourth of Iuly 1444.

Of this the kings motion, Scanderbeg liking well, and thinking it farre better now in so fit a time, with his owne forces joined vnto the Hungarians his friends, throughly to busie Amurath, than in short time after, himselfe alone to sustaine his whole power: by the generall consent of the Albanian princes his confederats and allies, yeelded vnto his request in liberall termes promising him by his letters, in good time to be present with him with thirtie thousand good souldiers. The copie of which letters I thought it not amisse here to set downe also.

HUNGARIE and POLONIA, greeting.

Scanderbeg his answer by letters vnto king Vladislaus.

Your letters most inuincible king, I haue with like joy and contentment receiued: which I in the generall assembly of my chiefetaines hauing caused publicly to be read, there was not any one of them which was not of opinion, but that so iust an occasion of war by you offered, was forthwith to be joyfully on our behalfe also embraced. And so euery man doth both publicly and priuately affirme, That nothing could haue happened vnto them more acceptable from God, than that they might by some notable service testifie their gratefull minds, and bind vnto them so excellent a prince: as also to giue so fit succours vnto the Christian commonweale. In which forwardnesse of my people, I my selfe tooke great contentment and pleasure, both in regard of your selfe, and in the behalfe of the publicke and common cause: seeing my men of warre, and all other my subjects, of what state or degree soeuer (without any perswasion vsed on my part) to be so cheerefully and courageously minded in defence of the faith, and of the Christian religion; and so well affectioned towards your most royall maiestie. And to say the truth, who is he (if he be not hatefull vnto God and man) albeit there were no question of religion, or of the common danger, that would refuse so iust and lawfull a warre? for such a king, as vnto whom alone we may and ought to attribute, That we Christians doe not onely raigne, but euen line, breath, and enjoy the libertie of our speech. Who would not willingly take up arms, and adventure himselfe into most manifest and certaine danger for the people of HUNGARIE; by whom in all ages the Christian commonweale hath with their so many trauels and so much of their blood, bene so mightily supported and defended? who euen from the very cradle haue bene continuall enemies vnto our enemies, and haue as it were euen vowed themselves for the honour of the Christian religion and name. Would God (most mightie and redoubted Vladislaus) it had bene in my power to haue brought vnto you such forces to this honourable warre, as were answerable vnto my courage and desire: then happily EVROPE should not longer lie in this ignominious estate, oppressed by Amurath; neither should the fields of VARNIA or BASILIA so often smoke with the blood of the Hungarians, nor euery corner of MACEDONIA with the blood of the Epirots: both nations being as it were become the expiatorie sacrifices of others sinnes and offences, we all now by turnes perish, whilest euery man thinketh himselfe borne but for himselfe alone. But why do I vnto my selfe poure forth these vaine complaints. Truly, it neither repenteth me of my forces, neither as I suppose (if it shall please God, that our forces may once meet and joyne together in so happie a warre) shall the Christian commonweale haue any cause to sorrow or be agreed with the issue and event of our fortune. For vnto those fiftie thousand good souldiers which lately discosted Alis Bassa on the borders of MACEDONIA, my purpose is to ioinc as many more vnto them: with all which strength as soone as conveniently I may, I will begin to set forward, ready to follow your ensignes to all euents whatsoeuer. And so fare you well, from CROIA the third of August 1444.

These letters being dispatched away vnto the king, Scanderbeg forthwith began to leaue his forces. And first of all he caused with new supplies to be made strong, all those companies where-with he had ouerthrowne Alis Bassa; not suffering any one of them to absent himselfe from this expedition. Vnto whom being in number fifteen thousand, all men of approued valour, hee joyned other fifteen thousand more, no lesse valiant than they: such a power as hee neuer either before or after raised for the recouerie, or defence of his kingdome. And so furnished with all things necessarie for so honourable a war, cheerefully set forward, accompanied with the vowes and hope of all his most faithfull and louing subjects. But being come to the borders of SERVIA, he found the strait and difficult passages of that rough countrey shut vp by George the Despot, (lord thereof, a man adorned with all the graces of nature, but otherwise a verie wicked damned Atheist, and a Christian but in name only) who but lately before, restored vnto his kingdome by the helpe of king Vladislaus, hauing changed his mind, did now mightily cleaue vnto the Turke his sonne in law (by whom he had before been himselfe exiled) and in fauour of his quarell, and despite of the Hungarians, but especially of Huniades, had stopped vp the waies and passages whereby Scanderbeg was with his armie to passe: who by his embassadour sent of purpose vnto the Despot, complained to him of that wrong, putting him in mind of the perjurious dealing of Amurath with him, notwithstanding he had married his daughter; and of the great pleasures the Hungarians had done him; of both which he had good prooffe: requesting him if it were but in regard of the common cause of Christianitie to giue vnto him (as vnto his friend by whom hee was neuer in any thing wronged) passage; and not to staine himselfe with the perpetuall note of infamie. That he being a Christian prince, and of late so mightily oppressed by the Turke, should now to the great hinderence of the Christian common weale take part with him, against his friends and deliuerers. But what availeth praier or requests, bee they neuer so reasonable, with a man set downe to mischief? Scanderbeg out of hope by any other meanes to open his way, but by plaine force, resolved so to doe: although it much grieved him to spend those forces vpon a Christian prince, which he had prepared against the capitall enemy both of himselfe and all good Christians, old Amurath the Turkish Sultan.

But whilest he thus discontented, spendeth his time with his armie vpon the borders of SERVIA, beset with many difficulties: Vladislaus prickt forward by the continuall solicitation of Julian the Cardinall, or else drawne on by his owne ineuitable destinie, hauing assembled a great armie of valiant and couragious souldiers out of HUNGARIE and POLONIA (yet in number farre inferior to that he had the yeare before, for that most of the voluntarie souldiers were returned home) set forward from SEGEDINVM, and in the beginning of Nouember (a time vnto fit for wars) passed ouer DANUBIVS, and entring into BVLGARIA came to NICOPOLIS, the Metropolitall citie of that kingdome (but then in possession of the Turks): where he burnt the suburbs thereof, and in that fruitfull countrey therabouts refreshed his people three or foure daies, where he also mustred his armie and tooke a view thereof: at what time Dracula Vauod of VALACHIA, a man of great experience in martiall affaires, being then present, and considering the small number of the kings armie, began to persuaade him to retire, saying, Hee had sufficiently learned by his owne harmes, to deeme a right of the power of the Turkish Sultan; who (as hee said) was wont many times to carie more men with him into the fields in his disport of hauking and hunting, than was there in the kings campe: wherefore he should doe well, not to expose those his small forces vnto so manifest perill, in such vnseasonable time of the yeare, but to referre them vnto a more fit opportunitie, when hee might with greater power encounter his puissant enemy. This his counsaile most men of greatest experience, and not caried away with other priuat respects, thought wholesome: but the Cardinall, authour of this fatall warre, extolling with great words the last yeares victorie obtained against the Turke, with glorious promises of great aid, as well by sea from the Pope, and the Venetians, as by land from the emperour of CONSTANTINOPLE and other Christian princes; augmenting also the great troubles in A-

set forth forward against the Turke.

ASTA, and promising an easie and happie successe vnto these wars in EVROPE; persuaded the king that Dacula his speech proceeded either of ignorance, vpon a superficiall judgement which he made of the kings power there present, without regard of further strength from his friends: or else of the priuat respect of his owne securitie, in regard of a commodious league made a litle before betwixt him and the Turke. So that the poore prince seeing his counsell mightily impugned by the Cardinall, and not so well taken, as it was meant by him; stood in doubt whether to leaue him to his owne fortune, and himselfe to his quiet peace, or casting off the Turkish league, to joyne with the king in this chance of warre: but at length resolved as a martiall minded man, preferring the vncertaine glorie of the field before his owne assured rest, said vnto the king:

Seeing that either your princely fortune, which hath euer hether to fauoured your high attempts; or else the hope of friends helpe, which I pray God faile you not at your need; or the secret disengagement of your destinie, vnable to be auoided, doth draw your maiestie into a different opinion from me: that your resolution which I cannot by reasonable perswasion alter, I will as the suddennesse of time, and my small abilitie will permit, most gladly further.

Dacula aideth Vladislaus with his arme and 4000 horse.

And therewith presented vnto the king, his sonne, with foure thousand horsemen well appointed, to serue him in these wars; wishing vnto him such good successe as he himselfe desired. Afterward when he was about to take his leaue of the king, he preferred vnto him two lustie young men, perfect guides for that countrey, with two horses of incredible swiftnesse, and with teares standing in his eies said vnto him:

*This last farewell

Take this small gift in good part, as a poore refuge to flie vnto, if your fortune happe to faile you, which I tremble to thinke vpon: I pray God they be giuen in vaine and so they shall if my prayers may preuaile. Yet if necessitie shall inforce you to vse them, you shall find them seruicable as your need.

And so taking his last farewell of the king, returned into VALACHIA. Vladislaus marching on from NICOPOLIS toward THRACIA, tooke many townes and forts by the way, which the Turks for feare yekled vnto him: at last he came to SVMIVM and PEZECHIVM, where the Turkish garrisons trusting as much to the strength of the places, as to their owne valour, stood vpon their guard: but the king laid siege to both the said places, and tooke them by assault; where he put to sword fise thousand of the Turks.

The Turks Bassas terrified with these vnexpected troubles, aduertised Amurath thereof, requesting him to leaue his obscure life, and to leaue the greatest power he could in ASTA, for the defence of the Turkish kingdome in EVROPE, which otherwise was in short time like to be lost: blaming also his discretion, for committing the gouernment of so great a kingdome, to so young a prince as was Mahomet his sonne, vnto whom many of the great captaines did halfe scorne to yeeld their due obedience. Amurath herewith awaked, as it had been out of a dead sleepe, left his cloister, and with great speed gathered a strong armie in ASTA, & came to the straits of HILBONTVS; where he found the passage stopped by the Venetian and Popes gallies, and was therefore at his wits end. But marching along the sea side vnto the straits of BOSPHORVS, he there found means to conuay ouer his whole armie: vsing therein (as some write) the helpe of the Genoway marchant ships, paying vnto the Genowayes for the passage of euery Turke a duckat, which amounted to the summe of 100 thousand duckets: or as some others affirm, corrupting with great bribes them that were left for the defence of this passage. And being now got ouer, joynted his Asian armie with such other forces as his Bassas had in readinesse in EVROPE: and so marching on seuen daies, encamped within four miles of VARNA, a citie pleasantly standing vpon the Euxine sea side in BVLGARIA, where the Christian armie lay: for Vladislaus hearing of Amurath his comming with so great an armie, had retired thither, hauing but a litle before taken the same citie of VARNA from the Turks, with CALACRIUM, GALATA, MACROPOLIS, and others vpon the sea coast.

Vpon the first report that Amurath was with such a mightie armie come ouer the strait of BOSPHORVS, Vladislaus who before was in good hope that he could not possibly haue found any passage, entred into counsaile with the commaunders of his armie, what course was now best to take: where many which before had been most forward in that action (presuming that Amurath could by no means haue transported his armie) were now so discouraged with the fame of his comming, that they aduised the king in time to retire home, and not to oppose so small an armie against such a world of people as was reported to follow the Turke. But other captaines of greater courage, and especially Huniades, said, It was not for the kings honour, first to inuade his enemies dominions, and presently to turne his backe vpon the first report of their comming; wishing him rather to remember the good fortune of his former wars, and that he was to fight against the same enemies whom he had victoriously ouerthrowne the yeare before: as for the multitude of his enemies, he had learned by experience (as he sayd) not to bee moued therewith, for that it was the manner of the Turkish kings, more to terrifie their enemies with the shew of a huge armie, than with the valour of their souldiours, which were nothing to bee accounted of, but as effeminate, in comparison of the Hungarians. Whereupon the king resolved to trie the fortune of the field.

Vladislaus vnderstanding by his espials, that Amurath the night before encamped within foure miles, was now putting his armie in order of battell; committed the ordering of all his forces vnto the valiant captain Huniades: who with great care and industrie disposed the same, guarding the one side of the battaile with a fenne or marsh, and the other side with cariages, and the rearward of his armie with a steepe hill. Therein politiquely providing, that the Christian armie, being farre lesse than the Turks in number, could not bee compassed about with the multitude of their enemies, neither any way charged but afront. The Turks armie approaching, began to skirmish with the Christians, which manner of fight was long time with great courage maintained, and that with diuers fortune, sometime one partie preuailling, and sometime the other; but with such slaughter on both sides, that the ground was couered and stained with the dead bodies and blood of the slaine. At length the battaile beeing more closely joynd, the victorie began to incline to the Christians, for Huniades had most valiantly with his Transiluanian and Valachian horsemen, put to flight both the wings of the Turkish armie, and made great slaughter wherefoeuer he came. Insomuch, that Amurath dismayed with the flight of his souldiours, was about to haue fled himselfe out of the maine battaile, had hee not been staied by a common souldiour, who laying hands vpon the reins of his bridle staied him by force, and sharply reprooued him of cowardise. The captaines, and prelates about the king (whom it had better seemed to haue been at deuout prayers in their oratories, than in armes at that bloodie battaile) encouraged by the prospect of successe of Huniades, and desirous to be partakers of that victorie, foolishly left their safe stations, where they were appointed by him to stand fast, and disorderedly pursued the chase, leauing that side of the battell where they stood, open vnto the Turks: But they were not gone farre, before they were hardly encountred by a great part of the Turks armie, for such purpose placed in a vally fast by. In which fight Lesco one of the most valiant captains of the Hungarians was slaine; and the Bishop of VRADIVM a better church man than souldiour; and the first man that disordered the battaile, seeking to saue himselfe by flight through the fenne, was there filthily strangled in the deepe mud, after he had with his horse therein struggled a great while. The Bishop of AGRA, a man of greatest authoritie with the king, was at the same time also lost, with many other church men more. The Cardinall, with some other of the expert captaines retiring toward their former standings, were hardly assailed by the Turks, who by the comming in of the king and Huniades, were with great slaughter forced to retire, and euen ready to flie. Amurath seeing the great slaughter of his men, and all brought into extreame danger, beholding the picture of the Crucifix in the displayed ensignes of the voluntarie Christians, pluckt the writing out of his bosome, wherein the late league was comprised, and holding it vpin his hand with his eies cast vp to heaven, said:

Behold thou crucified Christ, this is the league thy Christians in thy name made with mee: which they haue without cause violated. Now if thou bee a God, as they say thou art; and as we dreamt, reuenge the wrong now done vnto thy name, and mee, and shew thy power vpon thy perjurious people: who in their deeds denie thee their God.

Amurath prayeth vnto Christ.

The king with Huniades furiously pursued the chased Turks, with bloodie execution in a great space: when as the king in his heart hardly persuaded by Huniades to returne againe vnto his campe, at his comming thither found the Cardinall Julian, with Franke, one of his chiefe captaines, and others, ouercharged with the Turkes, which had againe made head against that part of the Christian armie: and there yet fought couragiously, by reason of their multitude, being also backt by the Ianizaries, which all this while had stood fast with their old king; as his last and most assured refuge, but were now come in. There began a most cruell and fierce fight: in the successe whereof, the Turks well saw the whole estate of their kingdome in EVROPE to consist,

A cruell fight.

many were there slaine on both sides: the Turks feeling their losse lesse than indeed it was, by reason of their multitude; and the Christians, by reason of their courage. A great while the victorie stood doubtfull, insomuch, that at length the Turks began to shrinke backe, in that part of the battaile where the king and Huniades fought. But in the left side, they prevailed so vpon the Christians, that they were euen readie to haue fled. Which when Huniades (hauing a vigilant eie vnto euerie part of the armie) perceiued, hee with speed made thether, and there againe with his presence restored the battaile almost before lost. Which done, hee returned againe towards the king, who in the mean time had most valiantly repulsed a great number of the Turks, and was now come vnto the Ianizaries, Amurath his last hope. There was to be scene a thousand manners of death, whilst both the armies fought more like wild beasts in their rage and furie, than warie and politique souldiours. In this confused medly, the yong king Vladislaus with greater courage than care of himselfe, brake into the battaile of the Ianizaries: at which time, Amurath himselfe was by a valiant Frenchman a knight of the Roads, first wounded with a pike, and after assailed with his sword, and had there ended his daies, but that hee was speedily rescued by his guard, by whom this worthie knight after great prooffe of his valour was there slaine in the midst of his enemies. Vladislaus being got in also amongst them, valiantly performed all the partes of a worthie souldiour, vntill such time as his horse being slaine vnder him, hee was forthwith oppressed by the multitude of his enemies and slaine: his head being strucke off by Ferizes, one of the old Ianizaries, was by him presented vnto Amurath; who commaunded it presently to be put vpon the point of a lance, and proclamation to be made, that it was the head of the Christian king: which was afterwards so caried through the principall cities of MACEDONIA, and GRECE, as a trophy of the Turks victorie. Huniades after hee had in vaine giuen diuers braue attempts, to haue rescued the kings bodie, retired with a few Valachian horsemen, and seeing no hope of better hap (for all the Christians being discouraged with the death of the king, had now taken themselves to flight) gaue place to necessitie and reseruing himselfe to his future fortune, fled ouer the mountaines into the thicke woods, from whence with much difficultie he got ouer DANUBIUS into VALACHIA, and was there (as some write) by Dracula prince of that countrey taken prisoner: In reuenge whereof, after hee was enlarged by the Hungarians, hee so aided Danus against Dracula, that in fine, Dracula and his sonne were both slaine, and Danus placed in his roome. Iulian the Cardinall flying out of the battaile, was found by that worthie man Gregorie Sansse, lying in the desert forrest by the way, side mortally wounded, and halfe stripped: by whom hee was in few wordes sharply reprooued, as the wicked authour of that perfidious warre: and there leit giuing vp the ghost. Many of the Christians which fled out of that battell fell into the enemies hands, and so were slaine: but greater was the number of them, which were drowned in the fennes, or that by hunger and cold perished in the woods, or else after long and miserable trauaile, finding no passage ouer DANUBIUS fell at length into the Turkish slaueerie. This great and mortall battaile as it was with diuers fortune fought, so was also the present report thereof most vncertaine: for the Turks that were at the first put to flight, reported in the townes thereby as they fled, that the battell was lost: and they which had all the daie endured the fight, not altogether assured of the victorie, and not knowing whether the Hungarians had retired themselves, whilst they suspected some deceit in the kinges campe, by reason of the great silence therein, staid two daies before they durst aduenture to take the spoile thereof. The number of them that were slaine in this battaile, as well on the one side as the other, was great; as the mounts, and little hils, raised of the bones and bodies of them that were there buried; doe yet at this daie declare. Howbeit the certaine number was not knowne, some reporting more, some fewer. Yet in this most agree, that of the Christian armie being not great, scarce the third part escaped: and that the Turks bought this victorie, with a farre greater losse, although it was of them lesse felt, by reason of their multitude, made lesse by that slaughter; as they that report least thereof affirme, by thirtie thousand. Which may well seeme rather to be so, for that Amurath after this victorie, neither farther prosecuted the same, nor shewed any tokens of joy at all, but became verie melancholie and sad, and being of them about him, demanded why after so great a victorie, he was no merrier: answered, That he wished not at so great a price, to gain many such victories. Yet in memorie thereof hee erected a great pillar, in the same place where the king was slaine, with an inscription of all that was then done: which as they say is yet there to be scene at this day. This bloodie battaile, was fought neere vnto VARNA (in ancient time called DIO-

NISIOPOLIS (a place fatal vnto many great warriors, and therefore of them euen yet abhorred) the tenth day of Nouember, in the yeare of our Lord Christ 1444.

Some maliciously impute the losse of the battaile of VARNA, and the death of the king, to Huniades, who (as they said) fled out of this battaile with ten thousand horsemen: but this report agreeth not with the noble disposition of that courageous and valiant capitaine, but seemeth rather to haue been deuised, to excuse the foule dealing of the cleargie: who as most histories beare witnesse, were the cheefe authors both of the warre, and of the lamentable calamitie ensuing thereof.

From the battaile of VARNA Amurath returned to HADRIANOPLE, hauing lost the greatest part of his best souldiours, and there with great solemnitie buried the bodie of Caraxia, vice-roy of EVROPE, slaine in that battaile: and then calling together all his nobilitie, againe resigned vp his kingdome vnto his sonne Mahomet, retiring himselfe vnto MAGNÉSIA, where he liued a solitarie and priuat life, hauing before vowed so to do, in the great feare he was in, in the late battaile against Vladislaus: but after hee had a short time performed these his vowes in that obscure and melancholie life, he wearie thereof, as some suppose, as not a little reuiued with the late victorie, or els solicited by Caly Bassa and other great counsellours, returned againe to HADRIANOPLE, resuming vnto himselfe the gouernment of the kingdome, to the great discontentment of his ambitious sonne Mahomet.

Scanderbeg yet sticking in the borders of SERVIA, and hearing what had happened vnto King Vladislaus with the Hungarians, was therewith exceedingly grieved: and hauing now lost the hope whereupon he had vnderaken that so great an expedition, resolved to returne home againe into EPÍRVS. Neuerthelesse, to be in some part reuenged of the wicked Despot, he with his armie forcibly brake into his country, and there did exceeding great harme. In his returning homewards, great numbers of Hungarians and Polonians, lately escaped from the slaughter at VARNA, repaired vnto him, whom he (according to the extremitie of their fortune) courteously received: and furnishing them with such things as they wanted, provided them shipping to RAGVSA, from whence they might in safetie returne into their owne countries. Thus by the disloyaltie and trecherie of the faithlesse Despot of SERVIA, was Scanderbeg stayed from being present at the bloodie battaile of VARNA, to the vnspeakable losse of the Christian commonweale: for it could not be, but that so many thousands of most resolute and expert souldiours, vnder the leading of so worthie a cheefetaine, must needs haue done much for the gaining of the victorie. And what more glorious sight could a man haue wished for, than to haue scene so puissant an armie in the field against the sworn enemy of Christendome, directed by two such valiant and renowned cheefetaines, as neuer either before or since their time was scene the like in one battell against the enemies of Christ and the Christian religion? They were both men of inuincible courage, of exceeding strength, and agilite of bodie, wise, prudent, and subtile; both of long time exercised in the Turkes warres, the greatest terrour of that nation, and most worthie champions of the Christian religion, being therein both very zealous. Of the two, Huniades was at that time accounted the better commander, and the more polliticke, as a man of greater experience in martiall affaires, by reason of his greater yeares: which was well counteruailed by Scanderbeg his perpetual good fortune, still as it were attending vpon him, & by his experience afterwards gotten, as in the course of his historie well appeareth.

Amurath aduertised of these proceedings of Scanderbeg, as also of the great harmes by him done in MACEDONIA, and that the frontiers of his dominions bordering vpon EPÍRVS, were by his furie vterly waisted and spoiled, and his people there for most part slaine, and that the rest had for feare forsaken their dwellings and left the countrey desolate and vnepeopled; was therewith exceedingly moued. Yet for so much as he still stood in dread of the Hungarians, and was now himselfe clogged with yeares, and therefore more desirous of rest; considering also the young yeares of his eldest sonne Mahomet, as yet vnfit for the gouernment of so great and troublesome a kingdome, with the perpetuall good fortune of Scanderbeg, and mallice of Huniades: he thought it not best to conuert all his forces vpon him, but to proue if he could cunningly draw him into some dishonourable peace for a time, that so he might afterwards at leisure bee the better reuenged of him. For which cause he writ vnto him letters, mixt with grievous threats and some fained courtesies, as followeth:

Amurath Ottoman, king of the Turkes, and emperour of the East, to the most ingratefull Scanderbeg, witheth neither health nor welfare.

The fullen and craftie letters of Amurath to Scanderbeg.

I neuer wanted honourable preferments to bestow upon thee all the while thou diddest live in my court, of all others most unkind Scanderbeg; but now I want words wherewith to speake unto thee, thou hast so highly offended my mind, and touched mine honour, that I know not in discretion what words to use unto thee, but of late one of my domestical servants. For neither will hard speech multiply the naturall fierceness of thy proud disposition, neither art thou worthie of better, which hast farre exceeded all hostilitie. And because thou wouldest omit no occasion to prouoke me, hast of late proceeded to that point of follie, that thou hast had thine owne affaires, and the welfare of thine owne subjects, in small regard, by confederating thy selfe in armes with the Hungarians, against me. It greenth mee to rehearse other thy unkindnesse, and as it were to touch those sores, if my mind would euer suffer me to forget the same, or that thy so manifold & horrible treasons, and strange examples of a most unthankfull mind, were to be couered with silence. Yet I thought good to aduertise thee (although perhaps too late) least that thy wastaid heat doe vntimely ouerthrow thee, with thy unluckie kingdom: and then thou wouldest make humble confession of thy long transgression, when thou hast lost thy selfe, and left no hope of refuge in thy desperat estate. We haue hitherto sufficiently suffered thy manifold iniuries: thou hast sufficiently prouoked the maiestie of the Othoman empire, with wrong and contumelious despitte, and I with patience haue borne all these thy contempts. Thinkest thou that my armie by thee betrayed unto the Hungarians, shall be vreuenged? Thinkest thou that so many cities and townes in EPIRVS, by thee rent from the bodie of my empire, with my garrisons there slaine, shall be forgotten? Or thinkest thou with thy late committed outrages to escape my reuenging hands? Remember the destruction of mine armie vnder Alis Bassa; the wasting and burning of my dominions; and lately the Hungarian warres, by thee so far as in thee was countenanced, with the territories of George, the Despot of SERBIA, my father in law, by thee spoiled. At length amend thou gracelesse man, and expect not farther, whether my indignation will breake out. Let not these trifling allurements of thy good fortune, so puffed up thy foolish desires, and sharpen thy conceits: that thy miserable fortune afterwards may moue euen thy greatest enemy, or my selfe, to compassion. I would thou shouldst at length remember my courtesies (if any sparke of humanity remaine in thy sauage nature) and make me not longer forie, that I haue so euill bestowed the same. And although it is not the part of an honourable mind, to rehearse those things which we haue in bountie bestowed upon any man: yet is it the token of a most unthankfull nature, so easily to forget all kindnesse past, as to need to be put in remembrance thereof. Wherefore Scanderbeg, I cannot but bewaile thy hap, and lament thine estate: For, to let passe the health of thy soule (which thou a very reprobate, esteamest as nothing) not to speake of the lawes of Mahomet, by thee despised, and the holy prophet by thee contemned, for the zeale thou hast vnto the Christian superstition: what hast thou (which now holdest thy poore and base kingdom in such price) euer wanted in my hands of all those things which most delight the desires of men? Diddest thou euer want armour, horses, a great traine of followers and servants, money, or other superfluities, the allurements of all age? Or diddest thou want matter to exercise thy valour, for encrease of thine honour? Wast thou euer denied preferments, dignities, and honours of all sorts fit for thine age, both at home and abroad? Was any man in my court decreed unto me, than thy selfe? What growing wit, not of strangers onely, but of them that were nearest unto my selfe, was better welcome unto me than thine? With what carefull instruction did I cause thee to be brought up? When thou wast deliuered unto me almost a child, I daily cherished and increased thy hoped towardnesse, with learning and nurture: I haue at all times honoured thee with rich rewards, magnificall praises, and honours of the field (which of all worldly things is most glorious) so that in all feats of armes no souldier was to me better knowne, or captaine of me more honoured. For all these great benefits, Scanderbeg, thou now shewest thy selfe such an one, that I may be thought not to haue brought up such a man as I hoped for, but a very serpent in mine owne bosome. But the loue of thy country did moue thee: which if thou hadst asked of me, would I haue denied thee the same unto thee? Which (if thou dost well remember) I so oftentimes voluntarily profered unto thee? But thou haddest rather to gaine the same by treacherie, than to receiue it at my hands of courtesie. So shone be it therefore on God his name, and that with my very good will. And verely, according to my accustomed clemencie towards all them whom I haue once well knowne, and become familiarly acquainted with, with, I now pardon thee all thou hast offended me; not for any thy present deserts, which are none, but because in this publique enmitie, it pleaseth mee to remember my former kindnesse in priuat towards thee, and thy faithfulness sometimes in my affaires; especially for that the time was much longer wherein thou seruedst me, than the time wherein thou hast offended me. CROIA and thy fathers kingdom (although thou hast gained the same by foule treacherie) I giue unto thee, upon condition thou willingly restore unto me the other townes of EPIRVS, which by no right belong unto thee, but are mine by law of armes, by my selfe honourably wonne. Whatsoeuer thou hast taken from my father in law, the prince of SERBIA, thou shalt forthwith restore, and make him an honourable recompence for the other harmes thou hast done unto him; and for euer hereafter, thou shalt as well forbear to offer violence to any our friends, as to aid any our enemies. So shalt thou for euer avoid the displeasure of the Turks, and stand in my good grace and fauour, as thou hast done before: except thou haddest rather (being taught by thine owne harmes) then in vaine crie for mercie, when thy furious outrage shall haue me in person, an implacable reuenger. Thou knowest thy forces, thou knowest the strength of mine armie; thou hast before thine eyes the fresh example of the Hungarian fortune, so that thou needest no further admonitions. Yet I would thou shouldst write at large what thou intendest to do. Thou maiest also conferre with Ayradin our seruant, our trustie and faithfull messenger, of whom thou shalt vnderstand more than are in these letters comprised. Farewell if thou be wise. From HADRIANOPLE.

To these letters Scanderbeg gaue small credit, and lesse to the messenger, but least of all to the old Fox himselfe, whom he well knew to haue written nothing simply of good meaning, but onely to gaine a cessation from warres, vntill he might at better leasure set vpon him with all his forces: wherefore calling Ayradin the messenger vnto him, whom he rather held for a craftie spie, than an honourable ambassador, after hee had many times both publickly and priuately discoursed with him, so farre forth as was possible to sound the depth of his comming, and had also further entertained him with all honourable courtesies; hee shewed him all his campe, with the strength thereof, which hee did, because he would not haue the craftie messenger to thinke, that he was any thing afraid of his maiesties greatnesse. And at last greatly complaining of Amurath his cruell and perfidious dealing against his father, his brethren, and himselfe, he sent him away with such answer in writing as followeth.

The souldiour of Christ Iesu, George Castriot surnamed Scanderbeg, prince of EPIRVS, to Amurath Ottoman king of the Turkes sendeth greeting.

Thou hast in times past (as thou writest) exceeded mee in many kinds of courtesies, and at this present I will exceed thee in modest and temperat speech: For I thinke there is no greater token of a base mind, than to be able to forbear to giue railing and opprobrious words, euen unto our most mortal enemies. Wherefore we haue with patience received and scene, both thy letters and messenger: and to confesse a truth, they haue ministered vnto me greater occasion of smile, than choller: whilest at the first thou shamest not to accuse me of much ingratitude, & treason: and presently following a milder passion, seemest carefull of my soules health, being ignorant of thine own miserable estate, as a studious defender of a most damnable error. And at last, keeping neither law of armes, nor orderly course answering to our affaires, dost most insolently and vnauidedly, as a valiant conqueror to his vanquished enemy, propound many conditions of peace, of such qualitie and condition, that mine cares come to be the same. Truly Amurath, although thy immoderat railing might moue a man of greatest patience to intemperat speech: yet I impute the same partly to thy great age, and partly to the forwardnesse of thy nature; and the rest, to thy conceined griefe, which I know thou canst hardly moderat: and the more, for that I haue not set downe my selfe to contend with thee in foule and vnseemly languages, but with armes and the just furie of warre. Yet I pray thee, wherfore dost thou so exclaime vpon me before God and man: as though thou hadst first suffered wrong and iniurie from me, and that thou hadst not in truth first don the same. Dost thou call my necessary departing, a perfidious treacherie? My native country by my policie and valour recovered, dost thou object to me as a villanie? Object the same still and spare not; charge mee with such crimes for euer, I care not. The long catalogue of thy kindnesse towards me, which thou reheardest, I could willingly remember, if it drew not with it the woofull remembrance of my greater miseries. in which if they were to be compared together, the greatnesse of thy good desert would be overwhelmed with the multitude of thy greater tyrannies; which I had rather thou shouldst count with thy selfe, than blush whilest I repeat them. Every man that knoweth them, may meruell how I had power to endure them, or that thou wast not wearie at last of thy crueltie and secret hatred. Thou tookest away my fathers kingdome by force; thou diddest murder my brethren; and my selfe thou diddest most wickedly vow to death, when I little feared any such crueltie. And doth it now seeme strange to thee, o Amurath, that an invincible mind, desirous of libertie, should seeke to break out of the bonds of so great slavery? How long at length diddest thou thinke I would endure thy proud and insolent bondage? which for all that I many yeares endured, and refused not thy commaund. I exposed my selfe to publicke and priuat dangers, both voluntarily and by thy assignement: speeches were given out daily by thy selfe, and the admonition of my friends concerning thy deepe trecherie, was rise in mine eares: yet for all that, of long time I simply beleueed both thy words and deeds to haue bene deuoid of all fraud, untill thy cankered mallice began too too apparently to shew it selfe, then began I also to glose with thee, wholly metamorphosed into thine owne conceits, untill I found occasion to recover my libertie. Wherefore there is no cause thou shouldst now greene, if thou be well beaten with thine own rod. But these are but trifles, Amurath, in comparison of those things which I haue laied up in hope and resolution of mind. Therefore hereafter surcease thine angrie threats, and tell not vs of the Hungarian fortune. Every man hath his owne resolution, and euery man a particular gouernour of his actions: and so will we with patience endure such fortune as it shall please God to appoint vs. In the meane time, for direction of our affaires, we will not request counsell of our enemies, nor peace of thee, but victory by the helpe of God. Farewell from our campe.

The resolute answer of Scanderbeg to Amurath his letters.

Amurath sixt king of the Turks.

When Amurath had read these letters, and further conferred with Arradin, hee was filled with wrath and indignation, wondering at the great resolution of so small a prince, presently casting in his mind (as was thought) the difficultie of that warre. Yet because he would giue no token of feare, oftentimes stroking his white beard, as his manner was when he was thoroughly angrie, with a dissembled cheerefulnesse of countenance said:

Thou desirest (wicked man) thou desirest the title of some honourable death: we will giue it thee (beleue vs) we will giue it thee. Wee our selues will bee present at the buriall of our foster child, and in person (though vnbidden) honour the funerall pompe of the great king of Epirvs; that thou shalt neuer complaine among the damned ghosts, that thou diddest die a base or obscure kind of death.

And for because at that time, by reason of many great occurrents, hee could not conuert his whole power into Epirvs, he sent Ferises, one of his best captaines, with nine thousand choice horsemen, to keepe Scanderbeg in doing, and to spoile his countrey so much as he could. Which was with such speed done, that it was thought Ferises would haue bene in the heart of Epirvs, before Scanderbeg could haue had knowledge of his coming. But for all his hast, he could not so preuent the flying fame, but that Scanderbeg hearing thereof, and hauing his men alwayes in readinesse, placed fiftene hundred good footmen in ambush vpon the rough mountaines, leading into the valley of MORA, whereby the Turks must needs passe into Epirvs; placing also two thousand horsemen, as he thought most fit & conuenient for his purpose. Ferises descending from the high mountaines full of woods and bushes, by the broken and stonie waies leading into the valley, was in that troublesome and intricate passage fiercely set vpon by Scanderbegs readie footmen, suddainely arising out of ambush, where the Turks hauing no vie of their horses, but rather by them encombered, were slaine as Deere enclosed in a toyle. In this conflict seven hundred and sixtie Turks were taken prisoners, and a greater number slaine, and Ferises himselfe, with the rest, enforced to flie, crying still out as hee fled, Better some saved, than all lost. Scanderbeg hauing thus ouerthrowne Ferises, pursued him into MACEDONIA, and with the spoile there taken, rewarded his souldiours, as he had also many times before done.

Amurath greued with the ouerthrow of Ferises, presently sent Mustapha a politicke and hardie captaine, with a new supplie of six thousand souldiours to take the charge from Ferises: commaunding him in no case, nor vpon any occasion, to enter farre into Epirvs: but onely to burne and spoile the frontiers thereof, saying, That he would account it for good seruice, if he might but vnderstand, that the trees and fruits of that countrey, had felt the force of his anger.

Mustapha

Amurath sixt king of the Turks.

Mustapha hauing receiued his charge, when he began to draw neere the borders of Epirvs, continually sent out scouts before his armie; to see if the passages were cleere, and so warily entered the vallie of MORA, a while Ferises not long before was ouerthrowne. In this fruitfull vallie, being the frontiers of Scanderbegs dominion, Mustapha entrenched his armie; vpon the rising of a hill, and placed espials vpon the tops of the high mountaines round about, by them to discover the coming of the enemy, and to haue notice thereof by signes into the campe: then reseruing foure thousand horsemen with himselfe, to keepe his campe, hee sent forth the rest of his armie, about nine thousand horsemen, to forrage and spoile the countrey (giuing charge before, that euery man vpon paine of death should presently retire to the campe, vpon signe giuen from thence, as to a place of safetie and refuge. The Turkish armie ranging, ouer that rich and pleasant vallie, burnt the villages, cut downe trees, spoiled the whiteyards, and made hauocke of all things that fire and sword could destroy, in that point executing Amuraths commaund to the full. At length Scanderbeg drawing neere to this vallie, with foure thousand horsemen and a thousand foot, was aduertised of all the enemies doings, by an Epirote souldiour, who greecuously wounded had hardly escaped from the Turks: of him he vnderstood, what number of Turkes were burning and destroying the countrey; of the campe also kept by Mustapha, and how espials were placed vpon the mountaines. Scanderbeg hauing well considered Mustaphas warlike proceedings, and seeing no pollicie to bee vsed against so carefull an enemy, resolved to vanquish him by plaine force, by assaulding him suddainely in his trenches, before his dispersed souldiours could repaire to the campe: and hauing to this purpose, with effectfull persuasions encouraged the minds of his valiant souldiours, readie of themselves to follow him through all dangers; while he had set all things in order for assaulding the enemies campe, speedily entered the vallie, and was presently discovered by the enemies espials, from the tops of the high hills, and a signe giuen to the campe, from whence also the appointed signe was giuen for the dispersed souldiours to retire: but most of them being straid from the campe, and busied in taking the spoile of the country, heard not or saw not the sign giuen: Those which were within the hearing thereof retired to the campe, and at their heeles followed Scanderbegs souldiours, terrifying them with calling vpon the name of Scanderbeg. Many of the Turks were by the Christians slaine in the entrance of the campe, with their booties in their hands, and presently the Turks trenches were now by Scanderbegs souldiours courageously assaulted, and the Turks beaten from the top of them. They hauing wonne the trenches, prevailed still vpon the Turks, filling all their camp with feare and slaughter. There was no vie of shot in that medlie, by reason of the straightnesse of the place, for they were now come to pell mell. Mustapha seeing his souldiours put to the worst, and that the campe was not long to be defended, tooke horse and fled by the port which was furthest from the enemy. The rest of the souldiours fled also, making such poore shift for themselves as they could. In this battaile 5000 Turkes were slaine, and but 300 taken; for the Christians enraged with the spoile of the country, reuenged themselves with the slaughter of the Turks. Scanderbeg lost in this conflict but 20 horsemen, and 50 footmen. The rest of the Turkes armie dispersed in the countrey, heauing the tumult in the campe, misdoubting the fortune of their fellowes, fled also: yet many of them were in that fight pursued and slaine.

After this ouerthrow, Mustapha returning to Amurath, the better to excuse the misfortune of himselfe, and the other captaines before sent, greatly commended the invincible courage of Scanderbeg, and his wonderfull skill in feats of armes; persuading Amurath either to send a greater power against him, or else none at all, saying, That to send such small armies, was but to minister matter to the increase of his glorie, and the infamie of the Turks; and to vse pollicie against him the master of pollicie, was but meere follie. It greued Amurath to heare the praises of his enemy, although hee knew the same to be true, by the continuall fortune he had alwaies against his great captaines, Alis-bassa, Ferises, and Mustapha: wherefore he determined for a time not to prouoke him further, but to suffer him to liue in peace: yet commaunded Mustapha to renew his armie for defence of the borders of his kingdome towards Epirvs, against the inuasion of Scanderbeg; but straightly commaunding him in no case to inuade any part of Epirvs, neither vpon any occasion offered, or conceiued hope of victorie, to ioine battaile with Scanderbeg, for feare of such euill successe as before.

At this time also the Grecians of PELOPONESVS now called MORIA, hauing before fortified the strait of CORINTH from sea to sea, with a perpetuall wall, which they called HEXA-

Amurath sixt king of the Turks.

MYLVN, and deep trenches about six miles in length, had also built five strong castles in the same wall, of purpose to take away all passage by land into that rich country; and began now not only to denie the yearly tribute they were wont to pay vnto the Turkish king, but also to invade such princes of ACHAEA their neighbours, as were content to remaine still the Turks tributaries; amongst whom Nereus prince of ATHENS, and Turan Gouvernour of THESSALIA, for Amurath, ceased not by continuall complaints to incense him against them of PELOPONNESVS. Who hauing his armie in readinesse, although it was now winter, and he himselfe verie aged, set forward from HADRIANOPLE, and marching through THESSALIA, came into ACHAEA, where most of the Grecians were before fled for feare into PELOPONNESVS. So passing on with his armie, he came to the strait commonly called ISTHVS, where the famous cite of CORINTH sometime stood; and there encamped his armie neere vnto the strong wall, and castles, lately before built, hoping that the Grecians of PELOPONNESVS, terrified with the multitude of his armie, would without resistance submit themselves: but when he perceived them to stand vpon their guard, and to trust to their strength, he laid battie to the wall four daies, and hauing made it faultable, brake through the same with his armie. The Grecians hauing lost the wall (their cheefe strength) fled, some to one strong hold, and some to another, as their fortune led them; the Turks at their pleasure spoiling and destroying that rich & pleasant country, sometime the nurse of worthie wies, and famous captaines: where they found wonderfull riches, and tooke prisoners without number; insomuch that they were sold among the Turks at most vile price. There Amurath for his pleasure, cruelly sacrificed six hundred Christian captiues, to the hellish ghost of his dead father Mahomet: & afterwards imposing a yearly tribute vpon the Peloponnesians, and others Grecian princes now yeelding againe vnto him, as an induction to their further slauey vnder the Turkish rirannie, he returned, taking in his way the two famous cities of PATRAS and SYCONE. Thus the rich country of PELOPONNESVS, and all the rest of GRECIA, sometime fountaine of all learning and ciuilitie, became tributarie to the barbarous and cruell Turkes, in the yeare of our Lord 1445.

Peloponnesus made tributarie vnto the Turke.

Old Amurath now clogged with yeares, and wearied with long wars, was content to take his rest at HADRIANOPLE: during which time, Batatz the sonne of Mahomet was borne in the yeare 1446, who afterwards of long time with great glorie gouerned the Turkish empire at CONSTANTINOPLE, as in his place shall appeare.

The Hungarians after the calamitie of VARNA, wherein they had together with Ladislaus their king, lost most part of their nobilitie also; in a generall assembly of their states, made choice of Ladislaus, the posthumous sonne of Albertus (and then in keeping of Fredericke the emperor) for their king. But for as much as he being then but a child of five yeares old, and chosen king, more for the remembrance of the emperor Sigismund his grandfather, and Albertus his father, and for the good hope conceiued of him, than for any other thing presently to bee expected from him; it was thought more than necessarie, to make choice of some notable and worthy man, vnto whom they might (during the time of the kings minoritie) commit the gouernment and protection of that so great and turbulent a kingdome. Many there were in that honorable assemblie well thought of, both of themselves and others: but such was the glorie and valour of Huniades, and so great the remembrance of his worthie deserts both of the kingdome of HUNGARIE, and of the Christian commonweale in generall, as without his seeking, procured vnto him the generall fauour and suffrages of all; yea so farre, that euen they which most enuid at his honour, as ouershadowing their own, were glad to hold their peace, for that without him it was commonly thought the state of that shaken kingdome could not long stand: So by the generall consent of all the states there assembled, hee was with the great applause of the people chosen and proclaimed gouernour, as of all others most fit for so great and heauie a charge: wherein he quietly spent some few yeares in deciding of ciuile controuersies, in composing the quarrels of the nobilitie; not forgetting in the mean time the indifferent administration of iustice to all men, ending many controuersies farre from the place of judgement, and that without all suspension of corruption, vsing therein such expedition and neuer-wearied patience, in hearing euery mans cause, that sitting, going, standing, riding, hee dispatched many great and weightie matters: alwayes shewing himselfe affable and courteous, as well vnto them of the poorer sort, as others of greater calling, that had any suites vnto him. So that it was of him truly said, That no man was than he vnto his friends more friendly, or vnto his enemies more crosse and contrarie.

Huniades in the minoritie of the king, chosen Gouernour of all the kingdome of Hungarie.

Amurath sixt king of the Turks.

In time of peace he was alwayes prouiding for warre, heaping vp great treasure; and such other things, as without which, the warres could not be maintained. But about all things, he was careful of the good agreement of the nobilitie, taking great paines in reconciling their displeasures conceiued one against another, and that with such dexteritie, as that he was both of them and others generally both beloued and feared.

In the meane time, whilst he was thus busied in disposing of the ciuile affaires of the commonweale and the administration of iustice, hee was aduertised by his espials, how that the old Sultan Amurath was raising great forces both in ASIA and EVROPE, and that as the common fame went, for the inuasion of HUNGARIE. For the withstanding whereof, Huniades not vnprovided, as neuer vnmindfull of so dangerous an enemy, or of any thing more desirous, than in some sort to be reuenged of the great losse receiued at VARNA, in the fourth yeare of his gouernment and in the yeare of our Lord 1448 accompanied with most part of the nobilitie of HUNGARIE, and the Vauod of VALACHIA his friend and confederate, set forward against the Turke, with an armie of two and twentie thousand choise souldiours. So hauing passed the riuer TIBISCVS, or TIBISE, and traauailing through VALACHIA, a little beneath where the riuer MORAVA running through SERBIA, falleth into DANYBVS, he with most part of his armie passed that great riuer; the rest in the meane time taking passage ouer at a towne called SERBIN. Huniades with his armie being thus got ouer into SERBIA, by his embassadours requested the Despot, as he had oftentimes before, to put himselfe into that most Christian warre; and remembering the great benefits he had receiued from the Hungarians, not to shew himselfe therfore vngratefull; than which, nothing could be more dishonourable: and to encourage him the more, certified him both of his owne strength, and of the aid brought vnto him by the Vauod; and that for the good successe of the warre, there wanted nothing but his presence and direction, with such troupes of light horsemen as he knew he had euer in a readinesse. VVhere-with he requested him with all speed to follow him. But he being a man of no religion, and better affected vnto the Turke than to Huniades, the more cleanly to withdraw himselfe from this warre, pretended many excuses: first, the league he had with Amurath his sonne in lawe, which he said he might not breake, for feare that if things chanced not well, he might so fall againe headlong into his old miserie; then, the vnseasonableness of the time, Autumne being now past, which difficulties in those cold countries they had to their cost too much felt in the late warre. These with many other such like he alledged, in excuse that he came not: but the truth was, the malice of the man, grieved to see Huniades preferred before him in the gouernment of the kingdome, and disclaining to serue vnder his ensignes, being himselfe Despot, and king of SERBIA, descended of the royall race, the cause of his backwardnesse: so that blinded with enuie, he could not there rightly iudge of himselfe, or what was fit for him in this case to haue done. But Huniades angrie with his vnkind answere, threatned him with his owne hands to be reuenged vpon him, and to giue away his kingdome to one more worthy thereof than he, if he should with victorie returne. So passing through SERBIA, as through the enemies countrey, he came into BVLGARIA. After whose departure, the false Despot by speedy messengers aduertised Amurath both of the coming of the Hungarians, and of their strength; yea he certified him of euerie daies, march, and how that Huniades was but with a small companie of his owne, and some weakie supplies of the Vauods come ouer DANYBVS: whom if he should not presently meet, but suffer him to come on further, and so with his armie to get betwixt him and home, hee might so shut him in, as that he should hardly be able to scape his hands. All which he did, partly for enuie, partly to gratifie the Turke, and the better to keepe friendship with him. So Amurath not contemning the Despots counsell, suffered Huniades without resistance to enter a great way into his countrey, and comming two or three daies march behind him, so stopped the passage as that he could not possibly retire, but that he must needs fight. And now they were both come vnto a great plaine in BVLGARIA, which the Hungarians call RIGOMBZV, and the Rascians the plaine of COSSOVA, through the middelt whereof the riuer SCHICHNIZA rising out of the mountaines of ILLIRIA running, at length falleth into MORAVA, and so into DANYBVS: this plaine is about 20 miles in length, and in bredth five, enuironed on each side with pleasant mountaines, in manner of a theatre, the riuer and low vallies at the foot of the mountaines being garnished with many countrey villages and townes. Into this fatall plaine when as the Hungarians first, and after them the Turks, were as into a place of combat descended;

them, omitting nothing that was of a good Generall or worthie souldiour to be done. The valiant he commended, the coward he reprooued, and as a carefull Generall, was himselfe in euery place present. Wherby the battaile became so fierce and terrible, that in euery place a man might haue seen all fowly foiled with blood, and the quarry of the dead. Amurath in like manner still sent in new supplies, nothing discouraged with the great losse of his men, presuming vpon his multitude, as fully resolu'd orderly to fight, and to make vse of all his forces; in hope at length by continuall sending in of fresh supplies, to wearie his enemies, whom he saw hee could not by force ouercome. Wherin he was not deceiued, for one battallion of the Hungarians was often times enforced to wearie foure or fise of the Turks before they could be releued, they came on so fast. That day they dined and supped in the battaile, refreshing themselves with such short rest as they could eat standing, going, or riding. The Turkes armie was that day in euery place put to the worst, & often times with great slaughter enforced by the Hungarians to retire almost vnto their trenches: yet was the battaile still againe renewed, and so fought on both sides, as well appeared they were resolu'd either to ouercome, or there to die. This cruell fight maintained all the day, was by the comming on of the night ended, both the armies retiring into their owne trenches: but with purpose the next daie to renew the battaile, and not to giue ouer or turnd their backs, vntill the victorie were by dint of sword determined. So with little rest, was that night spent, both armies keeping most diligent watch, all carefully expecting the next day, as by battell therein to trie whether they should liue or die. It was yet scarce faire daie, when both the armies in good order readie ranged began againe the battaile: which at the first, was not by the Hungarians fought with such force and courage as before, for there was none of them which had not the day before spent their whole strength; whereas there was yet almost fortie thousand of the Turks, which either had not fought at all, or but lightly skirmished. Yet Huniades exhorted his souldiours, not by faint harted cowardise to breake off the course of the victorie by them this daie before so well begun, but couragiously to prosecute the same; beseeching them not to be now wanting vnto themselves and their country, but to remember how well they had fought the day before, how many thousands of their enemies they had slaine, and not now at last to giue ouer, and so shamefully to frustrate all the paines and dangers by them before endured: for that they (as he said) were to be thought worthie of honour, not which began, but which well ended honourable actions. He wished them to set before their eyes the calamities like to ensue, if they should as cowards be ouercome: first, the diuers kinds of death and torture; then, the slaughter of their wiues and children; the rauishment of their virgins and matrons; and last of all, the vtter destruction of their kingdom, with the horrible confusion of all things, as well facted as prophane: all which were by that one daies labour (as he said) to be auoided. And therefore he besought them for the loue both of God and man, with their wonted valour, that day to set at libertie for euer, themselves, their country, their wiues and children, and what soeuer else they held deere. In like manner also did Amurath encourage his souldiours, with great promises, and threats, perswading them rather to endure any thing, than by that daies ouerthrow to bee driuen out of Europe. He carefully viewed his armie, ordered his battailes, and with many graue reasons perswaded them to play the men. But after that some light skirmishes being past, both the armies were fully joynd, the battell was fought with no lesse force and furie than the day before. Of the Christians many then wounded, came now again into the battaile, there either by speedy death or speedie victorie to cure their wounds before receiued; and there did right good seruice. Great was the slaughter in euery place, neither could the force of the Hungarians be withstood, whose furious impression, whē the Turks could not by plain force endure, they began with their fresh horsemen, cunningly to delude their desperat fiercenesse: at such time as the Hungarians began most hardly to charge them, they by & by turned their backs, suffering them a while to follow after the, far scattered & dispersed: who allured as it were with the hope of a present victory, eagerly pursued them, & in the pursuit slew diuers of them. And they again vpon a signall giue, closing together, & turning back vpon the disperced troupes, well reuenged the death of their fellows: & with their often charges, & retreats, wonderfully wearied the Hungarians; notably deluding their furious attempts with that vncertain kind of fight, all the day long. Many of the Hungarians were there slaine, and the Turks had that day the better, and so both armies being wearied, night and wearines ended the fight: both retiring into their trenches, there keeping most carefull watch. The next morning by the dawning of the day, the battaile was again begun. Huniades his bro-brother, Generall of the Valachians, with his light horsemen setting first forward, after whom in seemly order followed the rest of the nobilitie, with their companics. Where for certaine howers, the battaile was hardly fought with like hope on both sides, and a great slaughter made, but especially of the Hungarians; who wearied with the long fight, & most part of them wounded, were now all to endure this third daies labour. Zechel (Huniades his sisters sonne) valiantly fighting in the front of the battaile, was the first of the leaders there slaine in the thickest of the Turks. Emericus Marzalus and Stephen Bamss, both great commaunders, enclosed by the Turks, there died also. Amurath seeing the formost ensignes of the Christians which stood in Zechel his regiment, taken, and his souldiours (discomfited with the death of their colonell) turning their backs, presently commaunded all the companics, which were manie (yet left in the trenches, for fresh supplies) to issue forth; and at once to ouerwhelme the Christians, being (as hee said) but few and ouerwreied with three daies continuall fight. Vpon which the kings commaund, they fiercely breaking out, presently ouerthrew both the wings of the Christians, before wauering; and in a great battaile (wherein most of the chiefe commaunders were slaine, and their ensignes taken) discomfited the rest, and with a great slaughter put them to flight. Huniades seeing his brother now slaine, the ensignes taken, and the battaile quite lost; betooke himselfe to flight also, leauing behind him his tents and baggage, all which shortly after became a prey vnto the Turks; who from noone vntill night furiously followed the chase, with most cruell execution; but at length staid by the comming on of the darkenesse, they returned againe vnto their trenches. The rest of the Turkes armie that followed not the chase, compassing in the Hungarian campe, were there by the wounded souldiours, the wagoners, and other drudges of the armie, kept out so long as they had any shot left; but yet were in the end euery mothers sonne slaine, though not altogether vreuenged, two or three of the Turkes in many places lying dead by the bodie of one Hungarian. Amurath to cōquer the greatnesse of the losse he there receiued, commanded the bodies of his captaines there slaine, to be forthwith buried; and the bodies of his common souldiours, to be for the most part cast into the riuer SCHITNIZA. For which cause the inhabitants of the country there by, of long time after abstained from eating of any fish taken in that riuer. The plaine by this great battaile made once againe famous, lay neuertheless many yeares alter couered with dead mens bones, as if it had been with stones: neither could be ploughed by the country people, but that long time after armour and weapons were there still in many places turned vp and found. Thus albeit that this bloody victorie fell vnto the Turkes, yet was their losse farre greater than the Hungarians; hauing lost (as was reported by them that say least) foure and thirtie thousand of themselves, for eight thousand of their enemies. Howbeit they themselves report the losse to haue bene on both sides far greater; as that of the Christians were slaine seuentene thousand, and of themselves fortie thousand: which in so long and mortall a fight, is not vnlike to haue been true. In this vnfortunate battaile fell most part of the Hungarian nobilitie: all men worthy eternall fame and memorie, whose names we for breuitie wil passe ouer. Many in the chase taken, and the next day brought to Amurath, were by the commandement of the angrie tyrant slaine. Such as escaped out of the slaughter by the way of ILLYRIA, returned in safetie: but such as sought to saue themselves by returning back againe through SERVIA the Despots country, found the same so troublesome as that few of them escaped, but that they were by the way either slaine, or quite stripped of all they had.

Neither was the fortune of the noble Huniades much better than the fortune of the rest, who hauing on horsebacke all alone by vncouth and vntact waies, trauiiled three daies without meat or drinke, and the fourth day tired his horse and cast him off; being on foot and disarmed, fell into the hands of two notable theues, who in dispoiling him of his apparell, finding a faire crucifix of gold about his necke, fell at strife betwixt themselves for the same: whereby he tooke occasion to lay hand vpon one of their swords, and with the same presently thrust him through; and then suddenly assailing the other, put him to flight also. So deliuered of this danger, trauiailing on, and almost spent with thirst and hunger, the next day he light vpon a sheepridge, a sturdie rough knaue, who hearing of the ouerthrow of the Hungarians, was (in hope of prey) roaming abroad in that desolat country: Who at their first meeting, stricken with the maiestie of the man, stood at gaze vpon him; as did also Huniades, fearing in his so great weakness to haue to doe with him. Thus a while hauing the one well regarded the other, they began to enter talke, the sheeheard bluntly asking him of his fortune; and he for Gods sake crauing of him some thing to eat. When as the shepheard hearing of his hard happe, moued with his estate, and hope of promised reward, brought him vnto a poore cottage not farre off, causing to be set before him bread and water, with a few oynions. Who in the pleasant remembrance of that passed miserie, would oftentimes after in his greatest banquetes say, That he never in his life fared better, or more daintily, than when he supped with this shepheard. So well in hunger season homely cates. Thus refreshed, he was by the shepheard conducted to SYNDEROVIA: whereof the Despot hauing intelligence (whose countrey was all layd for the staying of him) caused him by the captaine of the castle to be apprehended, and imprisoned. But after certaine daies spent in talke about his deliuerance, it was at length agreed, that all such strong townes in RASCIA and SERBIA, as had by the Hungarians been detained from the Despot, at such time as his kingdome was by king Vladislaus restored vnto him, should now be againe to him deliuered; and that Matthias, Huniades his youngest sonne, should for the confirmation of farther friendship, marrie the Despots daughter: with some other such conditions as it pleased the yngratefull prince for his owne behoofe to set downe. For performance whereof, he requiured to haue Ladislaus, Huniades his eldest son, in hostage. All which Huniades was glad forthwith to yeeld vnto, for feare the false Despot should haue deliuered him into the hands of Amurath, his mortall enemy. So the hostage being giuen, Huniades was againe set at libertie. Who vpon Christmas day comming to SEGEDINVM, was there by all the nobilitie of HUNGARIE, and great concourse of the people, honorably receiued. This ingratitude of the Despot no lesse greued this worthie man, than the dishonour receiued from the Turke. Wherefore vpon the suddaine raising a great armie, he inuaded the territorie, long before giuen to the Despot by the emperor Sigismund in HUNGARIE, in exchange of the strong town of BELGRADE, destroying the countrey before him, and burning the villages, neuer resting, vntill he had got into his power whatsoeuer the Despot had in HUNGARIE: & yet not so contented, presently entred into RASCIA, where the Despots embassadois met him, bringing with them Ladislaus the hostage, honorably rewarded, & humbly crauing peace at his hands: which he at the request of the nobilitie, easily granted, with forgiveness of all former wrongs or iniuries. And so hauing with him concluded a peace, returned backe againe into HUNGARIE. But Fortune neuer suffereth long the valiant man to rest, but still keepeth him busied, least he should at too much ease attaine vnto honours glorie.

The Despot in-uaded by Amu-rath, & much aid of Huniades.

The yeare following, Amurath certainly enformed, That George the Despot hauing of late Huniades in his power, had againe set him at libertie: was therewith exceeding wroth, blaming him of great ingratitude, That for a kingdome which he had at his hands receiued, he had not deliuered vnto him his enemy, in full recompence thereof: whom of all others he most feared, & therefore likewise wished to haue had him petish. In reuenge of which iniurie (as he tooke it) the melancholic tyrant, sent Fritze-beg and Iose-beg, two of his most expert captaines, with a strong power to inuade RASCIA, the Despots countrey: who accordingly entring thereinto, strongly fortified CHRYSONICVM, a towne before ruined, vpon the side of the riuer MORAVA, and from thence with fire and sword destroyed the countrey both farre and neere. The Despot dismayed with this suddaine and vnexpected inuasion, wist not well which way to turne himselfe: the angrie Turke, he well knew, was not to bee appeased without yeelding vnto some great inconuenience; and to pray aid of Huniades, without which he was not able to withstand the Turkes; hee thought but vaine, for the wrong he had before done him. So that what to do he he wist not: yet had he rather to endure any thing, than againe to suffer the heauie bondage of the Turke. In this extremitie he thought best to make prooffe of Huniades, of whom hee humbly and not without great shame craued aid. Which the courteous gouernour, according to his honourable nature, forgetting all former iniuries, easily granted: and the rather, for that hee desired nothing more, than to be of the Turkes in some part reuenged of the ouerthrow from them of late receiued in the plaines of COSSOVA: as also for that he wisely foresaw, That the Despots countrey being lost, hee should haue the Turkes still brauing him euen as it were in the gates of HUNGARIE. Wherefore hauing with great speed raised a conuenient power, he forthwith in person himselfe set forward, and at SYNDEROVIA passing ouer the riuer DANEBVS into RASCIA, there joyned his power with the Despots, which hee found there readie. And so marching forward with such expedition, that hee preuented the fame of his comming; and the weather also at the same time as it were fauouring his purpose, and couering the countrey with a thicke mist, hee was the fourth day vpon the Turkes before they were aware of him. Who wonderfully dismayed with the suddaine comming of the Christians, and vpon the breaking vp of the mist, discouering also Huniades his ensignes (alwaies vnto them dreadfull) thought now no more of resistance, or of the ordering of their battaile, but as men discouraged, betooke themselves to speedie flight. After whom followed the Hungarian and Seruian light horsemen, with most bloodie execution hauing them in chace all that day; Huniades with his men at armes following still after in good order, for feare the Turkes should againe make head vpon the light horsemen that had them in chace. And had not the comming on of the night ended the slaughter, few of the Turkes had there escaped: but by the approach thereof many of them got into the woods, and so saued themselves. Fritze-beg the Generall, with most part of the Turkes best commanders, were in that flight taken. Huniades after this victorie entering into BVLGARIA, came to BVDINA, the metropolitall cite of that countrey, which (as the cause oftentimes of great wars) he burnt downe to the ground. And so hauing well reuenged himselfe, and cleared the countrey of the Turkes, he returned backe againe into SERBIA, and there gaue vnto the Despot for a present all the prisoners he had taken: and contenting himselfe with the honour of the victorie, returned with triumph to BUDA, there to find no lesse trouble with the Bohemians, and some of the discontented nobilitie of HUNGARIE, than hee had with the Turkes, to the great hurt of the Christian commonweale.

All this while that Amurath was thus troubled with Huniades and the Hungarians, Mustapha lying still vpon the borders of MACEDONIA, as Amurath had commaunded; it chanced that a great quarrell grew betwixt the Venetians and Scanderbeg, about the inheritance of Lech Zacharie (a noble man of EPIRVS) then shamefully murdered by his vnaturall kinsman Lech Duchague, part of whose inheritance lying in the frontiers of EPIRVS, the Venetians claimed, as belonging to their seignorie: and hauing got possession of the cite of DARYNA, part thereof, by force held the same against Scanderbeg: vpon which quarrell great warres arose betwixt the Venetians and him, who had before beene very great friends: inso much, that in the end they joined in battaile at the riuer of DRINE, where the Venetians were by him in a great battaile ouerthrowne. Of which troubles Mustapha daily vnderstood, and how that Scanderbeg so busied, had left but a small garrison vpon the borders of EPIRVS. Wherefore being desirous to redeeme his former disgrace with some better hap; hee would faine haue taken the oportunitie now presented, but that his great masters command lay so heauie vpon him, as that he durst not without his leaue attempt the same; knowing that the danger of his euill fortune, if it should so fall out, would farre exceed the vncertaine glorie of his better successe. Yet ceased hee not from time to time to giue Amurath intelligence of these troubles and warres in EPIRVS, earnestly requesting him not to let slip so faire an oportunitie, but to giue him leaue to enter into the countrey: in manner, assuring him beforehand of the victorie. yet the suspicious old king was long in resolving what to doe, still fearing the fortune of his enemy. At length discharged of the feare of the Hungarians, and commending Mustapha his forwardnesse, hee sent vnto him a messenger with letters of this purport, answerable to his desire.

The warres thou so greatly desirest, behold Mustapha we graunt vnto thee: the glorie thereof (if those things be true which we heare of the Venetian war) thine owne valour, and worthie right hand shall giue thee: yet thou must warily deale with that enemy, and not rashly take up armes, which thou maiest be enforced shamefully to cast away, when thou thinkest least. Peraduenture the counterfeite shew of warre, and faigned falling out among the Christians, do too much allure thee for the common saying is, There is no quarrell sooner ended, than betwixt the father and the sonne: wee in person absent, can neither aduise thee as present, nor commend a foolish forwardnesse in armes. Thou must before thou put on armes, dispose of all things, and consider of euery particular, which is to be put in execution when thou art in the field: Thou hast a great armie of fresh and lustre souldiers, thine enemies are with continuall warres wearied and spent: in that remaineth, doe as thou thinkest good, for I forbid thee the doing of nothing, which thou thinkest may be for the aduancement of our honour.

Mustapha hauing thus obtained leaue, and well appointed, with all his forces entered into EPIRVS, hoping in one battaile to end that warre: which he (presuming vpon the strength of his armie) many times offered in the plaine field. Newes hereof was brought to Scanderbeg (then lying at the siege of DARYNA against the Venetians) from his garrisons lying vpon the frontiers of EPIRVS, to whom he addressed a speedie messenger: commanding them in no wise to encounter with the enemy, but to keepe themselves within the sauegard of their strong holds, and to protraet the time vntill his coming. Afterwards selecting out of his armie fiftie hundreth horsemen, & fiftie hundreth chosen footmen, all old beaten soldiours, he with that small number marched to the place where he knew lay his garrisons intrenched, in the vpper countrey of DIBRA: leauing Ameſa his nephew at the siege of DAYNA. Mustapha hauing many times in vaine sought to draw the garrison souldiours out of their trenches by offering them many faire oportunities of aduantage, and now out of hope that way to circumuent them, began to spoile and burne the countrey round about. But when he vnderstood by his scouts of Scanderbeg his comming, hee speedily called together his armie, and encamped within two miles of Scanderbegs campe, at a place called ORONOCHE, in the vpper countrey of DIBRA. Scanderbeg had there in his campe of his garrison souldiours and those he brought with him, foure thousand horsemen, and two thousand foot, all old expert souldiours: where, after he had made his trenches strong, hee left therein three hundreth of them, and brought the rest into the field in order of battaile. Mustapha on the other side likewise brought on in good order his armie also. But whilst both armies thus stood ranged one within the view of the other, expecting nothing but the signall of battaile, suddenly a man at armes, in gallant and rich furniture, issued out of the Turks armie into the midst of the plaine betwixt both armies, and from thence with a loud voice challenged to fight hand to hand with any one of the Christian armie. This Turke was called Caragusa. At the first Scanderbegs soldiours vpon this challenge stood stil, one looking vpon another: for as they were all ashamed to refuse so braue an offer, so the danger so suddainly offered, staied euery mans forwardnesse for a while: Vntill that one Paul Maneſi, accounted the best man at armes in Scanderbegs armie (vpon whom euery mans eie was now cast, as if he had been the man by name called out by the proud challenger) not able longer to endure the Turkes pride, with great courage and cheerefull countenance came to Scanderbeg, requesting him that he might be the man to accept that challenge. Who greatly commended him, and willed him on God his name to set forward, first to win honour to himselfe, and then to giue example of his valour for all the rest of the armie to follow. Paul staying a while, vntill he had for that purpose most brauely armed himselfe, mounted presently to horse, and riding forth into the plaine, called aloud vnto the Turk, that he should make himselfe readie to fight. Whom Caragusa required to stay a while that he might speake vnto him a few words, indifferently concerning them both.

The victorie (said he) our force and fortune shall determine: but the conditions of the victorie, we are now to appoint our selues. If the Destinies haue assigned vnto thee the honour of this daie, I refuse not, but that thou maieſt by law of armes, when I am ouercome, carry away with thee my rich spoiles, and at thy pleasure dispose of my dead bodie. But if thou shalt fall vnder my hand, I require that I may haue the same right, and power ouer thy captiue bodie: and that the Generals will graunt that no man shall moue out of either armie, to better the fortune of either of vs in the time of the combat, or after.

When Caragusa answered, That hee agreed to those conditions of the combat, which hee vpon a needlesse feare had so required to be kept: saying, That where the fierce soule had yeilded, there of good right all the rest ought to be the conquerours; and that therefore he should fight without feare of any more enemies than himselfe: whom so soone as he had deſtroyed of life, he should haue free power to doe with his dead bodie what he would. Which if thou wouldſt giue (said he) vnto the teares of my fellow souldiours, yet would not worthe Scanderbeg suffer the carkeſſe of a vanquiſhed coward to be brought backe againe into his campe.

Caragusa maruailed to heare his so braue a resolution, and as it was thought, repented him of his challenge. But after that both the Generals had vpon their honours confirmed the lawes of the combat before rehearsed, both the Champions were left alone in the midst of the plaine betwixt both armies, with all mens eyes fixed vpon them. Now both the armies betwixt feare and hope, stood in great expectation of the cūent of the combat, preſaging their own fortunes in the fortune of their Champions. In which time they both hauing withdrawn themselves one from the other a conuenient distance, for the making of their course, and after with great violence running together: Caragusa was by Maneſi, at the first encounter stroke through the head and flame. Maneſi alighting, diſarmed the dead bodie, and stroke off his head: and so loaded with the armour and head of the proud challenger, returned with victorie to the armie, where he was joyfully joyfully receiued and brought to Scanderbeg, of whom he was there presently honourably both commended and rewarded. Scanderbeg seeing his men by this good fortune of Maneſi greatly encouraged, and the Turkes as men diſmaied with the death of their Champion hanging their heads, like an inuincible captaine himselfe set first forward toward the enemy, as it were in contempt of their multitude: and had charged them as they stood, before they had set one foot forward, had not Mustapha to encourage his souldiours, with certaine diſordered troups opposed himselfe against him, which the whole armie seeing, faintly followed: but as they set forward with small courage, so were they at the first encounter easily driuen to retire. Which when Mustapha saw, he called earnestly vpon them to follow him, and the more to encourage them by his owne example, put spurres to his horse, and fiercely charged the front of Scanderbegs armie, as one resolved either to gaine the victorie, or there to die: after whom followed most of the principall captains of his armie, which would not for shame forsake their generall: thus by his valour the battaile was for a while renewed. But Moses preuailing with great slaughter, in one part of the armie, the Turkes began to flie: in which flight Mustapha the Generall, with twelue others of the cheefe men in that armie, were taken prisoners, but of the common souldiours few were saved. There was slaine of the Turkes armie ten thousand, and fifteen ensignes taken, whereas of the Christians were lost but three hundreth. The Turkes tents and campe, with all the wealth thereof, became a prey to Scanderbegs souldiours. Wherewith although he had satisfied the desires of them all, yet to keepe his old custome, he entred into the confines of MACEDONIA, and there burnt and spoiled all that hee could. And afterwards leauing a garrison of two thousand horsemen, and a thousand foot, for defence of his frontiers, returned againe with the rest of his armie to the siege of DAYNA.

Not long after, the Venetians made peace with Scanderbeg: and Amurath desirous to redeeme his captaines, about the same time sent great presents vnto Scanderbeg: with fiftie and twentie thousand duckats, for the ranſome of Mustapha, & the other chieftaines: whom Scanderbeg so honourably vsed, as if there had neuer been any hostilitie betwixt him and them: and so with a safe conuoy, sent them out of his countrey. The ranſome of Mustapha and the other Turkes he deuided amongst his souldiours. When Scanderbeg had thus made peace with the Venetians, hee forthwith led his armie againe into MACEDONIA, with the spoile of that countrey to make his souldiours better pay, as his vsuall manner was. And to doe the greater harme, he diuided his armie into three parts, wherewith he ouerrunning the countrey, wasted and destroyed all before him, putting to the sword all the Turkes that came in his waie. As for the Christians that there liued amongst them, he spared, but left them nothing more than their liues: the buildings of the countrey he vtterly consumed with fire, so that in all that part of MACEDONIA which bordereth vpon EPIRVS, nothing was to beſeen more than the bare ground, and the shoues of the spoile by him there made. Which vnnuerſfull hauocke of all things he made, to the end that the Turkes should find no reliefe in those quarters, whenſoeuer they should come either to lie in garrison in that countrey, or to inuade EPIRVS. The spoile hee made was so great, that it was thought hee left not in all that countrey, so much as might relieue the Turkes againe for one daie.

Of all these great harmes by Scanderbeg done in MACEDONIA, Amurath was with all speed aduertised, and therewith exceedingly vexed: howbeit he resolved with his great counsellors, no more to send any of his Bassaes or captaines, but to goe himselfe in person, with such a royall armie, as should be sufficient not to conquer EPIRVS, but if need were, to fill euery corner thereof. Wherfore hee commaunded commissions to bee speedily directed into all parts of his kingdomes and provinces, for the leuying of a great armie for HADRIANOPLE: yet whether he intended to imploy the same, was not knowne to any in the Turkes court, more than to the Bassaes of the countie. Which caused all the bordering Christian princes to make the best preparation they could for their owne assurance, euery one fearing least that growing tempest should breake out against himselfe. But Scanderbeg of long acquainted with the Turkish policie, easily perceiued all that great preparation to be made against him: which he was the rather induced to thinke, by reason of the vnaccustomed quietnesse of Amurath, who all that while had neither sent any armie to reuenge the ouerthrow of Mustapha, nor so much as a garrison for defence of the borders of his kingdom, but had let all things negligently passe, as if he had beene in a dead sleepe. Besides that, it was also thought, that he had secret intelligence from some of his old friends and acquaint-acquaintance in Amurath his court, who probably suspected the matter. Wherefore Scanderbeg setting all other things apart, gaue himselfe wholly to the preparing of things necessarie for the defence of his small kingdome against so mightie an enemy. First hee by letters and messengers aduertised all the Christian princes his neighbours and friends, of the greatnesse of the danger of that warre; wherein Amurath (as he said) sought not onely his destruction, but the utter ruin of them all: exhorting them therefore to consider, how farre the danger of so great an armie might extend, and therefore to stand fast vpon their guard. Then hee sent Moses and other his experienced captaines into all parts of Epirvs, to take vp souldiours, and all the prouision of corne and victuals that was possible to be had. Wherein he himselfe also busily trauielled day and night, notwithstanding vntill he had left nothing in the country whereupon the enemy might shew his crueltie. Most part of the common people with their substance, were receiued into the strong citties, the rest tooke the refuge of the Venetian and other Christian princes townes and countries farther off, vntill this furie was ouerpast: all such as were able to beare armes, were commaunded to repair to Croia; where when they were all assembled, there were ynow to haue made a right puissant armie. But out of all this multitude Scanderbeg made choice onely of ten thousand old expert souldiours, whom he purposed to lead himselfe to encounter with the Turkes great armie, as he should see occasion: and placed a thousand three hundred in garrison in Croia. The citizens also themselves were thoroughly furnished with all manner of weapons and other prouision meet for the defence of their citie. Then proclamation was made, That all the aged men unfit for warres, with the women and children, should depart the citie; and none to bee therein left but the garrison souldiours, and such citizens as were willing to tarry, and able to beare arms. This citie of Croia was the cheefe citie of Epirvs, and of the fortune thereof seemed to depend the state of all the other strong townes and citties, and so consequently of the whole kingdome: for which cause, Scanderbeg had the greater care for the defence thereof. It was a miserable sight to see the lamentable departure of this weake companie out of Croia: all was full of weeping and wailing; no house, no street, no part of the citie was without mourning: but especially in the churches was to be seene the very face of common sorrow and heauinesse; where all sorts of people in great numbers flocking together, poured forth their deuout prayers, with fountaines of teares, wringing their hands; yea, and some in the impatience of their griefe forgetting themselves, seemed to expostulate their griefe with God. But when their sorrow was with teares assuaged, and their hearts somewhat eased, the aged mothers kissing their sonnes, gaue them many a fearefull commandement: sometime referring how louingly and tenderly they had brought them vp, and other some times shewing vnto them their feeble limmes and hoary haire, willing them to bee mindfull of them: The wiues presented their children vnto their husbands, bewailing to leaue them as childlesse widowers, and their houses desolat: The old men mure with sorrow, & carefull of their children, durst neither encourage them, for feare of making them too forward; neither dissuade them from aduenturing themselves, least they should seeme to loue them more than their native countrie. In the midst of these passions commandement came from Scanderbeg, that they must now depart, that the souldiours might take their places & charge. Then began their sorrowes afresh, with pittious screeching & teares. A man would haue thought the citie had euen then been presently taken by the Turkes. They could hardly be drawne from the embracing of their friends, all now desiring to remaine still with them in the citie, partakers of their common dangers. But when they saw the officers begin to be earnest vpon them, and to hasten their departure, then with heauie hearts they tooke as it were their last farewell, and departed out of the citie, setting their feet many times they wist not where, for desire they had to looke backe againe vpon the citie. This great multitude was conueyed also into the Venetian cities, and other places free from danger: whither all the country people, which were not before receiued into the strong cities, resorted also, with all their substance and cattell; leauing nothing in all the country of Epirvs, but the bare ground for the Turkes to prey vpon. After this multitude was departed, and all well quieted, and none left in the citie but men fit for seruice, Scanderbeg thoroughly stored it with all things needfull for the defence thereof, and for the enduring of a long siege: besides that, he gaue to euery souldiour conuenient armour, with some small reward. Then he placed Tranacoates (a valiant and famous captaine, honourably descended) gouernour of the citie. And so hauing set all things in order for the safeguard thereof, after hee had in few words exhorted them courageously to endure the siege, and not to listen to Amurath his flatter-ring and deceitfull charmes, he departed out of the citie vnto his armie, then lying within view, and began presently to march towards Dybra. But he was not farre gone, before he met with Moses with a gallant troupe of horsemen comming from Sfetigrade, a strong citie of Dybra, situate in the confines of Epirvs, bordering vpon Macedonia: which citie was Scanderbeg his second care, for that it was like to be the first that should endure the angry tyrants furie, standing first in his way, as it were the forresse of that country. Moses had there set all things in like order, as had Scanderbeg in Croia; and had there placed one Peter Perlat (a graue and politticke man) Gouernour, with a strong garrison of souldiours chosen out of all the country of Dybra, which were alwaies accounted the best men of warre in all Epirvs, and was for so doing greatly commended of Scanderbeg. VVho deliuering vnto him all the forces hee had prepared for the defence of the other castles and citties of Epirvs, sent him with diuers other of his nobilitie and captaines, to take order for the safetie of those places, appointing vnto euery man his charge. As for himselfe, he with a small troupe of horsemen went to Sfetigrade, carefull of that citie aboue measure, as it were before deuining the ensuing danger. Being come thither, and all the souldiours assembled by his commaundement into the market place, hee there in open audience spake vnto them as followeth:

Almightie God could not this day offer vnto you (worthie souldiours of Sfetigrade) better matter: neither could a fairer occasion be presented vnto braue minds and souldiours desirous of honor, than that which now hath caused you to take up most just armes. wherein you may for euer by worthie example make knowne your constant faith and worthie valour, both towards me in priuat, and the people of Epirvs in generall. Hitherto we haue borne armes for the honour of our kingdome, but now we must fight for our liues, our libertie, and the wals of our country. You must now force your selues, that you doe not by reproch and cowardise staine the worthie praises you haue already deserved, by the great victories by you obtained vnder my conduct. The greatest part of the fortune of this war dependeth vpon you: For the first passage of Amurath into Epirvs (that I my selfe may be vnto you the first messenger of that danger) will be this way: the first furie of the Turkes will assaile you, that hauing hitherto as it were broken downe the strongest forresse of Epirvs, hee may afterwards breake through the country, more subject to danger. The first fruits of this war is yours, you (if you beare the hearts of courageous men, mindfull of your libertie) may beat downe the proud strength of the haughty enemy, and discourage his high conceits. The Othoman king shall haue the beginning both of his hope and feare, of you: if he shall find you so minded, as I now see you gallantly moued, and with joy beare your violent indignation; he will in euery place feare a great force of danger, and thereby learne to abtaine from the other cities of Epirvs: neither will he lie here long at a vaine siege, except the warward old man, will foolishly hereupon gage all his forces: for such is the situation and strength of this citie, that it may easily set at nought an angry enemy. Wherefore resolute with your selues worthie souldiours and citizens, only by constancie and faithfulnessse, without bloodshed, to gain vnto your selues an honourable victorie. Of your valour (which I willingly speake of) dependeth for the most part the faithfulnessse of all the rest: they will looke vpon you whom they may praise or accuse, and whose example they may follow in the fortune of these warres. But to what purpose should men of worth in their actions pretend the necessitie of faith, or chance of fortune? whereas, by reason things are both best begun and accomplished. It seldome chaunceth, that fortune faileth the sound aduice, or is not obedient vnto vertue: and you haue all things which most politticke care could provide for your safetie. You want not armour, you want not plentifull prouision of victuals, you want not valiant men: the superfluous multitude of vnecessary people, the pittifull lamentation of women, and troublesome crying of children shall not withdraw you from your publike charge, from your seruice and defence of your country. I haue left you alone to your selues, for defence of your citie, your religion, and dwellings, that you might be encouraged onely with the pronocations of honour and libertie, with the emulation of aduerture and danger, and the very sight one of another, and I my selfe will not be far off with my courageous souldiours, a silent beholder and encourager of your vertue: where although I may not auert from you all the force of the cruell enemy by rash aduerture, nor trie the whole fortune of this war in plaine field, yet will I turne a great part of your dangers vpon my selfe, and trouble the enemies desires, with many a hot skirmish. For as much as there is no better manner of fight, nor safer kind of warre, for us amongst such a multitude of men, and so many thousands of souldiours, than neuer to offer battaile vnto the enemy in plaine field, neither to aduerture all vpon the fortune of one conflict, although a man did see apparent signes of victorie. He will of purpose at the first giue vs the oportunitie of good hap: hee will feed our hardinesse with the blood of his base souldiors, the easlier to intrap and oppresse our rashnesse, allured with the sweet bait of good fortune: but the craftie denises of the Othoman king, are by great policie and consideration to be frustrated. This mightie enemy is by little and little to bee cut off, as time and place shall giue occasion. For truly that victorie should bee vnto me lamentable, which I should buy with the blood of my souldiors: and beleene me, it would be vnto me a more sorrowfull than pleasant sight, to see eight or ten thousand of my enemies slaine, with the losse of a few of you. I will praise and honour my subiects of EPIRVS for valiant conquerours, if they shall not suffer themselves to be conquered of the Turkish king. The rest I had rather you courageous souldiors of DIBRA should consider with your selues, than that I should seeme to distrust of your assured faith, by giuing you a carefull and tedious admonition.

When Scanderbeg had with cheerefull persuation thus encouraged the minds of them of S FETIGRADE, he departed thence, and visited diuers other cities of EPIRVS, where finding all things politickely ordered by Moses and the other captaines, whom he had put in trust, he returned to his armie, then lying neere vnto CROIA.

Whilest Scanderbeg was with great carefullnesse yet thus providing for the safegard of his kingdome, in the meane time Amurath his armie was assembled at HADRIANOPE, to the number of a hundred and fiftie thousand men, whereof many were pioners, and men appointed for other base seruices necessarie at the siege of townes. Of this great armie Amurath sent fortie thousand light horsemen before him to S FETIGRADE, who according to his commaund came and encamped before the citie: the newes of their comming, with a great deale more than truth, was forthwith brought to Scanderbeg, then lying with his small armie neere CROIA: whereupon he with foure thousand horsemen, and a thousand foot, took the way toward S FETIGRADE, and strongly encamped his armie within seuen miles of the citie. Where hauing set all things in good order, he accompanied with Moses and Tanusius, went by certaine blind waies through the mountaines and woods, vntill he came so neere vnto the citie, that from the place where he stood, vpon the top of a hill, he might easily discouer in what sort the enemy lay encamped: and so returning backe againe to his campe, rise with his armie in the night following, and drawing as neere vnto the Turks armie as he could, vndiscovered, placed all his armie in the covert of the woods and secret valleyes, vnperceiued of his enemies. After that hee sent forth Moses and Musachi his nephew, with thirtie of his best horsemen, apparelled as if they had been but common souldiors, but passing well mounted, driuing before them certaine horses laden with come, by a by-way, as if they had purposed to haue secretly got into the citie. The day then breaking, they were discovered by the Turks scouts, and set vpon: where at the first Moses and the rest began of purpose to flie, but when he saw that they were pursued but with like number to themselves, hee returned backe vpon the Turks, and slew foue of them, and chased the rest vnto the campe. The Generall seeing what had happened, sent forth foure thousand horsemen to pursue these supposed victualers: whom they quickly recouered the sight of, for that Moses of purpose had made small hast to flie: but when the Turks began to draw nigh, Moses left the horses laden with come, and fled; yet so that he still drew on the Turks with hope to ouertake him, vntill he had brought them where Scanderbeg with his armie lay in wait: by whom they were suddainly assailed on euerie side, and with great slaughter put to flight. In this conflict, two thousand of the Turks were slaine, and a thousand of their horses taken: of the Christians were lost but two and twentie. This was the first welcome of the Turks armie to S FETIGRADE.

About eight daies after came Amurath with all his armie, in the beginning of May in the yeare of our lord 1449, and hauing made the greatest shew he could with his huge armie to terrifie the defendants: he encamped the baser sort of his footmen at the foot of the hill, whereon the citie stood, and lay himselfe with his Ianizaries, and other his most valiant souldiors, about three quarters of a mile further off: where after he had line still one daie, & well considered the strength of the place, towards euening he sent a messenger to the citie, who requested to speake with the Gouvernour Perlat. Whereof hee hearing, came to the wall: of whom the messenger requested, That he would commaund the souldiors standing by, to goe further off, for as much as he had some thing in secret to say vnto him from his master. Vnto whom Perlat merrily answered: It is like indeed to bee some great secret, that you would haue kept not onely from the hearing ring of my souldiors, but from the verie light of the daie, and therefore haue chosen the night: but I haue not learned of mine elders, to heare any message from mine enemy by night, neither at any time else out of the hearing of the garrison, to whom Scanderbeg hath committed the defence of this citie, and I the sauegard of my person: you must therefore at this time pardon me, and to morrow if your maister so please, I will heare you at large. And therewith commanded him to depart from the walls. So he returned for that time without audience as he came. It grieved Amurath not a little to see his messenger so lightly regarded: yet forasmuch as hee had more hope to gain the citie by large offers, or some reasonable composition, than by all his great force, he dissembled his wrath: and the next daie sent the same messenger again, with one of his Bassaes, a graue and well spoken man, himselfe borne in EPIRVS. This Bassa with three souldiors, and two seruitours, was by the gouernours commaundement by one of the ports receiued, into the citie, and brought into S. Maries church. Where after he had with great eloquence sought, to insinuate himselfe into the minds of the Gouvernour, and the hearers, and afterwards augmented the terrour of Amuraths power beyond all measure, laying before them the great victories by him obtained against the Hungarians, and the other Christian princes: in fine he exhorted them to yeild the citie vnto him, in whose name he promised first that the citizens should in all respects vnder his gouernement liue as they had before done vnder Scanderbegs; then, that the Gouvernour should receiue at Amurath his hands most honourable preferments, with many rich and princely gifts; and that it should be lawfull for the garrison souldiors to depart in safetie whether they would, and to haue three hundred thousand Aspers diuided amongst them in reward. But when the Bassa had ended his speech, the Gouvernour in this sort replied:

If you had not deliuered this speech vnto resolute men, deuoted vnto the defence of their libertie, it might perhaps haue wrought some effect: and we (said he) might peraduenture listen vnto your offers, if we were either afraid of the Othoman king, and the vaine threats of our enemies; or else were wearie of the gouernement of the noble Scanderbeg. But forasmuch as no euill desert of his, nor good desert of your masters, hath yet passed, for which we should preferre a stranger before our naturall soveraigne, an enemy before a friend, a Turke before a Christian; let your maister proceed first in his action begun, let him proue his fortune, let him by force terrifie vs, beat downe our walls, make ha- uocke of our men, and by strong hand drine vs to humble our selues at his feet, and to sue for peace: But it were a great dishonour, yea a thing almost to be laughed at, if we should cowardly accept of these conditions by him offered, before any assault giuen, before one drop of blond spilt, before any souldior did so much as once grone for any wound receiued, before one stone were shaken in the wall, or any small breach made. But your maister shall doe better to raise his siege, and get him backe againe to HADRIANOPE, there to spend the small remainder of his old yeares in quiet, and not to prouoke vs his fatall enemies, whose courage in defence of our liberties, and fidelitie towards our prince, hee hath so often times proued to his great dishonour, and losse of his armies. The faith I haue once giuen to my Soueraigne, for the defence of this citie, I will neuer forget, vntill the effusion of the last drop of my blond. It shall be vnto me reward and honour enough, if I either liuing defend this citie, or with losse of my life shall leaue my guiltlesse soule at libertie, and my carcase amongst the dead bodies of worthie souldiors, when I shall find a way into a farre better place.

The Generall hauing giuen this resolute answer vnto the Bassa, bountifullly feasted him that day at dinner, and afterwards led him through the middest of the citie: where he saw great store of victuals, by the Gouvernour commaunded of purpose to be set in shew, to put Amurath out of hope of winning the citie by long siege. And so sent the Bassa out by the same port whereby he came in, much discontented with the answer he was to returne to his maister.

When Amurath vnderstood by the Bassa, of the Gouvernours resolution, he was therewith exceeding wroth, and thereupon with his great ordinance battered the citie three dayes without intermission. And hauing by the furie of his artillerie made a small breach, he forthwith gaue thereunto a most terrible assault, labouring first to win the same by the force and multitude of his common souldiors, which the Turks call Afapi, whom hee forced by great numbers to that seruice. Of these souldiors, the Turke in his warres maketh no great reckoning, but to blunt the swords of his enemies, or to abate their first furie, thereby to giue the easier victorie to his Ianizaries and other his better souldiors: which the Othoman kings hold for good policie. these forlorne souldiors, without respect of danger pressing forward, are slaine by heapes at the breach, the Ianizaries at the same time in another place attempted to haue scaled the wals of the citie: but whilst they with much labour and difficultie first crawl vpon the steepe rocke whereon the citie was built, and afterward desperately mount vp their scaling ladders, they were by the defendants with huge stones and weightie peeces of timber cast vpon them, beaten down, whereof some were driuen headlong to the bottome of the rocke, and so miserably slaine. Many of them together with their skaling ladders, were by the Christians thrust from the wall; and tumbling downe the rocke, violently carried with them others, comming vp behind them. Some few got to the top of the ladders, and taking hold of the battlements of the wals, lost some their fingers, some their hands, but most their liues, being beaten downe as the other were. Many of them which stood farther off, were then wounded also, and with shot from the wals slaine. With this miserable slaughter, and no hope to preuaile, the Turks discouraged, began to withdraw themselves from the assault: but the Bassas and capitaines standing behind them, forced them againe forward, exhorting some, threatening others, and beating the rest forward with their truncheons. By which means the assault was againe renewed, but not with such courage as before, though with no lesse slaughter: which the defendants seeing, gaue from the wals great tokens of joy and triumph. Amurath perceiuing his discouraged souldiors readie of themselves to forsake the assault, presently sent Feri-Bassa (one of his most valiant capitaines) with a new supplie of three thousand chosen souldiors to renew the fight. The Christians well aware of their comming, ceased not with continuall shot to beat them from the wals: but such was the forwardnesse of that fierce capitaine, that without regard of danger he brought his men to the wals, where the defendants from above ouerwhelmed them with stones, timber, wild fire, and such other things as are vsually prepared for the defence of townes besieged. For all that, Feri-Bassa gaue so great an assault, that he slew diuers of the defendants vpon the wals, and had there forcibly entered, had not the Gouverneur perceiuing the danger, with a companie of fresh souldiors come with speed to the defence of that place, whereby the enemy was presently repulsed, and driuen againe from the wals. Amurath seeing the great slaughter of his men, and no hope of successe, caused a retreat to be founded, and so leauing the assault, retired againe into his campe. The great losse and dishonour at this assault receiued, much troubled his wayward mind: who for all that yet ceased not to giue the like vaine attempts. At length the capitaine of the Ianizaries perceiuing that part of the citie which was farthest from the campe, to be commonly but slenderly manned, by reason that it seemed a place impregnable, both for the height and steepenesse of the rocke; told Amurath, that he would assaile (if it so pleased him) secretly in the night to attempt by that place to enter the citie: where as they thought nothing was more to be feared, than the height thereof, which they supported with the wings of desire, doubted not to mount vnto. This his deuise exceedingly pleased the king, and was the next night with great silence put in execution. But such was the carefullnesse of the Gouverneur ouer euery part of his charge, that nothing could be done against the same, but that it was by him forthwith discouered. The Gouverneur aduertised by the watch, of the Turks attempt, with great silence presently repaired to the place with a great companie of the garrison souldiors, and standing close, from the top of the wall beheld the Turks, as it had bene a swarme of Emmets climbing vp the high rockes, and one helping vp another by such desperate way, as was in reason to haue been thought no man would haue attempted. But when they were come to the top of the rocke, & now euen readie to enter, they were from above suddenly ouerwhelmed, as it had been with a shower of shot, and so violently forced downe that high rocke, that most part of them which had got vp to any height, were miserably crushed to death either with the weight of themselves, or of others falling vpon them, and many of the rest slaine with shot from the top of the rocke: whereof Amurath presently vnderstanding, was therewith exceedingly greeued.

During the time of this siege, Scanderbeg neuer lay long still in one place, but remooued continually from place to place, as best serued his purpose, breaking sometimes into one quarter of the Turks campe, and sometime into another, and straightway so suddenly gone againe and as it were vanished out of sight, that Amurath many times wondered what was become of him. At this time, being the latter end of Iune, he was come with his armie within eight miles of Amuraths campe: and from thence sent Moses his greatest capitaine, in the attire of a common souldior, with two other, to take view how the enemy lay encamped. By which trustie espials he was enformed, That the Turkes lay in great securitie, as men without feare, keeping but negligent watch. Of which oportunitie, Scanderbeg rejoycing, the night following suddenly assaulted one quarter of the Turks campe. Whose comming, although it was a little before by the Turkes scouts discouered; yet his furious assault was so suddaine and so forceable, that he slew two thousand of the Turks, and filled euery corner of that great campe with feate and tumult, before they could well arme themselves or make resistance. After which slaughter he safely retired, carrying away with him two hundred and thirtie horse, with seuen of the Turkes ensignes; hauing in this skirmish lost of his men but two and fortie: whose dead bodies the Turkes the next morning in reuenge of their slaine friends hewed into small peeces.

Vpon these great disgraces one following in the necke of another, Amurath hauing no other object but the citie to shew his furie vpon, gaue three fierce assaults vnto the same, one after another, and was alwaies with losse both of his men and honour repulsed. But the more he lost, the more he burnt with desire of reuenge, perswading his souldiors, That as the strongest cities and fortresses were built by mens hands, so were they to bee ouerthrowne and laied euen with the ground by resolute and valiant men: encouraging them to a fresh assault, with greater promises of reward than euer hee had done before in all his warres, from the first beginning of his raigne. And because he would with more safetie giue this his last and greatest assault, he appointed Feri-Bassa, with twelue thousand horsemen and six thousand foot to attend vpon Scanderbeg, if hee should hap to come (as he thought he would) to trouble the assault, by assailing of his camp. Feri-Bassa glad of this charge, well hoping now to redeeme his former ouerthrow with some great victorie, and leading forth his armie a little from the campe, as he was commaunded, so lay; wishing for nothing more than the comming of Scanderbeg, vainly boasting, That he would seeke him in the field, and there trie his force and fortune with him hand to hand: which he did shortly after to his cost. When Amurath had thus set in order all things requisit, as well for the siege, as for the safegard of his campe: the next morning he compassed the citie round about with his armie, and couered the ground with his men of war, purposing at that time to gage his whole forces vpon the taking thereof. The wals he had before in some places battered, so much as was possible; and yet but so, as that they were not without skaling ladders to be assaulted: partly for the naturall strength of the place, and partly for that the defendants had with great diligence continually repaired and filled vp with earth what the furie of the cannon had throwne downe. This assault Amurath began first with his archers and small shot, which deliuered their arrowes and bullets vpon the top of the wall, and into the citie, as if it had bene a shower of haile, thereby to trouble the stationarie souldiors. In this heat, ladders were clapped to the wals in euery place where any could be possibly reared, and the Turkes began desperately to skale the wals: but the Christians nothing dismayed thereat, with great courage resisted them, and with shot from their safe standings wounded and slew many of them: yet others still pressed vp in the places of them that were slaine, so that the assault became most terrible in many places at once, but especially neere vnto the great gate of the citie; where the Turkes had vpon the suddaine with ladders, timber, and planks clapped together, raised close vnto that tower, as it had bene a wooden tower, equall in height to the wall; from whence the Turkes greatly distressed the Christians in that place, fighting with them as if it had been vpon euen ground, still sending vp fresh souldiors in stead of them that were slaine: and thereby preuailed so far, that they had set vp certaine of Amurath his ensignes vpon the wall, to the great comfort of the Turkes, and astonishment of the besieged Christians. The Gouverneur seeing the imminent danger, hastened to the place with a companie of fresh and valiant souldiors, by whose force the Turkes were quickly repulsed from the wall, their ensignes taken and sent into the market place: the tower of wood with many ladders and much timber by the Turkes brought to that place, was quickly consumed with wild fire cast vpon the same from the wals. Perlat hauing deliuered the citie of this feare, presently placed fresh souldiors in stead of them which were slaine or hurt, and so worthely defended the citie.

Whilst Amurath was giuing this great assault to Sfetigrad, Scanderbeg to withdraw him from the same, came with nine thousand souldiors to assaile the Turkes campe, as Amurath had before suspected, and was now come verie neere the same. Feri-Bassa glad of his comming, opposed his armie against him: which Scanderbeg seeing, retired a little, of purpose to draw the Bassa farther from the campe, and then forthwith began to joyne battaile with him. The Bassa considering the small number of his enemies, and his own greater power, withdrew foure thousand land horsemen out of his armie to fetch a compass about, and to set vpon the rearward of Scanderbegs armie: hoping so to inclose him, that he should neuer escape thence, but there either to be slaine or taken aliue, and his armie vtterly defeated. But the expert capitaine perceiuing his purpose, to meet therewith, left Moses to lead the maine battaile; and he himselfe with two thousand horsemen, so valiantly charged those foure thousand of his enemies before they were well departed from the rest of the Bassas armie, that they had now more cause to looke to their own safetie, than how to circumuent others. In this conflict Feri-Bassa hand to hand, as he had of late, was in fight with Scanderbeg, was by him there slaine. All this while that Scanderbeg was in fight with Feri-Bassa in the right wing of the armie, and Musachie in the left, Moses stood fast, receiuing the assault of the enemy without mouing anie thing forward; expecting the successe of the wings. But Scanderbeg hauing discomfited the right wing, and slaine the Generall, comming now in, he set forward with such force and courage, that the Turkes not able longer to abide his force, turned their backs and fled: of whom manie were slaine in this chase, though Scanderbeg doubting the great power of his enemy so nigh at hand, durst not follow them far; but sounding a retreat, put his armie againe in good order, for feare of some souldaine attempt from the campe, and after appointed some of the meanest of his souldiours to take the spoile of the slaine Turkes. When Amurath had vnderstood what had happened to Feri-Bassa, he was so overcome with anger and melancholy, that for a while he could not speake one word: but after the heat was a little past, he commaunded certaine small peeces of ordinance, which he had before vsed against the citie, to be remoued into the campe, and there placed vpon that side which was most in danger to the enemy. He also presently sent thither foure thousand souldiours to ioyne with the remainder of Feri-Bassas armie, for defence of the campe, with straight charge that they should not issue out of the trenches. Neuerthelesse he himselfe continued the assault of the citie all that day: but when night drew on, and no hope appeared for him to preuaile, he caused a retreat to be sounded, and leauing the assault, he returned againe into his campe. At this assault Amurath lost seuen thousand men, beside manie that died afterwards of their wounds; but of the garrison souldiours were slaine but few, and nintie more hurt.

The terror of the turkish armie, began now to grow into contempt throughout Epirus; and Scanderbeg was in good hope, that Amurath after so manie ouerthrowes and shamefull repulses, would at length raise his siege and be gone: yet he sent spies continually to discover what was done in the Turkes campe, and he himselfe with two thousand souldiours would oftentimes shew himselfe vpon the sides of the mountaines neere vnto Amurath his campe, of purpose to draw the Turkes out, that hee might take them at some aduantage. But the old king had giuen commandement vpon paine of death, that no man should go out of the trenches without leave, or once to speake of giuing battaile or assault: so that hee lay certaine daies in his campe, not like a king besieging a citie, but more like a man besieged himselfe: the which his still lying, Scanderbeg had the more in distrust, fearing greatly that he was hatching some mischiefe, which so soone as it was ripe would violently breake out.

Amurath considering with what euill successe he had manie times assaulted the citie, and holding it for a great dishonour to raise his siege and depart, hauing done nothing worth the remembrance; thought good once againe to prooue, if it were possible to overcome the minds of the garrison souldiours with gifts, whom he was not able to subdue by force. For which purpose he sent an embassadour vnto the citie, offering vnto the besieged and garrison souldiours ealie conditions of peace, with such large gifts and rewards as had not been heard offered to any garrison in former time. All which his magnificall promises were lightly rejected by the common consent of all the whole garrison, preferring their faithfull loyaltie before all his golden mountaines. For all that, Amurath was in good hope, that amongst so manie, some would be found into whose minds his large offers might make some impression: wherein he was not deceived. For one base minded fellow amongst the rest, corrupted with the Turkes great promises, preferring his owne priuat wealth, before the welfare of his country, waiting his time, had secret conference with the Turkes espials, and promised vpon assurance of such reward as was before by Amurath proffered, to find means that in few daies the citie should be yeelded into his power. This corrupted traitour, had laid many mischieuous plots for the effecting of this horrible treason: but the first device he put in practise, which of all others a man would haue thought to haue been of least moment, serued his wicked purpose in stead of all the rest. All the garrison souldiours souldiours of SFETIGRADE were of the vpper countrey of DIBRA, put into that citie, by Moses, for their approoued valour about all the other souldiours of Epirus. But as they were men of great courage, so were they exceeding superstitious both in their religion and manner of liuing, putting nice difference betwixt one kind of lawfull meat and other: accounting some cleane, some vnclane; abhorring from that, which they fondly deemed vnclane, with more than a Iewish superstition, chusing rather to die than to eat or drinke thereof: such is the strong delusion of blind error, where it hath thoroughly possessed the minds of men. The citie of SFETIGRADE (as is aforesaid) is situat vpon the top of a great high rocke, as most of the cities of Epirus now be, and was then watered but with one great well in the midst of the citie, which sunke deepe into the rocke, plentifully serued both the publicke and priuat vse of the inhabitants.

Into this common well the malicious traitour in the night time cast the foule stinking carion carcas of a dead dog, knowing, that the conceited garrison souldiours of DIBRA would rather endure the paines of death, and starue, or els yeeld vpon any condition, than to drinke of that polluted water. In the morning when the stinking carion was espied, and drawne out of the well, the report thereof was quickly bruted in euery corner of the citie, and that the well was poysoned: so that all the people were in manner in an vptore about the finding out of the traitor. The citizens were exceeding forrie for that had happened, but the garrison souldiours detested that loathsome and vnclane water (as they accounted it) more than the Turkish seruitude, protesting, that they would rather perish with thirst, than drinke thereof. Whereupon some of them desired to set fire vpon the citie, and whilst they had yet strength, to breake through the enemies campe or there manfully to die. And they which thought best of the matter, requested, That the citie might be yeelded vp: for now, they discouraged with a superstitious vanitie, could be content to hearken to the former conditions of peace, yea they were readie ynough of themselves to sue vnto Amurath for peace, though it had bene vpon harder termes. The Gouvernour troubled with that had happened, and astonied to see so great an alteration in the minds of his souldiours vpon so small occasion, could not tell whether hee might thinke it to proceed of a superstitious conceit, or of some secret compact made with Amurath. But the better to pacifie the matter, hee came into the market place, and there in the hearing of all the garrison, with many effectuall reasons, exhorted them to continue faithfull vnto their prince and country in that honourable seruice; and in a matter of so great consequence to make small reckoning to vse that water, which would easily in short time be brought againe to the wonted puritie and cleaneesse: And to persuade them the rather, he went presently to the well himselfe, and in the sight of them all dranke a greater draught of the water, whose example the citizens following, dranke likewise. But when it was offered to the capitaines and souldiours of the garrison, they all refused to tast thereof, as if it had been a most loathsome thing, or rather some deadly poyson, and with great instance cried vnto the Gouvernour, to giue vp the citie: for which cause many thought they were corrupted by Amurath his great promises. Howbeit none of that garrison (except that one traitour) did euer afterwards reuolt vnto the Turkish king, or yet appeared any thing the richer for any gift receiued, whereby such suspicion might be confirmed. When the Gouvernour saw that the obstinate minds of the garrison were not to be moued with any persuasion or reward (whereof hee spared not to make large promise) nor by any other means which he could deuise: hee called vnto him his cheefe capitaines, with the best sort of the citizens, &c. resolved with them full sore against his will, to yeeld vp the citie to Amurath, vpon such conditions as they themselves there agreed vpon: which were, That it should be lawfull for all the capitaines and souldiours to depart in safetie with their armour and all other things; and that so many of the citizens as would stay, might there still dwell in the citie, in such sort, as they had done before, vnder the government of Scanderbeg: the rest that listed not to remaine there still, might at their pleasure with bag and baggage depart whether they would. Glad was Amurath when this offer was made vnto him, and gaunted them all that was desired, sauing that hee would not consent that the citizens should continue in the citie, yet was he content that they should liue vnder him as they had before done, quietly enjoying all their possessions, but to build their houses without the wals of the citie: which condition some accepted, and some forfaking all, went to Scanderbeg. When all was thoroughly agreed vpon, the keys of the gates were deliuered to Amurath, and the Gouvernour with the capitaines and all the garrison souldiours suffered quietly to passe through the Turkish campe, as the king had promised. treason.*

earnestly perswaded his father, to haue broken his faith, and to haue put them all to the sword: saying, it was one of their prophet Mahomets cheefe commaundements, to vse all crueltie for the destruction of the Christians. But the old king would not therein hearken vnto his sonne, saying, That he which was desirous to be great amongst men, must either be indeed faithfull of his word and promise, or at leastwise seeme so to be, thereby to gaine the minds of the people, who naturally abhorre the gouernment of a faithlesse and cruell prince. The traitor which corrupted the water, remained still in the citie, and was by Amurath rewarded with three rich suites of apparell, and fiftie thousand Aspers, and had giuen vnto him besides a yearely pension of two thousand duckats. But short was the joy the traitour had of this euill gotten goods: for after he had a few daies vainely triumphed in the midst of Amurath his fauours, he was suddenly gone, and neuer afterwards scene or heard tell of: being secretly made away (as was supposed) by the commandement of Amurath: whose noble heart could not but detest the traitour, although the treason serued well his purpose. Amurath entring into SFETIGRADE, caused the wals to be forthwith repaired, and placed one thousand two hundred Ianizaries in garrison there. And raising his campe the first of September, departed out of EPHRS, hauing lost thirtie thousand of his Turks at the siege of SFETIGRADE; much grieved in mind for all that, that hee could not vanquish the enemy, whom he came of purpose to subdue. In his returne, the viceroy of ASIA marched before him with the Asian souldiours; in the rereward followed the viceroy of EVROPE with his European souldiours; in the midst was Amurath himselfe, compassed about with his Ianizaries and other souldiours of the court. Scanderbeg vnderstanding of Amurath his departure, followed speedily with eight thousand horsemen, and three thousand foot, and taking the aduantage of the thicke woods and mountaine straits (to him well knowne) whereby that great armie was to passe, oftentimes skirmished with the Turks, charging the sometime in the vaward, & sometime in the rereward, sometime on the one side, and sometime on the other, and slew many of them: whereby he so troubled Amurath his passage, that he was glad to leaue the viceroy of ROMANIA, with 30000 to attend vpon Scanderbeg, that he himselfe might in the meane time with more safetie march away with the rest of his armie. Scanderbeg perceiuing the stay of the viceroy, ceased to follow Amurath further, fearing to bee enclosed betwene those two great armies. The viceroy seeing that Scanderbeg was retired, after he had staid a few daies, followed his master to HADRIANOPLE, and so Scanderbeg returned to CROIA.

Shortly after the departure of Amurath out of EPHRS, Scanderbeg left two thousand souldiours vpon the borders for defence of the country against the Turks. These soldiours so straightly kept in the Ianizaries left in garrison at SFETIGRADE, that they could not looke out of the citie, but they were intercepted and slaine. And within a few daies after came himselfe with an armie of eightene thousand, and laied siege to SFETIGRADE the space of a moneth, which was from the middle of September vntill the middle of October. In which time he gaue two great assaults to haue recovered the citie, but was both times repulsed, with the losse of fife hundred men. Amurath vnderstanding that Scanderbeg lay at the siege of SFETIGRADE, sent with all speed to recall his armie, but lately before dispersed. Whereof Scanderbeg hauing intelligence, considering also the difficultie of the enterprise, with the approach of Winter, raised his siege, and returned to CROIA: where he set all things in the same order he had done before the coming of Amurath to the siege of SFETIGRADE, and put two thousand of his best souldiours there in garrison, vnder the charge of the famous capitaine Vrancontes, and stored the citie with sufficient victuall for a yeares siege, wherein he had great helpe from the Venetians and other Christian princes, for that there was then great scarcitie of all things in EPHRS, by reason of the late warres. The like care he had also of all the rest of his cities, being continually aduertised from his seeret friends in the Turks court of the great preparation intended against him by the Turkish king, against the beginning of the next Spring.

Amurath vnderstanding that Scanderbeg was departed from SFETIGRADE, changed his former determination for the calling backe againe of his armie, & appointed it to meet againe at HADRIANOPLE, in the beginning of March following: whether the Bassaes, and other great commaunders, at the time appointed assembled with their companies, according as Amurath had before commaunded. So that by the latter end of march, hee had there in readinesse an armie of an hundred and threecore thousand men strong. Of which great multitude, he after the manner of the Turkish warres, sent fortie thousand horsemen, vnder the leading of Sebalyas a pollicke captaine, as his vauntcourriers into EPHRS, in the beginning of April, in the yeare 1450. The valiant capitaine with great speed and no resistance entred into EPHRS, as was giuen him in charge, and without let came to CROIA: where, after he had aduisedly considered of the situation thereof, and of the places thereabouts, he strongly encamped himselfe neere thereunto in the pleasant plaine called TYRANNA: and there within his trenches kept his souldiours close, attending nothing more, but that no new supplie of men, munition, or victuals, should be conuaid into the citie, more than was therein before his comming. For he was not able with his horsemen to doe any thing against the citie: and Scanderbeg had left nothing abroad in the country subject to his furie. Besides that, he was expressely by Amurath forbidden, to attempt any thing against Scanderbeg himselfe.

After Sebalyas had twentie daies thus line encamped before CROIA, neither doing nor taking harme, Amurath by reason of his great age, hauing marched oftentimes but fife miles a day, came thether also with his whole armie, wherewith hee filled all the country round about: the very sight whereof, had been enough to haue discouraged the small garrison in CROIA, had they not been men both of great experience and resolution. Where after he had spent foure daies in settling of his campe, he sent two messengers to the Gouverneur (as the manner of the Turkes is) offering him if he would yeeld vp the citie, that it should be lawfull for him with all his souldiours in safetie with bagge and baggage to depart; and the Gouverneur himselfe to receiue in reward two hundred thousand aspers, with an honorable place amongst the great Bassaes of his court, if it would please him to accept thereof: and further, that the citizens should enjoy all their ancient liberties as in former time, without any alteration; with promise also of greater. These messengers comming to the gates of the citie, could not bee suffered to enter, but standing without, were commaunded there to deliuer their message. Which when the Gouverneur had heard, hee scornefully rejected their offers, and returned the messengers shamefully derided by the souldiours which stood vpon the wall. Amurath more offended with this contempt, than the refusall of his offers; and seeing no other meanes to gaine the citie, conuerted all his deuises vnto the siege thereof. Wherefore he first commaunded ten great peeces of artillerie to be forthwith cast, for he had brought none with him readie made, because of the difficult passage ouer the high mountaines into EPHRS; whereby it seemed to bee a matter of infinite trouble to haue brought his great ordinance: and therefore caried with him great store of metall in masse, whereof at his pleasure to make his great artillerie as he saw cause. In fifteen daies this worke was brought to perfection, and ten peeces of huge greatnesse were readie mounted vpon carriages. Six of them he placed against the East side of the citie, towards the plain of TYRANNA, and the other foure against the gate: in which two places onely, CROIA was subject to batterie, being on all other parts naturally defended with impregnable rocks, vpon the tops whereof were built faire battlements more for beautie than needfull defence. These two places Amurath battred foure daies continually, and with the furie of his artillerie had in both places beaten downe halfe the wall, and sore shaken the rest. Wherewith the Turks were exceedingly encouraged, and with great cheerefulness made all things readie to assault those breaches, whensoever Amurath should commaund, striving among themselves who should shew himselfe most forward in that dangerous enterprise. And Mahomet the young prince, the more to encourage the souldiours, besides the great rewards by his father proposed, promised of himselfe to giue an hundred thousand aspers to him that should first set vp an ensigne vpon the wals of the citie. The garrison souldiours on the other side, considering that the whole state and welfare of EPHRS was reposed in their valour; and that the eies of most part of Christendome were as it were fixed vpon them, were nothing dismayed with the breaches made, but manfully comforted and encouraged one another to endure all manner of perill and danger that might possibly chance: but especially the worthy Gouverneur Vrancontes, who going through the midst of his souldiours, and shaking some of them by the hands, withall said:

These, these are the fortresses of our citie; these are the innincible bulwarks, these are the irremovable stones and surest sement. What honour? what praise? what triumph should we hope for? if these walls standing whole and strong, we should lie shrouded under the defence of them; and not they defend us? So can cowardly defend cities, and sheepe feare not the wolues rage, when they are safely shut up within the wals of their sheepcoats: But that is the praise of the wals, and not of the men.

Worthie

Amurath sixt king of the Turks.

Worthie Calitriot our prince hath commended this his citie to bee defended by vs, and not vs by it: Honour is attended vpon with danger, and sofred up amongst perils: euerie base mariner may be a master in faire weather: and firme things stand of themselves and need not our upholding. Wherefore, men of worth shun such things, which being kept or lost, yeild like praise. Things readie to fall need shoaring, and thether hasteth honour, and there (worthie souldiours) appeareth courage and valour. Wherefore let our valiant right hands defend these broken breaches, and in stead of these dead wals, courageously oppose our lustie and lincly armed bodies against the force of our enemies. If these wals stood still firme, and unbattered, you should then fight from the top of them like women; but now that they are something shaken, you shall as men stand vpon somewhat more even ground, and encounter your enemies hand to hand, the better to satisfie your furious desire. Where I also in the thickest, shall easily view and judge of euerie mans priuat courage, in peticular, and of all your valour in common. And yet if we well consider of the matter, the place it self doth yet notably make for vs; and our former good hopes are little or nothing by these small breaches diminished: For this rising of the hill (not possibly be taken from vs) although it be not so high as it is in other places, yet doth it not serue vs sufficiently at great aduantage to charge our enemies, and hinder their assault: the steepenesse whereof, as it will be troublesome vnto them, so will it keepe vs most fresh in strength: and make our shot more forcible. Wherefore this had been a thing of vs to haue been wished for, if we desire the slaughter of our enemies at this siege; or if wee wish for perpetuall honour and glorie by this warre. For this breach of the wals wil encourage these barbarians, & allure their armed men to clime vp in greater multitude than if the wals were whole; whereof so many shall on euerie side bee easily slaine, as wee shall but cyme at: except you had rather sit still, holding your hands together in your bosomes as cowards: Their dead bodies shall fill up the breaches againe, if you be men mindfull of your libertie. What is there (worthy captaines and souldiours) that letteth our victorie? or memorable slaughter of our enemies? by whom onely these two places of the citie can bee assaulted: all the rest is out of danger, and feares no enemies force. Here onely is the paines to be taken, this onely is left for you to defend, and here shall you all be: the courage, force, and strength of you all shall in this place appeare. How will you so many worthie captaines, and valiant souldiours, in so little roome bestow your selues? we are too many defendants for so small breaches. Yet let vs play the men, and doe our endeavour: let vs in one conflict weaken the tyrants strength, and burst his proud heart: he will forsake this citie, and raise his siege vnfurnately begun, so soone as he shall see his first assault to cost him the liues of so many thousands of his men.

Cecilia assaulted.

When Vranacontes had with this comfortable speech thus encouraged his souldiours, against the assault which he expected the next day; and had with great care and diligence set all things in order for the same, and repaired the breaches as well as was possible in that case: hee gaue them leaue for that night to take their rest. In the morning Amurath commaunded the assault to bee giuen to both the breaches, which was forthwith by the Turkes cheerefully begun, and euerie man busie to performe the seruice hee was appointed vnto. But by that time that the assault was well begun, a suddaine allarm was raised throughout all the Turkes campe: for Scanderbeg with fife thousand valiant souldiours, had suddainly broken in vpon one side of the Turkes great campe, and at the first encounter had slaine six hundreth of the Turkes, and was now spoiling their tents. The rumour whereof, troubled the whole campe, and made the Turkes with lesse courage to assault the breaches, for feare of the danger behind them. Amurath although hee had great confidence in them whom he had before left for the sauegard of his tents, yet for more surety sent Scremet one of his greatest captaines, with foure thousand souldiours backe into the campe, for more surety: saying, That nothing could be too sure, against that wild beast: meaning the force of Scanderbeg. Mahomet also the yong prince, halted thether in great choler with his guard, much against his fathers will. But Moses, Scanderbeg his lieutenant, knowing himselfe too weak to withstand the multitude that was swarming thether (contenting himselfe with that which was already done) had before Mahomet his coming, speedily retired with all his armie into the sauegard of the mountaines, from whence he came: hauing done great harme in the Turkes campe, with the losse but of ten men. Scanderbeg in the heat of this skirmish, forgetting himselfe, had so farre engaged himselfe among the Turkes, that hee was by them on euerie side enclosed, and in great danger to haue been slaine or taken: yet valiantly breaking through them, hee escaped the danger and recovered the mountaines, and with much adoe came at length to his campe, to the great joy and comfort of them all, being before in great feare hee had been lost. This was accounted the greatest oversight of Scanderbeg in all his warres, for so much as the office of a good Generall consisteth not in aduenturing of his person to manifest danger, but in the politike gouernment of his charge. During the time that Scanderbeg thus assailed the Turkes campe, Amurath but faintly assaulted the breaches, expecting the successe in the campe: but when he ynderstood that Scanderbeg was retired and all quieted, he brought all his forces to the wals, and siet with the multitude of his archers and small shot, laboured to driue the defendants from the wals, ouerwhelming them with arrowes falling as thicke as haile. And likewise at the same time other common souldiours of baser account, brought scaling ladders and other things needfull for the scaling of the wals. After whom also followed the Janizaries and other chosen souldiours, readie to mount the ladders as soone as they should be set to the wals. But whilst they clime vp the high hills in this order, the garrison souldiours made such slaughter of them with shot from the wals and out of the citie, that they would haue presently retired, had they not been forced forward by their captaines, who spared neither stripes nor wounds when words would not serue. By this tyrannicall meanes, the scaling ladders were with great slaughter of the common souldiours set vp against the wals, and the Turkes climbing vp, came to handle blows with the defendants at the breaches: nothing was to be heard, but the crying of people, the clattering of armor, and the instruments of warre, which was terribly redoubled with the echoes from the mountaines round about. The Turkes doing what they might to winne the breaches, were by the Christians worthily repulsed, & with their ladders tumbled headlong downe the mountaine, with such horrible slaughter and discomfiture, especially of the common souldiours, that none of them would set one foot forward againe towards the wals, although they had small hope to saue themselves by retiring backe: for the fierce yong prince Mahomet, euen then making shew of his cruell disposition, caused them that returned, to be slaine, by the terror thereof to driue others forward. These common souldiours whom the Turkes make small reckoning of, are for most part miserable Christians, which liue in such countries as had sometimes receiued the faith of Christ, but are now vnder the Turkish slaueerie; of which sort of wretched people, the Turkish tyrants draw with them great multitudes in their warres, most commonly vnarmed, because they dare not well trust them in warres against the Christians: these carrie all the baggage of the campe, these serue to fetch wood and water for other souldiours of better account, these serue in stead of pioneers to cast trenches and raise bulwarks: and when battaile is to be giuen, if it be in plaine field, these haue then weapons put into their hands, and thrust into the forefront of the battaile to blunt the enemies swords: but if a citie be to be besieged, these serue as fit matter to fill the ditches with their dead bodies, or to make bridges for other souldiours to passe ouer vpon: and if they shrink to attempt any thing they are commanded, then are they more cruelly vsed by their commanders than by their enemies. When Amurath saw his souldiours so discouraged, he stood in doubt whether it were better for that time to found a retreat, or to send a new supply: but being intraged with the losse of his men, and desirous to be in some part reuenged, he sent diuers companies of his better souldiours for the incouragement of them which were before discouraged, and so gaue a fresh assault. But with as euill, or worse successe than before: for Vranacontes had withdrawne from the breaches all those souldiours which had indured the former assault, and placed other fresh and lustie men in their stead; who incouraged with the former victorie, and loth to be accounted inferior to their fellows, repulsed the Turkes with double slaughter: vntill that the aged king, not able longer to behold the endlesse losse of his men, caused a retreat to be sounded; which all his souldiours were glad to heare, and so returned into his campe, hauing lost in those two assaults eight thousand men, without any notable harme done vnto the defendants worth the remembrance.

This shamefull repulse much grieved all the captaines and commaunders of Amuraths army, but especially Mahomet the yong prince, whose violent nature vnaquainted with mishap burnt impatiently with reuenge. Wherefore vnderstanding that Scanderbeg lay intrenched vpon the mountaine of T V M E N I S not farre from his fathers army, he drew most of the best and readiest souldiours of all the whole campe, into that quarter which was nearest vnto Scanderbeg: of purpose that if he should againe assaile the campe in that place (as it was most like he would) he should be encountered with so many braue and valiant men there in readinesse, as that it should be hard for him either to doe any great harme, or for himselfe to escape. Of all which, Scanderbeg by certaine fugitiues had intelligence, as also in what order the campe lay: Whereupon he left Moses with five hundred souldiours in the place where he lay, taking order with him before his departure, that he at a certaine appointed houre in the night following, should assaile the Turkes campe in the quarter next vnto him where Mahomet lay; and hauing there raised some tumult, speedily to retire againe to his assured strength in the mountaine. Scanderbeg himselfe with the whole strength of his army, in number about eight thousand, in the meane time took a compasse about, and by certaine secret by-waies through the woods and mountaines, came vnto the farther side of the Turkes army, to a place called MOVNT CLE. The night following, Moses at the appointed houre with his five hundred souldiours assailed that part of the Turkes campe next vnto him, with such noise & tumult, as if it had been some great army. By occasion whereof, all the Turkes campe was in alarme, and drew in haste to that place where they heard that great tumult, as was before by Mahomet commanded. When at the same instant, Scanderbeg with all his army brake into the other side of the Turkes campe, where he was least feared or looked for, and from whence the best souldiours were before drawne by Mahomet: and there made such slaughter and hauocke of the rest, not knowing which way to turne themselves, that the losse a little before receiued vnder the wals of CROIA was now forgot, as a small thing in comparison of this. Moses hauing raised a great feare, and done little harme, retired in safetie to his well known strength: and Scanderbeg hauing made great spoile in the campe, fearing to be oppressed with the multitude of his enemies if he should there longer stay, returned in good time, hauing scarce lost one man.

Amurath after this great losse and trouble of his campe, withdrew most of his small ordinance which he had before bent against the citie, into his trenches, placing it as commodiously as he might for the defence thereof against the suddaine attempts of Scanderbeg. Yet for as much as he could not in that hoat season of the yeare so closely encampe his great army, but that some part thereof would still be in like danger as before; he therefore appointed Sebalias with sixteen thousand souldiours to attend vpon Scanderbeg, that he should no more trouble the whole campe. After which order taken, he battered the walles of CROIA afresh, and with his great ordinance overthrew whatsoeuer the citizens had repaired, making the breaches greater and more faultable than before, intending once againe by a new assault to proue his fortune, and the force of his souldiours: which he appointed to be the next day. But when he perceived no signe of courage or good hope in the heauie countenances of them discouraged, and that they yeelded to him their consents, rather for feare and shame, than for hope of victorie; he called them cowards discouraged with the least frowne of fortune, and said:

*Every weeke castle is able to hold out one assault: but if you will draw these wilde beasts out of their dens, you must arme your selues like resolute men of inuincible courage, to indure what thing soeuer shall happen. Great captaines with their puissant armies haue growne old vnder the wals of their enemies, vpon light and small displeasures: and will you hauing receiued so many disgraces of these perjured Epirots, leaue them all vnrueged? What great victorie was euer yet by any man gained without bloodshed? Remember the most glorious victorie of VARN. It is hard without bloudie hands to put the yoke vpon the fierce enemies necke. All honourable things are brought to passe with aduerture and labour: and the end of this warre dependeth of the taking of CROIA. If it were once won, all this warre were at an end: which if Scanderbeg lose (being the strength of his kingdome) he will not tarry one day longer in EPiRVS. Wherefore be of good cheere, and courageously set vpon it: there is not more vncertaintie in any thing, than in matters of warre. Fortune is to be proued, and oftentimes provoked of him that will wed her. And yet I will not denie, but that we must go more warily to worke against this enemy, and hazard our selues with better aduisement, and not without reason like wilde beasts to runne headlong vpon our owne death. At length we shall weare them out, if we kill but ten of them at an assault: yet are they daily to be assailed, that they may haue no leasure to refresh themselves, or to make up their breaches. And peradventure if force may not preuaile, fortune may find some mean that we looke not for, as it fell out at the siege of SPEITIGRAD, beyond all your expectation. Treason is ingenious, and mens desires great, where great rewards are propounded.*

With these and like speeches old Amurath encouraged his captaines and souldiours, and the next day early in the morning began the assault, which the Turkes valiantly attempted: and without regard of danger came to the gates of the citie, assaying, but with vaine and desperate labour, bout to haue broken them open. In this assault wild fire, was cast into many places of the citie, and the great artillerie oftentimes discharged into the breaches: whereby many of the Turkes themselves were slaine with their owne great shot, together with the Christians: for Amurath desperately set, was content to buy the life of one Christian with the losse of twentie of his Turkes. But the Christians still valiantly repulst their enemies; so that of them that came to the gates, none escaped aliue; and of them that assaulted the greater breach, they which were most forward, were first slaine, and they which stood farther off, were sore wounded with shot. Yet for all that, Amurath still maintained the assault, by sending in of new supplies, delighting to see them goe forward, but grieved at the heart to see them so slaine: vntill at last, wearie with beholding the slaughter of his men, he caused a retreat to be sounded, and so ended the assault, persuaded by his Basses, not wilfully to cast away his valiant souldiours where there was no hope to preuaile, but to reserve them for his better seruice.

Amurath now out of hope to win the citie by assault, thought good to proue what might be done by vndermining of the same: during which worke, he caused small alarmes daily to be given vnto the citie, to the intent that the defendants busied therewith, should not perceiue the secret worke of the mine. About which time his prouision of corne began to faile in his campe, for which cause hee sent his purueyors for corne to LISA, a citie of the Venetians, with whom he was at that time in league; and bought of them great store of corne. But as his officers were conueying it to his campe, Scanderbeg hauing intelligence thereof, slew the conuoy, and carried away with him all that prouision, deuiding it amongst his owne souldiours. Howbeit, not long after Amurath receiued great abundance of corne and other prouision out of MACEDONIA, beside that; the Venetian marchants afterward furnished him with plentie of corne, oyle, honey, and other necessaries; which Scanderbeg might well haue hindered, but that he would not in so doing offend the Venetians, which were also his secret friends, considering that Amurath might haue had all the same prouision out of the further part of MACEDONIA, THRACIA, MYSSIA, and such other places, if he had not otherwise had it from the Venetians.

Whilest Amurath thus lay expecting the successe of his mine, foure hundred of the garrison souldiours of CROIA fallying out of the citie, chased diuers of the Turkes that were come forth backe againe vnto the campe: whereof Amurath was glad, hoping, that they encouraged with that good hap, would to their further losse giue the like attempt afterwards. But the staied direction of the Gouernour deceived that his expectation: who considering the danger, would not suffer his souldiours any more to fallie out of the citie. Scanderbeg also at this time hauing increased his armie with a new supplie of two thousand souldiours, deuided the same into three parts, deliuering one part to Moses, another to Tanuse, and reseruing the third to himselfe. With this armie of nine thousand thus deuided, he determined by night at one instant to assaile the Turkes great campe in three diuers places: appointing in which quarter euery one should charge. But as Scanderbeg in the night appointed, was comming towards the Turkes campe, hee was discovered by their scouts: whereupon a suddaine alarme was raised in the campe, and all mens minds turned that way, and souldiours appointed with all diligence to guard that side of the campe. But whilest the Turkes were all at gaze this way for feare of Scanderbeg, Moses and Tanuse, in the dead of the night, at one time assailed the Turkes campe in two diuers quarters, as they were appointed, where they slew a number of the Turkes, and made great spoile. At which time Scanderbeg did also what he might: but by reason he was before discouered, did not much harme. Vpon the approach of the day Scanderbeg retired againe to the hills, and by that time it was faire daylight, laye downe vpon the side of a great mountain, about twentie furlongs off, in the open sight of all the Turkes campe: which he did of purpose, that Moses and Tanuse, which were by night retired into the mountains, might see which way to hold, to meet with him again. But the Turkes thinking that hee stood there to braue their whole campe, and as it were to deface them, to the great encouragement of the defendants: diuers of them earnestly craued leaue of Amurath, that they might goe vp to him, and at leastwise beat him out of sight: which hee granting, twelue thousand of his best souldiours, whereof seven thousand were horsemen, and the rest foot, presently set forward to encounter him. Scanderbeg seeing them all the way they came, vpon their approach softly retired a little farther vp into the mountaines, still expecting the comming of Moses and Tanuse. The Turkes vnacquainted with such difficult waies, marched vp the steepe hills after Scanderbeg with much labour and paine, well wearied of themselves: but when they were come a great way into the mountaines, they perceived by the rising of the dust, that some greater force was comming croſſe those mountaines: and not long after they might plainly see the foremost of their enemies. Wherefore fearing to be enclosed, they began to retire, in which retreat Scanderbeg hardly pursued them, and having the advantage of the ground, slew many of them, but especially with his archers. Moses also comming in affresh on another side, caused them to slide downe the hill amaine, and beside the slaughter that he made, took diuers prisoners. After which victorie, by Scanderbeg obtained in the sight of Amurath and his whole armie, he retired againe into the mountaines.

The late spoile of the Turks campe, with this ouerthrow of the soldiors but now sent against Scanderbeg, much greened the old tyrant: but the worke of the mine, wherein he had of long laid vp his greatest hope, forcing now to no good purpose, being deemed as well an endlesse peece of worke for the naturall hardnesse of the rocke, as also of small importance, for that it was by the defendants discouraged, draue him to his wits end. His forces hee had to his great losse sufficiently proued, and still found them too weake: and policie preuailed not. Nothing now remained, but to prouoke, if by great gifts and glorious promises hee could first corrupt the faith of the Gouvernour, and afterwards the garrison: wherein he determined to spare no cost. Vpon which resolution, he sent one of his Bassas (a man of great authoritie and dexteritie of wit) vnto Vranacotes, with such rich gifts and presents as might haue moued a right constant mind: commanding the Bassa (if it were possible) first to fasten the same vpon the Gouvernour, as presents sent from Amurath of meeke bountie, in the honour of his valiant mind; and afterwards to deliuer his message, not sparing to promise any thing for the giuing vp of the citie, yea more than should be desired. The Bassa attended on but with two seruants, came with this rich present neere to the gates of the citie, and there staid, vntill the Gouvernours pleasure were knowne: by whose commaund he was receiued into the citie, and brought to his presence. Then the Bassa with much reuerence and many magnificall words presented vnto Vranacotes the rich gifts sent from Amurath, and would forthwith haue deliuered them vnto him, as the rewards of his valour. But Vranacotes willed him first to declare his message from Amurath; vpon the hearing whereof, he would (as he said) as hee saw cause, either receiue or refuse them: before which time hee would not be beholden to his enemy, by receiuing from him the least courtesie. With which answer the subtil Bassa nothing dismayed, with great constancie thus began to deliuer his message.

Howsoeuer we agree (said he) vpon other matters we come for, we brought not these gifts of purpose to deceiue any: for so men vse to deale with their children and seruants, and not with men of courage and valour. And albeit that enemies gifts are euer to be suspected (as you haue right wisely said, and we our selues well know) yet wee durst not for shame come vnto so wortheie a Gouvernour (as the common saying is) empty handed: neither ought you, if you be the man you seeme to be, and whom men report you are, to refuse our courtesie. Take these presents in good part, which shall no way enforce or hinder you to determine or dispose of your affaires otherwise than shall seeme vnto you good: neither shall we once object vnto you these gifts, which wee so franke and freely offer in the great Sultans name, whether you reject or admit our demaunds and message; wherein there is (perhaps) no less regard had of your good, than of ours. For there is no greater token of a base mind, than to giue, in hope to receiue againe. We come vnto you franclly (wortheie Gouvernour) I speake it from my heart: we get not about with fild speech and rich rewards to circumuent thee, whose inuincible mind wee haue so often in vaine proued with our forces and power. That is it for which Amurath loueth thee. He doth wonderfully admire the vertues of his enemies, and if it were possible, desireth to haue them with himselfe. There verily with so mightie a monarch might thy inuincible mind and pregnant wit find a better way vnto the highest type of fortunes blisse. Not that I condemne Scanderbeg, whom we his enemies doe highly commend, for his countrie so well recovered, and so oftentimes worthely defended, yet chiefly by your helpe: but you are wortheie another manner of Soueraigne, and of another manner of calling, and not to spend all the daies of your life and such heroricall vertues in obscuritie and (without offence be it said) in contemptible basenesse. Besides that, Scanderbeg his estate is but momentarie: the destinies haue assigned vnto him too too mightie an enemy; his destruction may well be deferred, but not by any means auoided. Amurath hath conceived against him an implacable displeasure, and prepared his forces accordingly: hee hath sworn to spare no cost, no labour, no danger: and that hee will neuer whilest he liueth depart out of Epirus, before he haue imposed a deadly yoke vpon his necke. And behold, the first of this miserie beginneth at this citie, and vpon your selues. We daily heare his promises sound with these and such like speeches. That hee will neuer depart out of this place before hee haue taken this citie and satisfied his angrie mind with the torture of your bodies, no; not if he should therefore lose HADRIANOPLE, yea, and that more is his whole kingdom. And verily he will doe it, which I feare to deuine or thinke vpon. For although I wish others beare against you the mind of an enemy, yet am I a man, and moued with humane compassion: beleene me (ye men of CROIA) beleene me, my eyes would scarcely endure to behold the horrible spectacle of your miserable fortune. I tell you againe he will doe it, except you change your purpose, and now receiue health, life, libertie, and peace, whilest it is so freely offered. For albeit, that this notable strong place, these impregnable walls, and especially your owne valour, doe yet defend you: how long will it hold out? Verely, no longer than you haue victuall, no longer than you haue meat to sustaine your bodies. Do you thinke that Amurath will raise his siege in the middle of the heat of this war, and be gon? No, no, if force may not preuaile, if all his attempts faile, yet shall you see and feele these enemies continually to your hurt: you shall alwaies haue these tents in your eyes and at your gates, vntill long famine, which mastereth all things, take your courage also. I pray you, what hope haue you left? from whence ariseth in your resolute minds such desperate contempt of danger? Can Scanderbeg victuall you, being so straightly besieged? which bideth himselfe (poore man) in the woods all day, and sleeth over the tops of the mountaines, laden with traile and care, scarce able to releene his owne miserie. Or will the Venetians releene you? which daily bring vnto us and store vs with too too great plentie of all things necessarie for this war against you. Wherefore repent your too much hardnesse, and gather your wits together. Behold I your enemy aduise you. You haue long ynough continued in your obstinacie. Your countrie and libertie is not so far to be defended, as that you should therefore fight against God. But wherefore doe I call this libertie? You must giue place vnto your fortune, and learne to obey them that be too strong for you. You shall find assured libertie, rich rewards, perpetuall rest, with Amurath. Provide for your selues, if you be wise, whilest all things are yet whole for you to determine of; whilest we your enemies exhort and request you, and had rather haue you our voluntarie companions and friends, than our enforced seruants and slaues.

This the Bassa spake with great grauitie and no lesse vehemencie, expecting some great motions to haue risen in the minds of the soldiors. But when he perceived that his speech had rather filled them with indignation, than with feare: and that it was but a vaine thing to goe about to terrifie them with words, whom all the power of Amurath could not make afraid with weapons, he requested to talke alone with the Gouvernour in secret: which was also granted. For all men had no lesse good opinion of the wortheie Gouvernours fidelitie, than of his great wisdom and valour. The craftie Bassa hauing him by himselfe, began with great cunning to deliuer his meeke secret message: when Vranacotes perceiving by a little what the whole tale meant, interrupted him in the middle of his speech, and without more adoe commaunded him to depart: straightly charging him, That neither hee nor any other should after that time presume to come from his master to the citie to speake with him about any such dishonourable matter; for if hee did, he would in detestation thereof cause their hands, their noses, and their eares to be cut off, and so returne them dismembered in stead of answer. And so the Bassa was with his presents againe turned out of the citie, and no man suffered to receiue any thing of him in reward, although the soldiors could haue bene well content to haue eased him and his seruants of that carriage, if the Gouvernour would but haue winked thereat.

Great was the expectation in the Turks campe, of the Bassas returne: but when they saw the presents were not receiued, they easily guessed that all went not as they wished. But when Amurath himselfe vnderstood the Gouvernours resolute answer, he in great rage commanded all things to be made ready for a fresh assault: which he did rather to satisfie his anger, than vpon any hope he had to preuaile therein. The next day, he caused a furious assault to be giuen to the citie, but with greater losse to himselfe than before; the Christians still valiantly defending the citie against the Turkish furie. In this assault many of the Turks were slaine at the breach, with their owne great thor: for whilest Amurath sought therewith to driue the Christians from the defence of the breach, he slew a great number more of the forwardest of his owne men than he did of the defendants. But wearied at length to behold the endlesse slaughter of his men, he gaue ouer the assault, fault, and returned into his campe, as if he had been a man halfe franticke or distract of his wits; and there sat downe in his tent, all that day full of melancholic passions, sometimes violently pulling his hoarie beard and white locks, complaining of his hard and disaster fortune; that he had liued so long to see those daies of disgrace, wherein all his former glorie and triumphant victories were obscured, by one base towne of EPIRVS. His Bassaes and graue counsellours labouring in the meane time with long discourses to comfort him vp: sometimes recounting vnto him his many and glorious victories; and other whiles producing antient examples of like event. But darke and heauie conceits, had so ouerwhelmed the melancholy old tirant, that nothing could content his waiward mind, or reuiue his dying spirits: so that the little remainder of naturall heat which was left in his aged bodie, now oppressed and almost extinguished with melancholic conceits, and his aged bodie dried vp with sorrow, hee became sicke for griefe. Where vpon by the counsaile of some of his Bassaes, he sent an embassadour to Scanderbeg, offering him peace, if he would yeild to pay vnto him a yearely tribute of ten thousand duckats: thinking by that meanes his honour to be well saued, if before his departure out of EPIRVS, hee could but make Scanderbeg his tributarie. This embassadour was by Scanderbeg honourably entertained in his campe, but the offered peace at the same time viterly refused. The embassadour returning to Amurath, declared vnto him the euill successe of his embassage, which greatly encreased his melancholic sicknesse. And Scanderbeg to greue him the more, vnderstanding that he was dangerously sicke, and that the great Bassaes were more carefull of the kings health than of the successe of the warres; diuers times assailed the Turks campe. Which thing though the Bassaes kept from his knowledge with all carefulnesse: yet he often times suspected the matter, by the often allarums and tumults in the campe, and with the greefe thereof languished. So feeling his sicknesse daily to increase, and that he could not longer liue, lying vpon a pallier in his pauiilion, greuously complained to his Bassaes, That the destinies had so blemished all the former course of his life, with such an obscure death, that hee which had so often repressed the furie of the Hungarians, and almost brought to naught the pride of the Grecians, together with their name, should now be enforced to giue vp the ghost, vnder the wals of an obscure castle (as hee termed it) and that in the sight of his contemptible enemy. After that, turning himselfe to his son Mahomet, he earnestly commended him to the faithfulness of his Bassaes, and gaue him many graue aduertisements, sometimes in secret betwixt themselves, and sometimes in the hearing of others: want of strength, & abundance of teares running down his aged face (vpon the sight of his son) often times interrupting his speech. Yet sick vnto death as he was, and drawing fast vnto his end, he forced himselfe, to warne his sonne of such things as now at his death greued him most.

Hungarians with other the Christian princes, rose up in armes against vs: at which time we fought not with them for soueraigntie, but for the whole state of our kingdomes, as the bloudie battailes of VARN A and COSSOVA still witnesse vnto the world. So whilest I had neither lesiure nor sufficient power to take order for all my important affaires at once; in the meane time this enemy grew as you see. But how, or in what order you are hereafter to wage warre against him, you may not looke for any direction from me, which haue in all these matters so euill directed my selfe: Fortune neuer deceived my endeuours more, than in this. But happily thou Mahomet my sonne, maiest prooue a more fortunat warrior against him: and for so many honors already giuen vnto me, the destinies haue reserved the triumph of EPIRVS for thee. Wherefore my sonne, thou shalt receiue from me this scepter, and these roial ensignes: but about all things, I leaue vnto thee this enemy; charging thee not to leaue my death unreuenged. It is all I charge thee with, for so great and stately a patrimonie as thou art to receiue from me: it is the only sacrifice that my old departing ghost desireth of thee.

Shortly after he became speechlesse, and struiuing with the pangs of death halfe a day, he then breathed out his gaspily ghost, to the great joy and contentment of the poore oppressed Christians. He died about the middle of Autumne, in the yeare of our Lord 1450, when he had liued 85 yeares, as most write: and thereof reigned 28 (or as some others report 30;) about fife months after the siege laid before CROIA.

Thus lieth great Amurath, erst not inferiour vnto the greatest monarchs of that age, dead almost in despaire: a worthy mirror of honours frailtie; yeelding vnto the worldly man in the end, neither comfort nor reliefe. Who had fought greater battails? who had gained greater victories, or obtained more glorious triumphs than had Amurath? Who by the spoils of so many mightie kings and princes, and by the conquest of so many prowde and warlike nations, againe restored and established the Turkes kingdom, before by Tamerlan and the Tartars in a manner cleane defaced. He it was that burst the hart of the prowde Grecians, establishing his empire at HADRIANOPLE, euen in the center of their bowels: from whence haue proceeded so many miseries and calamities into the greatest part of Christendome, as no tongue is able to expresse. He it was that first brake downe the Hexamile or wal of separation on the strait of CORINTH, & conquered the greatest part of PELOPONNESVS. He it was that subdued vnto the Turks so many great countries and provinces in ASIA; that in plaine field and set battaile ouerthrew many puissant kings and princes, and brought them vnder his subiection: who hauing slaine Vladislaus the king of POLONIA and HUNGARIE, and more than once chased out of the field Huniades that famous & redoubted warrior; had in his prowde and ambitious heart, promised vnto himselfe the conquest of a great part of Christendome. But O how farre was he now changed from the man he then was! how farre did these his last speeches differ from the course of his forepassed life! full of such base passionat complaints and lamentations, as becomed not a man of his place and spirit; but some vile wretch ouertaken with dispaire, and yet afraid to die. Where were now those haughtie thoughts, those lustie looks, those thundring and commaunding speeches; whereat so many great commanders, so many troupes and legions, so many thousands of armed fouldiours were wont to tremble and quake? Where is that victorious hand that swaied so many scepters? where is the maiestie of his power and strength, that commanded ouer so many nations and kingdomes? O how is the case now altered! he lieth now dead, a gaspily filthy stinking carcas; a clod of clay viregarded, his hands closed, his eyes shut, and his feet stretched out, which erst proudly traced the countries by him subdued and conquered. And now of such infinit riches, such vnmeasurable wealth, such hugie treasures, such stately honors and vainglorious praises as he in his life time enjoyed; his frail bodie enjoyeth nothing, but left all behind it. O the blind and peruerse thoughts of mans nature! O the vaine glorie of mortall creatures! O the blind and peruerse thoughts of foolish men! Why do we so magnifie our selues? why are we so puffed vp with pride? why do we so much set our minds vpon riches, authoritie, and other vanities of this life? whereof neuer man had yet one daies assurance, and at our most need and when we least thinke, quite forsake vs; leauing euen them that most fought after them, and most abounded in them, throwded oft times in the sheet of dishonor and shame.

That his death is otherwise by some reported, I am not ignorant: the Turkes saying, that he died miraculously forewarned of his death at HADRIANOPLE: and some others, that he died

Let mine example (quoth he) be a warning vnto thee my sonne, neuer to contemne thine enemy, be he neuer so weake: of which one thing about all others, I haue repented my selfe of long, and shall doe after my death, if any feeling of humane things remaine in the dead. And that I was so foolish, and inconsiderat as to foster vp as it were in my bosome this my domesticall and neglected enemy: whereby I haue purchased vnto my selfe this calamitie, and for euer blemished the honor of the Ottoman kings: whilest I so basely ending my daies vnder the wals of CROIA, shall become a by-word vnto the world, and all posteritie for euer. This traitour should euen then haue been oppressed, when he by great treacherie, first recovered his wicked kingdom: in that newnesse of his estate, and before the minds of the people were assured vnto him, then it had been an easie matter, without bloodshed to haue viterly extinguished the wretch, together with his name. Ali Bassa whose euill fortune was the first beginning of his good: nor the other Generals, who by him slaine or taken prisoners, increased his strength and credit with his subjects, should not haue been sent against him: a thing which I haue oftentimes thought vpon, but could scarce haue beleueed, that euer I should haue thereby receiued such disgrace, together with the ignominious renting of my kingdom: if I had not been taught the same by mine owne experience, to my great losse and hearts greefe. We entred into EPIRVS, and here encamped an hundred and threescore thousand men strong: now if leasure serue you, take view of them, examine the matter, you shall find a great want of that number. The fields could not contain our regiment, and the multitude of our men: but now, how many tents stand empty? how many horses want riders? You shall go to HADRIANOPLE with our forces much impaired. As for me, the destinies haue vowed my spirit to this country of EPIRVS, as vnto me fatal. But wherefore do I impute vnto my selfe these impediments and chances of Fortune? for then first began this seed of mischief in EPIRVS, when the

in Asia, stricken with an Apoplexie proceeding of a surfer taken of the immoderat drinking of wine. But Marinus Barlesius, who liued in his time in Scodra fast by Epirus, whose authoritie, in report of the warres betwixt him and Scanderbeg we follow, setteth it downe in such manner as is aforesaid.

Presently after his death, Mahomet his sonne, for feare of some innouation to be made at home, raised the siege, and returned to HADRIANOPLE: and afterward with great solemnitie buried his dead bodie at the West side of Prusa, in the suburbs of the citie, where he now lieth in a chappell without any rooffe, his graue nothing differing from the manner of the common Turks: which (they say) he so commaunded to be done in his last will; that the mercie and blessing of God (as he termed it) might come vnto him by the shining of the Sunne and Moone, and falling of the raine and dew of heauen vpon his graue.

He whilest he liued mightily enlarged the Turkish kingdome, and with greater wisdom and policie than his predecessours, established the same: insonmuch that some attribute vnto him the first institution of the Ianizaries, and other souldiours of the court (the greatest strength of the Turkish empire) before indeed begun in the time of Amurath the first, his great grandfather, (as is before declared); but by him greatly augmented, and the policie of that state, whereby it hath euer since in his posteritie flourished, euen by himselfe plotted. For the better establishing whereof in his owne house, and to cut off all occasions of feare; as also to leaue all such as might haue the heart to arise against him, all naked and bare of forces to resist; but especially the other ancient and noble families of the Turks, still secretly repining at the great honour of the Othoman kings: he as a man of great wisdom and judgement, to keepe them vnder, in the beginning of his raigie, by manifold fauours began to bind vnto himselfe men of strange and forraigne countreys, his seruants; and by ordering of his most waightie affaires by their authoritie, so by little and little to cast off the seruice of his naturall Turks: they in the meane time little or nothing at all looking into this his practise. And whereas the Othoman kings his predecessours had for the most part, or rather all together raised their Ianizaries and other souldiours of the court, of such children of the Christians as were taken in the warres; he, seeing by experience how seruicable those new kind of souldiours were, began forthwith to plot in his head, how to make himselfe an armie all together of such able persons, his owne creatures, and so to bring in a new kind of warfare, wholly depending of himselfe. And to that end, by his officers appointed for that purpose, tooke from the Christians throughout his dominions, euerie fift child: the fairest and aptest of whom, he placed in his owne Seraglio at HADRIANOPLE, and the rest in other like places by him built for such purpose: where they were by sufficient teachers, first instructed in the principles of the Mahometan religion, and then in all manner of actiuitie and feats of armes. Of these, when they were grown to mans state, he made horsemen, gaue them great pensions, and sorting them into diuers orders appointed them also to guard his person; honouring the better sort of them with the name of Spahi-Oglani, that is to say, His sonnes the knights. And of these he began to make his Baslaes, his Generals of his armies, and the Gouernours of his prouinces and cities, with all the great offices of the state. The rest and farre the greatest part of these tribute children taken from their Christian parents, and not brought vp in these Seraglioes, hee caused to be dispersed into euerie citie and countrey of his dominion in Asia, there for certaine yeares to be brought vp in all hardnesse and painfull labour, neuer tasting of ease or pleasure: out of which hard brood so enured to paines, he made choise of so many of the most lustie and able bodies fittest for seruice, as he thought good; who kept in continuall exercise, and by skillfull men taught to handle all maner of weapons, but especially the bow, the peece, and the Scimitar, were by him as occasion serued added to the other Ianizaries, and appointed for the guarding of his person: calling them commonly by the names of his sonnes. The remainder of these tribute children, as vsit for the warres, hee put vnto other base occupations and ministeries. But vnto those martiall men of all sorts so by him ordained, hee appointed a continuall pay, according to their degrees and places: and by great benefits and liberties bestowed vpon them, bound them so fast vnto him, as that he might now account himselfe to haue of them so many sonnes, as hee had souldiours: For they together with the Christian religion, hauing forgot their parents and countrey, and knowing no other lord and master but him, and acknowledging all that they had to come and proceed of his free grace onely, remained euer bound and faithfull vnto him; and to keepe others also, as well the naturall Turks themselves, as the other oppressed Christians within the bounds of obedience and loyaltie. A great policie proceeding from a deepe judgement, first to weaken the Christians by taking from them their best children, and of greatest hope; and then by them depending wholly of himselfe, to keepe in awe and dutifull obedience his naturall subjects also: hauing them alwaies as a scourge readie to chastise the rebellious or disloyall. Now the other Othoman kings and emperours, the successors of Amurath, keeping this custome, and also increasing it one after another, haue thereby not onely kept the empire still in their house and familie, where it was first gotten: but also so maintained the maiestie of their state, as that they are of their subjects feared, obeyed, and honoured, not as kings, but as gods. For the naturall Turks their subjects loosing courage continually, and daily growing more base and dastardly, by reason they are not suffered to practise the knowledge of armes; and the souldiours in whose power all things are, knowing nothing of their owne, but holding and acknowledging all that they haue to come of their lord, account them as kings and lords of all: ruling much after the manner of the Pharaohs the ancient kings of Egypt; who were absolute lords and masters, both of the publick and priuat wealth of their subjects, whom they kept vnder as slaues and villaines. And hereof cometh it to passe, that the better part of them, whom we call Turks (but are indeed the children of Christians, and seduced by their false instructors) desire to be called Muslims (that is to say, right beleeuers) hold it a reproachfull and dishonourable thing to be called Turks, as it were peculiarly and aboue other people: For that they knowing right well, that there is not one naturall Turke among all those that beare authoritie and rule, and are had in greater honour and reputation than the rest (such as are the men of warre and courtiers) but he is borne a Christian either of father, or at the least of his grandfather; auaunch those onely to be Turks which liue in NATOLIA, all of them either marchants, or of base and mechanicall crafts, or poore labourers with the spade and pickaxe, and such like people vsit for the warres; the rest (as I say) holding it for a title of honour to be descended of Christian parents. Yea the Grand Signior himselfe, although by the fathers side he bee come of progenitors such as were naturall Turks borne, yet many of them had Christian mothers, which they accounted in the greatest part of their nobilitie and honour. Thus by the wisdom of Amurath was the order of the Ianizaries, and other souldiours of the court greatly aduanced, though not by him begun, and the politicke state of the Turkish kingdome (to say the truth) quite altered; the naturall Turks (more than the Sultan himselfe) now bearing therein no sway: but onely these new souldiours, all of them descended from Christian parents, and by adoption as it were become the sonnes of the Turkish Sultans, and vnder them commanding all: by whom they haue euer since managed their estate, &c. by their good seruice wonderfully, euen to the astonishment of the world, encreased and extended their empire. But of them more shall be said hereafter.

This great king was whilest hee liued, of his subjects woonderfully beloued, and no lesse of them after his death lamented. He was more faithfull of his word than any of the Turkish kings either before or after him: by nature melancholie and sad, and accounted rather politicke than valiant, yet was indeed both: a great dissembler and painefull in trauaile, but wayward and testie aboue measure, which many imputed vnto his great age. He had issue sixe sonnes, Achmetes, Aladin, Mahomet, Hasan (otherwise called Chasani) Vrehan, and Achmetes the younger, of some called Calepinus: three of whom died before him; but the two youngest were

lib. 3.

Solut & immensi qui timor orbis evant:
Me rapuit quæ cunque rapit mors improba, sed sum Virtute excelsa, ductus ad astra tamen Maior Alexander non me fuit, Anniball & non,
Fuderit Ausonios tot licet ille duces:
Vici victores Danados, domumque feroces Caonia populos, Sauromata, quæ vinctes:
Pannonius sensit, quantum surgebat in armis Vis mea: quæ latio cognita nuper erat.
Arsacide sensere manus has, sensit Arabs quæ:
Et mea sunt Persæ cognita tela duci.
Mens fuerat, bellare Rhodum, superare superbam

In English thus.

I that so many nations, townes, and kingdomes, haue brought low;
And haue alone dismaied the world,
and filld the earth with woe:
Am now by death (which all deuoures) brought downe from his degree, Yet doth the glorie of my name, surmount the starrie skie.
The great king Alexanders fame,
the world no better filld:
Nor worthy Hannibal, whose force
so many Romans kild.
I vanquishd the victorious Greeks, and tam'd with mightie hand,
The warlike people of EPHRS, and fierce TARTARIA land.
My force in field HUNGARIA felt,
my greatnesse is there knowne:
Which of late time through ITALY,
to their great ruth is blowne.
Th' Assyrians felt my heauie hand,
so did th' Arabians wild:
The Persian king with all his force,
I driue out of the field.
I purposed to win the RHODES,
and ITALY vndoc:
If that the fatall destinies, had granted leaue thereto.
But wo is me, for grisly death hath brought all this to nought:
And in the twinckling of an eye,
is perisht all I thought.
So perissheth the pride of man,
his honour, wealth, and power,
His golde, and whatsoeuer else,
it fadeth as a flower.

THE LIFE OF MAHOMET, SE-COND OF THAT NAME, SEVENTH KING AND FIRST EMPEROVR OF THE TURKS, FOR HIS MANY VICTORIES SVRNA-MED THE GREAT.

He report of the death of old Amurath the late king, was in short time blowne through most part of Christendome, to the great joy of many: but especially of the Greekes, and other poore Christians which bordered vpon the tyrants kingdome; who were now in hope, together with the change of the Turkish king, to make exchange also of their bad estate and fortune: and the rather, for that it was thought, that his eldest sonne Mahomet, after the death of his father, would haue embraced the Christian religion, being in his childhood instructed therein (as was supposed) by his mother, the daughter of the prince of SERVIA, a Christian. But vaine was this hope, and the joy thereof but short, as afterward by prooffe appeared. For Mahomet being about the age of one and twentie yeares, succeeding his father in the kingdome in the yeare of our Lord 1450, embraced in shew the Mahometane religion, abhorring the Christian, but indeed making no great reckoning either of the one or of the other; but as a mere Atheist, deuoid of all religion, and worshipping no other god but good fortune, derided the simplicitie of all such as thought that God had any care or regard of worldly men, or of their actions: which gracelesse resolution so wrought in him, that he thought all things lawfull that agreed with his lust, and making conscience of nothing, kept no league, promise, or oath, longer than stood with his profit or pleasure.

Now in the Court men stood diuersly affected towards the present state: the mightie Bassaes and others of great authoritie, vnto whom the old kings government was neuer greuous, inwardly lamented his death; doubting least the fierce nature of the yong king should turne to the hurt of some of them in particular, and the shortening of their authoritie in generall, as indeed it shortly after fell out. But the lustie gallants of the Court wearie of the old king, who in hope of preferment had long wished for the gouernment of the yong prince, were glad to see him set vpon his fathers seat. And the vulgar people (neuer constant but in vconstancie, and alwaies fawning vpon the present) exceedingly rejoyced in their yong king. The Ianizaries also at the same time (according to their accustomed manner) tooke the spoile of the Christians and Iewes that dwelt amongst them, and easily obtained pardon for the same: whereupon he was by the same Ianizaries and the other souldiours of the Court with great triumph saluted king. Which approbation of these men of warre, is vnto the Turkish kings a greater assurance for the possession of their kingdome, than to be borne the eldest sonne of the king, as in the processe of this Historie shall appeare: so great is the power of these masterfull slaues, in promoting to the kingdome which soeuer of the kings sonnes they most fauour, without much regard whether he be the eldest or not.

This yong tyrant was no sooner possessed of his fathers kingdome, but that hee forgetting the lawes of nature, was presently in person himselfe about to haue murdered with his owne hands, thren, hands his youngest brother, then but eigheteen moneths old, begotten on the daughter of Sponderbeius. Which vnaturall part, Moses one of his Bassaes, and a man greatly in his fauour, perceiving, requested him not to imbrue his owne hands in the blood of his brother, but rather to commit the execution thereof to some other: which thing Mahomet commaunded him the author of that counsell forthwith to doe. So Moses taking the child from the nurse, strangled it, with pouring water downe the throat thereof. The young ladie vnderstanding of the death of her child (as a woman whom furie had made past feare) came, and in her rage reuiled the tyrane to his face, shamefully vpbraiding him for his inhumane crueltie. When Mahomet to appease her furie, requested her to be content, for that it stood with the policie of his state: and willed her for her better contentment, to aske whatsoever she pleased, and she should forthwith haue it. But she desiring nothing more than in some sort to be reuenged, desired to haue Moses (the executioner of her sonne) deliuered vnto her, bound: which when she had obtained, she presently strucke him into the breast with a knife (crying in vaine vpon his vnthankfull master for helpe) and proceeding in her cruell execution, cut an hole in his right side, and by peece-meale cut out his liver, and cast it to the dogs to eat. At the same time also he caused another of his brethren, committed by his father to the keeping of Cilly Bassa, and now by him betrayed into his hands, to be likewise murdered.

Mahomet reformeth the Turkish commonweale.

Thus beginning his tyrannous raigne with the bloodie execution of them that were in blood nearest vnto him, and whom of all others he ought to haue defended, he presently after began to frame a new forme of a commonweale, by abrogating and altering the old lawes and customes, and publishing of new, better fitting his owne humour, and more commodious for himselfe: imposing also new taxes and subsidies vpon his subjects, neuer before heard of; thereby to increase his treasures, and satisfie his auaritious desire: which amongst many other his vices so much rained in him, as that he was thought ouersparing vnto himselfe, as well in his apparrell as in his diet. And proceeding farther, hee called vnto straight account all the great officers of his kingdom: of whom some he put to death, and confiscated their goods; others he put to great fines, or quite remooued them from their offices. In like manner hee dealt also with his great Bassaes, admitting many false and surmised accusations against them: whereby to bring them within his danger, where little mercie was to be looked for. By which meanes hee became no lesse terrible vnto his subjects, than he was afterward vnto his enemies; and so was of them exceedingly feared, but more hated. Amongst other things, hee much misliked in his court the excessive number of faulconers and huntmen; which was growne so great by the immoderat delight which his predecessors tooke in the pleasures of the field, that there were continually maintained of the kings charge, seuen thousand faulconers, and not many fewer huntmen, saying, That he would not be so much a foole, as to maintaine such a multitude of men to attend vpon so meere a vanitie. And therefore tooke order, that from thenceforth there should bee allowance made for five hundred faulconers onely, and one hundred huntmen: the rest he appointed to serue as souldiours in his warres. At the same time also he entered into league with Constantinus Paleologus, the emperour of CONSTANTINOPLE, and the other princes of GRECIA: as also with the Despot of SERVIA, his grandfather by the mothers side, as some will haue it; howbeit, some others write, that the Despot his daughter, Amurath his wife, was but his mother in law, whom hee vnder the colour of friendship sent backe againe vnto her father after the death of Amurath, still allowing her a princely dowrie. But if shee were not his mother (as like ynough it is that shee was not) much more happie was she, that the neuer groned for so gracelesse a sonne.

Mahomet goes
of Caramania.

Whilest Mahomet was thus occupied about his ciuile affaires, Ibrahim king of CARAMANIA, who long before had married Amurath his sister, and yet for all that, had (as his ancestors had before him) alwaies eniued the prosperous successe of the Othoman kings, tooke occasion in the first yeare of Mahomet his raigne, with fire and sword to invade his dominions in ASIA. Which thing when Mahomet vnderstood, he displaced Isa his lieutenant in ASIA, as a man not sufficient to manage so great warres, and appointed Isack Bassa in his roome, a most valiant man of warre, vpon whom not long before he had vpon speciall fauour bestowed in marriage the faire daughter of Sponderbeius, one of his fathers wiues, of whom we haue before spoken. This great Bassa passing ouer into ASIA, raised a great armie. After whom followed Mahomet in person himselfe with a greater, out of EVROPE: and hauing all his forces together, entered with great hostilitie into CARAMANIA. But the Caramanian king perceiving himselfe vnable to withstand so puissant an enemy, fled into the strength of the great mountaines, and by his embassadours offered vnto Mahomet such reasonable conditions of peace, as that hee was content to accept thereof. Which after they had by solemne oath on both parts confirmed, Mahomet returned with his armie to PRUSA: but when hee was come thither, the Janizaries presuming that they might be bold with the young king: putting themselves in order of battaille, came, & with great insolencie demanded of him a donatiue or largitious, as a reward of their good seruice done. With which so great presumption, Mahomet was inwardly chafed: but for so much as they were his best souldiours, and alreadie in armes, he wisely dissembled his anger for the present, hauing a little before had warning thereof by Abedin Bassa, and Turechah-beg, two of his great captaines, who had got some suspicion of the matter: wherefore to content them, hee caused tenne great bags of aspers to bee scattered amongst them, and so pacified the matter. But within few daies after, he caused Doganes (the Aga or cheefe captaine of the Janizaries) to be brought before him, and to be shamefully whipt: and so presently discharging him of his office, placed one Mustapha in the same. The like seueritie he vsed against the rest of the vndercaptaines, causing them to be cruelly scourged and beaten like slaues: which in that tyrannicall government is an vsuall punishment, vpon the least displeasure of the king to be inflicted vpon any man, without respect of degree or calling, if he be not a naturall Turke borne. Presently after he sent Isack his lieutenant against Elias prince of MENTESIA or CARIA, by whom the poore prince was driuen out of his countrey: euer since which time it hath remained in subjection to the Turkish kings, as part of their kingdom and empire.

When Mahomet had thus ended the Caramanian war, and was determined with his armie to returne to HADRIANOPE, he was aduertised, That the straits of HELLESPONTVS were so strongly possessed by the Christian fleet, that he could not possibly there passe ouer but with most manifest danger: wherefore hee tooke his way through that part of BYTHINIA which lieth about CONSTANTINOPLE, and came to the castle which the Turks call Acce-Chisar, and the Grecians Acronaspor, or White castle, standing vpon the narrow strait of BOSPHORVS on ASIA side, and there passed ouer into EVROPE at the same place where his father Amurath had not many yeares before in like maner found passage. Where when he was safely got ouer with his armie, he by the aduise of his Bassaes encamped fast by the sea side, and there presently began to build a great strong castle close vnto the straits of BOSPHORVS, nere vnto PROBONTIS on EVROPE side, directly oueragainst the other castle in ASIA. For the speedie accomplishment of which worke, he assembled thither all the workemen he could possibly get out of EVROPE and ASIA; apportioning vnto his captaines and souldiours of his armie part of the worke also: by whose industrie and labour, that great building was in shorter time brought to perfection, than was by any man at the first expected. This castle which for the greatnesse thereof is of most writers reputed for a citie, was by the Turks named Genichisar, & of the Grecians Neocastron, or New castle, and also Lamocastron, or castle vpon the straits: and was there by the Turks built, as well for the safetie of their owne passage too and fro, as for to hinder the passage of the Christians through those narrow straits, they now possessing the strong forts on both sides: and thereby also to distresse the citie of CONSTANTINOPLE, from whence this castle was not above five miles distant. When Mahomet in the second yeare of his raign had finished this great castle, with some other small forts about the same, and also repaired the other castle in ASIA oueragainst it, hee placed therein strong garrisons, and furnished the same with attillerie; in such sort, that no ship could passe through the strait of BOSPHORVS into the great Euxine or blacke sea, but she was in danger to be sunke: whereby the rich trade which the merchants of VENICE, GENVA, and CONSTANTINOPLE, had to CAFFA, and other places lying vpon the Euxine, were almost quite cut off, to the great hinderance of those estates. Now Mahomet by nature ambitious, and withall desirous to doe some such thing as the glorie whereof might farre passe the fame of his predecessors, thought nothing more answerable vnto his high conceits, than to attempt the winning of CONSTANTINOPLE, and the vtter subuersion of the Greeke empire: whereupon his father Amurath, and his great grandfather Baidar, had before in vaine spent their forces. Besides that, it greeued him to see that goodly citie, the ancient seat of the Christian empire, to be so commodiously situated, as it were in the midst of his kingdom, and not to be at his commaund. Hereunto the small power of the Greeke emperor himselfe, and the other Christian princes at the same time at mortall discord amongst themselves, ministred vnto his greedie desire no small hope of successe, and serued as spurs to pricke him forward vnto so great an enterprise. Wherefore all the Winter he caused great preparation to be made of shipping and warlike prouision both for sea and land: and gaue out commissions for the leuying of a mightie armie, to be in readinesse against the next Spring. But whither hee would employ the same, no man could certainly tell: some gesing one thing, and some another, as the manner of men is, when such extraordinarie preparation is at hand. Constantinus the eight of that name, then emperor of CONSTANTINOPLE, a prince of a mild and soft spirit, fitter for the church than for the field, hearing of the great preparation made by the Turkish king: and fearing least that tempest then growing, should vpon the suddaine breake forth vpon himselfe, first made such preparation, as his owne small abilitie would extend vnto: and then sent his embassadours vnto other Christian princes, earnestly craveng their aid and assistance in that his dangerous estate. But that labour was lost, and all his sute vaine: for they being at variance one with another, and hauing more care of priuat reuenge than how to repulse the common enimie of Christianity, could not or would not afford him any helpe at all. Nicholas the fift of that name, then bishop of ROME, with Alphonfus king of NAPLES, and the state of VENICE, promised to haue sent him thirtie gallies, but none for all that came.

There was by chauce at CONSTANTINOPLE certaine ships and gallies of VENICE, GENOVA, CRETE, and CHIOS, of whom the emperor made stay: at which time also it chanced, that Ioannes Iustinianus, an aduenturer of GENOVA, who had bene scouring those seas, came to CONSTANTINOPLE with two tall ships, and foure hundred souldjors: where he was entertained by the emperor. And for as much as he was a man honourably defended, and supposed to be both of great courage and direction, was by the emperor appointed Generall of all his forces next vnto himselfe. He also entertained six thousand Greekes: which, with three thousand Venetians, Genowaies, and others, whom he had made stay of, joined vnto the citizens, was all the weake strength he had to relye vpon, for the defence of his state and empire.

Against the beginning of the Spring, the Turkish king had in readinesse a great and puissant armie of three hundred thousand men, of whom, the greatest part were taken out of BYLGARIA, SERVIA, RASCIA, THESSALIA, MACEDONIA, and GRECIA, which as yet were called the Christian countries, and were themselves either indeed Christians, or els such renegates as had not long before forsaken the Christian faith: vnto these also were joynd diuers other Christians which came out of GERMANIE, BOHEMIA, and HUNGARIE, to serue the Turke in his warres. This hath beene none of the least meanes, whereby the Turkish kings haue growne so great, and their kingdome so mightily enlarged, by enforcing and alluring Christians to fight against Christians, to the vtter confusion of themselves. Amongst the great multitude of the European Christians, were mingled his effeminate souldjors of ASIA, and his naturall Turks and Ianizaries, which were in number fewest, and yet commaunded all the rest.

Mahomet en-campeth before Constantinople.

With this great armie, well appointed with all warlike prouision, came Mahomet the Turkish king from HADRIANOPLE: and the ninth day of Aprill, in the yeare 1453, encamped before CONSTANTINOPLE, and with the multitude of his armie filled all the maine land before the citie, from the sea side of BOSPHORVS, vnto the place where the same sea compasseth in the citie on two parts, and running farre into the land betwixt CONSTANTINOPLE and PERRA, maketh there a goodly haven betwixt them.

The situation of Constantinople.

This citie of CONSTANTINOPLE (called in ancient time BIZANTIUM) is in forme of a Triangle, situated in EVROPE in the pleasant countrey of THRACIA, vpon a point of the maine land shooting out towards ASIA, called of Plinie & Solinus, The promontorie CHRYSOCEBRAS; where the sea of PROBONTIS joyneth vnto that strait of sea which diuideth ASIA from EVROPE, called in ancient time BOSPHORVS THRACIVS; sometime the strait of PROBONTIS; and the mouth of PONTVS; and of the moderne writers, the strait of CONSTANTINOPLE; and about 200 yeares past, or more, S. George his aume. This point of the maine, whereon the citie standeth, lyeth about two Italian miles more Northward than doth the ancient citie of CALCEDON, on the other side of the strait in ASIA: more than thirtie miles distant from the Euxine or blacke sea, lying from it Northward; and two hundred miles from the strait of HELLESPONTVS or CALCIPOLIS, from thence South. Which noble citie (of all others most fitly seated for the empire of the world, and with great majesticke overlooking both EVROPE and ASIA) is by the Cosmographers accounted to stand in the height of 43 degrees, vpon seven little hills of no great and easie ascent: and was there first built by Pausanias the Lacedemonian king, and called BIZANTIUM, and so many yeares flourished as a populous and rich citie, vntill the ciuile warres betwixt Seuerus the emperor, and Niger: what time it endured the siege of the Romanes vnder Seuerus, three yeares, with such obstinacie, that it yielded not vntill it was brought to such extremitie that the citizens did eat one another; and then yielding, had the wals ouerthrowne by Seuerus, and the citie it selfe destroyed, and brought to the low estate of a poore countrey village, and so by him giuen to the Perinthians. In which base estate it continued vntill the time of Constantine the Great, the sonne of Helena (whom some will needs haue to haue beene an English woman) by whom it was new built, and beautified with buildings so stately and sumptuous, that vnto the strange beholders it seemed a dwelling place for heavenly wights rather than for earthly men. And to grace it the more, translated his imperiall seat thither, and called it NOVA ROMA, or new ROME; and all that pleasant part of THRACIA alongst the sea coast of HELLESPONTVS, PROBONTIS, and BOSPHORVS, by the name of ROMANIA, of the faire Romane colonies there by him planted, which name it at this day retaineth, and is of the Turks called ROMILIA and ROMELI (that is to say) the Romane countrey. But as for the citie it selfe, the glorious name of the founder so preuailed, that the citie was and yet is of him called CONSTANTINOPLE, or Constantine his citie: and now of the barbarous Turkes commonly, but corruptly, STAMBOLLI. It is (as we said) built in the forme of a Triangle, whereof the longest side which runneth from Northeast to Southwest, is on the South side washed with the PROBONTIS; and towards the ending of the point which is about the seauen towers, is somewhat indented; being commonly reputed to be eight miles long. The other side lyeth East and West fise miles in length, being washed with the haven, which is somewhat more than eight miles long before it meet with the fresh water, and about a quarter of a mile broad: on the farther side whereof standeth the citie of PERRA, commonly called GALATA, sometimes a colonie of the Genowaies. This haven is very deepe, and by that reason as commodious as deepe, bearing ships full fraught close to the shoare, so that they may discharge their burthens with the least trouble that may be, and is of Strabo called CORNU BIZANTI, or the horne of Bizantium. The third side of this citie towards the Continent, lyeth almost North and South fise miles also in length: those two sides that lie vpon the sea, and the haven, are enuironed and girt in with a single wall, built after the antique maner, with many high towers, which strongly defend & flanke the same. Without which wals (especially towards the haven) there lyeth a street between them and the shore. But the other side which is the third, and regardeth the main land (beside the ditch, which is also fenced) is defended with three wals: the first wall standing vpon the ditch being but low; and the second not farre distant from the first, raised somewhat higher; but the third ouerlooketh and commaundeth both the other; from whence as from an high fortresse both the other wals and all the ditch without may easily be defended. But the two vtter wals, with the whole space betwixt them, are now by the Turks but slenderly maintained, lying full of earth and other rubbish, euen as they were in the time of the Grecians: some cause why they with lesse heart and courage defended the same against their barbarous enemies. In the East part of the citie, on that point which in the raighe of the Grecians was called the cape of S. Demetrio, distant from ASIA not much more than halfe a mile, standeth the Seraglio or pallace of the great Turke, containing in it selfe a great part of an hill, enclosed round with a wall, as if it were it selfe a citie, in circuit more than two miles: wherein amongst other stately buildings, neere vnto the sea standeth a verie faire and sumptuous gallerie, built for pleasure, with a priuie gate well fortified and planted with great ordinance, and other munition, whereby the great Turke at certaine times passeth, when he is disposed in his gallie to take his pleasure vpon the sea, or to passe over the strait vnto his houses or gardens of delight, on the other side in ASIA. In this great citie are also many other most stately and sumptuous buildings, as well of late erected by the Turkish Sultans, since they became lords thereof, as before by the Greeke emperours: amongst all which, the Temple of S. Sophia standing in the East side of the citie, not farre from the Seraglio (now reduced vnto the forme of a Mahometan Moschie, and whether the great Turke goeth often times to heare seruice, being indeed but the Sanctuarie or chauncell onely of the great, stately, and wonderfull church built by Iustinian the emperor) is most beautifull and admirable. That which standeth of it now, is both round & verie high, built after the fashion of the Pantheon in ROME, but much greater, fairer, and not open in the top as is that: the wals thereof being of the finest

marble, and the floare all paved with faire marble also. In the middest there is a verie great and large circle, compassed in with high and huge pillars of most excellent marble of diuers sorts; and these support a mightie vault that beareth vp as many moe pillars aboue, standing after the verie same order; and in a downe right line, almost of the like greatnesse and goodnesse of the marble with the other below: vpon which, aboue the second vault, in manner of a loofe, resteth the great round rooffe which couereth all that space of the church which is compassed with the aforefaid pillars: being all enameled and fillited, with the pictures of Saints, after the ancient manner of some great churches in Christendome: but that the Turks, who like not to haue any pictures in their churches, haue put out their eyes onely, as loath to spoile such a rare peece of worke, and utterly to deface it. In like manner the wals of the vpper vault are wrought, painted, or portraied after the same order, though in some part decayed, by reason of their long continuance and standing. About this church are eighteen or twentie dores of brasse, right faire and costly, well declaring the magnificence and greatnesse thereof in more ancient times: when as it had (as is reported) more than two hundred dores of like making and greatnesse; and beside the hugeness of the frame and building it selfe, had also diuers faire monasteries and houses of religion joynd vnto it: whereunto belonged six thousand priests, whose houses and lodgings extended almost all ouer the place where now the Turke his pallace standeth, and the other places adjoyning to this great church, which is now their cheefe Moschie, and called by them by the proper name of S. Sophia, because they hold euen as we do, the wisdom of God to be incomprehensible and infinit. The next in magnificence vnto this is the Moschie of Solyman, wherein he lyeth buried, with his welbeloued wife the faire Roxelana: a worke well becoming the majestie of so mightie a monarch. There are beside these also many other faire Moschies, Seraglios for the Turke his wyues and concubines, Bezestanes or Buttes for marchants, Obeliskes, Batches, and other publicke edifices and buildings of great majestic and state, all well worth the beholding: wherein consisteth all the beautie of this so auncient and renowned a citie; faire vnlike to that it was in the time of the first Greeke emperours, and before it was spoiled by the Latines. For the Turkes priuate houses in this so great and imperiall a citie, so much renowned through the world, are for the most part low and base, after the Turkish fashion, built some of wood, some of stone, and some of vnburnt bricke, layd with clay and dyrt, which quickly decayeth againe: they after their homely manner (by long custome receiued) neuer building any thing sumptuously for their owne priuate vse, but contenting themselves with their simple cottages, how meane soeuer, commonly saying them to be good enough for the short time of their pilgrimage; and yet not sparing for any cost vpon the publicke buildings and ornaments of the commonwealth, which they build with great majestic and pompe; but especially their Moschies, wherein they excell. Neuertheless there yet are in CONSTANTINOPLE some other houses also built high and comely inough; but these bee few, and verie old, all inhabited by the Christians and Iewes, and not by the Turks. But of this inough, and so againe to our purpose.

The Souldiers of the Turkes in their priuate houses.

The Turke's fleet.

Mahomet with his puissant armie thus encamped before the citie, placing his Asian souldiers on the right hand, toward the Bosphorus; his European souldiers on the left hand, toward the haue; lay himselfe with 15000 Ianizaries and other souldiers of the court, in the middle betwixt both, against the heart of the citie. On the farther side of the haue also by Pera, hee placed Zoganus, one of his cheefe counsellors, with another part of his armie. At which time also Pantolages his Admirall came to the siege, with a fleet of thirtie gallies, and 200 other small ships, and a number of other lesser vessels, which were rowed with three, or fve oares a peece, full of Turkish archers, fitter for shew than seruice. But for defence of the haue, and so of the citie on that side, the emperour had caused the haue to bee strongly chained ouerthwart from the citie to Pera: and within the chaine had orderly placed his small fleet, the greatest strength whereof was seauen great ships of Genoa, with three gallies, and two galliots of Venice, three of Creta, and a few others of the Island of Chios; all which were there, rather by chance vpon marchants affaires, than that they were provided for any such seruice: yet by this means the Turke's fleet was shut out of the haue, and so the citie put in good safetie on that side.

When Mahomet had thus conveniently encamped his armie, and surrounded the citie both by sea and land: he first cast vp great trenches as neere as hee possibly could vnto the wals of the citie, and raised mounts in diuers places as high as the wals themselves, from whence the Turks with their shot greatly annoied the defendants. After that, hee placed his batterie against one of the gates of the citie called CALEGARIA, and terribly battered the same, especially with one peece of ordinance of a wonderfull greatnesse, which with much difficultie was brought from HADRIANOPLE with an hundred & fiftie yoke of oxen, & caried a buller of an hundred pound waight, made (as his other shot was) of a kind of hard blacke stone brought from the Euxine sea. For as yet (as it seemeth) so soone after the inuention of that fatall engine, the vse of bullets of metall was vnknowne. There with continuall batterie, he terribly shooke the wals, which although they were verie strong, yet were they not able to withstand the furie of so great a batterie. The Christians also out of the citie discharged their great artilerie vpon the Turkes; but so sparingly, as if they had bene afraid to shake their owne wals; or loath for good husbandrie, to spend shot & powder, which was vnto the canoniers verie sparingly allowed: yet that which was spent, was so well bestowed, that the Turkes were therewith greuously annoyed. The breach also which they had made at the aforefaid gate, was by the defendants with great and dangerous labour againe repaired with faggots and earth; and such like matter best seruing for that purpose, and so made stronger than before. In which most dangerous work, they were altogether directed and greatly encouraged by Iustinianus the Geniway, the emperours lieutenant general for defence of the citie.

Yet for all this diligence of the Christians, Mahomet continued his batterie with no lesse furie than before: but reposing greater hope to find a way into the citie, by the spade and mattocke, than by batterie; hee employed his pyoners, whereof hee had great store, to digge a mine: Being altogether directed by Christians skilfull in that kind of worke, whom hee had for that purpose entertained. By whose cunning direction, with the industrious labour of the poore pyoners, the mine was brought to such perfection, that part of the wall, with one of the strong towers in the same, was quite vndermined, and stood supported, but with such vnstable staies as the pyoners had left for the bearing vp thereof vntill such time as it should by the tirants appointment be blown vp. This dangerous worke was neither perceiued, neither yet feared by the Constantinopolitans, as a thing not possible to haue bene done: forasmuch as Baiuzet and Amirath had both with great labour before in vaine attempted the same, at such time as they hardly besieged the citie. But that which those great kings had with much vaine labour by vnskillfull men made prooue of, Mahomet had now by men of greater deuise, brought to passe; although itooke not such effect as he wished: for one Ia. Grandis, a Germane captain, and a man of great experience, suspecting the matter, had caused a countermine to be made, whereby the labour of the Turkes was in good time discovered; and they with fire and sword driuen out of the mine, and the same strongly filled vp againe, and so the citie for that time deliuered of a great feare and danger. Mahomet perceiuing that it auailed him not to continue his batterie against that place which was againe so strongly repaired, remooued the same, and planted it against a tower called BACTATINA, neere vnto the gate called PORTA ROMANA, or Roman gate. Which tower shaken with continuall batterie, at length fell downe, and filled the ditch before the vter wall, euen with the ground. But this breach was also speedily and with great courage made vp againe by the defendants, although the Turkes did what they could, with continuall shot, to haue driuen them from the same. At which time they also erected certain high towers of timber, couered with raw hides to defend the same from fire, out of which they with their shot slew many of the Christians vpon the wals, and in making good the aforefaid breach: but Mahomet seeing this valiantnesse of the defendants, openly said, That it was neither the Grecians skill, nor courage, but the Frenchmen that defended the citie: For the Turkes commonly call all the Christians of the West by the name of Frankes or Frenchmen.

The cheerefulnesse and industrie of the Christians in defending and repairing the aforefaid breach, was so great, that the Turkish king began almost to dispaire of winning the citie; which hee could no way assault but on one side. When as a wicked Christian in his campe, put him againe in good hope, by shewing vnto him a deuise how to bring a great part of his fleet ouer land into the haue, and thereby to assault that part of the citie by water, which the citizens least feared: by which ingenious deuise, and by the great strength of men; Zoganus Bassa (to whom that charge was committed) brought seuentie of the lesser ships and galliots, with all their sailes abroad (to the great admiration of all that saw them) vp a great hill, and so by drie land, out of the Bosphorus behind Pera, the space of eight miles, into the haue of CONSTANTINOPLE, which running in betweene the citie and Pera, runneth into the maine land (as we sayd) about eight eight miles. The Christian that discovered this device vnto the king, is supposed to haue learned it of the Venetians, who not long before had done the like at the lake of BENNA CVS. Glad was Mahomet to see so many of his ships and gallies in the haven, and the Christians with the sight thereof no lesse discouraged. Neuerthelesse, they attempted to haue burnt those vessels as they were in launching, but the Turkes had so commodiously placed certaine peeces of great Ordinance for their defence, that the foremost of the gallies of the Christians, approaching the Turke fleet, was presently funke; wherewith the rest dismayed, returned backe from whence they came. Certaine of the Christians of the lost gallie, whom the Turkes tooke vp swimming in the haven, were the next day cruelly slaine in the sight of the Christians: in reuenge whereof, certain Turkes before taken prisoners into CONSTANTINOPLE, were forthwith brought to the top of the wals, and there in the sight of the campe with like crueltie put to death.

Mahomet thus possessed of the haven, shortly after caused a wonderfull bridge to be made quite ouer the haven, from Zoganus his campe which lay by P E R A, vnto the wals of CONSTANTINOPLE: which bridge was built with timber and planks, borne vp with small boats & empty caske, after a most strange manner, and was in length more than halfe a mile: by which bridge his armie came ouer the haven, to assault the citie on that side also.

In the meane time, three tall Genoway ships laded with corne from SICILIA, came with a faire wind of CHIO, with one of the emperours laded with corne from SICILIA, came with a faire wind for CONSTANTINOPLE. The Turkes great fleet then lying not farre off within the sight of the campe set vpon them, and after a great fight, wherein an exceeding number of the Turkes were slaine with shot, the gallies boorded the ships: but being much lower, were so far from doing any good, as that the Turkes could not well looke out, but they were from aboue slaine or wounded. Mahomet from the shore beholding the vnequall fight, and slaughter of his men, cried out aloud, sweareing and blaspheming God, and in great rage rid into the sea as farre as he durst; and coming backe againe, rent his clothes, faring with himselfe like a mad man. The whole armie of the Turkes beholding the same fight at sea, was filled with like indignation also, but could nothing remedie the matter. The great fleet ashamed in the sight of their king to bee overcome of so few ships, did what they might desperately to enter: but all in vaine, being continually overwhelmed with shot and stones from aboue, and valiantly beaten downe by the Christian souldiours. At length wearie of their losse, they were glad with dishonour to fall off againe, and to get them farther off. The report of the losse the Turkes sustained in this fight, is almost incredible: some of the Turkes fugitiues reported, almost ten thousand Turkes to haue there perished: but certain it is, that such was the losse, as filled the whole armie with indignation & sorrow, many hauing there lost their kinsmen or friends. Three of these ships that had made this fight, arrived in safetie at CONSTANTINOPLE, the other was lost. Mahomet vpon this overthrow conceived such displeasure against Pantogles his admirall, who in that fight had lost one of his eyes, that hee neuerthelesse thrust him out of his office, confiscated his goods, and was hardly by the great Basses entreated to spare his life.

Whilest Mahomet thus lay at the siege of CONSTANTINOPLE, and had thereunto given many great attempts, with more losse vnto himselfe than to the defendants, a rumour was raised in his campe, of great aid that was coming out of Italic by sea, and out of HUNGARIE by land, for the releefe of the besieged. This report (although indeed it was not true) with the due consideration of the danger of the siege, filled the Turkes campe with feare: so that the souldiours commonly murmured amongst themselves, saying, That to satisfie the ambitious humour of their young king, they were led to fight against impregnable wals and fortresses, yea against the barres of nature it selfe, without all reason. Whereupon Mahomet entered into consultation with the three great Basses his counsellors, Whether it were best for him to continue the siege, or not. When Caly Bassa, sometime his tutor, a man of greatest authoritie amongst the Turkes, both for his long experience and high place, and withall secretly favouring the distressed emperour, after hee had with long and graue discourse declared the difficultie or rather impossibilitie of the wished successe in the present warre; and confirmed the same, by producing the examples of Balier his great grandfather, and of Amurath his father, who had both in vaine made prooue of their strength against that citie: at length concluded, that in his opinion it were best for him to raise his siege, and to depart before he had sustained any further losse or disgrace. But Zoganus the second Bassa, in great fauour also with Mahomet, and secretly enuying the greatnesse of Caly Bassa, persuaded suaded the king to proceed in his honourable enterprife: assuring him of the good successe thereof, and with all the reasons he could deuise, impugned that which Caly Bassa had said: And of the same opinion with Zoganus was also the third Bassa, rather of purpose to crosse Caly Bassa, and withall to fit the kings humour, than for any great hope he had in the good successe of that hee so much desired. Howbeit the speech he and Zoganus deliuered, so well agreed with the kings affection, that he resolved to continue the siege: and therevpon gaue full authoritie to Zoganus to appoint a day for a great and generall assault to be giuen: resolving at once to gage all his forces vpon the winning of the citie. Which charge Zoganus gladly took vpon him, & with his good liking appointed the 29 day of May for that generall assault, being then the Tuesday next following. In the meane time he sent one Ismael, the sonne of Alexander prince of SINOPE, embassadour vnto the emperour, to offer him peace: but vpon such hard conditions, as were no lesse to be refused than death it selfe. Which thing he did, partly to satisfie the mindes of his Turkes (who are for most part of opinion, that God will not prosper them in their assaults except they first make vnto their enemies some offer of peace, how vnreasonable soeuer it forceth not) and partly to make prooue what confidence the enemy yet had in himselfe, for the holding out of the siege. But that dishonourable peace so offered, together with the intollerable conditions, was by the emperour honourably refused: who no lesse feared the Turkes faith (if he should haue accepted thereof) than he did the hardnesse of the conditions. Three daies before this fatal assault was to be giuen, the Turkes (according to their manner) kept their solemne fast, eating nothing all the day vntill night; and then making the greatest cheare and joy they could deuise, and in the winding vp of the fame, tooke their leaue one of another, with such kissing and embracing, as if they should neuer haue met againe. At the same time Mahomet to encourage his souldiours, caused proclamation to be made through his campe; That he would freely giue all the spoile of the citie for three daies vnto his souldiours if they could win it: and for confirmation thereof, solemly swore the Turkes great oath, By the immortall God; and by the foure hundred prophets, by Mahomet, by his fathers soule, by his owne childten, and by the sword wherewith hee was girt, faithfully to performe whatsoever he had to them in his proclamation promised.

Whilest these things were in doing, Caly Bassa disdaining that his counsaile was rejected, and the opinion of his aduersaries followed: by secret letters aduertised the emperour of the day appointed for the generall assault, together with all the preparation made against him: persuading him not to be afraid of them, who were themselves no lesse afraid of him; but carefully to provide to haue all things in readinesse for the defence of his citie, and valiantly to withstand the rash and last attempt of his enemies.

This wofull emperour had already done what he could to the utmost of his power for defence of the citie, all the time of the siege: but such was the disloyaltie of the citizens, his subjects, that many times they could hardly be drawne from their priuat trades and occupations vnto the wals to withstand the enemy, foolishly affirming, That it was to no purpose for them to fight against the Turkes at the breaches, and to starue for food at home in their houses: For which cause, the emperour commaunded a view to bee taken of all the corne in the citie (which then began to grow verie scarce) but vpon diligent search made, such store was found in many houses, hands, (which was by them either altogether kept in, or sold afterwards at vnreasonable prices; or else so sparingly vntered, as if they had none to spare) as that it appeared, the dearth and scarcitie which then beganne to increase, to proceed rather of the couetousnesse of men, than of any true want of graine: this store the emperour caused to bee proportionably diuided vnto euerie familie at reasonable prices, according to their spending; and for eased the great murmuring and grudging of the common people for bread. The Grecian mercinarie souldiours also, regarding more their owne priuate profit, than the publique seruice, refused any longer to goe to the wals than they were sure of their daily pay: which the poore emperour otherwise vnable to giue them, was glad to conuert the church plate and Jewels into money, to content them. For he had many times before with teares, in vaine, requested to haue borrowed monie of his couetous subjects, to haue been employed in the defence of the citie; but they would still sweare, that they had it not, as men growne poore for want of trade: which in few daies after, their enemies found in such abundance, that they wondered at their wealth, and derided their folly. That possessing so much, they would bestow so little, in defence of themselves and their country: But this had been their usual manner of dealing with their emptiours, in that declining state of the empire:

pire: as well appeared in the time of the emperor Baldwin, who for lacke of monie was glad first to sell away many of the goodly ornaments of the citie, and afterwards to pawne his own house vnto the Venetian marchants, for monie to maintaine his state, as is in the former part of this Historie declared.

But to returne againe to the course of our Historie. The emperor certainly aduertised of the enemies purpose, for the generall assault shortly to be giuen, first commended the defence of himselfe and the citie vnto the protection of the almighty, by generall fasting and prayer: and afterwards appointed euerie capitaine and commaunder, to some certaine place of the wall for defence thereof: which was done by the direction of So. Iustinianus his Generall, in whose valor the Constantinopolitans had reposed their greatest hope.

But the citie being on euerie side now beset with the Turkes great armie, and the defendants in number but few, for so great a citie, (in compasse eight miles) the wals could not but slenderly in many places be manned, and especially on both sides toward the sea, where indeed least danger was. The greatest strength and best souldiours, were placed for defence of the viter wall, where the breach was, and the assault expected by land. Iustinianus the Generall himselfe, with three hundred Genowayes well armed, and certaine chosen Greekes, vnderooke the defence of that part of the battered wall, neere vnto the Romane gate, where the fall of the tower BACRINA had filled the ditch, as is aforesaid: against which place Mahomet himselfe lay encamped, with his Ianizaries and best men of warre. Neere vnto Iustinianus lay the emperor himselfe, for defence of another part of the wall: and so other capitaines orderly with their companies, all alongst the viter wall. And because the defendants should haue no hope to saue their liues, more than their owne valour, the emperor caused all the gates of the inner wall to be fast shut vp. And in this sort they lay all the night, expecting continually when the assault should bee giuen: all which time they might heare great hurly burly and noise in the Turkes campe, as they were putting things in readinesse for the assault.

assaulted by the Turkes.

A little before day, the Turkes approached the walles, and begun the assault, where shot and stones were deliuered vpon them from the wals as thicke as haile; whereof little fell in vaine, by reason of the multitude of the Turkes, who pressing fast vnto the wals, could not see in the darke how to defend themselves, but were without number wounded or slaine: but these were of the common and worst souldiours, of whom the Turkish king made no more reckoning than to abate the first force of the defendants. Vpon the first appearance of the day, Mahomet gaue the signe appointed for the generall assault, wherupon the citie was in a moment and at one instant on euerie side most furiously assaulted by the Turkes: for Mahomet, the more to distresse the defendants, and the better to see the forwardnesse of the souldiours, had before appointed which part of the citie euerie colonell with his regiment should assaile. Which they valiantly performed, deliuering their arrowes and shot vpon the defendants, so thicke, that the light of the day was therewith darkened: others in the mean time courageously mounting the scaling ladders, and comming euen to handie stroakes with the defendants vpon the wall; where the foremost were for most part violently borne forward by them which followed after. On the other side, the Christians with no lesse courage withstood the Turkish furie, beating them downe againe with great stones and waightie peeces of timber, and so ouerwhelmed them with shot, darts, and arrowes, and other hurtfull and deadly deuises from aboue; that the Turkes dismayed with the terror thereof, were readie to retire.

Mahomet returneth
into the assault.

Mahomet seeing the great slaughter and discomfiture of his men, sent in fresh supplies of his Ianizaries and best men of warre, whom hee had for that purpose reserved as his last hope and refuge: by whose comming on, his fainting souldiours were againe encouraged, and the terrible assault begun afresh. At which time, the barbarous king ceased not to vse all possible means to maintain the assault: by name calling vpon this and that captain, promising vnto some whom he saw forward, golden mountaines; and vnto others in whom he saw any signe of cowardise, threatening most terrible death: by which meanes the assault became most dreadfull, death there raging in the midst of many thousands. And albeit that the Turkes lay dead by heapes vpon the ground, yet other fresh men pressed on still in their places, ouer their dead bodies, and with diuers euent either slew, or were slaine by their enemies.

In this so terrible a conflict, it chanced Iustinianus the Generall to bee wounded in the arme: who losing much blood, cowardly withdrew himselfe from the place of his charge, not leaving any to supplie his roome, and so got into the citie by the gate called ROMANA: which hee had caused to be opened in the inner wall: pretending the cause of his departure to be for the biiding vp of his wound, but being indeed a man now altogether discouraged.

The souldiours there present, dismayed with the departure of their Generall, and forecharged by the Ianizaries, forsooke their stations; and in hast fled to the same gate whereby Iustinianus was entered: with the sight whereof, the other souldiours dismayed, ran thither by heapes also. But whilst they violently strue, all together to get in at once, they so wedged one another in the entrance of the gate, that few of so great a multitude, got in: in which so great a presse and confusion of minds, eight hundred persons were there by them that followed, troden vnder foot or thrust to death. The emperor himselfe, for safegard of his life flying with the rest, in that presse as a man not regarded, miserably ended his dayes, together with the Greeke empire. His dead bodie was shortly after found by the Turkes amongst the slaine, and knowne by his rich apparell; whose head being cut off, was forthwith presented to the Turkish tyrant: by whose commaundement it was afterward thrust vpon the point of a lance, and in great derision caried about as a trophiee of his victorie, first in the campe, and afterwards vp and downe the citie.

Constantinople
won by the Turkes.

The Turkes encouraged with the flight of the Christians, presently advanced their ensignes vpon the top of the vttermoost wall, crying victorie; and by the breach entred as if it had been a great flood, which hauing once found a breach in the banke, ouerfloweth, and beareth downe all before it: so the Turkes when they had woon the viter wall, entred the citie by the same gate that was opened for Iustinianus, &c by a breach which they had before made with their great artillerie; and without mercie cutting in pieces all that came in their way, without further resistance became lords of that most famous and imperiall citie. Some few there were of the Christians, who preferring death before the Turkish slauerie, with their swords in their hands, sold their liues deere vnto their enemies: amongst whom, the two brethren Paulus and Troilus Bochiardi Italians, with Theophilus Paleologus a Greeke, and Ioannus Stianus a Dalmatian, for their great valour and courage, deserue to be had in eternall remembrance: Who after they had like lions, made slaughter of their enemies, died in the midst of them, embred with their blood, rather oppressed by multitude than by true valour overcome. In this furie of the Barbarians, perished many thousands of men, women, and children, without respect of age, sex, or condition. Many for safegard of their liues, fled into the Temple of SOPHIA; where they were all without pittie slaine, except some few referred by the barbarous victors, to purposes more grieuous than death it selfe. The rich and beautifull ornaments and jewels of that most sumptuous and magnificent Church (the stately building of Iustinianus the emperor) were in the turning of a hand, pluckt downe and carried away by the Turkes: and the Church it selfe built for God to be honored in, for the present conuerted into a stable for their horses, or a place for the execution of their abominable and vnpeakable filthinesse: the Image of the crucifix was also by them taken downe, and a Turke cap put vpon the head thereof, and so set vp and shot at with their arrowes; and afterwards in great derision caried about in their campe, as it had been in procession, with drums playing before it, railing, and spitting at it, and calling it the god of the Christians. Which I note not so much done in contempt of the image, as in the despite of Christ and the Christian religion.

But whilst some were thus spoyling of the churches, others were as busie in ransacking of priuat houses, where the miserable Christians were enforced to endure in their persons whatsoever pleased the insolent victors: vnto whom all things were now lawfull that stood with their lust, at euerie common souldiour hauing power of life and death, at his pleasure to spare or spill. At which time riches were no better than pouertie; and beautie worse than deformitie. What tongue were able to expresse the miserie of that time? or the proud insolencie of those barbarous conquerors? whereof so many thousands, euerie man with greedinesse fitted his owne vnreasonable desire: all which the poore Christians were enforced to endure. But to speake of the hidden treasure, money, plate, jewels, and other riches there found, passeth credit: the Turkes themselves wondred thereat, and were therewith so enriched, that it is a proverbe amongst them at this day, if any of them grow suddenly rich, to say, He hath been at the sacking of CONSTANTINOPLE: whereof if some reasonable part had in time been bestowed vpon defence of the citie, the Turkish king had not so easily taken both it and the citie. But euerie man was carefull how to encrease his owne priuat wealth, few or none regarding the publike state: vntill in fine, euerie euerie man with his priuat abundance was wrapped vp together with his needie neighbour in the selfesame common miserie. Yea the securitie of the Constantinopolitans was such, that being alwaies enuironed with their mortall enemies, yet had they no care of fortifying of so much as the inner wall of the citie (which for beautie and strength was comparable with the wals of any citie in the world, if it had been kept well repaired) but suffered the officers which had the charge to see to the fortifying of the citie, to conuert the greatest part of the money into their own purses: as appeared by Mannuel Giagerus, a little before a verie poore man; and likewise by Nephtus, who then hauing that office to see vnto the fortification of the citie, had in short time gathered together seuentie thousand florens, which became all a worthy prey vnto the greeke Turkes.

After that the barbarous common souldiour had thus by the space of three daies without controlment taken his pleasure in the citie (as Mahomet had before promised) and throughly ranfact euerie corner thereof: they then returned into the campe, with their rich spoils, druing the poore Christian captiues before them as if they had ben droues of cattell, or flocks of sheepe: a spectacle no lesse lamentable, than was the sacking of the citie. It would haue grieved any humane heart to haue seene the noble gentewomen and great ladies, with their beautifull children, and many other faire personages, who lately flowed in all worldly wealth and pleasure, to be now become the poore and miserable bondslaves of most base and contemptible rascals; who were so farre from shewing them any pittie, as that they delighted in nothing more than to heape more and more miserie vpon them, making no more reckoning of them than of dogs. There might the parents see the wofull miserie of their beloued children, and the children of the parents, the husband might see the shamefull abuse of his wife, and the wife of her husband, and generally one friend of another: and yet not able to mourne together (the least part of heauie comfort) being in the thraldome of diuers cruell masters, by whom they were kept in sunder, like in few daies to be dispersed into diuers farre countries, without hope that they should euer find releafe, or one see another againe.

The souldiours being all retired into the campe, Mahomet as a proud conquerour, with great triumph entered into the citie of CONSTANTINOPLE, then desolate and void of all Christian inhabitants; and there after the manner of the Turkish kings, made a sumptuous and royall feast vnto his Bassaes and other great captaines: where after he had furcharged himselfe with excesse of meat and drinke, he caused diuers of the cheefe Christian captiues, both men and women (of whom many were of the late emperours line and race) to be in his presence put to death, as hee with his Turkes sat banquetting: deeming his feast much more stately by such effusion of Christian blood. Which manner of exceeding crueltie he daily vsed, vntill such time as he had destroyed all the Grecian nobilitie that was in his power, with the cheefe of the late Constantinopolitan citizens. At which time also diuers of the Venetian Senatours, with Baiulus their Gouvernor, and many rich marchants of GENVA and other places of ITALIE were in like manner murdered: so that of seuen and fortie Senatours of VENICE which were there taken (whereof most part came thither by chauce, bound for other places, but there vnluckily shut vp) some few found the fauour, with exceeding great ransomes to redeeme themselves.

Amongst these noblemen thus lamentably executed, was one Lucas Leontares, or Noiras, commonly called Kyr-Lucas, or lord Lucas, but of late great chancellor of CONSTANTINOPLE, a man of greatest account next vnto the emperour himselfe: whom the Turkish tyrant seemed greatly to blame, that hee being a man in so great credit with the late emperour, perswaded him not in time to haue sought for peace vpon any condition, or els to haue yeelded vp the citie, rather than to haue run that extreame course of wilfull miserie. Hee to excuse the matter, said, That the late emperour his master was encouraged to hold out the siege, by the Venetians and citizens of PERRA, from whom he receiued secret aid: as also by some of the greatest men about his own person: for prooffe whereof, hee drew out of his bosome the letters which Caly-Bassa had to that purpose written vnto the emperour, and deliuered them to Mahomet, hoping thereby to haue found some fauour. But when he had said what he could, the eldest of his sonnes then liuing (for he had lost two elder in the time of the siege) was cruelly executed before his face, and the youngest reserved for the tyrants lust: and after all this miserie had his owne head stricke off with the rest appointed for that daies sacrifice. Out of this generall calamitie escaped Io. Insulinus the Generall, who with all speed fled at first to PERRA, and from thence to CHIOS, where in few daies after he died, of greefe of mind (as was thought) rather than of his wound, being happie if he had honourably before ended his dayes vpon the wals of CONSTANTINOPLE. Isodorus also the Cardinall and Legate from the Pope, disguised in simple apparrell, and being of the Turkes vnkowne, redeemed himselfe for a small ranfome, as if he had been a man of no account, and so escaped: whom if Mahomet had knowne, he had vndoubtedly bene made shorter by the head.

The glorie of this famous citie of CONSTANTINOPLE continued many hundred yeares, commanding a great part of the world, vntill that by ciuile discord and priuat gaine, it was by little and little so weakened, that the emperours of later times, for the maintenance of their estate, were glad to relie sometime vpon one, and sometime vpon another, yet still holding the title and state of an empire, by the space of 1121 yeares, when as (God his judgement set apart; wonderfull and shamefull it is to consider, how) it was by this Turkish king Mahomet so quickly taken, and the Christian empire of the East there vtterly ouerthrowne: which happened in the nine and twentieth day of May, in the yeare of our Lord 1453. Constantinus Paleologus, the sonne of Helen, and last Christian emperour, being then slaine, when he had reigned about eight yeares. Since which time it hath continued the imperiall seat of the Turkish emperours, and so remaineth at this day.

The potestats and citizens of PERRA, otherwise called GALATA, a citie standing opposit against CONSTANTINOPLE, on the other side of the hauen, and then vnder the gouernment of the Genowayes, doubting to run the same course of miserie with their neighbors, sent their Orators vnto Mahomet (the same day that CONSTANTINOPLE was taken) offering to him the keyes of their gates, and so to become his subjects. Of which their offer Mahomet accepted, and sent Zoganus with his regiment to take possession of the citie. Who comming thither, according to Mahomet his commandement, there established the Turkish gouernment, confiscated the goods of all such as were fled, and vsed the rest of the citizens which stayed, with such insolencie and oppression, as that their miserie was not much lesse than theirs of CONSTANTINOPLE. And because it was doubted, that the Genowayes might by sea giue aid vnto the citizens, if they should at any time seeke to reuolt, he caused all the wals and fortresses of the citie which were toward the land, to be cast downe and laied euen with the ground. Thus is the fatall period of the Greeke empire run, and Mahomet in one day become lord of the two famous cities of CONSTANTINOPLE and PERRA: the one taken by force, the other by composition. At which time the miserie of PERRA was great, but that of CONSTANTINOPLE justly to be accounted amongst the greatest calamities that euer happened to any Christian citie in the world.

Mahomet had of long time borne a secret grudge against Caly-Bassa, sometime his tutor, for that by his means Amurath his father, in the dangerous time of the Hungarian warres, had againe resumed vnto himselfe the gouernment of the Turkish kingdome, which hee had before resigned vnto him, then but young. But for as much as hee was the cheefe Bassa, and had for many yeares ruled all things at his pleasure, to the generall good liking of the people, during the raigne of old Amurath, and was thereby growne to be of such wealth, credit, and authoritie, as no man had at any time obtained greater vnder any of the Othoman kings: Mahomet in the beginning of his raigne, before hee was well established in his kingdome, durst not to take reuenge of that iniurie (as hee deemed it) but yet still kept it in remembrance, warily dissembling his deepe conceiued hatred, as if he had quite forgot it. Neuerthelesse sometime (for all his wauiness) words fell from him, whereby the warie courtiers (which as curiously weigh their princes words, as the cunning goldsmith dooth his finest gold) easily perceiued the secret grudge that stucke in his stomacke against the Bassa: and thereby deigned his fall to be at hand. So it happened one day that as Mahomet was walking in the court, he saw a fox of the Bassaes tied in a chaine, which after hee had a while earnestly looked vpon, hee suddainly brake into this speech: Alas poore beast, hast thou no money to giue thy master to set thee at libertie? Out of which words, curious heads gathered much matter concerning the kings disposition towards the Bassa. This ominous surmising of the courtiers (which oftentimes proueth too true) was not vnkowne vnto the Bassa himselfe, but troubled him much: wherefore to get himselfe out of the way for a season, more than for any deuotion, he tooke vpon him to goe in pilgrimage to visite the temple of the great prophet (as they tearme him) at MACHA, which amongst the Turkes is holden for a right religious and meritorious worke: hoping, that the young kings displeasure might in time be mitigated, and his mallice assuaged. But Mahomet perceiuing the distrust of the Bassa, and whereof it proceeded, seemed to take knowledge thereof, and with good words comforted him vp, willing him to be of good cheere, and not to misdoubt any thing; neither to regard the vaine speech of foolish people, assuring him of his vndoubted fauour: and the more to put him out of all suspicion, continually sent him rich gifts, and heaped vpon him new honors, as if of all others he had esteemed him most. Vntill that now at the taking of CONSTANTINOPLE, it was discovered by Lucas Leontares, that he had intelligence with the late emperor of CONSTANTINOPLE, and his letters produced. For which cause, or as the common report went, for the old grudge that the tyrant bare against him, as also for his great wealth, he was by Mahomet's commandement apprehended and carried in bonds to HADRIANOPLE: where after he had with exquisite torments been enforced to confesse where all his treasures lay, he was most cruelly in his extreame old age executed. After whose death, his friends and seruants (which were many, for he was a man greatly beloved in court) in token of their griefe put on mourning apparell: so that in the court appeared a great shew of common sorrow; wherewith Mahomet being offended, caused proclamation to be made, That all such as did weare such mourning apparell, should the next day appeare before him: at which time there was not one to be seene about the court in that heauie attire, for feare of the tyrants displeasure.

Mahomet placeth his imperiall seat at Constantinople, and is worthily accounted first Emperour of the Turks.

After that Mahomet was thus become lord of the imperiall citie of CONSTANTINOPLE, as is aforesaid; and had fully resolved there to place his imperiall seat: he first repaired the wals and other buildings spoiled in the late siege, and by proclamations sent forth into all parts of his dominions, gaue great priuiledges and immunities to all such as should come to dwell at CONSTANTINOPLE, with free libertie to exercise what religion or trade they pleased. Wherby in short time that great and desolat citie was againe well peopled, with such as out of diuers countries resorted thither: but especially with the Iewish nation, which driuen out of other places, came thither in great numbers, and were of the Turks gladly received. So when he had there established all things according to his hearts desire, he tooke vpon him the name and title of an Emperour: and is from that time not vnworthely reputed for the first emperor of the Turks.

Now amongst many fair virgins taken prisoners by the Turks at the winning of CONSTANTINOPLE, was one Irene a Greek borne, of such incomparable beautie and rare perfection, both of body & mind, as if nature had in her to the admiration of the world, laboured to haue shewed her greatest skill; so prodigally she had bestowed vpon her, all the graces that might beautifie or commend that hir so curious a worke. This paragon was by him that by chance had taken her, presented vnto the great Sultan Mahomet himselfe, as a jewell so fit for no mans wearing as his owne: by the beautie and secret vertues whereof, he found himselfe euen vpon the first view not a little moued. Neuerthelesse, hauing as then his head full of troubles, and about all things carefull for the assuring of the imperiall citie of CONSTANTINOPLE, by him but euen then woones he for the present committed her to the charge of his Eunuch, and sent her away, so to be in libertie kept vntill his better leisure. But those his troubles ouerblowne, and his new conquests well assured, he then began forthwith to thinke of the faire Irene: and for his pleasure sending for her, tooke in her perfections such delight and contentment, as that in short time he had changed state with her, she being become the mistresse and commander of him so great a conqueror; and he in nothing more delighted, than in doing her the greatest honour and seruice he could. All the day he spent with her in discourse, and the night in dalliance: all time spent in her companie, seemed vnto him short; and without her nothing pleased: his fierce nature was now by her well tamed, and his wonted care of armes quite neglected: Mars slept in Venus lap, and now the soldiers might go play. Yea the verie government of his estate and empire seemed to be of him, in comparison of her, little or not at all regarded; the care thereof being by him carelesly committed to others, that so he might himselfe wholly attend vpon her, in whom more than in himselfe, the people said he delighted. Such is the power of disordered affections, where reason ruleth not the reine. But whilest he thus forgetfull of himselfe, spendeth in pleasure not some few daies or moneths, but euen a whole yeare or two, to the lightning of his credit, and the great discontentment of his subjects in generall: the Ianizaries and other fouldiors of the court (men desirous of imploiment, and grieued to see him so giuen ouer vnto his affections, & to make no end thereof) began at first in secret to murmur thereat, and to speake hardly of him; and at length (after their insolent manner) spared not openly to say, That it were well done to deprime him of his government and state, as vnworthy thereof, and to set vp one of his sonnes in his stead. Which speeches speeches were now growne so rife, and the discontentment of the men of warre so great, that it was not without cause by some of the great Bassaes feared, wherunto this their so great insolencie would grow. But who should tell the tyrant thereof; whose frowne was in it selfe death: or who durst take in hand to cure that his sicke mind: which distraught with the sweet, but poysoned potions of loue, was not like to listen to any good counsell, were it neuer so wisely giuen: but as a man metamorphosed, to turne his furie vpon him which should presume so wholefomely (but contrarie to his good liking) to aduise him. Vnhappie man, whose great estate and fierce nature was not without danger to be medled or tempered with, no, not by them who of all others ought in so great a perill to haue bene thereof most carefull; but were now for feare all become silent and dumbe. Now amongst other great men in the Court, was one Mustapha Bassa, a man for his good seruice (for that he was of a child brought vp with him) of Mahomet greatly fauoured, and by him also highly promoted; and he againe by him as his Soueraigne no lesse honored than feared: who no lesse than the rest, grieued to see so great a change in the great Sultan, of whom they had conceiued no small hope of greater matters than were by him as yet performed; and moued also with the danger threatened vnto him by the discontented Ianizaries and men of warre: espying him at conuenient leisure to be spoken vnto, and presuming of the former credit he had with him, aduentured thus to breake with him, and to giue him warning thereof.

How dangerous a thing it is for a subject or vassale, without leaue, presumptuously to enter into the secrets of his dread Lord and Soueraigne, the wofull examples of others (most mightie Mahomet) haue so sufficiently warned me, as that were it not for the dutifull loyaltye I owe vnto your greatnesse, far dearer vnto me than mine owne life, I would not at this time aduenture my selfe vnto the hazard of your doubtfull acceptance of my faithfull speech and meaning; but with others keepe silence, and in secret mourne together with my heauie thoughts: which if I should in so great a danger both of your life and empire now doe, without warning you thereof, I were not to be accounted unworthie onely those your great fauours and honours, most bountifull vnto me bestowed; but as a most vile traitor both vnto your state and person, to be of all men detested and abhorred. The life you haue of late led, euer since the taking of CONSTANTINOPLE, as a man carelesse of his state, and wholly wedded vnto his owne pleasure, hath giuen occasion not vnto the vulgar people onely (alwayes readie to say the worst) and soldiers of the Court, the guarders of your person, but euen vnto the greatest commanders of your armies and empire, to murmure and grudge, I dare not say, to conspire against you. Yet pardon me dread Soueraigne, if I should so say, for that there is no man which with great discontentment maruellet not much to see so great an alteration in your heroicall disposition and nature: whereby you are become far unlike that noble Mahomet, which hauing ouerthrowne the Greeke empire, and taken the great citie of CONSTANTINOPLE, promised both vnto himselfe and others, the conquest of ITALIE, and the sacking of ROME, the stately seat of the antient Roman conquerours. You haue giuen your selfe ouer (as they say) for a spoile and prey vnto a poore simple woman, your slauie and vassale, who with her beautie and allurements hath so bewitched your vnderstanding and reason, as that you can attend nothing but her seruice, and the satisfying of your most passionate and inordinate desires; which how much the more you cherish them, so much the more they torment and vex you. Enter but a little into your selfe (I pray you) and compare the life you now lead with the like time heretofore by you spent in treading honors steps, and you shall find a notable difference betwixt the one and the other. Had the noble Othoman, the first raiser of your house and familie, so giuen himselfe ouer vnto pleasure, you had not now inherited the countries of BITHYNIA and GALATIA, with others moe alongt the Euxine, by him conquered. Neither had his sonne Orchanes (the lively image of his father, and follower of his vertues) by leading this kind of life, triumphed ouer LICAONIA, PHRYGIA, and CARIA, or extended the bounds of his empire so farre as vnto the straits of HELLES PONTVS. What should I speake of Amurath his sonne and successor in the empire, who in person himselfe, first of the Othoman kings, passed ouer into EVROPE, placed his imperiall seat at HADRIANOPLE, conquered THRACIA, BULGARIA, and RASCIA. Yea Baiazet your great grandfather is in his misfortune to bee more than you commended, as vanquished in field by the mightie Tamerlane with foure hundred thousand horsemen and six hundred thousand foot, and not by a filie woman: comforting his mishap with the honour and greatnesse of him by whom he was so overcome. Neither may I with silence passe ouer your woorthie grandfather the noble Mahomet, who not contented to haue restored the shaken empire, conquered also a great part of MACEDONIA, euen to the Ionian sea, and carying the terror of his armes ouer into the Albanians rise in armes against the said two princes their souverains: and vnder the leading of their rebellious captaine Emanuel Catecuzenus, grievously troubled both the poore princes. These Albanians were a rough and hardie kind of people, which living after the manner of the rude Scythian herdsmen, by feeding of cattell, had of long time planted themselves in PELOPONESVS; differing from the naturall Greekes, both in the manner of their living and language: which diuersitie was no small cause that they oftentimes spurned, as now, against the government of the Gracian princes. In this extremitie, the two distressed princes (not well knowing which way to turne themselves) sought for peace at Mahomet's hands, offering to become his tributaries. Of which their offer he willingly accepted, as an induction to the full conquest of that country; and sent Turashan gouernour of THESSALIA, one of his greatest men of warre, with an army into PELOPONESVS, to aid those princes against the Albanians: by whose industrie the masterfull rebels were in short time discomfited, and the counrey of PELOPONESVS quieted; yet so, that it was now become tributarie to the Turkish king.

Thomas and Demetrius rebell against Mahomet, and are by him spoiled of part of their dominion.

These two princes Demetrius and Thomas, the last of all the Christian princes that reigned in PELOPONESVS, hauing thus lost their libertie, liued for a few yeares as the Turkes vassales; paying such yearly tribute as they had before promised. During which time, many displeasures arose betwixt the two brothers; being both jealous of their estate; and desirous by all possible meanes to win the hearts of their subjects one from another: whereby it came so to passe, that whiles they both desired to become popular, they weakened their owne credit; and had not their subjects at such commaund as best stood with the safetie of their estate. Neuerthelesse as soon as they vnderstood that the Christian princes of the West were making great preparation against the Turke; and that Calixtus the third of that name (then the bishop of ROME) had already put a fleet of gallies to sea, which did great spoile vpon the borders of the Turkes dominions; they vainly perswading themselves that the Turkes would in short time be againe driuen out of GRECIA, refused to pay any more tribute vnto the Turkish king, or to keepe league any longer with him. Vpon which occasion, Mahomet with a puissant army came downe and first besieged CORINTH, and afterwards entering into PELOPONESVS tooke diuers strong townes, and destroyed the counrey before him: and forced the two princes for safeguard of their liues to flee, the one to MANTINIA, and the other into the strong citie of EPIDAVRVS, now called RAVSIVM. The poore princes destitute of such aid as they expected, and altogether vnable to withstand the power of the mightie tyrant, began againe to sue for peace: which he, hauing now spoiled their counrey, granted vpon condition, That all such places as he had already taken, should be still his owne; and also that the citie of PATRAS with the counrey adioyning, should be deliuered vnto him; and that for the rest, the said princes should pay vnto him a yearly tribute: which hard conditions the poore princes, now in danger to loose all, were glad to accept of: whereupon a peace was for that time againe concluded.

In his returne he tooke the citie of ATHENS in his way, which he not long before had taken from Francus Acciauoli by composition (by meanes of Omars the sonne of Turechan, one of his great captains) promising to giue him the counrey of BOTIA with the citie of THEBES in lieu thereof. This Francus was nephew to Nerius, sometime prince of ATHENS, and had of long time been brought vp in the Turkes court, as one of Mahomet's minions; and was of him (as was supposed) entirely beloued. But when he had receiued the dukedome of THEBES in exchange for his princely state of ATHENS, he was shortly after, as if it had been in great friendship sent by Mahomet to Zoganus, his lieutenant in PELOPONESVS: by whom he was at first counteously entertained, but afterwards being about to depart, he was (according as Mahomet had before commanded) suddenly staied; and when he least feared, cruelly murdered.

Mahomet cometh againe into Peloponessus.

About three yeares after the peace before concluded betwixt Mahomet and the two brethren, Mahomet vnderstanding that the Christian kings and princes had combined themselves against him, with a purpose to drue him againe out of GRECIA: thought it now high time, and much for the assurance of his estate, to roote vp the small reliques of the Grecian empire, which yet remained in PELOPONESVS in the two princes of the imperial bloud; Thomas and Demetrius: whereunto he saw a faire occasion presented. Forasmuch as those two brethren were at that time at great variance betwixt themselves, neither paid him such tribute as they had before promised: hereupon he with a great and strong army came to CORINTH, where Asanes a noble man of great authoritie and power in that counrey, whose sister Demetrius had married, came vnto him from

from the prince his brother in law, attended vpon with many gallant gentlemen, his followers, of purpose to aid him against the other prince Thomas, nothing fearing any harme to haue been by the Turke intended against himselfe or his brother in law Demetrius, whom they both reckoned of as of a friend. But when Mahomet was entered into PELOPONESVS, and came to THESSALIA, he caused the same Asanes, with all his cheefe followers, to be laied hold vpon, and cast into bonds: knowing (as it should seeme) no man for friend, which might any way hinder his ambitious designs.

Demetrius submiseth himselfe to Mahomet.

Demetrius hearing what was happened vnto Asanes, fled to SPARTA, now called MIZITHRA: whether Mahomet in few dayes after came and laied siege to the citie. But the poore prince considering that he must needs at length fall into his hands, went out of the citie, and humbly submitted himselfe with all that he had into his power. Which so well pleased the Turkish tyrant, that hee counteously receiued him, comforted him, and promised him in stead of SPARTA to giue him other lands and possessions of like value elsewhere: Neuerthelesse, hee committed him to safe custodie, and carried him about with him as his prisoner, vntill hee had finished those warres. After he had taken SPARTA, he besieged CASTRIA, where he lost diuers of his Iauizaries: for which cause, when he had taken the citie, he put all the souldiours therein to the sword; and cut the captaines ouerthwart in two peeces. From thence he marched to LEONTARIUM, called in antient time MEGALOPOLIS, which he tooke; with another citie called CARDICEA, whither they of LEONTARIUM had before conueyed their wiues and children, as to a place of more safetie. There he cruelly put to death all the inhabitants of those cities, men, women, and children, in number about six thousand, of whom he left not one aliue: and yet not so satisfied, commaunded the very beasts and cattell of those places to be killed. Many cities of PELOPONESVS terified with the dreadfull example of their neighbours, forthwith yielded themselves: and amongst others SALVARTIVM, a great and strong citie of ARCHADIA; where hee caused all the inhabitants, men, women, and children, to the number of ten thousand, to be cast into bonds; looking for nothing but present death: all which he commaunded afterwards to be sent captiues to CONSTANTINOPLE, and with them peopled the suburbs of that citie. After that, he by the counsell of Demetrius, sent one of his captains called Iosua, with certaine companies of Greeke souldiours, vnto the strong citie of EPIDAVRVS, to commaund them in the name of the prince; to deliuer vnto him the citie, with the prince his wife and daughter, which lay there. But the Gouernour trusting vnto the strength of the citie, refused to deliuer the same: yet suffred the prince's wife with her daughter to depart out of the citie, being willing to goe to her husband; whom the captaine hauing receiued, returned, and presented them to Mahomet. By whose commaundement they were presently sent into BOTIA, there to attend his returne towards CONSTANTINOPLE, and an Eunuch appointed to take charge of the young ladie, who had so warmed Mahomet's affection, that he tooke her afterwards to his wife. At the same time hee also subdued the most part of ACHATA and ELIS, by Zoganus Bassa his lieutenant: whether hee came not long after himselfe, and laied siege to the citie of SALMENICA, which for lacke of water was at length yeelded vnto him: but the castle was by the space of a whole yeare after valiantly defended against the Turkes left to besiege it, by Thomas the prince: of whom Mahomet afterwards gaue this commendation, That in the great counrey of PELOPONESVS hee had found many slaues, but neuer a man but him. This valiant prince seeing the miserable ruine of his counrey, and the state thereof utterly forlorne, after he had most nobly endured a yeaeres siege in the castle of SALMENICA, got to sea, and so arriued in ITALIE: where traouling to ROME, hee was honourably receiued by Pius Secundus, then bishop there: who during his life, allowed him a large pension for the maintenance of his state. Thus Mahomet hauing thrust both the Grecian princes out of their dominions, and subdued all PELOPONESVS (excepting such strong towines and castles, as bordering vpon the sea coast were yet holden by the Venetians) left Zoganus Bassa his lieutenant to gouerne that new conquered prouince, and with great triumph returned himselfe towards CONSTANTINOPLE, carrying away with him Demetrius the prince, with his wife and daughter; and many other noble prisoners. But after he was come to HADRIANOPE, and placed in his royall seat, he remooued the Eunuch from the faire young ladie, and tooke charge of her himselfe. As for Demetrius her father, hee gaue to him the citie AEVUM, with the custome arising of the salt there made, as a pension for him to liue vpon. Thus this most famous and populous counrey of PELOPONESVS fell into the Turkish thraldome, about the yeare of our Lord 1460, seuen yeares after

after the taking of CONSTANTINOPLE. Which I haue here together set downe, as it is reported by them who liued in that time, and in the same countries: omitting of purpose other great occurrents of the same time (which shall also in conuenient place be hereafter declared) to the intent that the fall of that great Empire, with the common miserie of the delicate Gracians, might appeare vnder one view; which otherwise being deliuered by peecemeale, as it did concur with other great accidents according to the course of time, would but breed confusion, and require the Readers greater attention.

The Christian princes, especially such as bordered vpon the dominions of the Turkish tyrant, were no lesse terrified than troubled with the subuersion of the Constantinopolitane empire: for they saw by the continuall preparation of the Turk, that his ambitious desires were rather increased, than in any part satisfied with his so great and late victories. Wherefore they with all carefulness fortified their frontier towns, and provided all things necessarie for defence of themselves, and for the repulsing of so mightie an enemy. Amongst the rest, George the old Despot, or prince of SERVIA (whose dominions of all others lay most in danger of that tempest) speedily mustred his men of warre, fortified his strong cities, placed his garrisons, and left nothing undone, that he thought needfull for the defence of his country: for he had many times before to his great losse, endured the furie of the Turkish kings, although he were joynd vnto them in the bonds of nearest alliance. And hauing thus politickly set all things in order at home, in person himselfe took his journey into HUNGARIE, from thence to procure aid against such time as he should haue need. But the Hungarians, and especially Huniades (who at that time bare greatest sway in that kingdome) hauing before had sufficient triall of the vncertainty and light faith of that aged prince, who had so often fashioned himselfe according to the occurrents of the time, that he was accounted neither right Turke, nor good Christian; refused to promise him any aid, but left him to his owne fortunes: wherewith he returned discontented, and full of indignation. But shortly after he was come home, he died of an hurt receiued in a skirmish with Michael Ziluge, gouernor of BELGRADE: whose brother Ladislaus he had but a little before treacherously murdered, as he was traauiling by wagon to BELGRADE with his said brother Michael, who at the same time hardly escaped. This was the end of George Despot of SERVIA, when he had liued nintie yeares: in which time of his long life, he had plentifully tasted of both fortunes. A man assuredly of great courage, but of a maruellous vnquiet nature: by profession a Christian, yet a great friend vnto the Turkes, whom he many times stood in great need: a deepe dissembler, and double in all his dealings; whereby he purchased vnto himselfe that credit, that he was not of any his neighbour princes whilst he liued, either beloued or trusted: and after his death, of his subjects so detested, that the people of that country euen at this day in their country songs, still teareme him, The faithlesse and gracelesse Despot. Lazarus his youngest son, after his death succeeded in his place; hauing deprived both his elder brethren (Stephen and George) of the gouernment: for Amurath the Turkish king had long time before put out their eyes, of purpose to make them vnfit for the gouernment of so great a country: yet these blind princes found meanes to flee away from him to Mahomet, carrying with them a great masse of money; and so incited him against Lazarus their younger brother, that to keepe friendship with the tyrant, he was glad to promise vnto him a great yearely tribute, and so to become his tributarie. But within few moneths after, Lazarus died; the last Christian prince that reigned in SERVIA: after whose death, great troubles arose in SERVIA for the fourtaignie: The blind brethren still crauing aid of Mahomet, with whom they then liued; and the desolate widow of Lazarus, putting her selfe with her three sons, Iohn, Peter, and Martin, into the protection of the Hungarians: by which means she with much trouble held her state for a season. Vntill such time as that the Seruians, seeing small assurance in that manner of gouernment, and wearie of the harmes they daily receiued of the Turkes yielded themselves with their country, vnto the obedience of the Turkish emperor. Mahomet, who for euer vnted the same vnto his empire as a prouince thereof, and so it remaineth at this day.

Now was Mahomet by the continuall course of his victories, growne to that height of mind, that he thought no prince able to abide his forces; neither any enterprize so great, which he was not of power to bring to passe: wherfore he ceased not on euerie side continually to vex and trouble the princes, whose countries bordered vpon his. But about others, his heart was greatly set against the Hungarians: for that by them the Turkish kings his ancestors, had been more troubled, and their state more endangered, than by any or all other the Christian princes. Wherefore fore he resolved now to take them in hand; which thing he had from the beginning of his reign greatly desired. And because the citie of BELGRADE standing vpon the great riuer of Danubius, was accounted the key of that country, he determined there to begin his warres, and by taking thereof to make an entrance into the heart of HUNGARIE. Hereupon he leuied a great armie of an hundred and fiftie thousand of his best souldiours; in whom he reposed such an assured trust and confidence, that he accounted the citie already as good as taken, and a faire way made into HUNGARIE: so ready are we to promise vnto our selues, the things we earnestly desire. For the better accomplishment of these his designs, he had provided in readinesse a fleet of 200 ships and gallies, which he sent vp the riuer of Danubius from VINDATO BELGRADE, to the intent that no reliefe or aid should be brought vnto the citie out of HUNGARIE, by the great riuers of Danubius and Sauus, whereupon the citie of BELGRADE standeth. With this fleet he kept both those riuers so straitly, that nothing could possibly be conuaid into the citie by water: and not so contented, sent part of his said fleet farther vp the riuer of Danubius, and so landing his souldiours in many places, spoiled the country all alongst the riuers side. Shortly after he came with all his forces by land, and encamped before the citie: whereunto at his first coming he gaue a most fierce assault, thinking to haue taken them vnprovided: but finding greater resistance than he had before imagined, and that the Hungarians were ready to skirmish with them without the wals, he began to proceed more warily, and entrenched his army: and to provide for the safetie thereof, by casting vp of deep trenches & strong rampiers, against the sudden sallies of his enemies: and after, planting his batterie, began most furiously to shake the wals with his great artilerie. By the furie whereof, he ouerthrew a part thereof, and laid it flat with the ground: which the defendants with great industrie and labour speedily repaired, by casting vp of new fortifications and rampiers, in such sort, that it was rather stronger than before.

In the meane time Huniades (not to be named without the addition of a most worthy captain) being then Generall for the Hungarians, sent a fleet of ships and gallies, well appointed with all warlike prouision, downe the riuer of Danubius from BUDA: which encounting with the Turkes fleet, tooke twentie saile of them, and so discomfited the rest, that they were glad to run themselves on ground neere vnto the kings campe. All which were by *Mahomet*s commandement presently set on fire, because they should not come into the power of the Hungarians. By this means the Christians became masters of both the riuers of Danubius and Sauus; and so at their pleasure, by water conuaid into the citie all things needfull for the defence thereof. Huniades also himselfe, with fife thousand valiant souldiours, and Io. Capistrano a Minorite frier (by whose perswasion fortie thousand voluntarie Christians out of GERMANIE, BOHEMIA, and HUNGARIE were come to that warre) entred into the citie that way with their souldiours and followers.

Mahomet resolutely set down for the winning of the citie, had with continuall batterie made the same at length faultable; and so determined the next day to giue a generall assault, appointing which part of the wall euerie Colonell with his regiment should assaile. But as they were with great diligence and greater itire, preparing all things needfull for the next daies seruice: it was by chance slaine with a great shot out of the towne. With whose death, Mahomet was exceedingly troubled, as with an ominous token of the euill which afterwards ensued vnto him and his whole army. For all that, prosecuting his former determination, the next day early in the morning he commanded the assault to be giuen: and with the dreadful sound of trumpets, drums, cornets, and other instruments of warre, brought on his Ianizaries to the breach: who as courageous souldiours fiercely assailed the same, and without any great resistance, entred both there and in diuers other places of the citie; reckoning the same, to be now their owne. For Huniades hauing before stored euerie corner of the citie with his most valiant and expert souldiours, had taken order that the defendants, vpon the first charge of the Ianizaries, should forsake their stations, and as men discouraged, retire towards the citie: of purpose to draw the fierce enemies faster on, to their farther destruction; and vpon a signe giuen to set vpon them on fire, and to repaire vnto their former places of defence. Which was accordingly done: so that as soone as the Ianizaries, with other of the Turkes most forward souldiours, were in great numbers entred, vpon the retiring of the defendants, and the signe before appointed in the citie giuen, the defendants, as men suddenly changed, turning againe, fiercely charged the Turkes which were entered, tered contrarie to their expectation: and the valiant Huniades, at the same time issuing out on euertie side with his most resolute souldiors, so oppressed the Turkes, that few of them that were entred escaped with life, but were there in the citie either slaine or taken prisoners; and the rest with exceeding slaughter beaten from the wals. Presently after, Huniades in this confusion of the Turkes, strengthened with the souldiors which came with Capistranus the frier, made a sallie out of the towne, and set vpon the Turkes appointed for the defence of the great ordinance; which was with such resolution performed, that the Turkes were glad with great slaughter to forsake their charge, and to leaue the ordinance to their enemies.

The Turkish tyrant fore troubled and throughly chafed with the losse of his great ordinance, courageously charged the Hungarians afresh, to haue recovered the same againe: but was so valiantly repulsed by Huniades, and so beaten with the murdering shot out of the citie, that he was glad when he had got him out of the danger thereof into his trenches. Huniades also retiring, turned the ordinance he had lately woon, vpon the Turkes campe, and with the same did them no small harme.

In this hurle, a great part of the Christian army (which then lay on the other side of Danubius) was speedily transported ouer the riuer; and making no stay in the citie, joyned themselves with Huniades, then lying without the wals of the citie. Who notably strengthened with this new supply, assailed the Turkes trenches, as if he would euen presently haue entered their campe: at which his presumption, the proud tyrant (neuer before so braued) disclaining, went out of his trenches, and valiantly encountering him, beat him backe againe to the great ordinance; from whence he was againe by the Christians driuen to his trenches. Which manner of doubtfull and dreadfull fight, was on both sides notably maintained, vntill the day was almost spent: victorie with indifferent wings, howering now ouer the one side, now ouer the other.

In these hote skirmishes and conflicts, Chafans capitaine of the Ianizaries, with many other valiant men were slaine. And Mahomet himselfe performing the part as well of a courageous souldiour as of a worthy chieftaine, was fore wounded vnder his left pappe; so that he was taken vp for dead and so carried into his pavilion, to the great discomfiture of his whole army. But comming againe vnto himselfe, and considering that he had in that siege lost his whole fleet, his great ordinance, with most part of his best souldiors, and yet in no possibilitie of the towne: secretly in the night arose with his army, and with great silence shamefully departed; still looking behind him when the Hungarians should haue pursued him into SERVIA, or haue troubled him vpon his way towards CONSTANTINOPLE. At this siege (beside many of his best captaines and chiefe commanders) were slaine fortie thousand of his best souldiours. The losse that he there sustained was so great, and so stucke in his mind, that euer after during his life, when he had occasion to speake of that siege, he would shake his head and sigh deeply, and many times wish, That he had neuer seene that citie, whereat both he and his father had receiued so great dishonour. Many were of opinion, that if Huniades had there had his horsemen on that side of Danubius to haue presently pursued the fearfull enemy, that the whole army of the Turkes might haue there been ouerthrowne. This notable victorie was obtained against the Turke the sixt of August in the yeare of our Lord 1456.

The death of the most famous captaine Huniades.

Shortly after, this most valiant and renowned capitaine Huniades, worthy of immortal praise, died of hurt taken in these warres; or as some others write, of the plague, which was then rife in HUNGARY: who when he felt himselfe in danger of death, desired to receiue the sacrament before his departure, and would in any case (sicke as he was) be carried to the Church to receiue the same; saying, That it was not fit, that the Lord should come to the house of his servant; but the servant rather to go to the house of his Lord and master. He was the first Christian capitaine that shewed the Turkes were to be overcome; and obtained more great victories against them than any one of the Christian princes before him. He was vnto that barbarous people a great terror, and with the spoile of them beautified his country: and now dying, was by the Hungarians honourably buried at ALBA IULIA, in S. Stephens church: his death being greatly lamented of all good men of that age.

Mahomet the Turkish emperor, no lesse desirous to extend his empire with the glorie of his name, by sea than by land; shortly after the taking of CONSTANTINOPLE put a great fleet to sea, wherewith he surprised diuers Islands in the ÆGEUM, and hardly besieged the citie of the first Emperour of the Turks.

RHODES. At which time, Calixtus the third, then bishop of ROME, aided by the Genowaies (for the grudge they bare against the Turkes for the taking of PERRA) put to sea a fleet of sixteene tall ships and gallies well appointed, vnder the conduct of Lodonicus, patriarch of AQUILIA; who with that fleet scoured the seas, and recovered againe from the Turkes the Island of LEBNOS, with diuers other small Islands thereabout: and encountering with the Turkes fleet neere vnto the Island of the RHODES, at a place called the Burrow of S. Paule, discomfited them, sunke and tooke diuers of their gallies, and forced them to forsake the RHODES. After which victorie at sea, hee for the space of three yeares, with his gallies, at his pleasure spoiled the frontiers of the Turkes dominions all alongst the sea coast of the lesser ASIA, and wonderfully terrified the effeminate people of those countries; and so at length returned home, carrying away with him many prisoners and much rich spoile.

After that Mahomet was thus shamefully driuen from the siege of BELGRADE, and his fleet at sea discomfited (as is before declared) hee began with great diligence to make new preparation against the next Spring to subdue the Isles of the ÆGEUM, especially those which lay neare vnto PELOPONNESVS. But whilest he was busie in these cogitations, in the meane time embassadours from Vsun-Cassanes the great Persian king, arrived at CONSTANTINOPLE, with diuerse rich presents sent to him from the said king. Where among other things, they presented vnto him a paire of playing tables, wherein the men and dice were of great and rich precious stones of inestimable worth, and the workmanship nothing inferiour to the matter: which the embassadours for ostentation said, That Vsun-Cassanes found in the treasures of the Persian king, whom he had but a little before slaine and bereft of his kingdome, and had there beene left long before by the mightie conquerour Tamerlane. Together with these presents, they deliuered their embassage, the effect whereof was, That those two mightie princes might joyne and liue together in amitie: and that whereas Dauid the emperor of TRAPZONDE, had promised to pay vnto Mahomet a yearly tribute, enforced thereunto by George his lieutenant in ASIA; he should not now looke for any such thing: for as much as that empire after the death of the emperor then liuing, should of right belong vnto Vsun-Cassanes, in right of his wife, who was the daughter of Calo-Ioannes, the elder brother of Dauid the emperor, then liuing: And further requiring him, from that time not to trouble or molest the said emperor his friend and neere alliance, so should hee find him his faithfull and kind confederat: otherwise it was (as they said) in his choice to draw vpon himselfe the heauie displeasure of a most mightie enemy. Mahomet before enuying at the rising of the Persian king, and now disdainning such peremptorie requests, little differing from proud commaunds; in great choller dismissed the embassadours with this short answer: That he would ere long be in ASIA himselfe in person, to teach Vsun-Cassanes what to request of a greater than himselfe. This vnkindnesse was the beginning and ground of the mortall wars which afterwards ensued between these two, then the greatest princes of the East, as shall be hereafter more at large declared. The embassadours being departed, and Mahomet's fleet of an hundred and fiftie saile readie to put to sea, hee altered his former determination for the Islands of the ÆGEUM (which after the losse of CONSTANTINOPLE had for the most part put themselves vnder the protection of the Venetians) and commanded his admirall with that fleet to take his course through the straits of Bosphorus into the great Euxine sea (now called the blacke sea) and so sailing alongst the coast to come to anker before SINOP, the cheefe citie of PAPHLAGONIA, and there to expect his comming thither with his armie by land. This great citie of SINOP standeth pleasantly vpon a point of the maine which runneth a great way into the Euxine, sometime the metropolitane citie of that prouince: but as then, with CASTAMONA and all the countrey thereabout, was vnder the gouernement of Ismael, a Mahometane prince: vpon whom Mahomet had now bent his forces, for no other cause than that he was in league with Vsun-Cassanes, the Persian king. Now with great expedition had Mahomet leuied a strong armie, and passing therewith ouer into ASIA, was come before he was looked for, to SINOP. Ismael seeing himselfe so suddainly beset both by sea and land in his strongest citie, although he wanted nothing needfull for his defence, hauing in the citie foure hundred peeces of great artillerie, and ten thousand souldiours: yet doubting to be able with that strength to endure the siege, offered to yeeld vp the citie to Mahomet, with all the rest of his dominion, vpon condition, That he should freely giue him in lieu thereof the citie of PHILIPPOPOLIS in THRACIA, with the countrey therevnto adjoining. Of which his offer Mahomet accepted: and so taking possession of SINOP, with the strong citie of CASTAMONA.

Trapezond, reduced unto the Turks.

MONA, and all the rest of the princes territorie, sent him away with all his things to PHILIPPOPOLIS, as he had promised. This Ismael was the last of the honourable house of the Isfendians, who had long time raigned at HERACLEA and CASTAMONAI in PONTVS. From SINOPE he marched on forward with his armie to TRAPEZOND. This famous citie standeth also vpon the side of the Euxine or Blacke sea in the country of PONTVS, where the emperours of CONSTANTINOPLE had alwayes their deputies, whilest that empire flourished and commaunded the East part of the world, as farre as PARTHIA: but after it began againe to decline (as all worldly things haue but their time) one Isack (whose father, emperour of CONSTANTINOPLE, the Constantinopolitanes had for his euill gouernment slaine) flying to TRAPEZOND, tooke vpon him the gouernment of that citie, with the countries of PONTVS and CAPADOCIA, and many other great prouinces, and was at first called the king of TRAPEZOND: but after hee was well established in that gouernment, both he and his successours tooke vpon them the name and title of emperours; which they maintained equally, if not better, than the late Constantinopolitane emperours, and therefore are of most accounted for emperours. Hee that then raigned, was called Dauid Comnenus: which most honourable familie of the Comneni had long time before raigned in CONSTANTINOPLE; and out of the same were many other great princes descended, which ruled in diuers places of MACEDONIA, EPIRVS, and GRACIA. Mahomet comming to TRAPEZOND, laied hard siege vnto the same by the space of thirtie dayes both by sea and land, & burnt the suburbs thereof, as he had before at SINOPE. The fearefull emperour dismayed with the presence of so mightie an enemie, and the sight of so puissant an armie, offered to yeeld vnto him the citie with his whole empire, vpon condition, That hee should take his daughter to wife, and deliuer vnto him some other prouince, which might yeeld him such yearely profit as might suffice for the honourable maintenance of his state. Mahomet perceiuing the weakenesse of his enemie by his large offers, refused to accept thereof, and attempted by force to haue taken the citie: which not sorting to his desire, the matter was againe brought to parle: where after long debating too and fro, it was at last agreed vpon, That the emperour vpon the faith of the Turkish king for his safe returne, should in person meet him without the citie, if happily so some good attonement might be made betwixt them. Whereupon the emperour following the Turkes faith before solemnly giuen for his safe returne, as was before agreed, went out of the citie to meet him, in hope to haue made some good agreement with him: but as soone as hee was come out, Mahomet according to the damnable & hellish doctrine of his false prophet (That faith is not to be kept with Christians) presently caused the emperour to be cast into bonds, and so to be detained as prisoner. VVhich when it was bruted in the citie, the citizens vtterly discouraged, without farther resistance yeelded themselves with the citie into his power.

Mahomet now lord of TRAPEZOND, entring the citie, tooke prisoners the emperours daughter, with all the rest of his children and kindred, and all such of the nobilitie as hee found in the citie: whom he caused forthwith, together with the emperour, to be sent by sea as it were in triumph to CONSTANTINOPLE. Of the rest of the cittizens he chose out so many as hee pleased for his owne seruice, and appointed eight hundred of the Christian children, in whom appeared most towardlinesse, to be brought vp for Ianizaries, many also of the other citizens were sent into captiuitie to CONSTANTINOPLE: the beautifull women and virgines hee deuicid amongst his friends and men of warre, certaine chosen paragons of whom, hee sent as presents to his sonnes. After he had thus taken his pleasure in the citie, and left none there but the basest of the people, he put a strong garrison of his Ianizaries into the castle, and a great garrison of common souldiours into the citie, appointing his admirall to gouerne the same. The rest of the emperours strong townes, discouraged with the taking of TRAPEZOND, and the miseries thereof, in short time submitted themselves vnto the Turkish thraldome, wherein they haue euer since most miserably liued. So Mahomet in the space of few moneths hauing reduced that empire into the forme of a prouince, returned in great triumph to CONSTANTINOPLE; when hee had in this expedition subdued PAPHLAGONIA, PONTVS, and a great part of CAPADOCIA, with some other prouinces neere vnto the Euxine sea. When he was come to CONSTANTINOPLE, he sent the emperour with his children prisoners to HADRIANOPLE. But afterwards vnderstanding that the Persian queene, the wife of Vsun-Cassan, sought meanes to get some one of her vnckles children, whom by the power of her husband she might if it were possible aduance vnto her fathers empire, he sent for Dauid the wofull emperour to CONSTANTINOPLE, and there cruelly caused him, him, with all his sonnes and kinsmen, to be put to death; and to the vttermost of his power rooted out all that most honourable familie of the Comneni, excepting George the emperours youngest sonne, who at his first comming to HADRIANOPLE turned Turke: whose sister (the emperours daughter) Mahomet afterwards tooke to be one of his concubines. This Christian empire was by the Turkish tyrant Mahomet thus miserably subuerted & brought to nought in the yeare of our Lord 1461.

The yeare following, which was the yeare 1462, Mahomet hauing intelligence, that Wladus Dracula prince of VALACHIA, his tributarie, was resolved to cast from him his obedience, and to joyne himselfe vnto the Hungarians, his mortall enemies; thought it best to proue if he could by policie circumuent him, before he were altogether fallen from him. For which purpose hee sent Catabolimus his principall secretarie vnto him to bring him to the court, promising him greater fauours and promotions from the emperour, than he had as yet at any time enjoyed. And by the same trustie messenger, he commaunded Chamuzes Bassa, gouernour of BIDINA and the countrey lying ouer against VALACHIA, on the other side of Danubius, to doe his vttermost deuoure for the entrapping of Wladus: promising him great rewards if he could bring the matter to effect. Whereupon Chamuzes deuised with the secretarie, that when he had done his messenger to the prince and with all his cunning perswaded him to take that journey vpon him, hee should secretly beforehand giue notice vnto him of the certaine day of his returne backe againe from the prince: at which time it was like, that Wladus would in courtesie of himselfe bring the secretarie well on his way, being a man of so great account in the Court, or at leastwise not refuse so to doe, being thereto requested by the secretarie: at which time the Bassa secretly passing ouer Danubius with certaine troupes of horsemen, and lying close in ambush vpon the way, should suddenly set vpon the prince, and so either take him, or els kill him. The plot thus laied, and euerie circumstance agreed vpon, the secretarie held on his way; and comming to the prince, forced his wit to perswade him to go to the court: sometime cunningly extolling the great opinion that Mahomet had of his fidelitie and valour; and otherwhiles feeding him with the hope of greater honours and princely preferments he was to receiue at the emperours hands. But when hee had said what he could, he obtained no more of the warie prince, but good words againe, and that he would in courtesie conduct him on his way vnto the side of Danubius. VVherof the secretarie by speedie messengers gaue Chamuzes intelligence: who secretly passing ouer Danubius with certaine troupes of horsemen, and riding a good way into the country, lay in ambush vpon the way, whereby the prince with the secretarie must needs passe. According as was before appointed, the secretarie accompanied with the prince, put himselfe vpon the way, and at the very prefixed time came to the place where Chamuzes lay in ambush with his horsemen: who suddenly arising, and on euerie side assailing the prince, slew diuers of his men before they were well aware of his comming. But Wladus being a man of great courage, and better appointed than the Bassa had supposed (for he went alwaies attended vpon with a strong guard of valiant and stout men) so receiued Chamuzes and his Turkes, that hee slew many of them, and at length after a hard conflict tooke him with the rest prisoners: whose hands and feet he caused to be cut off, and their bodies afterwards to be thrust vpon sharpe stakes, set fast in the ground, to the terror of all that saw them; and did the Bassa so much honour, as to hang him and the secretarie vpon a gibbet a great deale higher than the other Turkes. And not satisfied with this reuenge, presently gathered his forces, and passing ouer Danubius into the Turkes dominions, burnt all the country before him along with the riuers side, killing man, woman, and child, without mercie: after which great spoile & slaughter made, he returned againe into VALACHIA. The report of these news being brought to Mahomet, set him in such a choller and rage, that he commaunded the great Bassa Mahometes, which first sold him thereof, to be cruelly whipt; VVhich seruile punishment in that tyrannicall gouernment hath vially beene inflicted euen vpon the greatest Bassas of the court, vpon the least displeasure of the tyrants, especially if they bee not naturall Turkes borne; accounting the rest in their anger but as their base and contemptible slaues, as well appeareth by the wofull end of many, euen of the greatest of them. But when he vnderstood by most sure aduertisements, that all was as the Bassa had before reported, or rather worse, it is not to be in words expressed into what a rage he fell: the spoile of his countrey greeued him much, but the shamefull death of the secretarie his embassadour, and of Chamuzes the Bassa, tormented his heart, and filled him with indignation and desire of reuenge. VVherfore with all speed possible he assembled his souldiours and men of warre, out of all parts of his dominions to PHILIPPOPOLIS: and had in short time raised such an army, as the like he had not at any time imploied since the winning of CONSTANTINOPLE. At the same time also, he sent his Admirall with 25 gallies, and 150 saile of other small vessels by the Euxine, to enter the riuer Danubius, and there landing his men, to joyne his forces with the prince of PODOLIA: who for a grudge he bare against Wladus, had promised to aid the Turke against him. When all things were now in readinesse, he marched with his army from PHILIPPOPOLIS, and passing ouer Danubius, entered into VALACHIA, before which time, the Admirall had landed his men, and with the helpe of the Podolian, had burnt the citie of PRATILABA, the greatest towne of trade in all VALACHIA; and was besieging CEBTUM, called in antient time LYCOSTOMOS: where after they had lien a while and received some losse, they left the siege and departed, the Podolian backe againe into his countrey, and the Admirall to his fleet.

Mahomet himselfe in person invaded Valachia

Mahomet being got ouer Danubius, burnt the villages, draue away the cattell, and made havocke of all that came in his way. As for prisoners, he tooke but few; for the Valachies before his coming, had retired their wiues and children, and all that were vnto forwarres, either into their strong cities, or into the refuge of great and thicke woods (whereof there is in that countrey plentie) or else into the high and rough mountaines, where they were in more safetie than in any their strongest holds: and all such as were able to beare armes, followed the prince, who could, with safetie; and many times cut off such as stragled any thing farre abroad from the armie, into the countrey: yet neuer durst shew himselfe in plaine field, being indeed but a handfull, in comparison of the Turkes multitude. Mahomet, to small purpose roaming vp and down the countrey at his pleasure, staid neuer long in one place; and making no reckoning of such a weak enemy as durst neuer shew himselfe, pitched his tents still in the open plaines, and so lay with his army in great securitie, not entrenched at all. Wladus by his espials vnderstanding of this manner of *Mahomet*s encamping, came in the dead time of the night, and with all his power furiously assailed that quarter of the Turkes campe where the Asian souldiours lay, and slew many of them in their tents; the rest terrified with the suddennesse of the alarm, fled out of their tents for refuge vnto the European souldiours: the prince following them at the heeles, and entering into that quarter of the campe also, did there great harme; and stricke such a generall terrour and feare into all the Turkes army, that they were euen vpon the point to haue wholly forsaken their tents and betaken themselves to flight. Yea Mahomet himselfe, dismayed with the terrour of the night and tumult of his campe, and fearing least the Hungarians had joynd their forces with the prince; not knowing which way to turne himselfe, had vndoubtedly fled, had not Mahomet Basha a man of great experience in martiall affaires, perswaded him otherwise: and by generall proclamation made through the campe, That no man should vpon paine of death, forsake the place wherein he was encamped, staid the flight; and with much adoe enforced them to make head against the prince. Wladus perceiuing the Turkes now to begin to stand vpon their guard, and to make resistance: after great slaughter made, returning, tooke the spoile of the tents forsaken by the Asian souldiours, and vpon the approach of the day, againe retired with victorie into the woods. As soone as it was day, Mahomet appointed Haly-Beg with certaine companies of select souldiours, to pursue the Valachies: who ouertaking part of the princes armie, tooke a thousand of them prisoners, and put the rest to flight: all which prisoners were by the tyrants commaund, presently put to the sword. From that time Mahomet euerie night entrenched his army, and caused better watch and warde to bee kept in euerie quarter of his campe, than before.

A most horrible spectacle.

As he marched along the countrey, he came to the place where the Bassa and the secretarie were hanging vpon two high gibbets, and the dismembred Turkes empaild vpon stakes about them: with which sight he was grieuously offended. And passing on farther, came to a plaine containing in breadth almost a mile, and in length two miles, set full of gallows, gibbets, wheels, stakes, and other instruments of terrour, death, and torture; all hanging full of the dead carcases of men, women, and children, thereupon executed, in number (as was deemed) about twentie thousand. There was to be seene the father, with his wife, children and whole family, hanging together vpon one gallows; and the bodies of sucking babes, sticking vpon sharpe stakes: others with all their limbes broken vpon wheels, with many other strange and horrible kinds of death.

death: so that a man would haue thought, that all the torments the Poets faine to bee in hell had been there put in execution. All these were such as the notable, but cruell prince, jealous of his estate, had either for just desert, or some probable suspition, put to death; and with their goods rewarded his souldiours: whose cruell manner was, together with the offender to execute the whole family, yea sometimes the whole kindred. Mahomet, although he was by nature of a fierce and cruell disposition, wondred to see so strange a spectacle of extreame crueltie: yet said no more but that Wladus knew how to haue his subjects at commaund. After that, Mahomet sent Iosephus, one of his great captaines, to skirmish with the Valachies; who was by them put to the worke: but by the coming in of Omares the sonne of Turechan, they were againe in a great skirmish overthrowne, and two thousand of their heads brought by the Turkes vpon their launces into the kings campe: for which good seruice Omares was by the king preferred to be gouernour of THESSALIA.

Two thousand of the Valachies slain.

When Mahomet had thus traced VALACHIA, and having done what harme he could, saw it to be to no purpose, with such a multitude of men to hunt after his flying enemy, which still kept the thicke woods or rough mountaines: he returned againe to CONSTANTINOPLE, leaving behind him Haly-beg with part of his army, to prosecute that warre; and with him Dracula the younger brother of Wladus, who was also called Wladus, as a stale to draw the Valachies into rebellion against the prince. This Dracula the younger, was of a little youth brought vp in *Mahomet*s court, and for his comely feature of him most passionately affected: which inordinat perturbation, so preuailed in the intemperat nature of the lasciuious prince, that he sought first by faire words: and great gifts to corrupt the youth; and not so preuailing, attempted at last to haue forced him: wherewith the noble youth being enraged, drew his rapier, and striking at him to haue slaine him, grieuously wounded him in the thigh: and thereupon fled. Neuertheless being drawne backe againe to the court, and pardoned, he was afterwards reconciled to the king, and so became his Ganimede; and was of him long time wonderfully both beloued and honoured, and now set vp for a stale (as is before said) for the Valachies his countrey men to gaze vpon.

It fortuned, that after the departure of the king, diuers Valachies came to Haly-Beg the Turkish General, to raunsome such friends of theirs as had been taken prisoners in those warres, and were yet by him detained: to whom the younger Dracula by way of discourse declaring the great power of the Turkish emperour, and as it were lamenting the manifold and endlesse miseries of his natie countrey; cunningly imputed the same vnto the disordered gouernment of his cruell brother, as the ground of all their woes: assuring them of most happy and speedy redresse, if the Valachies, forsaking his fierce brother, would cleaue vnto him as their soueraigne, in speciall fauour with the great emperour. VVhich speech, he deliuered vnto them with such lively reasons, and in such effectually tearmes, that they their present, perswaded by him; and others by them; in short time all, as if it had been by a secret consent, forsooke Wladus the elder brother, and chose Dracula the younger brother to be their prince and soueraigne. VVho joyning vnto him the Turkes forces, by the consent of Mahomet tooke vpon him the gouernment of that waylike countrey and people; yet holding the same as the Turkish tyrants vassallo, the readiest way to infidelitie. Wladus seeing himselfe thus forsaken of all his subjects, and his younger brother possessed of his dominion, fled into TRANSYLVANIA, where he was by the appointment of the Hungarian king apprehended, and laied fast in strait prison at BELGRADE, for that he had without just cause (as it was laid to his charge) most cruelly executed diuers Hungarians in VALACHIA: yet such was his fortune, after ten yeares hard imprisonment, to be againe enlarged, and honourably to die in battaile against his auncient enemies the Turks.

The death of Wladus.

Mahomet returning out of VALACHIA to CONSTANTINOPLE, sent the same fleet which hee had vsed in his late warres, into the AEgeum, to take in such islands as being before vnder the Constantinopolitane empire, had vpon the losse of the citie put themselves vnder the protection of the Venetians; but especially the isle of MITYLENE, called in antient time LESBOS: pretending that Nicholaus Catelusus prince thereof, did harbour the pyrats of ITALY, and other places; and also bought of them such prisoners, and other bootie, as they continually rooke from the Turkes at sea, or alongst the sea coast; out of many places of his dominions: pretending also the chastising of the said prince, for that he had, by treacherie slaine his eldest brother, and so vnjustly taken vpon him the gouernment. His fleet thus set forward, he himselfe with a small

small army passed ouer into ASIA, and came by land to POSSIDIUM a citie of IONIA ouer against MITYLENE. From whence he embarked himselfe ouer the narrow strait into the island; where after he had once landed his army, he in short time ouerran the whole island, and miserably spoiled the same, leading away all the inhabitants thereof into captiuitie; who shortly after were sold at CONSTANTINOPLE like flocks of sheepe, and from thence dispersed into all parts of his dominions. After he had thus harried the countrey, and left nothing therein vnspoiled; he besieged the Prince in the citie of MITYLENE, whereof the island now taketh name: and with his great ordinance continually battered the same by the space of 27 daies. In which time many sharpe assaults were also giuen by the Turkes, whereby the defendants were greatly diminished and wasted. The prince perceiuing himselfe not able long to hold out, offered to yeeld vp the citie, with all the strong holds in the isle, vpon condition, that Mahomet should therefore giue vnto him some other prouince, of like valew to the island: which his offer Mahomet accepted, and by solemne oath bound himselfe for performance of that he had promised. Whereupon the prince came out of the citie, and humbled himselfe before him, excusing himselfe for the receiuing of the men of warre (wherewith he was charged) as done for no other purpose, but that they should forbear to spoile his owne countrey, much subject to their furie: wterly denying that he had at any time bought, or shared, any part of such prizes as had by those pirats by sea or land been taken from the Turkes. With which his excuse, Mahomet seemed to be reasonably well contented, and with good words cheered him vp: neuertheless, as soone as the citie, with all the other strong holds in the isle, were by the princes meanes deliuered into his hands, hee no longer made reckoning of his Turkish faith, but cruelly caused many of the chiefe citizens of MITYLENE to be put to death; and three hundred pirats, whom he found in the citie, to be cut in two peeces in the middle, so to die with more paine. And when he had placed conuenient garrisons in euerie strong hold in the isle, he returned to CONSTANTINOPLE, carrying away with him the prince, and all the better sort of the inhabitants of MITYLENE, that were left aliue, together with all the wealth of that most rich and pleasant island; leauing it almost desolat, none remaining therein more than his owne garrisons, with a few of the poorest and basest people. Mahomet after he was arrived at CONSTANTINOPLE, cast the prince Nicholas, with Lucius his cosin (whose helpe he had before vsed in killing of his elder brother) into close prison: where they seeing themselves euerie houre in danger of their liues, to winne fauour in the tyrants sight, wickedly offered to renounce the Christian religion, and to turne Turke. Which Mahomet vnderstanding, caused them both to be richly apparelled, and with great triumph to be circumcised, and presently set at libertie: yet still bearing in minde his olde grudge, he shortly after, when they least feared any such matter, clapt them both fast againe in prison, and there caused them to be most cruelly put to death. A iust rewarde for the bloodie murderers, and apostacie, who to gaine a little longer life, were content to forsake God.

Shortly after it fortuned, that Stephen king of BOSNA (in antient time called MASTA SYPRIOR) who supported by the Turkish emperour, had wrongfully obtained that kingdom against his owne brethren, refused now to pay such yearely tribute as hee had before promised: for which cause Mahomet with a strong armie entered into BOSNA, and laied siege vnto the citie of DOROBIZA: which when he had with much adoe taken, he deuided the people therof into three parts; one part whereof he gaue as slaues vnto his men of warre; another part he sent vnto CONSTANTINOPLE; and the third he left to inhabit the citie. From DOROBIZA he marched to IAZIGA, now called IACA, the chiefe citie of that kingdom, which after four monthes siege was deliuered vnto him by composition: In this citie hee tooke the kings brother and sister prisoners, with most of the nobilitie of that kingdom, whom he sent as it were in triumph vnto CONSTANTINOPLE. The other lesser cities of BOSNA following the example of the greater, yeelded themselves also. But Mahomet vnderstanding that the king of BOSNA had retired himselfe into the farthest part of his kingdom, sent Mahometes his chiefe Bassa with his European souldiours to pursue him: wherein the Bassa vsed such diligence, that he had on euery side so inclosed him before he was aware, that hee could by no meanes escape, which was before thought a thing impossible. So the king for safeguard of his life was faine to take the citie of CLYSSA for his refuge: where he was so hardly laied to by the Bassa, that seeing no other remedie, hee offered to yeeld himselfe vpon the Bassas faithfull promise by oath confirmed, that he should be honourably vsed, and not to receiue in his person any harme from the Turkish emperour. Whereupon the Bassas oath to the same purpose was with great solemnitie taken; and for the more assurance conceiued in writing, firmed by the Bassa, and so deliuered to the king: which done, the king came out of the citie and yeelded himselfe. The Bassa hauing thus taken the king prisoner, carried him about with him from place to place, and from citie to citie, vntill he had taken possession of all the kingdom of BOSNA; and so returning vnto his master, presented vnto him the captiue king: who was not a little offended with him, for that hee had vnto him so farre engaged his Turkish faith. But when the poore king thought to haue departed, not greatly fearing further harme, he was suddenly sent for by Mahomet: at which time, he doubting the worst, carried with him in his hand the writing wherein the Bassas oath for his safetie was comprised: neuertheless, the faithlesse tyrant without any regard thereof, or of his faith therein giuen, caused him presently to be most cruelly put to death, or as some write, to be slaine quicke. Thus was the Christian kingdom of BOSNA subuerted by Mahomet in the yeare 1464: who after he had at his pleasure disposed thereof, and reduced it into the forme of a prouince to be (as it is at this day) gouerned by one of his Bassas, in great triumph returned to CONSTANTINOPLE, carrying away with him many a wofull Christian captiue, and the whole wealth of that kingdom.

Mahomet following the example of his father Amurath, had from the beginning of his raigne by one or other of his great Bassas or expert capitaines still maintained wars against Scanderbeg, the most valiant and fortunat king of EPIRVS: the greatest part whereof, although it did in the course of time concurre with the things before declared, and might by peccemeale haue bene amongst the same in their due time and place inserted; yet I haue of purpose for diuerse reasons wholly referred them for this place: First, for that I would not interrupt the course of the historie before rehearsed, with the particular accidents of this warre: And then, for that the greatest heat of this hereditarie warre, deliuered as it were from hand to hand from the father to the son, happened not long after this time; when as Mahomet hauing conquered the kingdom of BOSNA, had surrounded a great part of Scanderbegs dominion: Wherein I had respect also vnto the Readers ease, who may with greater pleasure and content, and lesse paines also, view the same together, than if it had bene dispersedly scattered and intermeddled with the other greater occurrences of the same time. In which discourse I will but briefly touch many things well wortie of a larger treatise. And if forgetting my selfe, I shall in some places happen to stay something longer than the Readers haft would require; yet I hope, that the zeale and loue hee beareth vnto the worthie memorie of most famous Christian princes, together with the shortnesse of the historie, in comparison of that which is thereof written in iust volumes by others, shall easily excuse a larger discourse than this. But againe to our purpose.

Mahomet in the beginning of his raigne sent embassadours to Scanderbeg, offering him peace, so that he would graunt to pay vnto him such yearely tribute as his father Amurath had in his life time demanded. Which embassage the craftie tyrant sent rather to proue what confidence Scanderbeg had in himselfe, than for any hope he had to haue his demand graunted. This dishonourable offerred peace Scanderbeg scornfully rejected, and so returned the embassadours as they came: and presently vpon their departure entered with his horsemen into that part of the Turks dominion which bordereth vpon EPIRVS: & when he had wasted the countrey, returned home laded with the spoile thereof. In reuenge of which despight, Mahomet shortly after sent Amesa one of his best men of warre, with twelue thousand horsemen into EPIRVS, to requite Scanderbeg with the like spoile of his people and countrey. But Scanderbeg vnderstanding by his espials of the Turks comming, lay close in ambush with six thousand souldiours vpon the great mountaine MODRISA, ouer which the Turks must of necessitie take their way: and as they were about by night to haue passed ouer that rough and steepe mountaine, and were with much difficulty almost got vp to the top thereof, they were suddenly charged by Scanderbeg his footmen, who hauing the aduantage of the place, made great slaughter of the Turkes, & draue them downe the mountaine amaine; at which time their horses stood them in no stead at all, but were rather vnto them an hinderance in that vneuen and troublesome ground. Now when the Turkes were come to the foot of the mountaine, they were in that great feare and disorder againe fiercely assailed on the one side by Scanderbeg, and on the other by his nephew, called also Amesa; who before the Turkes comming had placed themselves with their horsemen in places of most aduantage: so that the Turkes hardly beset and forced on euery side, were in short time ouerthrowne and put to flight. In this conflict seven thousand of the Turkes were slaine, and Amesa Generall of the Turkes armie with diuers other captains taken, whom Scanderbeg sent prisoners to CROIA. For joy of this victorie at Scanderbeg his returne, great triumph & feasting was made at CROIA. During which time, Scanderbeg caused Amesa the Turke, with the rest of the Turkish captains, to be enlarged, to be partakers of that joy, whereof they against their wils had giuen the occasion; and afterwards vsed them with all kind of courttesie during the time of their abode. This Amesa requested of Scanderbeg, That he might send a messenger to CONSTANTINOPLE, to certifie Mahomet how the case stood with him and the rest, whom happily he might thinke to haue bene slaine in the battaile; and to procure from him their ransome. Which his request Scanderbeg easily graunted, and set downe their ransome at thirteene thousand ducats. The newes of this ouerthrow sore greued the Turkish tyrant, but afterwards when he saw the remainder of his armie without their generall and leaders, hauing for most part lost their ensignes and armor, and also the messenger that was sent from Amesa, he fell into such a rage, that hee denied to giue any thing at all for his ransome: imputing all that losse to his trecherie, follie, or cowardise. Howbeit he was afterwards perswaded by his Bassaes and other great courtiers, Amesa his friends, to thinke better of the Generall, of whose faithfulness and valour he had of long time had great experience, and also to send his ransome: by denying whereof, hee should (as they said) discourage his other generals and capitaines, who by chaunce of warre might hap to fall into the like danger. By whose perswasion Mahomet sent an embassadour to Scanderbeg, with the ransome demanded, and other great presents also. Vpon receit whereof, Amesa with the other capitaines were set at libertie, and sent with safe conuoy out of EPHRS. All the money sent for the Turkes ransome, Scanderbeg deuided amongst his capitaines and souldiours.

The great warres betwixt the Turkes and Scanderbeg, are at large written by Marinus Barletius, in 12 booke. De vita & gestis Scanderbegi, from whence this Historie is taken: and were done betwixt the yeares 1450 and 1467.

This late receiued ouerthrow filled the proud tyrant with desire of reuenge, so that hee determined forthwith to send another armie into EPHRS: the leading whereof, diuers of his great and most expert captains ambitiously fought for. For Mahomet had promised great rewards and most honourable preferments to him whose hap it should bee to vanquish Scanderbeg. Amongst the rest, one Debreas (a man for his forwardnesse and courage, in great fauour with his soueraign) by great sute obtained to haue that charge: promising with exceeding confidence vnto Mahomet, to make a beginning of better successe in his warres of EPHRS, than others thither by him before sent: for the accomplishment whereof hee required to haue no greater power than was sent the yeare before. But after that Amesa was returned to the court, and had with long discourse set forth the vertues and valour of Scanderbeg, with the inuincible courage of his souldiours, Debreas became more temperate in his speech, and was contented to receiue a new supplie: so that he had vnder his charge fouretee thousand souldiours: with which armie hee marched towards EPHRS, and was come to a place called POLOVS, where he lay with his armie encamped in a plaine in great securitie, fearing no danger, for that he was not as yet in the enemies countrey, neither as he supposed, nere the enemy. Of all this preparation, and of the coming of Debreas, Scanderbeg had intelligence: and being resolved not to expect the coming of the Turkes into EPHRS, made choise of six thousand of his best horsemen; with whom he marched with as much speed as was possible into the enemies countrey, and came by night vnto the plaine where the Turkes lay, hoping to haue been vpon them before they were aware, and so to haue ouerthrowne them. Wherein he was much deceiued: for by the light of the moone (which then shined all night) he was by the Turkes in time descried, yet the suddenesse of his approach with the strangenesse of the attempt, exceedingly dismaied the whole army of the Turkes. But Debreas mindfull of the promise he had made vnto his lord and master, with cheerefull words encouraged his souldiours, and presently sent out certaine troupes of light horsemen, to receiue the first charge of the enemy, vntill he might set his whole army in order of battaile. Betwixt these troupes, and others sent out by Scanderbeg, began a sharpe skirmish; both the armies standing fast, as beholders, carefully expecting the euent thereof. But Scanderbeg doubting, that if his souldiours should in this first encounter be put to the worse, it might tend to the great discouraging of the rest of his army; seconded his men with other fresh troupes vnder the leading of Moses and Amesa: by whose coming in, the Turkes were forthwith beaten backe, and chased euen to their maine battaile. In the heat of which chase, Moses forgetting himselfe, had with great danger in following on too fast, been enclosed by the Turkes, had not his furie bene in good time staied by Amesa: for which ouersight, he was afterward blamed by Scanderbeg, that he could not with greater moderation vse his good fortune; commending such forwardnesse in a priuat souldior, but not in so great a commaunder. When Moses and Amesa had thus put the Turkes to flight, Scanderbeg brought on his whole armie, and fiercely assailed the Turkes, yet troubled with the discomfiture of their fellows. Debreas on the other side, with cheerefull speech, and his owne valour, so encouraged his souldiours, that Scanderbeg was there notably resisted, and his fortune as it were at a stand: vntill that Musachius, with certaine troupes of resolute men, drawne out of the left wing of Scanderbeg his armie, gaue such a fierce charge vpon the side of the Turkes armie, that he brake their rankes, and sore disordered that part of the armie. Which when Debreas perceiued, he withdrew himselfe out of the front of the battaile wherein hee had valiantly stood against Scanderbeg, and came to the place where Musachius had disordered the battaile, and with such courage cheared vp his troubled souldiours, that his onely presence and valour seemed to bee the very life and heart of his whole armie. Whilest Debreas was thus busied against Musachius, Scanderbeg in the meane time with might and maine still charged the front of the enemies armie: who now in the absence of the Generall began to loose their order and to giue ground, making no such resistance as before. At which time, Moses forcibly breaking into the thickest of them, tooke one of their ensignes, which hee threw backe amongst his followers: wherewith they encouraged, so pressed vpon their enemies, without regard of danger, that the Turkes being therewith discouraged, and their battaile disordered, were almost readie to turne their backs and to flie. Debreas seeing all in danger to be lost, hastened with all speed vnto the place where he saw most perill, and did what was possible to haue restored the battaile, and encouraged his souldiours: where pressing in amongst the foremost, hee was by Scanderbeg himselfe encountered hand to hand, and so by him slaine: with whose fall the whole armie discouraged, without further resistance fled. Moses pursuing them on the one side, & Musachius on the other, with furious hand slew more in that chase than were slaine in the battaile. Of the Turkes were slaine in this battaile 4120, and some prisoners taken, but of the Christians few or none: so that for the good fortune thereof, Scanderbeg accounted it a victorie giuen. All the spoile taken from the enemy, together with the prisoners, was by Scanderbeg equally deuided amongst the souldiours. Vnto Moses he gaue Debreas his horse and armour: and vnto Musachius a prisoner, which by his port and behauior seemed to be a man of some good account. This Turke agreed with Musachius vpon a ransome of two hundred ducats, and presently vpon agreement made, drew forth the money out of a little bag, which he had kept secretly about him, and offered it to Musachius for his ransome: VVho receiuing the money, told the Turke, that he must prouide another ransome, for as much as that money was his owne before by law of armes, as taken with his person. The Turke on the other side alledged for himselfe, the agreement already made, with the payment of the full summe agreed vpon. This controuersie was brought before Scanderbeg: who with great pleasure heard them both what they could say: Musachius laying in hard for another ransome, and the Turke for his libertie vying the agreement. VVho when they had both said what they could for themselves, Scanderbeg smiling, told them, that they both contended for that which was in right his and neither of theirs: for the prisoner with the money were both mine (said he) at the first taking of him; since which time I haue giuen to you Musachius the prisoner, which I knew, but not the money which I knew not of: neither doth the concealing thereof make it yours (said he to the Turke) who had by law of armes lost your selfe, together with that you had about you. After he had thus pleasantly discoursed of the matter, and brought them both in doubt, he awarded vnto Musachius the money he agreed for, and to the Turke his desired libertie: who glad thereof, and hauing also receiued his horse and armour of the gift of Scanderbeg, departed, speaking all the honour he could of so noble a conquerour. After this victorie Scanderbeg with great triumph returned againe to CROIA.

When Mahomet vnderstood that Debreas was slaine, and his armie ouerthrowne, hee became exceeding melancholie: but after he saw so many of his souldiours returned as had ben sufficient to haue restored a lost battaile, he was so highly displeased with their cowardise, as that he could not endure the sight of them. The death of Debreas greued none more than the king himselfe: for the capitaines generally either eniued at his hardinesse, or else hated his insolencie. Amesa amongst the rest tooke no small pleasure, that his proud successour had taken part of his euill fortune, and so in part eased his former infamie. The great Bassaes and men of warre seeing their soueraigne so desirous of reuenge, offered to spend their liues in that seruice: whose forwardnesse wardnesse he seemed not to refuse: howbeit he had in his mind already plotted another manner of reuenge. He was not ignorant, what great matters his father Amurath had brought to passe, by sowing discord amongst the princes of GRACIA: which fowle practise he purposed now to put in practise himselfe. There was at that time many famous chieftains in EPHRS, of Scanderbeg both beloued and trusted; amongst whom, he was in hope to find some one who for desire of wealth or promotion, might be allured to giue some desperate attempt against the life or state of Scanderbeg. Of all others, Moses Golemus of DIABRA (a man honourably descended) was most inward with Scanderbeg, and for his prowesse and experience in martiall affaires, of all men accounted the best capitaine in all EPHRS, next vnto Scanderbeg himselfe: him, the craftie tyrant most desired to alienate from Scanderbeg, as one fittest to serue his purpose, and easiest without suspition to be delt withall; because he commonly lay with a strong garrison in DIABRA, vpon the verie frontiers of EPHRS. Wherefore he directed his letters vnto the gouernor of SEBTIGRADE, commanding him by all meanes he could possibly deuise to withdraw Moses from Scanderbeg; and not to spare for any gold or golden promises whereby to allure him: promising also vnto the gouernour himselfe great preferments, if hee could winne him. Vpon receipt of which letters, the gouernour began forthwith carefully to deuise, how he might best attempt the matter he had in charge: where after many deuises, he at last thought vpon a shrewd-headed fellow, one of the Christians which dwelt in SEBTIGRADE; whom for that he was a Christian, he might without suspect vse as an instrument in so dangerous and important an action. This Christian the gouernour called vnto him, and after he had with great gifts and large promises wooed him to undertake the matter; he sent him away, fully before armed with plenteous instructions, full of treason and deceit. When this subtil messenger was come vnto Moses, and vnder pretence of great and secret matters of importance, had obtained to speake with him in priuie: he after some discourse had of matters well worth the hearing, began at length vnder the couert of faire glozing words, to vtter his poison: Shewing vnto him (as a messenger from the gouernour) the great and good opinion the Turkish emperour had of long time conceiued of his valour and prowesse: for which cause his heroicall nature could not but honour him, although he were his enemy; and therewith also manuell, that he being a man of that worth, could be contented to be commaunded by Scanderbeg, whose state was by him chiefly vpholden: whereas if he would doe wisely, and changing his affection, follow Mahomet, an emperour of greatst magnificence and power, he should quickly in his court find such honourable entertainment, as were to be preferred before the state of Scanderbeg: or if the soueraignie of EPHRS his native countrey did better please him, he might easily be thereunto advanced, by joyning his owne endeavour vnto Mahomet's great power. It pleased Moses well to heare his owne praises (a thing incident vnto haughty minds) and he liked well that he was so fauoured of the Turkish emperour: but the hope of the kingdome of EPHRS began to worke in him new conceits, and moued him more than all the rest. Such is the force of ambitious thoughts, that they make a man forget all things, save themselves: so glorious a thing it is, to stand in the highest place. For all that, Moses neither in word or countenance made any semblant of liking, or disliking the message. Which the wily messenger taking for a secret consent, and hartely glad that he had been so well heard: not desiring as then any further answer, craued leaue to depart; promising in short time to returne to him againe. After the departure of this messenger, many troubled thoughts began to arise in the mind of Moses: his mirth was changed into melancholy, and the cheerfulness of his countenance was abated, his haughty thoughts were his solitarie companions, and the imagined kingdome the idoll he in secret worshipped; so that in short time, he seemed vnto the wiser sort as a man altogether metamorphosed. Some were so bold, as for to aske the cause of the messengers comming: vnto whom he answered, That he was one, from whom he receiued intelligence of matters concerning the good of the state: which his answer was holden for true; for who durst once mistrust Moses? Whilste he was thus tossed vp and downe with his owne thoughts, as a shippe with the billowes of a wrought sea, the same sly messenger, according to his promise came againe; and for his more credit, in secret brought with him such presents as well might seeme to haue bene sent from the Great Turke; with his message better framed than before. Of all which that was sent, Moses is reported to haue receiued nothing but the worst, which was, the verie treason it selfe. And so returned the messenger, with answer, That he could not but in good part accept of the Turkish emperours great fauours; and for the rest of his requests, whatsoeuer he should chance to doe therein, he should not from thenceforth find him any great enemy: commanding the messenger at his departure, no more to repaire vnto him about that matter, for feare of suspition.

After that, it chanced that Scanderbeg came into DIABRA, to see how all things stood there, and to consult with Moses for the besieging of SEBTIGRADE; which citie it grieued him to see in the possession of the Turkes. Moses to auert Scanderbeg from that enterprize, wherein hee must of force be driuen to shew himselfe, told him, That he vnderstood of late by a certaine messenger which came to him out of SEBTIGRADE, that the citie was so well stored by the Turkes, of all things necessarie for the defence thereof, that it were but lost labour to attempt any thing against the same: wherefore hee aduised him rather to besiege BELGRADE (not that BELGRADE which is situated vpon the riuier of Danubius, but another of the same name) in the confines of EPHRS, then holden by the Turkes, but distant from SEBTIGRADE about an hundredth and fortie miles; of the taking whereof, there seemed to be more hope. By this persuation, Scanderbeg resolved with himselfe to make prouision for the besieging of BELGRADE. And forasmuch as his souldiours of EPHRS alwaies vsed to the field, were not so fit for the besieging of townes, he thought it good to pray aid out of ITALY, from his old friend Alphonso king of Scanderbeg craveth aid of Alphonso king of NAPLES, with whom he had been of long time acquainted, and vnto him much beholden. Wherefore he sent two of his noble men embassadours vnto him, with certaine rich presents, and familiar letters of this purport.

Our souldiours of EPHRS, know only how to fight with men, and them to vanquish: with walls they know not how to deale. You Italians (as I vnderstand) haue skill in that kind of seruice, and take pleasure therein: wherefore now at this present, I haue need of your helpe and cunning. There be certaine townes of our enemies in EPHRS, yea almost in the heart of our kingdome; which eye-sore I haue of long desired (if it pleased God) to take out of my sight: but being occupied with continuall wars, had no leisure vntill now, happily to attempt any thing against them. This time I haue chosen as most fit, to satisfie my desire, both for the seasonableness of the time of the year, and for that Mahomet spareth me leisure; whose furie I haue wisely calmed: You vnderstand in few words, what I haue need of: all other things are almost in readinesse, and we only looke for your helpe. Lend me such souldiours as know how to fight a faire off. I meane harquebusers and canoniers, for of others we haue store plenty. But happy is APULIA, my Alphonso, vnder thy government, from whence men fit for all seruices may be drawne as out of a most plentifull treasure. Whensoever we haue requested men fit for seruice, either in peace or warre, you haue beautified both our court and campe. By you the kingdome of EPHRS hath been supported with ciuile policie, and warlike strength: all sort of people, of what condition soeuer: yea euery corner of EPHRS soundeth forth thy praise, both at home and abroad. But for mine owne part, I doe so louingly embrace your kindnesse, and so firmly retaine the remembrance of your desert: towards me, that sometime I wish you that fortune (although in so doing I may seeme unkinde) which (as the common saying is) proueth, but getteth not friends: to the intent, that you might by some more certaine proofe know, how much I am to you deuoted.

When Scanderbeg had sent away his embassadours, he with all diligence began to prouide things necessarie for the siege of BELGRADE; wherein he had purposed also to haue vsed the seruice of Moses. But he now in heart a traitor both to his prince and countrey, and a friend to Mahomet, found many excuses to stay at home in DIABRA: alleadging first, that it was to be thought, that so soone as the Turkish king should heare of the siege of BELGRADE, he would inuade some part of EPHRS, thereby to withdraw his enemies from the siege: and then, that no part of all EPHRS lay neerer vnto the Turkes, or more in danger, than DIABRA; and that therefore he could doe any better seruice, than to see vnto the safetie of that countrey, long before committed to his charge, and in which also most part of his liuing lay. These his excuses, proceeding indeed from deepe treason, were yet neuertheless thought reasonable, and he for his prouident care highly commended; and authoritie giuen him with new supplies to augment the garrison vnder his command, as time and occasion should require.

By that time that Scanderbeg had fully made his preparation for the intended siege, the embassadours before sent to Alphonso, were returned into EPHRS, and with them such aid as Scanderbeg had before requested; and a great deale more: For Alphonso fearing the greatnesse of the Turkish emperour, in what he could furthered Scanderbeg his actions, reckoning Epirus not above 60 miles distant from his dominions, to be the strongest wals of his kingdome in Asiatra (as not many years after, it by prooffe appeared, when as the Turks having taken Constantinople put all Italy in no small feare.) With this aid he also wrote louing letters vnto Scanderbeg, to put all Italy in no small feare. With this aid he also wrote louing letters vnto Scanderbeg, thanking him for his presents, and for the good opinion he had of him, willing him to make as bold of all his things, as of his owne. But when he came to make mention of the fouldiours he had sent; Alphonfus, after the manner of his pleasant nature, merrily wrote vnto Scanderbeg, That he had sent him Italian fouldiours which could according to his desire, fight well both with men and wals; but better with women: and that therefore the Epirots were best to take heed, that they whole helpe they required for fight a farte off, proued not also good warriours at hand at home in their houses. The great commendation Scanderbeg had giuen of the king, was by him referred vnto the excesse of his loue, and by the king requited with like.

Scanderbeg now furnished with all things needfull, set forward, and according to his former determination, came and encamped before Belgrad, with an army of foureene thousand good fouldiours: and in short time had so distressed the citie, that the Turks were glad to take truce with him for sixteene daies, which time expired, they promised to deliuer vp the towne, if they were not before relieved. Vpon conclusion of this truce, Scanderbeg encamped himselfe vpon an high hill neere vnto the citie, with three thousand horse, and a thousand foot; and appointed Musachius and Tanufius, with the rest of the army, to remoue farther off, into a large plaine, where they might encampe themselves in a more wholsome and fresh ayre, in that hot season of the yeare, during the time of the truce. At which time he appointed also 25 scouts to keepe continuall watch vpon the top of the highest mountaine, to discouer a farte off the coming of the enemy, and to giue warning therof vnto the campe by making a fire vpon the mountaine: by the negligence of which watch, Scanderbeg receiued a great ouerthrow, as hereafter followeth.

The newes of the siege of Belgrad was brought vnto Mahomet, at such time as he was ready to haue passed into Asia against the emperour of Trapezond: which great enterprife he was loath to giue ouer, for the reliefe of Belgrad, and yet to lose that citie vnto Scanderbeg, grieved him much: wherefore he resolved with himselfe so to do the one, as that he would not altogether neglect the other. And so holding on his extended journey into Asia, himselfe, with such fortune as is aforesaid, he sent Sebalias one of his great Bassas, with fortie thousand horsemen to relieue Belgrad, promising him great rewards if he could bring him Scanderbeg either aliuie or dead. This Bassa was of the Turks accounted for a warie captaine, but not so contagious, alwaies more politike than forward: he hauing receiued his charge, set forward with all speed possible, no lesse carefull of that he was commanded, than was Mahomet himselfe, and by great journeyes came on so fast, that he still preuented the fame of his coming; and by his foretunniers intercepted, or rather (as some write) corrupted the watch which Scanderbeg had before placed vpon the mountaines; so that no signe was giuen vnto the campe of the enemies, as was expected. By meanes whereof, Sebalias with all his power were vpon that part of Scanderbeg his army, which lay in the plaines, before they were well aware of his coming: so that most part of them had not so much leisure as to bridle their horses, or to put on their armor. In which so sudden a feare, Musachius armed himselfe, and put his fouldiours in such order as the shortnesse of the time and the enemies approach would permit; doubting much, whether it were better to fight or to flie: but seeing no lesse danger in flight than in fight, he resolutely receiued the enemies charge, as a man desirous before hand to reuenge his owne death. And at length (seeing his men slaine about him by heapes, and that courage must needs giue place vnto fortune) fiercely attempted to haue broken through the midst of his enemies, and so to haue fled vnto the mountaine where Scanderbeg lay: but he was so beset, that no way was possible to be made; wherefore resoluing there to die, he desperately fought, to the great admiration of his enemies, vntill that he, with all there with him, were euery man slaine. Tanufius on the other side, after he had giuen diuers braue attempts to haue rescued his cousin Musachius, finding by prooffe, that he could doe him no more good therein but to become the wofull companion of his death, exhorted all the rest yet left, for safeguard of their liues to flie: in which doing, most of them were slaine, for the Bassas great army so filled all places thereabout, and so eagerly pursued the victorie, that it was almost impossible any way to scape. Scanderbeg lying vpon the mountaine, and seeing the ouerthrow of most part of his armie, was about many times to haue descended from the hill, to haue holpen them in what hee might, or els to haue there died with them: but yet stayed, being thereto earnestly requested by his other most expert captaines; and persuaded, not desperately to thrust both himselfe and them all into the manifest perill of assured death.

Sebalias hauing slaine Musachius, and put Tanufius to flight, followed the chafe with the greatest part of his armie, so that few were left in the great plaine, except such as stayed to rife the dead. Scanderbeg taking that oportunitie, came downe from the hill whereon he stood, with his foure thousand fouldiours, and in a moment slew all such Turks as he found in his way: and after following in the taile of the Turkes armie, cut off a great number of them, and brought a general feare vpon the whole armie: insomuch, that Sebalias perceiuing that he gained not so much in chasing of Tanufius, but that he lost more in the reteward of his armie, by the pursuit of Scanderbeg, left the chafe, and turned vpon his fierce enemy: Where after a sharpe skirmish begun, the warie Bassa fearing in the maintaining of that disordered fight to haue the victorie wrung out of his hands by Scanderbeg, caused a retreat to bee sounded, so to call together his disperfed fouldiours, and in better order to encounter his dangerous enemy. Scanderbeg in the meane time hauing assembled the remainder of his armie, valiantly again encountered the Turks, who thought in this battaile to haue made an end of the warres in Epirus: and with his owne hand slew Mat and Barach, two valiant fouldiours of the Turkes; which like stout champions had before sworn vnto Mahomet the death of Scanderbeg, if they should chance to meet with him. In this last skirmish a great number of the Turks were slaine: but night drawing on, Sebalias retired with his armie to a mountaine neere vnto the citie, and Scanderbeg likewise to another almost two miles off: and in the dead time of the night rising with his armie, returned in safetie into Epirus, leaving strong garrisons vpon all the strait passages as he went, for feare least the Bassa proud of this victorie, should forthwith breake into Epirus. This was the onely and greatest ouerthrow that Scanderbeg had hitherto receiued of the Turkes: wherein hee lost two thousand horsemen and three thousand foot (most part whereof were of the Italians sent from king Alphonfus) together with his tents and great artilerie, and about eightie of his men taken prisoners. And of the Turks were also slaine three thousand.

*Scanderbeg slaine
by night into

The next day Sebalias perceiuing that Scanderbeg was retired, commanded the bodies of the slaine Turks to be sought out and buried: but of such Christians as they yet found breathing, the Turks cut off their hands and feet, and so left them amongst the dead. The head of Musachius and of many other the slaine Christians, which by their armour or apparrell were thought to be of the better sort, were by the commandement of Sebalias cut off: which because he could not for the distance of the place, and heat of the weather, without great annoyance carrie with him to Constantinople, as the barbarous manner of the Turks is; he caused them to bee slaine, and stuffed with chaffe, and so to bee caried as the vaine trophies of his victorie. Afterwards, when hee had repaired the battered wals of Belgrad, and put a new supplie of seuen hundred fresh fouldiours into the citie, beside the old garrison therein before, and set all things in good order, he returned with great triumph to Constantinople. And the more to set out the glorie of his victorie, at such time as he entered the citie, he first caused the captiue Christians to be led in chaines before him; after whom were borne the ensignes taken from the Christians, with the aforesaid heads thrust vpon launces, and after them all the spoile: last of all came Sebalias himselfe, with his fouldiours, as great conquerours, and was of the people receiued with such applause and joy, as if hee had conquered some great kingdome. No man was now spoken of but Sebalias, his praises were in euery mans mouth, hee was the onely man (as they said) that did shew that Scanderbeg was to be overcome: no preferment was now thought too great for him, or reward sufficient to counteruaile his desert. The poore Christian captiues were afterwards for most part sold: of the rest, some were aliuie thrust vpon sharpe stakes, some hanged vpon yron hookes, some otherwise cruelly at the victors pleasure tortured to death.

Moses lately before corrupted by the practise of the gouernour of Spartigrade, hearing of the great losse Scanderbeg had receiued at Belgrad, thought it now a most fit time for his reuolt. But for as much as the fact, in the nature of it selfe foule, seemed euen to himselfe the doer thereof a great deale fouler and more dishonourable, for that he had therein no complices: hee thought it good, if it were possible, to allure some others into the fellowship of his treason, so to diminish diminish the infamie of himselfe, in communicating the same with many, and to appeare with greater credit before the Turkish tyrant, than if hee should as a contemptible fugitive come all alone. Wherefore vpon the bad newes from BALORDA, he seemed at the first very pensive, and much to lament the misfortune of Scanderbeg and the common miserie of the countrey of EPIRVS, with many words amplifying the same: and then on the contrarie part, setting forth to the vttermost the force and power of the Turkish emperor Mahomet, thereby to strike a greater terror and distrust into the minds of them with whom hee was conuerfant: but vnto such as were more secret and inward with him, hee discovered the great affection and fauour the great emperor Mahomet had of long borne him, with the large offer of his gifts and preferments, assuring them of the like also, if they would conformance themselves vnto his appetite; seeking hereby so much as he could, to allure them into the participation of his most execrable treason: yet when he had said what he could, he found none but a few of the baser sort of the common souldiours, which were willing to hearken vnto him or to follow him. When Moses saw how much he had laboured, and how little preuailed, fearing to be discovered, hee fled by night to *SPE*TI GRAD, accompanied with a few base fellows, and easily obtained the gouernours passe, with safe conduct to CONSTANTINOPLE: where he arriued a litle before the returne of Sebalis from *BALOR*DA, and was of Mahomet both joyfully receiued and honourably entertained.

When Scanderbeg vnderstood that Moses was thus revolted, at the first report thereof hee was troubled with the strangenesse of the fact, that he stood speechlesse as a man astonished: but after he had pawed a while, and vpon further enquire had found it to be true, he according to his heroicall disposition, said no more, but that he could easily haue Moses excused, for that hee was carried away with the violence of such fortune as might haue alienated the mind of a right constant man. And when diuers of his friends (according to the manner of the world) with hard speeches seemed to agrauate his offence: he could not abide to heare the same, but commanded them to hold their peace, and no more to vse such speeches: wishing that all treason and euill fortune were together with Moses gone out of EPIRVS. Vpon this newes, Scanderbeg accompanied with Ancsa his nephew and a troupe of horsemen, presently went into the countrey of DIBRA, and there with all care caused most diligent enquire to be made, if any could be found partakers of the conspiracie with Moses. But finding none, he much rejoyced in the fidelitie of his subjects: and hauing for all things in good order in that prouince, returned himselfe to CROIA.

Moses remaining in the Turks court, ceased not to sollicite Mahomet to proceede in his warres against Scanderbeg, promising to doe therein great matters, euen to the spending of his life in that seruice. But the craftie tyrant thinking it not good to trust him too farre before hee had further triall of him, delayed him off vntill the next Spring, pretending that the yeare was too far spent to begin warres. In the meane time he caused all Moses talke, his behauior and actions, to be diligently obserued and noted; and oftentimes himselfe discoursed with him concerning the managing of that warre: all which he did especially to sound the depth of Moses his thoughts. And finding nothing in him but the most assured and vndoubted signes of a mind deuoted to his seruice, and altogether estranged from Scanderbeg: in the beginning of the Spring he committed to his charge the leading of fifteene thousand horsemen for the invading of EPIRVS; such men as Moses himselfe should make choice of: for a greater number he required not for the vanquishing of Scanderbeg. These souldiours although they detested (so few in number) to enter that fatal countrey of EPIRVS, as men faire warned by other mens harmes; yet heartened on by the opinion they had conceiued of their new Generall, and the hope they had by his meanes to find friends in that countrey to joyne with them, were the willing to goe. So Moses furnished with a notable armie, and all warlike prouision he could desire for the destruction of his countrey; and blinded with the inagination of a kingdome, set forward; & matching through THRACIA and Macedonia, forgetting the loyaltie due vnto his soueraigne, and the loue hee ought to haue borne vnto his native countrey, came and entered into DIBRA.

Scanderbeg by his espials vnderstanding of the coming of Moses, as also what strength hee was of, stood not now vpon any policie against him who had of long been priue to all his secret games, but was readie euen at his first entrance with true valour to encounter him. As both the armies stood raunged in order of battaile, a messenger came from the Turks campe, to know of Scanderbeg, if any one of his armie durst to proue his fortune hand to hand against one of the Turks, before the beginning of the generall battell. By which messenger answere was returned, That

That the challenge should be accepted. The name of the Turk which made this braue challenge was Ahemaze, a man for his valour and courage of great name amongst the Turkes: Vpon this proud challenge, Zacharias Gropa, a gentleman of no lesse reputation amongst the Christians, hastily stepped forth before Scanderbeg (as if he had beene afraid to haue beene preuented by some other) and requested, that he might be the man to abate the Turkes pride: Scanderbeg embracing him, commended his noble mind, and wishing him good fortune, gaue him leave to carrie with him into the field the first honour of the Christian armie. As he was arming himselfe, his companions & fellowes in armes standing about him, wished vnto him not more courage or strength than he had, but onely the fortune of Manessi. Vpon his armour hee put on many rich jewels and ornaments, the allurements or rather the rewards of the enimie, if hee could vanquish him. The Turkish champion was no sooner come into the plaine betwixt both armies; & made shew of himselfe in great brauerie as if his match had yet beene scarcely found; but he saw Zacharias come forth brauely mounted, and readie to charge him: to whom Ahemaze calling aloud, said there would bee time ynough for him to hasten to his death; and therefore requested to talke with him before. So when he had learned of him both his name and place, he propounded such like conditions of the combat, as had beene long before derided by Manessi: whereof Zacharias in no better sort accepted. In few words it was agreed vpon betwixt them, That each of them should abide his owne fortune, without any helpe or aid of others; and that the victor should haue full power ouer the bodie and spoile of the vanquished. Thus agreed, they withdrew themselves one a good distance from another, and with their lances charged, ran together with such force, that with the violence of the encounter they brake their lances one vpon the other, and were both horse and man ouerthrowne. Both vnhorsed, they nimbly recovered themselves, and with their scimitars fiercely assailed the one the other on foot. Fortune it should seeme had determined to beautifie that combat with varietie, standing a great while indifferent to both. After many sturdie strokes giuen, without any hurt done, by reason they were so strongly armed, it fortuned that both their swords were beaten out of their hands: then grappling together with their bare hands, as if they had beene two vnarmed wrestlers, after long struggling till they were both almost out of breath, Zacharias ouerthrew the Turke, and lying vpon him, with his dagger, about the gorget thrust him into the throat, and slew him: and so rising vp, with the sword that first came to his hands, cut off the Turkes head: at the sight whereof the Christian armie gaue a great shout for joy, to the great discomfure of the Turks. To be short, Zacharias depoyling the Turke of his armour, and what else he thought good, returned loded with the spoile of his enimie, and presented vnto Scanderbeg the proud Turkes head: for which hee was of him afterwards most honourably rewarded.

Into this place yet reeking with the blood of the late slaine Turke, came Moses, and with a loud voice challenged Scanderbeg hand to hand; thinking indeed that he would not haue aduentured his person: but when he saw him readie to come forth, hee shamefully forooke the place, and returned with shame ynough into his armie.

Presently after, both the armies vpon signall giuen set forward, and so began to joine battaile: where at the first onser Scanderbeg so valiantly charged the vauward of the Turkes armie, that they were glad to giue ground: which Moses perceiuing, releued them with new supplies: and riding now here, now there, with his presence and courage restored the battaile, in many places almost lost. Howbeit, the Epirots encouraged with the beginning of their good fortune, still preuailed vpon their enemies, and after great slaughter made, came to the strength of their battaile; where Moses had placed most of his best souldiours, as his most assured and last refuge: In this place the Turks fought with exceeding courage, and Moses warily obseruing in what part of the battaile Scanderbeg himselfe was, directed his greatest forces against him, of purpose, if possibly he might, to haue slaine him: whereof he missed but a litle; for a courageous souldiour of the Turkes by chance encountering with Scanderbeg, with his horsemans staffe bare him quite backward vpon his horse, in such forcible manner, that the Turks for joy gaue a great shout, thinking verily he had beene slaine: but Scanderbeg recovering himselfe againe, and chased with such an vnwonted disgrace, furiously assailed the same Turke with his sword, and after a great fight slew him. A great part of the Turkes armie being alreadie ouerthrowne by them that had the leading of the wings of Scanderbeg his armie, diuers of the common souldiours thrust the heads of the slaine Turkes vpon the points of their speares, in token of victorie, to the great astonishment of the the Turkes: and now joyning themselves with Scanderbeg, more fiercely charged the maine battail of the Turkes than before. Neuertheless, Moses encouraging his souldiours, did what was possible for a man to doe, and euen with his owne valour a great while staid the course of the victorie: vntill he seeing the ground about him couered with the dead bodies of his best souldiours, and that there was no remedie but that he must either flie, or there die; turned his backe and fled. In which flight, many of the hindermost of the Turkes were slaine: as for Moses himselfe, he escaped by waies to him well knowne, onely with foure thousand men, the poore remainer of so great an armie: the rest, to the number of about eleuen thousand, all choise men, were slaine: whereas of the Christians were not past an hundred lost, and about eightie wounded. Of all the Turkes that were taken, onely one was sau'd; who being a man of good account, had yielded himselfe to Zacharias, and was afterward raunfomed: the rest were all by the common souldiours, without pittie, tortured to death, in reuenge of the crueltie by them shewed at Belgrade: Scanderbeg himselfe either not knowing thereof, or winking therat.

Moses condemned of the Turkes

Moses with the rest of his discomfited armie, lay still a while vpon the borders of Epirus, and would faine haue perswaded them, after the departure of Scanderbeg, to haue followed him againe into Epirus, to haue surpris'd the garrison left in Dibra, in number not aboue two thousand; promising to bring them vpon the same garrison, before they should be aware of their coming. But the Turkes hauing him now in contempt, were about by generall consent to forsake him, and to returne home. And so Moses seeing no remedie, returned with them to Constantinople, with countenance as heauie as if he had bene a condemned man now carried to the place of execution: and the Turkes which had not long before had him in great admiration, expecting that he should haue ended the wars in Epirus; began now to disgrace him as fast, and to speake all the euill of him they could deuise. Yea the proud tyrant himselfe (although he could blame nothing in the man, but his fortune) was so highly offended with him, for the losse of his armie, that he had vndoubtedly put him to most cruell death, had not the great Basses, and others nere about him, perswaded him otherwise: saying, That in so doing, he should alienate the mindes of all others from reuolting vnto him, or attempting any great thing for his seruice. So was he by their mediation, pardoned his life; but withall, so disgraced, that he had little or nothing allowed him afterwards for his necessarie maintenance: all which despitefull contumelies he outwardly seemed patiently to beare; but was inwardly so tormented with melancholy and grife, that he could neither eat nor drinke: The remembrance of the foule treason committed against his prince and countrey, was day and night before his eyes; and the disgraces of the Turkes court inwardly tormented him with intollerable grife: The sight of the tyrant (who measured all things by the euent) filled his heart with secret indignation; and to returne againe vnto his naturall prince, of whom he had so euill deserued, he was ashamed: Sometime the clemencie and princely nature of Scanderbeg, whom he knew of old, flow to reuenges, and easie to be entreated to forgiue, hartened him on to thinke of returne; and by and by, the consideration of his foule treason ouerwhelmed him with despaire. Thus with contrarie thoughts plunged too and fro, tormented with the inspeakeable griefes of a troubled conscience, not knowing what to doe, purposing now one thing, and by and by another: at last he resolved to forsake the insolent tyrant, and to submit himselfe to the mercie of Scanderbeg; wishing rather to die in his countrey for his due desert, than to liue with infamie, derided in the Turkes court. Resting himselfe vpon this resolution, one euening hee got secretly out of the gates of Constantinople, and traueilling all that night and the day following before he reitied, by long and weariie journies, came at last vnto his natie countrey, of Dibra. The garrison souldiours beholding their old gouernour all alone, full of heauinesse, as a man eaten vp with cares; moued with compasion, and forgetting the euils hee had bene the occasion of, receiued him with many teares and friendly embracings, and brought him to Scanderbeg, who by chance then lay not farre off. Moses comming vnto him with his girdle about his necke, in token that he had deserued death (as the manner of that countrey was) found him walking before his tent, and there with heauie cheere falling downe vpon his knees at his feet, submitted himselfe vnto his mercie, and with great humilitie and signes of repentance, craued his most gracious pardon. Which his request Scanderbeg presently granted, and taking him vp by the hand embraced and kissed him, in token he had from his heart forgiuen him: and within a few daies after, caused all such things of his as were before confiscat, to be againe restored vnto him; with all such offices and promotions tions as he had before enjoyed: and by open proclamation commanded, That from thenceforth no man should either publicly or priuately speake of that Moses had trespassed. Mahomet vnderstanding that Moses was returned againe into Epirus, and honoured of Scanderbeg as in former time, was much grieued therat, and fumed exceedingly: First, for that he had at all trusted him; and then, that he had so let him slip out of his hands: being verily perswaded, that all that Moses had done, was but a finenesse of Scanderbeg to deceiue him.

Shorly after that Moses was returned into Epirus, Mahomet by like practise allured vnto him Amesa, Scanderbeg's nephew; promising to make him king of Epirus in his vnckles steed. For by that meanes, the craftie tyrant thought it a more easie way to draw the mindes of the people of Epirus from Scanderbeg vnto him descended of the princes blood, than to Moses, or to any other stranger he should set vp. Amesa vpon this hope of a kingdome, fled to Constantinople: and because he would cleere the mind of the tyrant of all suspition and distrust, he carried with him his wife and children, as the most sure pledges of his fidelitie. This Amesa was of stature low, and the feature of his body not so perfect as might sufficiently expresse the hidden vertues of his mind: He was of courage hautie aboue measure, subtilly, and of a pregnant wit; wonderfull painfull, and thereto courteous and bountifull (the chiefe meanes whereby aspiring minds steale away the hearts of men). Whatsoeuer he got of himselfe, or had by the gift of his vnckle, he deuided it amongst his souldiours or friends: he was verie affable, and could notably both couer and dissemble his affections: for which things, he was about all others both beloued and honoured of all the people of Epirus, next vnto Scanderbeg himselfe. At his first comming to Mahomet, he filled not his eares with great promises, and vaine praises of himselfe as had Moses; but only excusing his owne reuolt, labour'd to perswade him, That he had for iust causes left his vnckle, with a desire now faithfullly to serue him. And to that purpose spake vnto him as followeth:

If it should please thee (most noble Mahomet) to call to remembrance the old iniuries, and ancient displeasures by vs committed against thine imperiall Maiestie: we might seeme now rather to haue come hither to receive the iust guerdon of our euill deserts, than vpon any hope of honor or preferment. For what could haue beene done more in disgrace of the Othoman empire, than that you haue seene long since done by vs, in the most dangerous time of the Hungarian war: rather of a malicious & set purpose, than for that we were just enemies? When as in the same perfidious course, I my selfe being a helper and partaker therein (for now no excuse is to be pretended for our doings, more than repentance) your fathers army was betrayed at Morava, and the kingdome of Epirus by great treacherie wrested out of your fathers hands: the only cause of so many calamities, and of so much bloodshed. But vaine is this feare, and our suspition needlesse, with so wise and mercifull a prince; especially for that my yeares then greene, and youth prone vnto the harme of it selfe, and a mind not resting vpon his owne resolutions, deceiued me. I beloued mine vnckle (for the ignorant beloued many things) and allured with the desire of soueraigntie (the proper disease of that age) and too much credulous, I forsooke you and followed his promises: but discretion growing with yeares, I haue by little and little perceiued both the perfidious dealing of mine vnckle, as also that my reuolt from you was more hurtfull vnto my selfe than to any other. Scanderbeg recovered, and also enlarged the kingdome of Epirus; but not without my great labour and helpe. I expected long time, that he should haue giuen me, if not my fathers whole inheritance, yet at least some part thereof, as a small reward of my so great travell and danger. Not long after he married a wife, and hath begot a young heire, a new successor in his kingdome: vnto me for shame of the world, because I should not altogether lead a priuat life, he hath assigned a base corner of Epirus; where he enioyning the rest, I might lead a poore and contemptible life. In this case I had much adoe to bridle my affections, and could neuer disgeast that iniurie: yet the iniquitie of the time, with the insolent disposition of the man, compelled me to smother vp my thoughts, and to make faire weather; least finding some suspition, he should craftely haue entrapped me, as he did of late George Strefie his sisters sonne; whom wrongfully charged with fauined surmises, he hath almost deprived of all his possessions. I would willingly haue fled vnto the feet of your highnesse, I would gladly haue forsaken my ingratefull vnckle with the staines of his infamous kingdome: but that the remembrance of the old rebellion, and many iniuries since done, did make me afraid: vntill that now (God I thinke so appointing it) I came most gladly, following your most royall faith and promise. You had scarcely beckned vnto me, you had scarcely inuited me, hauing of long intently waited en-ric occasion; but straight way I came with such speed, as if I would haue slowne: I lingred not, I expected not either Scanderbeg or his euill happe, or your more prosperous successe, as of late did Moses: least I might thereby justly seeme either for feare or regard of some imminent danger, rather to haue provided for mine owne safetie than to haue embraced your magnificence. Neither haue I lest any thing for you in me to suspect, nor any cause wherefore I should desire to returne againe into EPIRVS: here are present most sure bonds of my loue, and faithfull pledges of my loyaltie. Behold (worthy Mahomet) you haue whatsoeuer is decre unto me, yea whatsoeuer nature could giue, pleasing vnto men in the course of mans life. These I haue brought vnto thee, which should with violence haue been taken from an enemy: such pawns as might assure thee of the faith of a most doubtfull man. More than this, haue I brought nothing: for in so great speed and secret departure, I could not haue regard of my substance. And if I might haue had time to haue trussed up my trash at leysure; yet I know not how, I should haue thought it a kind of basenesse, to haue brought with me any part of the poore reliques of mine old fortune: especially vnto thee, of all other the richest. Onely my fidelitie I lay downe before thee, for any thing greater I haue not: and if thou desire of me any other bond for more assurance, I refuse not whatsoeuer your highnesse shall appoint: for I came not hither to set downe covenants and agreements of my selfe, but to receive them from you. I dare not promise to vanquish mine vncle, and to subdue EPIRVS with an army of fiftene thousand men: the misfortune of Haly-Bassa and other your Generals; yea and the late and rare victorie of Sebalias, with great bloodshed gained, may serue for examples. In me you shall neither want diligence nor faithfull seruice: as for other things concerning the euent of this warre, and for the reuenge of the iniuries by you receiued; you being a prince of power inuincible, and of a most deepe judgement, are not to be aduised by me your unskilfull vassall.

*Ameſa honoured
by Mahomet.*

This speech of Ameſa, seemed vnto Mahomet free from all dissimulation, forasmuch as he knew most part thereof to be true; and his wife and children brought vnto his presence, confirmed the rest. Wherefore commending his good affection, he appointed him honourable entertainment, referring other matters vnto a farther time.

Vpon the approach of the Spring, Mahomet desiring nothing more than to be reuenged vpon Scanderbeg, entered into consultation with his great Bassaes, concerning the inuasion of EPIRVS: vnto which counsell Ameſa was by Mahomet admitted, and his wicked deuise for the destruction of his country, of all others best liked. After the matter had been long too and fro debated, it was concluded, that Isaack the great Bassa of CONSTANTINOPLE, should with an army of fiftie thousand be sent against Scanderbeg, and Ameſa with him, hauing the charge of five thousand horsemen: and the Bassa to proclaim Ameſa king of EPIRVS; thereby to persuade the Epirots, that Mahomet inuaded EPIRVS rather for the displeasure he bare against Scanderbeg, and for the aduancement of Ameſa, than for any ambitious desire he had to take vnto himselfe that kingdome.

Great was the preparation for this warre, and the expectation thereof greater. Flying fame had in short time filled euery corner of EPIRVS with the report of these newes; adding thereto (as the manner is) a great deale more than was true. Whereupon Scanderbeg without delay, sent for his great captains and men of warre into DIBRA, where that tempest was first to be expected: and when they were all assembled, he declared vnto them the greatnesse of the danger, and what he thought thereof himselfe as followeth.

*A notable speech of Scanderbeg vnto his captains, how the Turks were subdued at their conquering
into EPIRVS.*

Amongst all other things which God hath left to vex and grieve the minds of men in so great variety of worldly affaires, we see (right worthy souldiers) these two the greatest, Hope and Feare. The first a more comfortable thing, and proper to courageous minds: I may not say of light beleefe: the other a thing of more discretion and safetie, which although it vse to deferre the desires of men, yet hath it power at length excellently to cure and season the same. Hereupon is it easily to be gathered, that the great cheefestaines of former times haue gained more honour and greater victories, by fearing all that was to be feared, than others in shew more hardie, which feared nothing. Hereupon the great Carthaginien captaine vsed to call Q. Fabius (whom the Romanes euer thought too slow and too fearefull) his great enemy: but Terentius Varro he called a greater enemy vnto his owne countrey and the people of ROMES, than to himselfe. But wherefore do I wrongfully call that Feare, which might more truly be called Discretion, or wholesome Policie? Call it as you will, it is not much materiall: but this one thing no man can denie, That thereof hath risen the antient discipline of warre, and the old and sound government of martiall affaires. This aduised carefulnesse cherisheth and nourisheth Hope it selfe, it doth nothing rashly, it hath eyes before, behind, and on both sides, it weigheth in indifferent ballance things past, present, and to come. You may now perceiue to what end my speech tendeth. I would first conferre with you, and know your opinions, before I determine any thing of the order of this warre; that either I might yeeld vnto your opinion, or els you (as you haue alwaies hitherto done) to mine. You heare, you now heare with your eares what preparation, what warlike provision is daily made against vs. Lo the great Bassa of CONSTANTINOPLE, all the flower of EUROPE, and whole strength of the Ottoman kingdome knocketh at our gates. I want not courage (neither euer did) to prooue my fortune against him, not without your honour: but I thinke it better to vse policie and warie heed against so great an enemy, than our wanted force and courage. That notable overthrow of Hali Bassa, so many great victories by vs atchieued, our minds by so many good hap confirmed, persuade me to thinke that we haue both courage and strength to encounter him in plaine battaile: but the vncertaine euent of war, and fortune neuer sufficiently knowne, maketh wise men to forget what is past, and to feare that is to come. It was neuer proper to any man, it was neuer giuen by inheritance, alwaies to overcome; new occurrences require new correspondents: neither may you, for that you conquered yesterday, presume to assure your selfe to deuide the spoile of your enemies to day. Victorie is like a trauellour, and goeth hither and thither, not resting long in a place: and although it be for most part both gotten and kept by courage and discretion; yet oftentimes, when you haue most carefully and politically disposed of all things, the fortune and chance of warre haue therein a great sway. I was wont to require (I remember it well) onely valour and courage in my souldiers, contemning all externall accidents and fortunes hap; if you did promise vnto me courageous minds, I assured you of all good hap and prosperous successe: but that losse we receiued at BELGRADE (the remembrance whereof my mind feareth, and alwaies abhorreth to thinke vpon) hath much changed my former cogitations, and made me to deeme farre otherwise of worldly matters, and the vncertainetie of fortune. What if that day had been longer? or Sebalias of more courage? might not the state of EPIRVS haue that day been utterly overthrowne? we wrethen rather by God preserved, than by any thing that was in our selues: what remained more, but that we should like cowards haue yeeld: our selues to haue been bound of the conquerours? The night defended vs, yea euen God himselfe defended vs; whoooke from them both policie and force, and gaue vs time to breath and escape away. We were then but as a prey, expecting but the coming of the victor: Howbeit, he tooke nothing from vs, he carred little or nothing away with him, being too much careful to keepe the honour he had already gained, and peradventure in feare of them of whom he was not without cause most feared. I spake not this of purpose to terrifie any of you, but rather to admonish you, and to consult with you, how such great preparations may be frustrated and ouerthrowne, and some notable victorie by vs atchieued, without the price of our blood, or the losse of such things as we haue. The number of our enemies is, great, and so great, as vntill this day we neuer saw in EPIRVS greater, except at such times as they came to besiege our cities, and to deuour vs all. Now if we shall meet them in the plaine fields in a set battaile, the euent thereof will be doubtfull, many of vs must needs fall, many of vs must die (I would I might be a false prophet) before so great an armie will either slie or be overcome, your victorie shall be mingled with teares, and the heauinesse of the conquerour not much unlike the sorrow of the conquered. Was it but a few that we lost at BELGRADE? Is that losse so to be recovered? What flower of Chinabrie, hardly to be in many yeares restored? How many worthy men were there slaine? EPIRVS must needs in short time be vnpeopled, if we shall so desperately only seeke for such glorious victories. Wherefore if we will doe well, we must so fight to day, as that we may fight to morrow also. Neither are our enemies and we in like case: The losse of fortie or fiftie thousand is lesse vnto the Turkish tyrant, than the losse of an hundred of you is to me. We are in all but a few, and therefore carefully to be kept: which if we regard not for our owne sakes, yet let vs doe it for our wiues and childrens, whose welfare and libertie dependeth of our liues: I know the number of you, I know your faces and countenances, and almost euery one of your names, which maketh me also more careful of your health. And yet I would not refuse to trie the whole fortune of this battaile in plaine field, if we might thereby end all the wars against the Turks for euer: if I were in hope so to find an end of our labours and trauels hereafter, I would gladly aduenture my life with yours, for the perpetuall quiet and peace of our posteritie: but a new enemy alwaies ariseth, and we must still looke for new wars. When this Isaack is gone, another Isaack will ere long come in his place: we shall be alwaies exercised with new wars, and enclosed with new dangers: It is the destinie of EPIRVS (as far as I can see) and wee our selues are borne thereto. Wherefore we must gather our wits together, we must well husband our forces, and so diuide our patrimonie, as that we may alwayes haue something to content our creditors, when they shall chance to come vpon vs. Yet shall God (no doubt) giue an end also vnto these troubles: for extremities cannot be of long continuance, and you your selues shall at length take rest: yea, the strong and puissant enemy, wearied with so many vaine attempts, will at last haue ynough thereof, and leaue off his perpetuall hatred against vs: then shall it be to you no small pleasure to remember so many labours and dangers past. Thus haue I declared vnto you the commodities and incommunities ensuing the victorie in plaine battell. But what if we be vanquished? where haue we any hope of reliefe left? from whence may we expect helpe? Will the bloodie enemy, inflat with victorie, expect whilest we again recover our strength and encounter him againe with new forces? No, he will pursue vs and chase vs, so long as any of vs are left: and hauing ouercome vs, will poure out the rest of his furie vpon our towns and country, then subiect to his iniurie. But some of you peraduenture will say, that they are by policie to be ouertaken, and not to be met in open field: of which opinion I also am my selfe, yet happily differ from you in the time of doing the same. Then I thinke it best to deceiue them, when they thinke they cannot be deceived: when as they being as it were in possession of a supposed victorie, like men ouerjoyed, shall cast no perill. Now they come euen from the gates of CONSTANTINOPLE, full of distrust, prying into euery corner, as men before warned by others harmes, and so many dreadfull examples of their fellows. Besides that, they haue with them my gracelesse nephew and domesticall foe Amesa, who will teach them to foresee and shun such snares as in times past he with vs was wont to lay for them. Wherefore we must now tower vp vnto the height of some notable and strange policie, whereby both our country may be from danger preserved, and also some great victorie, without our owne bloodshed (which seldom chaunceth) obtained: which to the maintenance of our antient glorie and renowne, we haue to this day by many most notable victories gained: But time and space, and the sight of the enemy shall furnish us with this deuise. Now (that my discourse may come to the purposed end) first of all, all things subiect either to the furie or victorie of the enemy, are to be removed out of the way; all people, of what age, sex, or condition soeuer, are to be brought out of the country into places of safetie; and then, our towns are to be furnished with strong garrisons and all other necessarie provision, against all the chaunces of fortune. Besides, who knoweth the secret designs of the tyrant? or whether he himselfe (of long time desirous of renenge, and thirsting after our blood) will follow the Bassa at the heeles, or no? Perhaps I may beleue and feare more than is needfull: but it is good to feare all that may be feared, that we may indeed feare nothing. If all things shall thus be set in order, if there shall be nothing left in the fields or in the villages, that may enrich, feed, or feare our enemies, and which may withdraw our care and thoughts from our enemies, undoubtedly we shall be victors. And if you will be ruled by me, and follow my direction in these wars, I will assuredly deliuer your enemies into your hands to be slain at your pleasure; and (by the leaue of God) will make the name and valour of the Epirots more terrible vnto the Turke, than euer it hath been in the time of our ancestors. I flatter not my selfe, I deceiue you not wif any thing may be promised in worldly actions, this I assure you of, and this will I take vpon mee. But these things are better done than said. In the meane while, to spend no more time in longer talke and discourse (than which, no greater losse can be to soldiers) let euery one of vs take a part in this charge, for the good disposing of all things, and how to withstand the enemy. I will not commaund any thing to others, which I will not my selfe doe: I will refuse nothing, or reckon any thing base, which may tend to the common honour or profit of vs all.

This speech of Scanderbeg was well liked and joyfully receiued of all the hearers, so that many besought him to manifest vnto them how he purposed to proceed in those wars: whereunto hee with cheerefull countenance answered, That it was ynough for him, if they did but beleue him, promising himselfe in person to bee in the most dangerous actions as farre as any of them, wherwith they rested contented. And presently dispatching his lieutenants into diuers parts of his kingdom, as he thought most conuenient, provided, That all things were in short time conueyed out of the country into the strong townes and other places of refuge. No corne, no cattell, or other things of any worth was left in the country; but all left desolate, in like manner as was before at the coming of the great king Amurath to the siege of CROIA.

By this time Isaack the great Bassa was come into EPIRVS, accompanied with Amesa: and as hee marched, still sent before him his scouts and espials, carefully to view euery corner of the country, for feare to bee entrapped as others before him had bene; directed in his journey for most part by Amesa. Scanderbeg had in readinesse such an armie as he had purposed to vie against his mightie enemy, but lay with six thousand horsemen onely in shew, as if hee had determined with them to haue giuen them battaile, but meaning indeed nothing lesse. For as soone as the Bassa was come in sight, he with those horsemen, according as hee had before appointed, as if hee had bene discouraged with the very sight of the Turkes, turned his backe and fled. And because he would not giue them any occasion to suspect it to be done for some policie or finenesse, and so to make them more careful, he fled not into the mountaines or woods, as his wonted maner was, but directly toward LYSSA, a towne of the Venetians standing vpon the sea coast, as if hee had quite despaird of the keeping of EPIRVS, and fled thither for refuge. The Bassa seeing him flee, was glad thereof, and sent certaine troupes of horsemen to pursue him, & diligently to marke which way he tooke: but encamped himselfe with his armie in the plaines of DIBRA, neer vnto ORONTIUM, where Scanderbeg lay before: & there rested his armie, wearie of long trauell, expecting the returne of his horsemen, sent after Scanderbeg. But vpon their returne, when it was for a certaintie reported by them, That Scanderbeg with an handfull of men was fled out of EPIRVS, and not an enemy to be seene, the Turkes began to reioyce, and proudly to triumph; that they had without any losse driuen the enemy out of the country; yet much greued, that they could no where find any thing to satisfie their greechie desires: for why, all things were so cleane gone, as if the country had bene swept against their coming, which might haue bene a sufficient cause for them to haue distrusted some great matter; but they flattering themselves, supposed all this to be done for feare of them, vpon extreame desperation: such is the fraile condition of men, to loose strength of bodie, common sence, yea, their reason and vnderstanding, when some great mischeefe is appointed for their ouerthrow or destruction. The Bassa seeing the enemy fled, and now no cause of feare, consulted with his cheefe captaines, what were now best to bee done: Amesa still perswading him not to remoue, but there to stay a time, and to expect the farther euent of matters. But the greater number, whose opinion preuailed, said it was better to goe farther into the country, and to take the spoile thereof, before the country people should conuey away all their substance into places of safetie, as they had done there in DIBRA, and leaue them nothing but the bare ground and emptie cottages. By this perswasion, the Bassa early next morning in good order set forward: commaunding by generall proclamation, That no man vpon paine of death should breake his array or straggle from the armie. Yet before he set forward, he called Amesa vnto him; whom after he had highly commended, and with great vehemencie inuayed against Scanderbeg, he with the great applause of the whole armie in the name of Mahomet created him king of EPIRVS. That day he marched not farre, by reason of the great heat: for it was then about the midst of Iuly. Yet when he had well wearied himselfe with that daicles trauell, finding neither enemy nor any things els worthe to be accounted in any part of a victorie; he encamped at night, keeping diligent watch, and sending forth his scouts euery way, but especially towards LYSSA. The next day, which was the third day after the Bassaes coming into EPIRVS, hee set forward againe, and came at length into ÆMATHIA, and there encamped that night.

When Scanderbeg (flying for feare, as the Turkes supposed) was gone a great way out of their sight towards LYSSA, and come euen to the borders of his kingdom, he there staid all the rest of that day. And a little before the going downe of the sunne, he with a few select horsemen departed from the army, and with painfull trauell got vp to the top of the high mountaines, from whence a man might by day well discouer all the plaines of ÆMATHIA. There he appointed one Petrus Emanuel, a politicke and valiant gentleman, with certaine horsemen to marke diligently which way the enemy held, and by certaine secret and appointed waitings and signes, to giue knowledge thereof to the army. After such order taken, he returned himselfe, and came againe to the campe after midnight. And presently rising with his army, and fetching a compass about, came vndiscovered, and secretly encamped himselfe as neere as he could vnto the mountaines where his scouts lay, with eagles eyes waiting for the least mouing of the enemy. The Bassa desirous to get as farre as hee could into the country, before the heat of the day, began early in the morning to set forward, and came to the plaines of PHARSALIA, through the world spoken of for the great battell in them long time before fought, between the two most famous chieftaines Cesar and Pompeius: and now once more to bee made famous, by the slaughter of the Turkes. Here the enemy finding some stragling cattell, and other small things which the country people had in their hastie flight left behind them, fell to seeking after boocie, and as men without feare feare, spent that day in roaming vp and downe the countrey, in hope to find something: and at night encamped without any great watch, but towards LYSSYM, from whence they (in great expectation) looked for the coming of Scanderbeg; and as it were in disgrace of him, carried Amesa in triumph vp and downe the campe, as if he had been already possessed of the kingdome of EPYRVS. Scanderbeg lying on the other side of the mountaines, perceived by his espials which way the enemy lay: and with great silence vnder the couert of the mountaines and woods, secretly bent his course the same way, vntill hee came to a mountaine called TVMENIST, at the foot whereof he encamped that night. The next morning the Bassa holding on his way, came and encamped not farre from the same mountaine, and there staid himselfe with halfe his army, and sent Amesa with the other halfe to burne and spoyle the countrey: who about noone returned to the campe with such prey as he had got, with his souldiours well wearied with trauell and the heat of the day. Scanderbeg like a carefull housholder, who being about to entertaine and feast some honourable personages, trusteth not to his wife and seruants, but looketh vnto the bestowing of his prouision himselfe, carefully ordering and disposing and setting forth all things, especially if his prouision (for want of abilitie) be short, to welcome so great guests; and setting all things forth to the greatest shew, seeketh at least to fill the eies of his guests, although he doubt to satisfie their appetites: so he carefully viewing all the mountaines and thick woods therabouts without resting, set Moses in one place, Tamiusus in another; and all the rest in places most conuenient. He appointeth euery man what to doe, and instructeth them, and considereth of euery particular circumstance himselfe: and so diuideth his forces, as might best serue his purpose, and make the most terrible shew vnto the enemy: for which purpose he in euery companie placed mo trumpets, drums, and other instruments of war, than he had before at any time vsed. When he had so to his most aduantage bestowed so many of his captaines and souldiours as he thought good, and as the nature of the places would giue leaue, he with foure thousand horsemen and the like number of foot, speedily marching vp the rough mountaine of TVMENIST, from thence plainly beheld in what order the Turkes campe lay in the plaines below. The Turkes, especially they which were lately returned with Amesa from the spoile of the countrey, lay scattered abroad in the fields, with their horses vnbridled and vnbridled, resting their wearie bodies: some got vnder the shadowes of trees were victualing themselves; some hauing filled their bellies, lay fast on sleep vpon the greene grasse; the rest were passing the time, some with one kind of sport, some with an other, as souldiours doe in field when they haue little or nothing to doe: for it was then the hottest time both of the yeare and of the day, being about the midst of Iuly, and the noontime of the day: The like negligence was also in that part of the campe where the Bassa himselfe lay: euery man taking his ease and pleasure, with small regard of horse or armour; for being out of feare of Scanderbeg, whom they thought to haue been a great way off at LYSSYM, they lay as men without care wrapped vp in securitie, the common destruction of great armies and common wealths. Amesa with the great captaines, were at the same time altogether in the Bassas pavilion; consulting what course they were best to take, to doe something to the contentment of Mahomet, and their owne commendation: Some said it were best, with fire and sword to destroy all they could in EPYRVS; and so hauing laied the countrey wast, to returne: Others thought it better to march directly to CRONIA, to proue if the citizens could be perswaded to yeeld themselves, and receiue Amesa for their king; otherwise to threaten them with a continuall siege, and vnto destruction of the countrey, if vpon the vaine expectation of helpe from Scanderbeg they should refuse to submit themselves. As for Scanderbeg himselfe, who then lay hovering ouer their heads, he was in all that consultation least feared: who from the top of the mountaine, beholding the securitie and disorder of the Turkes camp, and delighted with the sight therof; encouraged his souldiours, and martialled them in such order as they were to follow him, for the charging and terrifying of the enemy. But first of all he determined to oppresse the Turkes scouts; which lay at the foot of the mountaine; for which purpose he himselfe with a few horsemen first secretly descended the mountaine, the rest of his army following shortly after, and so suddenly came vpon the scouts that he slayd them all, excepting one, who escaping by the swiftnesse of his horse, came running into the campe as one halfe scared out of his wit, crying out that Scanderbeg was coming. The Turkes suspecting nothing lesse than the coming of him that way, at the present instant hardly beleued that he was so nigh: while as he following him at the heels as fast as he could, with his horsemen and his footmen after them, was in a moment as if it had been a sudden tempest, broken in amongst amongst the vnarmed Turkes, and there making great slaughter of them, filled all the campe with sudden tumult and feare. Amesa who at the first noife had speedily got him to his charge, with his souldiours some halfe armed, some on foot, hauing no leisure to bridle their horses, was the first that made head against Scanderbeg. The Bassa also did what he might in that sudden feare and shortnesse of time, to arme his men, and to put them in order: but whilest these things were in doing, the souldiours which lay in ambush in the woods, came downe the mountaine with such horrible shouts and noise of instruments of warre, as if heauen and earth should haue presently gone together; the hills and vallies with their hollow echoes, encreasing the terror of the alarm. Insomuch, that the Turkes dismayed, and fearing that all the force of EPYRVS with the countries adioyning had come vpon them, began to flie on euery side, before that Moses and the rest that lay in ambush were come into the plaines. Amesa acquainted with his vnckles stratagems; as much as he could encouraged the Turkes; crying aloud and telling them, That such vaine tumults and terrours were not to be feared, being but the bare shifts and deuises of their enemies to couer their owne weaknesse: and by his owne valour staid many which before were about to haue fled. In this while, the Bassa hauing put his men in best order he could, was coming to the aid of Amesa, hardly charged by Scanderbeg: but in his setting forward, he was so valiantly encountred on the one side by Moses with his horsemen, and on the other by Tamiusus and Emanuel with their footmen, that he was enforced, not without great losse, againe to retire vnto his trenches.

All the hope of the battell depended vpon Amesa, who still with great courage withstood his vnckle; exhorting his souldiours valiantly as men to endure that first assault, which should afterwards bring them most assured victorie: hartening them on with hope of speedie help from their fellowes, if they would but a while endure the furie of their enemies, whose hearts (as hee said) would presently be discouraged, if they preuailed not in that their first and desperat attempt, hauing nothing else to trust vnto. By which perswasion the Turkes were againe encouraged, accounting it a great dishonour to flie, and leaue their chieftaine in the field. But when they saw Scanderbeg still to preuaile vpon them, and that no helpe came as they hoped (for many were by Scanderbeg his horsemen slaine as they were arming themselves; many were by the way cut off as they were coming, and the rest put to flight) they which before fought valiantly with Amesa, turned their backs and fled also. Scanderbeg his horsemen pursuing the chafe, made great slaughter of the Turkes, and in the same chafe tooke Amesa prisoner. Scanderbeg, hauing ouerthrowne that part of the Turkes battell, was coming with a thousand footmen and some horsemen, to haue ayded Moses against the Bassa: but before his coming, Moses to blot out his former infamie, had with inuincible courage put the great Bassa with all his army to flight: and Scanderbeg following the chafe, gaue him not leaue to looke behind him, vntill he was got out of EPYRVS. Many were in this chafe taken prisoners, and amongst the rest one Mesites a Sanzacke, a man of great account amongst the Turkes. In this battell beside the prisoners, were taken twentie of the Turkes fairest ensignes. As for horses, armour, and other spoiles taken in the field, and in the campe, all which fell vnto the souldiours share, it is almost incredible to be told. The number of the slaine Turkes is of diuers diuersly reported, they which write of the most, reckon vp thirtie thousand; and they which speake of the least, account twentie thousand. Of the Christian answers lost but sixtie. Now if any account it strange, that so great a victorie should be gained with so little losse; not to speake of that is written in holy writ, let him but read the auncient histories of the Romans, or the chronicles of our owne country, and he shall in them find victories no lesse strange. There was to be seene the sudden and strange alteration of these worldly things, no more indeed (whatsoeuer we account of them) to be reckoned of, than of things we haue not. Scanderbeg possesseth the rich pavilion, erst belonging to the great Bassa; and other of his captaines enioy tents, with much other rich furniture neuer prepared for their vse. Amesa which the same day as a victorious conquerour oucran a great part of EMATHIA with his horsemen, and was in triumph carried vp with the generall acclamation of many thousands of valiant souldiours, and honoured as a king, and of them so called; is now led through the Christian army to his vnckle, with his hands bound behind him as a slave, speechlesse and confounded, vnable to hold vp his head for shame: whose miserie moued most of the beholders to compassion, and forced teares out of the eies of many.

be buried, together with their horses; which he did not for any regard of them, but that their loathsome carcases should not infect the country: and after that, returned in great triumph to CROIA. By the way as he went, the countrey people, which were before for feare of the Turks fled into the woods and mountaines in great multitudes, met him; as did others also out of the cities, whose mouthes were all full of his worthy praises. Before him went the captiue Turkes with their hands bound behind them, excepting such as were enforced to carrie the Turkes on signes: Next vnto them followed the great Bassaes rich pailion, in such manner supported by his vnckle, that he might not as he well deserved, be carried bound amongst the other captiues: Last of all came Scanderbeg his victorious souldiours in goodly order, euery man leading a spare horse taken from the enemy, and loaded with spoyle. So when he was come to CROIA, and there of his subjects joyfully receiued, he brake vp his army, and gaue euery man leaue at his pleasure to depart. The Sanzacke, and Amesa, were committed to safe keeping, vntill farther order was taken for them. Amesa afterwards was for his treason worthely condemned to perpetual prison, and by an embassador from Scanderbeg sent vnto king Alphonsus to NAPLES, there to be kept in durance; and with him was also sent an honourable present of part of the spoile taken from the Turkes, in token of the victorie. What became afterward of this Amesa, concerneth not much the course of our historie; yet to satisfie the desirous, I think it not amisse with him to stray a little out of the way.

When Amesa had remained a yeare in prison at NAPLES, Scanderbeg vnderstanding of the death of Alphonsus, by his embassadour requested of Ferdinand his sonne, to haue Amesa restored to him againe. By which meanes he was brought backe againe into EPIRVS, and cast in prison at CROIA; but not in such straight manner as before: for Scanderbeg according to his accustomed clemencie, began now to forget the injurie to him before done; and at last ouercome with the continuall supplication and teares of his nephew, pardoned him his life; and restoring him to his former libertie, receiued him also into his former fauor. But Amesa remembering what pledges of his loyaltie hee had left with Mahomet at CONSTANTINOPLE, and fearing what would become of his wife and children, if he should hastily vnto his libertie, giuing his vnckle most humble thanks, brake vnto him his mind concerning that matter, as followeth:

The speech of Ameſa to Scanderbeg.

Whereas you of your owne gracious goodnesse onely, without any desert of mine, haue regarded my life and welfare, it behooueth me also to be carefull for the life of others: least whilst I receive your exceeding bountie with too much desire of mine owne health and honour, I doe at this present, by this same benefit of yours, cast away them, whom I haue long sithence by mine owne treacherie undone. Mine unfortunate and guiltlesse wife is with Mahomet, my little and innocent children are with him also: these yet liue, and shall liue, so long as the tyrant shall thinke, that I liue in heart his; but when he shall once perceiue by this your gracious dealing that I am fallen from him, the cruell creditor will forthwith cut and rend in peeces the pledges of my faith, and their innocent blood shall pay the guilt of their fathers offence. Wherefore the Othoman tyrant is of me by some deuice to be deceiued, that I may in the meane time preserve those pledges, vntill I may by some fit occasion afterwards redeeme the same. I will by your leaue this night take my flight out of CROIA, as if I had broken prison, and escaped against your will, and so flie vnto Mahomet, making the greatest shew I can of my wonted loue and loyaltie towards him: not omitting to heare, or speake vnto that credulous king such things concerning your estate, as I was wont in my better fortune: that hauing so cleared my selfe of all suspicion, which he perhaps hath conceiued by reason of my captiuitie and long stay with you, I may at length, with my wife and children, so escape from him: wherein you may helpe me much, if you shall openly make shew as if you were grieued with my escape, and seeme to be highly offended with the keepers of the prison for the same. In the meane time, whilst I shall stay in the tyrants court expecting some fit time for my escape, I will stand you in stead of an intelligencer, so that your enemy shall not to my knowledge either attempt or goe about any thing against you, which shall be kept from your hearing or knowledge.

Scanderbeg refused not to graunt whatsoeuer he had requested, but said vnto him:

The answer of Scanderbeg to Ameſa.

Ameſa, sithence we haue graunted you life, with all the good things thereunto belonging, we will not prohibit you to use that our gift to your most good, and to the preservation of them who for euer may most justly call vpon you, as debtor vnto them, for their welfare and libertie. Go thy waies, proceed, take thy time and occasion as seemeth vnto thee best; and at length reforme thy selfe, whilst thou yet hast sufficient time and space. We now belene you in all things, and well like of this your deuise: Ameſa you shall herein deceiue no man but your selfe, if you shall longer follow the faith & court of the barbarous king, whereas like danger is both of bodie and soule both to thee and thine. Whensoever thou shalt returne vnto vs, thou canst not doe vs a greater pleasure: and in what regard thou hast heretofore been with vs, in the same thou shalt be with vs againe.

The death of
Ameſa.

The same night Amesa by secret order from Scanderbeg, escaped both out of prison and out of CROIA: and in the morning it was all ouer the citie, that he was gone, and the keepers sharply rebuked for their negligence. He comming to CONSTANTINOPLE, easily persuaded Alahomet, that he was by chance escaped, with all things els that he told him: yet was he not for all that, so well graced of him as before; nor for any distrust he had in the man, but for the euill successe hee had in the former warres. Now whether Amesa neglected his promised returne, or could find no oportunitie to performe the same, is vncertaine: but certaine it is, that shortly after he died at CONSTANTINOPLE, poisoned as was thought by the commaundement of Mahomet, who could no longer endure the sight of him, whom he reckoned the author of the notable ouerthrow receiued in ÆMATHIA. This was the wofull end of this noble and valiant man, well worthe of remembrance; had not his haughtie thoughts soared too high with the desire of souerainetie.

When Mahomet vnderstood in what manner Isaack Bassa was ouerthrowne, and his armie discomfited, hee was therewith much grieued, and justly blamed the Bassaes securitie: yet such was his credit with his soueraigne, that the matter was in better sort passed ouer than was supposed it would haue beene. Neuerthelesse, Mahomet in reuenge thereof would willingly haue employed all his forces vpon Scanderbeg, if his more vrgent affaires would haue so permitted. For at the same time, besides that great warres began to arise betwixt him and the Venetians (which continued for many yeares after) hee was certainly enformed, That the Christian princes were making a strong confederation against him. At which time Mahomet disdainingly openly to sue for peace at Scanderbegs hands, cunningly practised by such as were sent to redeeme the prisoners, and also by the Sanzacke himselfe, to perswade Scanderbeg to require peace of him; assuring him, that if he did but aske it, it would for a long time bee easily obtained. Which thing Scanderbeg well acquainted with the Turkish policie, vterly refused to do. Wherefore Mahomet for defence of his countries bordering vpon EPIRVS, sent two of his most expert captaines, Sinam, and Hamur, with each of them foureteene thousand souldiours into MACEDONIA, expressly charging them not to enter at any time or vpon any occasion, into EPIRVS, or by any meanes to prouoke Scanderbeg: which his commaundement they so well obserued, that the Epirots by the space of almost two yeares enjoyed the fruits of peace, although there was no peace at all concluded. So that the remembrance of old injuries wearing out with time, at length by the mediation of the same captaines, a peace for a yeare was agreed vpon betwixt Mahomet and Scanderbeg. In which time he passed ouer into APTIA, and there notably aided king Ferdinand against the French, the proceeding wherein, as not pertinent to our historie, I of purpose passe ouer.

yeare concluded betwixt Mahomet and Scanderbeg.

After that the time of the peace before concluded was expired, all things now going well with Mahomet, as he desired, he determined according to his wonted maner to trouble the quiet estate of Scanderbeg: and so sending a new supplie of souldiours vnto Synam-beg, who then lay with a strong garrison vpon the frontiers of EPIRVS, commaunded him with all his power to make warres vpon Scanderbeg. Synam accordingly, with an armie of twentie thousand men entered into EPIRVS, where he was forthwith encountered by Scanderbeg, and his armie vterly ouerthrowne, so that but few escaped by flight with Synam himselfe. Presently after he sent Asam-beg, another of his captaines, into the same seruice, with an armie of thirtie thousand, whom Scanderbeg also in plaine battaile vanquished at OCRIDA: in which battaile Asam himselfe was fore wounded, and finding no way to escape, was glad to yeeld himselfe prisoner to Scanderbeg, by whom hee was courteously vied, and afterwards set at libertie. Iussim-beg following Asam with eigheten thousand into EPIRVS, was set vpon by Scanderbeg also, and hauing lost part of his armie, was glad glad by speedie flight to saue himselfe with the rest. After all this, Caraza-beg, an old captain and a man of great experience (who had bene a great commaunder, and a companion with Scanderbeg in the time of old Amurath) requested of Mahomet, That he might proue his fortune against his old acquaintance Scanderbeg, assisting him of better successe than before. The long and approued experience of this old leader put Mahomet in such hope of good speed, that he gaue present order for the leuying of such an armie as Caraza had requested, and for ten thousand more than he had at the first required. With this strong armie, in number almost fortie thousand, Caraza set forward, hauing before filled the minds of men with the expectation of some great matter to haue bene by him done. Scanderbeg vnderstanding certainly, that Caraza was comming, stood more in doubt of the man than of his power: and therefore assembled greater forces than he had vsually done before: and to welcome him, sent two thousand of his best and most expert souldiors secretly into the enemies country: who lying in ambush amongst the woods & mountaines, whereby Caraza must needs passe, suddenly set vpon foure thousand horsemen, the runners of Caraza his armie; who marching disorderedly, and fearing no such matter, were in a trice ouerthrowne, and most part of them slaine: those few that escaped, fled backe againe to the armie, as if they had come in poast to bring tidings of some haste newes to the Generall. With which so vnfortunat a beginning, Caraza was so discomfited, that if he might for shame, he could haue bene content to haue returned againe and gone no farther: yet for his honours sake holding on his way, he came into EPIRVS; where whilst hee was (after the manner of old men) long in resolving what course to take, he was vpon the sudden assailed by Scanderbeg, before he could well put his men in order of battaile. At which time there fell such a vehement shower of raine, that both the armies were glad to retire before any great hurt was done. Three dayes together it rained continually (for it was about the later end of Autumne): all which time Scanderbeg ceased not in one place or other to trouble the Turks campe: so that the old Generall, partly distempered with the extremitie of the weather, which for the violence thereof he tooke to be ominous; and more discouraged with the restless attempts of Scanderbeg, rife with his armie, and retreating backe, by the same way he came returned to CONSTANTINOPLE. Where he was well derided of Mahomet, that hauing promised so much, had performed so little: yet afterwards was againe by him in some fort commended, for that he had with lesse losse looked vpon Scanderbeg, than other his Generals before sent against him.

Mahomet perceiuing that Scanderbeg was not to be subdued but with such forces as hee was not then at leisure to employ vpon him, thought it not amisse to proue if hee could by faire speeches and glorious shewes of fained friendship get within him, and so bring him to confusion. For which purpose he sent vnto him an embassadour, with rich presents, and letters of this purport.

Sultan Mahomet, Lord and Emperour of the East and of the West, and of all parts of the World, vnto Scanderbeg, prince of ALBANIA and EPIRVS, sendeth greeting.

The letters of Scanderbeg to Mahomet.

I thinke friend Scanderbeg, that no acquaintance can be greater, or friendship more firm, than that which hath growne of long and mutuall conuersing and liuing together: and especially if the same haue taken beginning from childhood and tender yeares, as you know it hath done betwixt vs two; who haue of long time, euen from our childhood, liued together in great loue and friendship, when as you first lay as hostage in my fathers court. Wherefore beloued Scanderbeg, when as I call to remembrance all those things, with others, wherewith our youthfull yeares were then delighted; and being mindfull also of all those things which you haue oftentimes done for the aduancement of our empire and kingdome, and for the glorie of the Othoman familie; I cannot chuse but embrace thee with a singular Zeale and affection. For I take God to witnes, that nothing could chance more welcome or pleasing vnto me in my life, than to haue thee with me, and for a while to enioy thy companie. Neither needest thou to fear any thing to come vnto me, for that my souldiors without my knowledge or commaundement haue of late broken in and spoiled thy kingdome: which thing as reason required, was vnto me exceedingly displeasing: neither did it any whit offend me, that they were by thy forces vanquished and overcome, and so received the iust reward of their euill deserts; and that all things fell out with thee according to the equitie of thy cause, and as thy heart could haue desired. But to let these things passe, the remembrance of our old loue and friendship perswadeth me to come to agreement, & to ioine together with thee in a perpetuall league of amitie: to the intent that our auntient acquaintance and familiaritie, which by reason of long absence is almost worne out, may againe take life, encrease, and be confirmed. Of which peace, let these be the capitulations, if they shall seeme vnto you reasonable: for I know it belongeth vnto him that requirerh not the peace, to appoint the conditions of the same. First, we require of you freely and peaceably to suffer our armies to passe through your kingdome, for the besieging of the cities and inuading of the countries subiect to the Venetians our enemies: Then, to deliuer vnto vs your sonne Iohn in hostage, whom we will alwayes vse as one of our own naturall children: And afterwards, that our marchants and men of trade may peaceably come and trauell into all parts of your kingdome with their marchandize, and there freely and safely vse their negotiation: Last of all, that your selfe in person may, at your pleasure safely and without all feare repaire vnto vs, and in like manner, retorne againe. In which things if you will yeeld vnto vs, I promise in the faith of a king, to graunt vnto you and your kingdome sincere peace, with perpetuall tranquillitie; and that there shall not be any more deerer vnto me than your selfe; and will neuer to the vttermost of our power permit your kingdome to be infested or molested by any of our subiects, or others. Whatsoeuer you shall farther receiue from vs by the mouth of our embassadour Mustapha, you may thereto giue full credence. Fare you well from our imperiall pallace at CONSTANTINOPLE the 10 of May 1561.

Scanderbeg hauing receiued these letters, and well considered of the same, returned him answer by the same messenger as followeth:

The souldiours of Christ Iesus, George Castriot, otherwise called Scanderbeg, prince of the Albanefes and Epirots, vnto Mahomet prince of the Turkes, greeting.

Your letters (most magnificent) are deliuered vnto vs: wherein you write of your exceeding loue and singular affection towards vs, confirmed as you say by old acquaintance: which being growne up betwixt vs, and by tract of time firmly rooted, and as it were into nature conuerted, shall alwayes retaine his force and strength. But for as much as it seemeth vnto you good to awake the same, hauing of long time and many yeares lien as it were asleepe; and to make a motion that we should enter into a certaine new league and confederation, whereof amongst other conditions of the league by you propounded, this is one, That your forces may freely passe through my kingdome, to inuade the Venetians: Vnto this your request, worthe Mahomet, it standeth neither with equitie nor with mine honour to consent, for so much as the Venetians are my especiall good friends and confederats. As for that you desire to haue my sonne Iohn with you in hostage for the better assurance of the peace betwixt vs, I should peraduenture doe it (most noble Mahomet) if fatherly affection would giue me leaue: but since I haue no more but him, and he as yet a tender child, it is not for the good either of him or vs, to haue him now taken from vs, when as he ought of vs to be most tenderly cherished, and carefully instructed. As for that you requested concerning your marchants, that they may freely and safely trafficke into my kingdome at their pleasure, I can be content to yeeld therunto, and wish heartily, that there might be a free entercourse for our marchants indifferently with their commodities into both our kingdomes. Farther, whereas you earnestly persuaide me boldly and without feare to come vnto you, that by such interview and personall presence, our great desire, growne of long absence, might be the better satisfied: in this thing most excellent prince, I cannot but praise your most honourable disposition; and commend your good nature; and would therefore boldly follow your perswasion, if my other vrgent affaires, with the gouernment of my kingdome, would so permit. But what should I doe? my sonne Iohn is (as I said before) but little, and as yet vnfit to gouerne; and my people (as you know) loue alwayes to haue something to doe; being by nature a fierce and restless nation, whom I my selfe haue much adoe to rule and gouerne: For all that, I will come vnto you according to your desire, expecting onely a more commodious time. So fare you well, and loue me still. From our campe the 30 of May, 1461.

When Mahomet had receiued these letters, and well perused the same, he writ to him againe in manner following:

Sultan Mahomet, Emperour of all the parts of the World, vnto Scanderbeg, prince of the Albanefes and Epirots, greeting.

Your letters we haue receiued by our embassadour Mustapha, wherein you giue vs to vnderstand, that you

you like of none of the conditions of peace by us propounded, but onely that concerning our marchants and men of trade, that they might freely and as their pleasure use their traffique and trades with their marchandise too and fro: and upon this condition onely you graunt us peace. Thus your offer we accept of, and all the rest of your excuses we willingly admit: wherefore I promise vnto thee (my loving Scanderbeg) and will performe all that thou dost require, and upon that resolution rest: and will so long as I line obserue and keepe a sincere and inuolable peace with thee for euer, except thou first giue cause of violating the same. And for that purpose haue we with our usuall and imperiall seale signed these our letters, which we by our embassadour Mustapha haue sent vnto thee, as thereby confirming vnto thee this perpetuall peace. Wherefore you also (if you be so content) may subscribe, and with your seale confirme this of ours, that I in like manner may also haue your like consent and agreement. And would farther, that you would commaund knowledge thereof to be made by open proclamation through all your kingdome, as I will in like manner cause to be done through mine. And for the more manifestation of this my loue towards you, I would also that you should vnderstand, That of mine owne mere motion and bountie, I doe freely giue vnto you all those things, which you by force of armes haue taken from my father in ALBANIA and EPIRVS, so that you may possesse and enioy the same, as if they had alwaies been yours and your ancestors: wherefore I giue, graunt, and confirme vnto thee and thy heires, all the right, title, or interest, which I heretofore had therein: and from henceforth will alwaies account and repute thee as prince of ALBANIA and EPIRVS, and so call thee. And as I haue promised thee in the faith of a king, will neuer hereafter with warres molest thee or thine, except thou thy selfe giue cause thereof. Wherefore after you haue with your seale confirmed these things, you may commend them to our faithfull embassadour Mustapha, to bee by him brought vnto us: vnto whom I would you should in all things giue full credit. So fare you well, and render vs loue for loue. From our imperiall palace at CONSTANTINOPLE, the 22 of Iune, 1461.

A peace concluded betwixt Mahomet and Scanderbeg.

Vpon receit of these letters a peace was concluded betwixt Mahomet and Scanderbeg, and the same by publicke proclamations solemnely published through both their kingdomes, to the great reioycing of many. Which peace was for a season faithfully kept on both sides, vntill that the Turkes lying in garrison vpon the frontiers of EPIRVS, began after their wonted manner againe to fetch preyes and booties out of the country. Of which injuries Scanderbeg by letters complained to Mahomet: who answered that he was altogether ignorant thereof, and affirmed in shew to be much offended with the insolencie of the doers thereof: and forthwith caused many things to be againe restored. By which meanes the peace before concluded, was still as before continued.

A little before the conclusion of the aforefaid peace, great warres began to arise betwixt the Turkes and the Venetians: who all this while being in league with the Turke, peaceably followed their traffique and trades of marchandise, little or nothing at all regarding their neighbours harmes and miseries, vntill that now the flame and fire began to take hold vpon their owne houses, and as it were to awaken them out of a dead sleepe. For Mahomet after he had subuerted the empire of CONSTANTINOPLE, and driuen Thomas and Demetrius the emperours brethren out of PELOPONNESVS (now called MORRA) rested not so contented, but by his lieutenants and other great captaines began to disturbe the quiet of the Venetians, who then held in their possession METHONE, CORONE, NEAPOLIS, ARGOS, with diuers other strong townes in PELOPONNESVS, standing vpon the sea coast. And now it chanced, that about this time, Iofue, Mahomet's lieutenant in PELOPONNESVS, had by the treason of a Greeke priest, vpon the suddaine surpris'd the citie of ARGOS: And Omares another of his great captaines, hauing first spoyled the country about NAFPACTVM (now LEPANTO) entered farther into the territorie of the Venetians about METHONE and CORONE, making hauocke of what cometh in his way. With which injuries, plainly tending to open warre, the Venetian Senators being much troubled, sat oftentimes in counsell, deliberating with much care what course to take in a matter of so great importance. Some being of opinion, that it were best to send embassadours to Mahomet, so to make prooffe if the matter might by faire means be redressed: others on the contrarie part deeming it to be to no purpose so to doe; for as much as such great and manifest outrages, nothing differing from plaine hostilitie, could not possibly be done without the tyrants knowledge and expresse commaund. After the Senators had oftentimes met together, and with many great reasons debated the matter too and fro, and yet for all that concluded nothing

(as in consultations of great matters with a multitude, it most commonly falleth out to be a harder matter, and to require longer time, to bring the multitude to some certaine resolution, than it is afterwards to performe the same in action.) In this so great a diuersitie of opinions concerning so weightie a cause, at length one Victor Capella, a noble gentleman and graue Senator step vp in the midst of the Senate, and there stauckely deliuered this notable speech vnto the rest concerning the matter propounded, as followeth:

I haue before this at other times, by long experience, often noted (most noble Senators), that in all our greatest consultations of matters most concerning our common state, some are alwaies so aduised or rather wedded vnto their owne conceits, that they can hardly with patience endure to heare the reasonable opinion of others contrarie to their owne: the chiefe cause of our slow resolutions, wherefore I haue thought it good, briefly at this time to call vpon you for resolution: for as much as I see we must of necessitie take up armes, be we neuer so loth or unwilling: For to my vnderstanding, you doe but betray the state, in delaying the time to make present warre vpon the barbarous enemy. Yet many principall men amongst vs, aduise vs to beware, that wee doe not rashly or vnadvisedly determine of matters of so great consequence: and thinke it requisite, that we should send embassadours vnto the tyrant, to expostulate with him his vnjust dealing in breaking his faith and league: and withall to request him to obserue the conditions of the peace before agreed vpon, if happily he may rather by perswasion than by armes be moued to change his purpose: and if by this meanes nothing may be obtained, then at length they thinke it necessarie to resolve to make warre vpon him. They alledge further, That if we shall attempt warre, our citties in the continent bordering vpon the Ionian, in PELOPONNESVS, with diuers others of ours in the firme land, will not bee able to hold out very long, but for want of necessities must needs perish with the first of the trouble: besides that, if those places shall be wasted and spoyled, great losse (as they say) shall ensue thereby vnto most of vs in priuat: the greatest motive (perhaps) wherefore they thinke it most convenient to deferre the warres, and for that purpose to send our embassadours vnto him. Of which embassage, first by your leave a few words. At such time as these our embassadours, men of great wisdom and reach, not long since came vnto him, he had them in no regard; but dallying off the time with fraudulent, deceitfull, and glosing speeches, did indeed such things to the contrarie as we least hoped: wherefore I cannot well denie (if we should send them, or such others againe) what especiall thing of all that we then gaue them in charge, they should now propound vnto him, hauing alreadie said what is to be said; except they should say, That where as we are not of sufficient strength and power to wage warre against him, we would be glad to decide the matter by talke, and by that simple meanes to redresse our injuries: and vpon the matter to shew our selues prest and ready to fall to agreement with him; according as shall stand with his good pleasure and liking. Truly this were good plaine dealing, but it will not serue our turne: ARGOS is alreadie taken from vs, and he maketh open war vpon vs: where in he doth but proue our courage; and trie how long we will put up these injuries. If we will quietly digest these, he will then confidently and without feare proceed further: but if we shall as best seemeth vs, valiantly resist him, he shall be glad of such rest as wee shall giue him; and when he knoweth not well which way to turne himselfe, shall be as glad as we to lay downe armes and to seeke for peace: where as if we shall doe otherwise, I feare we shall repent our selues when it will be too late. It is reported, that as soone as he was come into PELOPONNESVS, he went himselfe in person vnto EVBEA, to view the citie of CALCIS: and going a second time out of PELOPONNESVS, founded the depth of the passage, and came within the sight of the citie, of purpose to haue assaulted it, if he had found opportunitie: at which time he himselfe rid ouer that strait of the sea betwixt Bœotia and EVBEA with his horse, and curiously viewed in what place he might most conveniently passe ouer with his armie to besiege the citie. Verely these are the most manifest signes of war, where by any man may sufficiently proue, that he hath long since resolved (so soone as he is ready) to make warre vpon vs, whilst we are yet dreaming in the midst of our long consultations. Hee will proceed in the warres he hath begun: and cutting vs short, augment his owne dominions. Then will hee blame his lieutenants and captaines, as authors thereof: but yet still be doing that best serueth his purpose. And whilst no man opposeth himselfe against him, his power daily encreasing, he will doe the best he can suddainely to swallow vs up, being vnprovided. For he may easily raise great forces, that by sufferance of others, maketh himselfe of great strength there where hee had before no footing. Shall we then say that we haue no warres with this encroaching tyrant? Some I know feed themselves and others also, with vaine hopes, saying; That he will neuer turne his forces vpon vs, nor ruinate our estate, although he might at ease doe it: wherefore (say they) let vs reframe from warres, and vse our peace and quietnesse, yet omitting nothing in the meane time that shall bee needfull for our safetie. But for as much as it plainly appeareth vnto all men by that which is before said, That he hath alreadie indeed proclaimed warre against vs, invading our countries, surprizing our cities, and killing our people: Whether thinke you it more expedient or profitable for vs, to sit still and suffer our dominions to bee taken from vs, or rather by open warre to make the barbarous king know the greatness of our power and strength? For if we shall enter into open warre; wee being in armes sufficiently provided for all euents, and with carefull eye attending all his attempts, shall easily avoid both himselfe and all his deuises: who if wee be suffered to run still on forward with his prosperous successesse, people will dayly more and more fall vnto him, in hope to liue the better, as his friends. For which cause, I thinke it better to preserve an honourable warre before a doubtfull peace. As for delay it hath hurt many great States, and our selues most of all: whereby wee haue in sort betrayed the empire of GREECE, with the wofull emperor himselfe, when as this tyrant battered the wals of CONSTANTINOPLE: for our traffique was much holpen by the Grecians, whom we then left to themselves. After that, we despaired and reiected the pittifull complaints of the princes of PELOPONNESVS, who with teares craved our aid: and now wee see that famous country lost, and fallen into his hands, through our sloth and negligence. Of late, when as the king of BOSNIA humbly requested our aid, and promised fully to requite our courtesie, and whatsoever els we should doe in his behalfe; we suffered his kingdome to be lost, and himselfe to be cruelly murdered of the Turkes. For all these things by vs thus neglected, we cannot escape the infamous report of all the rest of the nations in EUROPE, but that they will say, That we for the greedie desire of trade and filthie gaine, haue forsaken, and for our parts betrayed whole kingdomes and nations, agreeing with vs both in manner and religion; and to haue stood still, looking on, untill they were subdued and brought in thralldome by the Turkes. Wherefore in few words to shew you the matter, if we shall ioyne in league with the Hungarians, and enter into armes, we shall so be able to keepe our owne: whereas if we shall vse delays, and hunt after peace, we shall in short time see, that he will suddainely deuour vs, being vnprouided, and wrest from vs all our prouinces and territories which border vpon him. And therefore it is (in my opinion) best to send our embassadours into HUNGARIE with a great masse of money to stir vp that warlike nation into the fellowship of this warre. And beside the naue we now haue in readinesse, to put to sea as many mooships and gallies as we are able. The great Bishop also is not to be forgotten, but by all means to be drawne as a cheefe man into this warre. Besides all this, we must doe what wee can to raise vpr rebellion against the Turke in PELOPONNESVS: which will be no hard matter to bring to passe. For if the Peloponnesians rise in armes with one of their poore princes which revolted from the Turkish king, and forsaking all that they had, aduentured themselves into all manner of perill and danger: what thinke you they will doe, if they shall see so great forces coming both by sea and land against the Turkish king? It were good also, that we should send two thousand Italian horsemen into PELOPONNESVS, to animate the people: who when they shall see vs thus to proceed, will undoubtedly presently revolt from the Turkes, and yeeld themselves with their country vnto vs from whence we may most commodiously vex and molest this tyrant: For there is no where better entrance into his kingdome, than by the way of PELOPONNESVS. So that ioyning in league with the Hungarians, we shall beset him on euery side: they all along the riuier of DANEBVS, and we out of PELOPONNESVS. Let vs not therefore sit still with our hands in our bosomes, suffering our countries to be taken from vs, & our subiects made bondslaues to the Turkes: but encouraging them by our example, animate them to take vp armes and valiantly to resist the cruell and barbarous tyrant.

The greater part of the Senat mooued with this graue Senatours speech, decreed without delay to make warres, and to send their embassadours to the Pope, the king of HUNGARY, and other the Christian princes their neighbours, to pray aid of them in these warres against the Turkes. According to this decree, the Venetians for defence of their territorie sent one Bertholdus Eiste, a valiant capitaine, with an armie into P E L O P O N E S S : where at his first coming, he in short time recovered the citie of A R G O S before lost. And departing thence, marched through the country with his armie of fiftene thousand men vnto the strait of C O R I N T H, called I S T H M V S. At which place Mouisius Lauretannus, Admirall for the Venetians (by appointment before made) met him : and there joyning their forces together, with great labour in the space of fifteene dayes fortified all that strait from the Ionian vnto the sea Aegeum, with a continuall rampier and double ditch, in length about fise miles. In which worke they vsed the helpe of thirtie thousand men: and in doing thereof, were much furthered by the ruines of the old wall before destroyed by Amurath. The Venetian commanders hauing fortified this strait, encamped before CORINTH, and laied strait siege vnto it: where, at the second assault, Bertholdus the Generall desirous by his owne forwardnesse to encourage his souldiours, was in that assault greeuously wounded with a stone, cast downe vpon him from the wall, of which hurt he shortly died. Neuerthelesse, the siege was still continued by Bettinus Calcinatus, who succeeded in Bertholdus his place. But whilst the Venetians lay thus at the siege of CORINTH, suddainely newes was brought vnto the campe, that Mahomet was comming with a great armie himselfe in person to raise the siege, and to destroy the new fortifications at ISTHMVS. Whereupon the Venetians left the siege, with purpose to haue defended the late fortified strait. But after that it was certainly knowne, that Mahomet was euen now at hand with an armie of fourescore thousand Turks, Bettinus distrusting with his small number to be able to defend the strait against so puissant an armie, left the place so lately before fortified, and with all his armie retired to NEAPOLIS to keepe the sea coast.

Shortly after, Nabomet without any reluctance at all entered with a world of men by the strait into PELOPONVS: and when he had with the great slaughter of the country people roamed vp and downe about ARGOS, he came to NEAPOLIS, and in most terrible manner assaulted the citie twice: both which times hee was notably repulged by the Venetians, and many of his men slaine. Departing thence, he destroyed and wasted the country about METHONA (now MODON) and CORONE; and assaulted the citie of IVNCV, but with no better successe than he had before NEAPOLIS. Wherefore Winter now drawing on, hee returned with his armie to CONSTANTINOPLE.

After his departure, the Venetians spoiled all that part of ARCHADIA which was subject to the Turkes, requiting him with like injuries as he had done them before. Nor long after, Laurentinus the Venetian Admirall had the Island of LEMNOS deliuered vnto him by one Cominius, a famous pyrat, who had surpris'd the same, and taken it from the Turkes: but distrustful how he should be able to keepe the same, deliuered it ouer vnto the Venetians. Shortly after, Vrsatus Iustinianus, a great magnifico amongst the Venetians, was sent to succeed Laurentinus their Admirall: But whilst he was scouring the Ægeum with a fleet of two and thirtie great gallies, Andreas Dandulus, Generall of their forces at land, inconsiderately encountering with the Turkes horsemen betwene MANTINEA and PITHEME, was by them ouerthrowne and slain, and with him diuerse other gentlemen of great account. In which skirmish fiftene hundred of the Venetians were slaine also with their Generall. And as fortune is neuer more constant than in mischefe, so at the same time Vrsatus, Generall at sea, landing his men in the Island of LESBOS, besieged the citie of MITYLENE, and gaue thereunto two great assaults, wherein he lost fife thousand men. And vnderstanding that the Turkes fleet was comming to releue the citie, raised his siege, and sailed into EVBÆA, and from thence passed ouer into PELOPONVS: where hee shortly after died for sorrow and griefe of mind. In whose place the Venetians sent another famous capitaine called Jacobus Laurentanus.

The Venetians well considering the great power of the Turkish emperor, laboured by their embassadours, to draw as many of the Christian princes as they could into the fellowship of this warre; but especially the great Bishop, by whose meanes they were in good hope to bee greatly strengthened. Pius the second of that name was then the great Bishop, who at first answered the Venetian embassadours, That he must take away the little Turke, before hee had any thing to doe with the great: meaning thereby, Sigismundus Malestestus, prince of ARMINVM; whom he deadly hated, for that he tooke part with the French against the Aragonians. Howbeit (the warres in ITALIE being well appeased) Pius still sollicitèd by the Venetians, made great preparation against the Turkes, giving it out, That hee would in person himselfe goe vnto those warres: and by his authoritie, then much regarded, procured great aid out of GERMANIE, FRANCE, *SPAIN*E, and other countries also farther off: at which time also voluntarie men in great numbers reforted out of all parts of Christendome into ITALIE, ready to adventure their liues in those religious warres. At the same time also the Venetians had with much adoe by the working of Paulus Angelus, Archbishop of DIACONVM, perswaded Scander derbeg to renounce the league which he had before made with the Turke, and to enter into arms againe: which he presently did, and vpon the sudden spoyle the borders of the Turks dominions next vnto him. Wherewith Mahomet was no lesse troubled, than with all the rest of the great preparation of the Christians against him: fearing that (as it was then reported) he should be made generall of the Christian armie, which Mahomet feared might tend to the viter ruine of his kingdome: so dreadfull was the name of Scanderbeg amongst the Turkes. Wherefore thinking it most expedient for his affaires, to reconcile him if it were possible, by his embassadour sent for that purpose, writ vnto him as followeth:

Sultan Mahomet, Emperour of the East and of the West, vnto Scanderbeg, prince of the Albanenses and of the Epirots, greeting.

The letters of
Scanderbeg.

I haue alwayes had thy fidelitie and vpright dealing in great admiration, most noble prince Scanderbeg: for which cause, I thought it a thing incredible, that thou being a prince of such an hericall and princely perfection, should so inconsiderately and without any occasion breake the faith and league which thou not long since solemnely contracted with me. For as I am aduertised, thou hast entred into the confines of our dominions with a great armie, and with fire and sword destroying all that thou couldst, hast caried away with thee a great bootie. Of which thing I know right well, that the Venetians are the onely cause, by whose counsell and perswasion thou hast becme set on to doe this deed; and seduced by their allurements and subtil perswasions, hast made war vpon me, and art become the faithlesse breake of thine owne league, and of the sacred law of nations. Yet doe I little or nothing blame thee therefore, regarding more the cause of the ignominie, than the despite it selfe, and lay the blame vpon them who haue alwayes been my foes and capitall enemies, rather than vpon thee. But alas, what is this vnto me (Scanderbeg) that thou hast done, which possesse so many and so large dominions? Diddest thou thinke to doe so great hurt vnto our kingdome, by spoiling a little peece of our country, and by stealing our cattell, more like a theefe and robber than an open enemy? I yet account not worthe the name of an iniurie. But if thou thinke it so good, proceed in these thy doings: for I make more account of thy friendship and loue, than of whatsoeuer is to me dearest: because as thou knowest I haue alwayes borne vnto thee an especiall fauour, and loued thee most entirely. And therefore as oft as I call to remembrance our tender yeares and old familiaritie whilest we liued together in my fathers court at HADRIANOPLE, I cannot but thinke my selfe bound vnto thee in all courtesie. And therefore my good Scanderbeg, I most heartily request and entreat thee, that we renewing the former conclusions of peace, may of new confirme the same by solemne oath: wherewith if the former peace had bene established, thou wouldest not haue suffered thy selfe to haue been now of the Venetians so circumuenced or seduced. It is therefore needfull, that we now againe for euer confirme a league and peace betwixt vs by solemne and sacred oath on both sides: which if thou shalt doe (as I hope thou wilt) and in this be aduised by me, thou with thy posteritie shall vndoubtedly alwayes raigze in peace, and in safetie possesse whatsoeuer is yours. Where, as if thou shalt doe otherwise (beleue me) it will repent thee, and that right quickly. Thou knowest alreadie my force, which whether thou be able to withstand or not, thou were best to be well aduised. The poore princes thy neighbors, the Venetians thy seducers, cannot deliuer thee from my forces and power. Doe they not see the Grecians almost all rooted out before thy face? the emperours of CONSTANTINOPLE and TRAPEZOND by vs deprived of their empires? the princes of SERBIA and RASIA destroyed? the king of BOSNIA put to death? and all the kingdomes of ASIA, with many other kings and princes mee vanquished and ouerthrowne, and made subiect vnto mee? Wherefore Scanderbeg, I aduise thee in this to follow my counsell, keepe thy promise, and so beleue me thou shalt not be deceived. Concerning these matters, we haue giuen further commaundement to our embassadour and seruant Mustapha, which commeth vnto thee: vnto whom doubt thou not to giue credence in any thing. Farewell from our imperiall citie of CONSTANTINOPLE the 7 of May 1463.

Scanderbeg hauing by the afore said messenger receiued these letters, and well considered of the same, returned answer as followeth:

The champion of Christ Iesus, George Castriot, otherwise called Scanderbeg, prince of the Albanenses and Epirots, to the most excellent Mahomet king of the Turkes, greeting.

Thou marvell (most noble Mahomet) that my souldiors (as you say) contrarie to our league and the conditions conditions of our peace, haue entered into your confines, and from thence caried a great bootie. Of which thing (you say) the Venetians are the authors, whom you call your mortall enemies: inferring afterward, that you are little therewith offended, for that you are a most mightie prince, and can easily digest such vniuersall, for the great loue you beare vnto me: and the rather for that I did it deceived (as it pleaseth you to say) by others. All these things you can easily forgine and forget: so that I will by solemne oath confirme the same conditions of peace that were in our former league betwixt vs agreed vpon. And thereunto you do greatly vrge me, you admonish and counsell me to follow your aduise, as tending to the great profit and securitie of me and my posteritie, least happily whilest I seeke to please the Venetians, I incur your heauie displeasure. Besides this, the more to terrifie me, you reckon up as it were in a catalogue, the people, nations, kings, and princes, by you overcome and subdued. But what is that which is so strange (I pray you) and which you so much maruell at (most noble Mahomet)? Is it not for that my souldiors did that in the confines of your dominions, whereof they were (of right) sorrie: and had therof to me complained, that your souldiors had before done the like in their goods and possessions. Wherefore if they also vpon a militarie brauerie (as is your manner of phrase) haue made themselves whole, and done one shewd turne for another reuenging iniurie receiued, and not inferring any of new: there is no cause that you should either thinke it strange or blame me. I would my selfe haue restrained my souldiors, although they were greenously iniured (I will plainly confesse vnto you a truth) I would haue appeased their angrie minds, enflamed with desire of reuenge; if you (a prince of all others most rich and bountifull) would either haue taken order, that full restitution might haue bene made vnto them of all such things as they had lost, or els would with condigne punishment haue chastised the insolence of your souldiors: which you would seeme to conuer with the tearme of militarie wantonnesse or brauerie; an excuse scarce currant amongst children. For although offences are in all places greenous, yet ought they most of all so to be deemed in martiall affairs. What I pray you, would you haue me to take it for a lasciuiousnes in your men of war? especially when I had receiued so great losse, when as you might with a word first haue restrained them from doing of it, and at your pleasure corrected them after the deed was done. Wherefore (most excellent Mahomet) take you also in good part these our tearmes, which you haue accustomed hitherto most gloriously to giue and sell vnto vs, whilest you alwayes couer your reach with some excuse or shew of right. As for that in excusing me vnder colour of old acquaintance and friendship you inuey against the Venetians, verely you do them wrong: for why those good, iust, and vertuous princes are not to be slandered by you, as seducers of me or others. Beside, what need that inuincible state to enter into counsell with me, or (as it pleaseth you to say) to allure me to fall at ods with you, or to prosecute you as their enemy? Who of them, I beseech you, (I say) of themselves alone, when occasion shall require, are able to dare you in plaine battell, and to abate your pride. Further, where as you aduise me to reiect their friendship, your labour is therein but lost: for what man is so disperate, or hated of his subiects, that would not chuse rather to erre with that most honorable Senat, than to be in the right with you? especially I, who haue of long time bene confederat with them, and am of all others vnto them most deere: which you for all that had no regard of, but (according to your vntrustie dealing) breaking in sunder the bonds of peace, spoiled and wasted their territorie in PELOPONNESVS. Neither can your great threats terrifie me, which you after the Turkish manner thundr & poure out against me, except I will be ouerruled by you: for it is the part of an Albanese both to endure when need shall require, and also to do such things as be seeme a man of courage. You cannot make me afraid, being but a small prince, with my honorable friends the Venetians. And what are you? so great an emperour of the East and of the West, and of all parts of the world, as you vaine tearme your selfe? Truly you make me smile, and other Christian princes laugh you to scorne, in vsurping falsely to your selfe the stately stile of the emperour of the world. What possesse you in ASIA the greater? verely nothing. Is all yours in ASIA the lesser? not so. What haue you in EUROPE? except THRACIA, MYTIA, part of GRECIA, and PELOPONNESVS, with the Isle of MYTILENE. As for AFRICA, you neuer set your foot therein. Is this to be emperour of all the world? But suppose, suppose (I say) woorthie Mahomet, that all from the farthest part of the Ocean were yours, you ought not therefore so to swell, as to contemne all others. Cease to boast, and learn now (if you can) the speciall but true examples of humane fragilitie. Where are now the Assyrians, which sometime swayd the world? where be the Medes? where the Persians? and to be short, where are the Romans, the great commanders of all? Verely, Iamerlane the Scythian king (called the terror of the world) was far greater than you: who in triumph drew before his chariot thy great grandfather Baiazet in chains: who had before gained so many victories, whom neuer the lesse he ouerthrew in the plains of ARMENIA, with three hundred thousand Turkes hauing in his armie (as is reported) twelue hundred thousand thousand men greater than Xerxes or Darius, whose armies couered the seas, and dried up the rivers before them as they went, yet for all this (noble Mahomet) they are all cast out by him that casteth out all nations, the finger of the highest hath brought them all to nought. Wherefore learn to know your selfe to be a man also. Trust not too much to the multitude of your souldiors, and strength of your armies: for oftentimes great and puissant armies haue been ouerthrowne with far lesse, as all histories beare witness: whereof it is commonly said, Thou shalt not praise the valor of the Generall, before he be brought to the triumph. And do you not thinke Mahomet, that God will fauour the better cause? you know, you well know, that all your kingdome is violently gotten, that it is wrongfully and vniustly possessed: for which cause I am not afraid not only to withstand you when you shall come, being so great a prince; but also valiantly and courageously to dare you into the field, and by the power of God both to hope for, and have a notable victorie ouer you. We haue souldiors also, which know how to vse their weapons, to march before their enemies, and how to beare themselves in the heat of the battell. Wherefore, to that you say vnto me for the new confirming of the former league, you labour now but in vaine to circumuent me with such faire gloses, I hate your faith in such distrust, and your friendship in detestation: for as much as you cunningly and subtilly, after the manner of your ancestors, whatsoeuer you do, or whatsoeuer you promise vnto me, it tendeth all to no other end than to thrust me out of my kingdome. Yet thus long I haue by Gods helpe well escaped all your policies, all your crafts and deceits. But I hope there will in short time be an end of all these matters, when all your sleights and deuises shall not ease you, neither your winking head or Turkish pride any thing profit you. It is not I alone that so much stomacke you, there cometh after me a great number of Christian princes: Behold, the whole chinalrie and glorie of the Christian commonweale is in armes, and coming against thee with all their force: all the kings and princes of Christendome haue combined themselves together, with the great Bishop, against thy state, and will in short time be present to destroy thee & thy kingdome. Wherefore (worthie Mahomet) I haue thought it good in regard of our old friendship (although the same hath by you been greatly empaiued and violated) to forewarne you of all these things, that you might gather your wits together, and in time provide for the safetie of your selfe and of your kingdome. You see the force and power of so many great princes, from which whether you can escape or no, I know not: yet you may, if you will follow my aduise, you may I say make both your name and empire of great, greater, of famous most renowned, of fortunate most happy and blessed; if casting off from you the grosse errors of the Mahometane superstition, you will embrace the faith and truth of Christ Iesus, and at length haue regard of your soules health. And you which excell all your predecessors in highnesse of spirit and pregnancy of wit, suffer not your selfe and your subiects as it were by inheritance to be longer blinded in your wilfull errors: but doe that (as wise prince) of your owne accord, which other wise you will shortly of necessitie be constrained to doe. To say, Had I wist, hath ever been accounted a great disgrace from the mouth of an emperor. At length amend and measure your selfe. Behold, Almighty God doth offer you means, whereby you may quiet the whole state of your kingdome, and all our kings and princes lone, honour, and reuerence you. Neither let the ambitious desire of souerainetie or immoderate care of those things you possesse, trouble you from so doing: For whatsoeuer you haue vniustly and unlawfully vsurped, the Christian princes will grame, confirme, and establish vnto thee, as if they had been your owne by antient inheritance. So shall you be a true monarch indeed, and rule and raigne lawfully, if you shall embrace this faith, and worship God aright: which so soone as you shall fee the sweetnesse of, you will be sorrie that you knew it no sooner, you will grieve at the time you haue lost, and utterly detest and abhorre all that filthy superstition which the most filthy false Prophet Mahomet hath left amongst you. From our campe the 26 of May 1463.

With these letters Scanderbeg dismissed the Turks embassadour. About which time he received letters from the great bishop, That he accompanied with the Christian princes, would without delay come ouer into EPIRVS with a strong army of valiant Christians, to joine their forces with his against the common enemy of the Christian religion: exhorting him in all their names to denounce war against the Turkish king. Which thing Scanderbeg most joyfully undertooke: and without delay with all his power brake into the Turkes dominion, burning and destroying the country before him as he went: from whence he returned laded with the spoile there gotten.

When Mahomet had perused Scanderbeg his letters, and certainly vnderstood of the great preparation made against him in ITALIE, as also of the great spoile of late made by Scanderbeg, hee became exceeding melancholic, as a man much troubled in mind, which dayly more and more more increased: for that hee saw not the wonted cheerefulness in his men of war, but all full of heaviness and dispaire, as if they had beene men already vanquished. Neuertheless, he speedily took order for the leuying of a great armie: fortifying his cities and strong holds, leaving nothing vndone that was possible, for the assurance of his state. And to repress the furie of Scanderbeg, sent Siremer Bassa with fourteen thousand souldiours to lie vpon the borders of EPIRVS, with charge onely to attend vpon him. Who mindfull of his charge came into MACEDONIA towards vnto the citie OCRIIDA, now called ALBIRIA, in the verie confines of MACEDONIA towards EPIRVS, and there lay with his armie: some part thereof lodged in the citie, and the rest in places more conuenient neere about the same.

The coming of the Bassa, as also the manner of his lying, was not vnknown to Scanderbeg, who desired nothing more than to bee doing with him. Wherefore he secretly in the night marched towards OCRIIDA with twelve thousand souldiours, and being come within three miles of the towne, lay close in ambush, and vpon the breaking of the day sent out 500 horsemen towards the enemy, vnder the conduct of Peicus Emanuel, and Petrus Angelus, two valiant and expert captaines, to draw him if they could into the field. But Scanderbeg had before commanded them, that if the enemy did come forth to fight, they should make but small resistance, but retire backe as if they had fled, and so to traine him on to the place where the armie lay. Which was so well performed by the two skillfull captaines, that the Bassa with all his power was according as they could haue wished, drawne into the field, and brought to the verie place where Scanderbeg lay: Who suddenly rising vp with all his armie, assailed the Turkes on euery side, and slew them as deere enclosed in a toile. In this battell ten thousand of the Turkes were slaine, the treasurer of the armie with twelve other of great marke were taken prisoners, and brought bound to Scanderbeg, who were presently ransomed for 40 thousand ducats.

Scanderbeg hauing obtained the victorie, returned with triumph into EPIRVS, daily expecting the coming of the great armie out of ITALY: but fatal destinie, the mightie controuler of mens highest designs, had not so appointed. For when Pius the great bishop had out of all parts of Christendome assembled a great armie (whereof the greatest part were voluntarie souldiours) and all things were now in such readinesse, that he had put himselfe vpon the way, and was come to ANCONA, a citie vpon the sea side (where Christophorus Maurus duke of VANCE came vnto him, with ten gallies well appointed, to haue accompanied him in those warres: and all men were now in expectation of some great matter to haue beene done) suddenly he fell sick of a feuer, and died in the yeare 1464. Whereupon the armie was forthwith dispersed, and all that great preparation frustrated, to the exceeding griefe of many Christian princes; and no lesse joy of the Turkes, who now rejoiced to see themselves deliuered of so great a feare.

About this same time, Vittor Capella chiefe persuader of this warre betwixt the Venetians and the Turkes, was by the Senat sent Generall of their forces at sea, in stead of Laurentius, whose yeare was then expired. He hauing received the charge from Laurentius, and sayling out of EVBOEA, in short time tooke from the enemy the citie of AVLIS in PELOPONESVS ouer against CHALCIS, and also the citie of LARVS in the gulf of THESSALONICA, with the isle of HINER. Afterwards landing his men by night at PYRVS, he suddenly surprised the citie of ATHENS (now called SATINAE) sometime the mother of learning, and most noble citie of GRACIA; and from thence carried away with him into EVBOEA all the people he there found, as his prisoners, together with the rich spoile of that citie. Whilest he lay in EVBOEA, he was persuaded that the citie of PATRAS in PELOPONESVS would be deliuered vnto him by the Christians that dwelt therein, if hee did but shew himselfe before it. Whereupon he departed from EVBOEA, and coming into the gulf of PATRAS, landed 4000 footmen vnder the leading of Barbaricus, and 200 horsemen, of whom one Nicholaus Ragius was captaine. Barbaricus marching toward PATRAS, was come within a mile of the citie; when manie of the horsemen, and of the vnruely mariners, disorderly scattering abroad, neglected the intended service, and sought after pillage all about the countrey. The Turkes garrisons taking this opportunity, set vpon them with their horsemen, and so easily ouerthrew them, being scattered and out of order. At the first encounter, Barbaricus himselfe was slaine: Ragius captaine of the horsemen was taken, & aliue empaiued vpon a sharpe stake. Of all them that were landed, scarce a thousand were left, who saved their liues by flying vnto the gallies. With this ouerthrow Vittor the Venetian Admirall was greatly discomfited; yet hauing conceived some hope of better success, in few daies daies after attempted againe to haue taken P A T R A S, but with like hap as before. For hauing lost a thousand of his men about the citie, and the rest glad to take their refuge to the fleet, he was constrained with great dishonour to depart thence. And so full of sorrow and heaviness returning into E V B O A oppressed with melancholy, there suddenly died.

The Venetians deceived of the great hope they had conceived of the generall preparation made against the Turkes, and much troubled with the hard proceeding of their warres against so mightie an enemy: by their embassadours solicited Mathias, not long before chosen king of H V N G A R I E, to joyne in league with them, and to take vpon himes against the common enemy: offering presently to furnish him with a great summe of money, beside a large yearly pension for the maintenance of those warres: for which he should to his power by land defend all their territorie betwixt the Rhetian Alpes, and the Adriatique; against the invasion of the Turke.

This Mathias surnamed Corvinus, was the younger sonne of the most famous capitaine Johannides, whose elder brother Vladislaus, a gentleman of such courage as might well shew who his sonne he was, being not able to digest the injuries and disgraces done vnto him and his brother, by Vrbicus countie of C I L I A, and ynnke vnto Ladislaus the yong king of B O H E M I A and H V N G A R I E; for the despite he alwaies bare vnto their father Huniades, slew the same Vrbicus at A L B A R E G A L I S, euen in the kings court. Which outrage the yong king was glad for the present to winke at, and also to grant him pardon; as hauing taken away the man, whose immoderate power well stood not with the kings safetie: but in deed fearing the citizens of A L B A R E G A L I S, who exceedingly fauoured the sonnes of Huniades for their fathers sake, for all that, Ladislaus returning into B O H E M I A, caused both the sons of Huniades vpon the sudden to be apprehended, and most cruelly executed Vladislaus, being then about six and twentie yeares old. Mathias the younger brother was kept in prison, expecting nothing else but to be partaker of his brothers hard fortune: as vndoubtedly he had, had not Ladislaus the yong king vpon the sudden, as hee was vpon the top of his marriage with Magdalaine the French kings daughter, by vntimely death bene taken away. After whose death, the Hungarians for the loue they bare vnto the remembrance of Huniades, by a militarie election, chose this Mathias his youngest sonne, then in prison at P R A G E, to be their king. Whereof Pogebrawe (who after the death of Ladislaus, of an old gouernour had made himselfe the yong king of B O H E M I A) hauing speedie intelligence as he was sitting at supper, sent for Mathias his prisoner, and when he was come, commaunded him to sit downe at the vpper end of the table: whereat the yong gentleman being then but about eightene yeares of age, and sore abashed, began to craue pardon. But when the king would needs haue it so, and that he was set; the king to quiet his troubled thoughts, willed him to be of good cheere, for that he had good newes to tell him. Good newes, said he, if it would please your maiestie to grant me libertie. Yea that, said the king; and more to: and then saluting him by the name of the king of H V N G A R I E, brake vnto him the whole matter, how that he was by the generall consent of the Hungarians, chosen their king. And so in few daies after, married vnto him his daughter: which done, he furnished him with all things fit for his estate, and royally accompanied him into H V N G A R I E, where he was with great joy and triumph receiued of the Hungarians: ouer whom he afterwards gloriously taigned for the space of eight and thirtie yeares. In which time, he notably enlarged the kingdome of H V N G A R I E, and became a farre greater terrour vnto the Turkes, than euer was his father Huniades. And therewithall (which is not to be accounted in the least part of his praises) was alwaies a great fauourer and furtherer of good letters, and ingenious deuises.

But to returne againe to our purpose, Mathias hauing well considered of that the Venetians had requested: answered them, that they had many times before in like case refused to giue aid vnto the Hungarian kings his predecessours: yea and that more was, thought it a thing not reasonable, that anie such thing should be requested at their hands; forasmuch as they theretoe receiued no harme from the Turke, but were in league and amitie with him: so that the Hungarian kings wanting their helpe, had manie times receiued greater losse from the Turke, than otherwise they should haue done, if they had bene by them aided. Yet for all that, he was content to forget all such unkindnesse, and to grant them what they had requested: promising the next Spring to inuade the Turkes dominion, and according to their request, to take into his protection all their territorie betwixt the Rhetian Alpes, and the Adriatique: which thing hee most honourably performed. For with the first of the Spring he passed ouer Danubius at B A I G R A D E with a puissant armie, and rased the forts which the Turkes had built thereabouts; and so entering into S E R V I A, laid all the countrey waste before him: and afterwards laden with spoile, returned home, carrying away with him twentie thousand captiues. Neither so rested, but with great good fortune maintained great warres against Mahomet during all the time of his raigne: and afterwards against Baiazet his sonne also, wherein he most commonly returned with victorie: so that it is of him as truly as briefly written, That no Christian king or chieftaine, did more often or with greater fortune fight against the Turkish nation, or had of them greater victories.
